JUDICIAL AND STATUTORY DEFINITIONS

OF

WORDS AND PHRASES.

VOLUME 5.

KEROSENE.

Naphtha, benzine, benzol, and kerosene are all refined coal or earth oils, not differing in their nature, but only in the degree of inflammability; kerosene being much less inflammable than either of the others. Morse v. Buffalo Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 30 Wis. 534, 536, 11 Am. Rep. 587.

In the American Encyclopædia "kerosene" is said to be a term originally employed as a trade-mark for a mixture of certain liquid hydrocarbons used for purposes of illumination. It has been prepared from bituminous coal, bituminous shales, asphaltum, malthus, wood, resin, fish oil, and candle tar; but it is doubtless true that at the present time its practical business source is petroleum, from which it is obtained by a process of distillation and refinement. It is therefore, in a commercial sense, a refined coal or earth oil. Bennett v. North British & Mercantile Ins. Co., 81 N. Y. 273, 275, 37 Am. Rep. 501.

Judicial notice cannot be taken of the fact that kerosene is explosive, as the Legislature has in fact declared that there is a degree of purity to which it may be brought and at which it may be kept on sale in cities with comparative safety, and judicial notice will only be taken of those matters which must happen according to the constant and invariable course of nature, or of such general and public notoriety that every one may fairly be presumed to be acquainted with them. Wood v. Northwestern Ins. Co., 46 N. Y. 421, 424.

KEY.

The term "key," as used in a statute prohibiting any person from having in his possession at night burglars' tools, a key, pick-lock, etc., comprehends a skeleton key and any kind of a key employed for purposes of house-breaking. Reg. v. Oldham, 14 Eng. L. & Eq. 568, 570.

The words "stole a key," in a charge that a certain person broke into a room and stole a key, are actionable, as a key may be the subject of larceny. Hoskins v. Tarrence (Ind.) 5 Blackf. 417, 35 Am. Dec. 129.

KEYAGE.

"Keyage" is the money or toll taken for lading or unlading wares at a key, or port. Rowan's Ex'rs v. Town of Portland, 47 Ky. (8 B. Mon.) 232, 253.

KICK—KICKING.

The term "kick," as applied to railroad cars, describes the operation of placing a car on the siding. It may be described as follows: "The car to be kicked standing between the engine and the switch, the switch is thrown to the proper position, the car uncoupled from the engine, and the engine started, shoving the uncoupled cars as it moves. When sufficient momentum has been given the car to move it to the desired spot, the movement of the engine is stopped, and the car allowed to move on; some one riding on the car to apply the brakes at the proper place for stopping." Erb v. Eggleston, 60 N. W. 98, 99, 41 Neb. 860.

What is known in railroad parlance as "kicking" refers to the practice of uncoupling one car from the other cars of a train and imparting to such car sufficient momentum by the switch engine, so that the car will be carried a short distance by force of such momentum. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. O'Neil, 50 N. E. 216, 217, 172 Ill. 527; Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Champion, 36 N. E. 221,

222, 9 Ind. App. 510, 53 Am. St. Rep. 357; Mark v. St. Paul, M. & M. Ry. Co., 20 N. W. 131, 132, 32 Minn. 208; Howard v. St. Paul, M. & M. Ry. Co., 20 N. W. 93, 32 Minn. 214.

To transfer a car to another track or switch by what is called in the language of railroad men a "kicking switch," the engine is moved forward at sufficient speed to give the car the momentum which will move it to a place where it is desired to have it, and while in motion the engine is uncoupled from the car, and is then stopped. Pringle v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 21 N. W. 108, 64 Iowa, 613.

Making a switch by "kicking," or shunting, means by pushing a car backward by the remainder of the train, uncoupling, and then stopping the train, allowing the car to run on by force of the momentum received by the train. Pinney v. Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co., 71 Mo. App. 577, 580.

Flying switch distinguished.

"Making flying switch" and "kicking cars" are terms denoting nearly the same thing. In the former, the engine may be in front, and, upon being disconnected, the rear cars may be run upon another track while still rolling. In "kicking cars" the disconnected cars are given their impetus by a backward motion of the engine, which does not follow them. Bradley v. Ohio River & C. Ry. Co., 36 S. E. 181, 183, 126 N. C. 735.

KICK SIGNAL.

There is a difference between a "back-up signal" and a "kick signal." A back-up signal means that the engineer shall back up the train. A kick signal means that the speed shall be sufficiently increased to throw the cut-off car into the side track by the force of the increased momentum, without following the car into the switch with the rest of the train. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Hill, 70 S. W. 103, 105, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 12.

KICKER.

A "kicker" is a device for opening the door of stoves by the use of the foot. Lowman v. Excelsior Stove Pattern Co., 16 South. 17, 19, 104 Ala. 367.

KIDNAPPING.

Kidnapping is an aggravated species of false imprisonment. Costello v. State, 14 S. W. 1011, 29 Tex. App. 127 (citing Pen. Code, art. 521; Click v. State, 3 Tex. 282); Smith v. State, 23 N. W. 879, 881, 63 Wis. 453.

Kidnapping, under the common law, is false imprisonment aggravated by carrying the imprisoned person to some other place, and is changed somewhat by Rev. St. 1881, §

1915, providing that any person who kidnaps, or forcibly carries away, or decoys, or arrests, or imprisons any person, with the intention of having him carried away from his place of residence under the laws, is guilty of kidnapping. Eberling v. State, 35 N. E. 1023, 1024, 136 Ind. 117.

Kidnapping is said to be the forcible abduction and carrying away of a man, woman, or child from his or her own country, and sending him or her to another. Click v. State, 3 Tex. 282, 285 (citing 2 Toml. Law Dict. 335; 4 Bl. Comm. 219; 1 East, P. C. 430, § 4); Smith v. State, 23 N. W. 879, 881, 63 Wis. 453.

A person who willfully seizes, confines, or inveigles another, with intent to cause him without authority of law to be secretly confined, or in any way held or kept or detained, against his will, is guilty of "kidnapping." Dehn v. Mandeville, 52 N. Y. St. Rep. 281, 282, 22 N. Y. Supp. 984.

Whoever kidnaps, or forcibly or fraudulently carries off or decoys from his place of residence, or imprisons or arrests, any person, with the intention of having such person carried away from his place of residence, etc., shall be guilty of kidnapping. Rev. St. Ind. 1881, § 1915; Boes v. State, 125 Ind. 205, 206, 25 N. E. 218.

"Kidnapping" is defined by the statutes to be the forcible or fraudulent carrying off from his place of residence, or arresting or imprisoning any person with intent to have such person carried away from his residence, unless in pursuance of law. State v. Sutton, 116 Ind. 527, 530, 19 N. E. 602.

"Kidnapping" is defined by statute as where a person willfully seizes, confines, inveigles, or kidnaps another, with intent to cause him, without authority of law, to be secretly confined or imprisoned within the state, or be sent out of the state, or be sold as a slave, or in any way held or kept or detained against his will. Dehn v. Mandeville, 22 N. Y. Supp. 984, 985, 68 Hun, 335.

The crime of "kidnapping" may be committed in either one of two ways: (1) By forcibly or fraudulently carrying one off or decoying him from his place of residence, unless it be done in pursuance of law, state or federal; (2) by arresting or imprisoning a person, with the intention of having him carried away, unless it be done in pursuance of like authority. State v. Kimmerling, 124 Ind. 382, 384, 24 N. E. 722.

Actual force or fraud.

In 2 Rev. St. p. 664, § 28, providing that every person who shall without lawful authority forcibly seize, etc., any other, or shall inveigle or kidnap any other, etc., shall be punished, etc., "kidnap" includes procuring the intoxication of a sailor with the design of getting him on shipboard without his consenting and taking him on board in that condition as much so as if the kidnapping had been done by force, overcoming his resistance while in full strength. Hadden v. People, 25 N. Y. 373, 378.

The word "kidnap," in a statute providing that one who without lawful authority seizes, inveigles, or kidnaps another, with intent to cause her to be securely confined or imprisoned in the state, or to be sent out of the state, etc., or detained against her will, is guilty of kidnapping, ordinarily implies actual force. People v. De Leon, 16 N. E. 46, 47, 109 N. Y. 226, 4 Am. St. Rep. 444.

It is not necessary, in order to constitute the crime of kidnapping, that there should be actual violence. In Designey's Case, T. Raym. 474, it appears that the defendant spirited away the son of another and was adjudged guilty. State v. Rollins, 8 N. H. 550, 567. See, also, Cochran v. State, 18 S. E. 16, 17, 91 Ga. 763.

Purpose of act immaterial.

Under Pen. Code, § 207, every person who forcibly steals, takes, or arrests any person in this state and carries him into another country is guilty of kidnapping. This language necessarily implies that the arrest and conveyance to another country must be without the consent of the person injured and without any lawful authority therefor. But the particular purpose intended to be accomplished by such unlawful act is immaterial. The crime consists of a false imprisonment, aggravated by a removal to another country. The allegation in an indictment as to the purpose of defendant is therefore surplusage. People v. Fick, 26 Pac. 759, 760, 89 Cal. 144.

Removal.

Pen. Code, § 207, declaring that every person who forcibly takes, steals, or arrests any person in this state and carries him into another country, state, or county, or who forcibly takes or arrests another person, with the design to take him out of this state, without having established a claim according to a law of the United States or of this state, or who persuades, entices, decoys, or induces, by false pleas, misrepresentations, or otherwise, any person to go out of the state, or to be taken or removed therefrom, for the purpose of intending to sell such person into slavery or involuntary servitude, or employ him for his own use or the use of another without the free will of such person, is guilty of kidnapping under such statute. Where the person is removed from one country to an island, which is also a part of the same county, though separated by the high seas, the person so acting is not guilty of kidnapping. Ex parte Keil, 24 Pac. 742, 85 Cal. 309.

It is not necessary, in order to complete the offense of kidnapping, that the party should be carried out of one country and sent into another. If he is seized, and an actual transportation takes place with that view, the offense would seem to be complete. Nor is it material that the intention was to transport to some other country than the United States. For this purpose the various states are foreign, each to the others. It is questionable indeed whether it is necessary that the transportation to another state or country should be in contemplation. East says: "The most aggravated species of false imprisonment is the stealing and carrying away or secreting of any person, sometimes called 'kidnapping,' which is an offense at the common law. * * *

Of this nature is the offense pointed out by St. 43 Eliz. c. 13, which, reciting that many subjects dwelling * * * within the counties of Cumberland, Northumberland," etc., "had been taken * * * and carried out of the same counties, or to some other place within the same, as prisoners, * * * enacts," etc. But he says, further: "The forcible abduction * * * of any person is greatly aggravated by sending them away from their own country into another, properly called 'kidnapping.'" State v. Rollins, 8 N. H. 550, 567. See, also, People v. Fick, 26 Pac. 759, 760, 89 Cal. 144.

Want of consent.

To constitute kidnapping the detention must be against the consent of the person detained. The fact that under Pen. Code Tex. art. 513, force is not an essential element, if the person kidnapped is a female under the age of 15 years, does not dispense with the necessity of her nonconsent. Costello v. State, 14 S. W. 1011, 29 Tex. App. 127.

A female 14 years of age, being by law as competent to contract marriage as one of 18 years and upward, and the validity of her marriage not depending in any degree upon the consent of her parents or guardians, it is not "kidnapping," under section 4308 of the Code, providing that any person who shall forcibly, maliciously, or fraudulently lead, take, or carry away, or decoy or entice, any child under the age of 18 years from its parents or guardians, against his or their wills and without her or their consent, shall be indicted for kidnapping, for a man not himself under any disability to lead, take, or carry her away from her parents against their will and without their consent for the bona fide purpose of marrying her, which marriage is actually consummated; the girl herself freely consenting, and no force or fraud being used by the man, either against her or her parents. Cochran v. State, 18 S. E. 16, 17, 91 Ga. 763. See, also, People v. Fick, 26 Pac. 759, 760, 89 Cal. 144.

KIDNEY TROUBLE.

An answer in the proofs of death that insured had had "kidney trouble" should not be construed as inconsistent with an answer in an application that he never had disease of the kidneys, since there might have been a kidney trouble from accident, or from some other temporary cause, such as to produce sickness when it could not properly be said that there was disease of such organs. Hogan v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 41 N. E. 663, 664, 164 Mass. 448.

KILL

See "Assault with Intent to Kill"; "Pre-meditated Killing."

Other kind of killing, see "Other."

Person killed or otherwise, see "Otherwise."

Within a statute punishing any person who shall kill any fur seal within the limits of Alaska territory, "kill" means actual killing of the seal. A person cannot be punished for preparing, attempting, or intending to kill seal. Until the deed is done, the locus penitentiae is open to him, and he may abandon the illegal purpose, and avoid the punishment prescribed by the act. So with the vessel. It can only be engaged in violating this section when it is successfully used or employed to accomplish the same result. The Ocean Spray (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 558, 559.

"Kill any dog," as used in Rev. St. c. 58, § 12, providing that any person may kill any dog, being without a collar, should not be construed to include authority to convert a dog without a collar to a person's own use. The object of the statute is not to confer a benefit on the individual, but to rid society of a nuisance by killing a dog. Cummings v. Perham, 42 Mass. (1 Metc.) 555, 556.

In popular language, as well as in legal phraseology, a party is said to have "killed" one on whom he has inflicted a blow of which the wounded person soon dies. The recognized doctrine is that where a mortal wound is given, and the wounded person dies within a year and a day, the intentment of the law is that the wound caused the death. Martin v. Copiah County, 15 South. 73, 74, 71 Miss. 407.

One person may be said to have "killed" another from the time of the infliction of the wound. Newton County v. Doolittle, 18 South. 451, 452, 72 Miss. 929.

"Kill," as used in a statute providing that every person who shall be convicted of an assault and battery on another by means of any deadly weapon with the intent to kill or maim, shall be indicted, etc., the words "to kill" are used in a general sense and mean any felonious homicide. People v. Kerains (N. Y.) 1 Thomp. & C. 333, 339.

The words "to kill with a pistol," as used in an information charging an assault with intent to commit murder, are of more extensive significance than either of the words, "touch," "strike," "beat" or wound, used in the statute defining the offense, and include all that is signified by either or all of them. State v. Feamster, 41 Pac. 52, 53, 12 Wash. 461.

As importing crime.

The word "kill," when applied to persons, implies force, violence, a destruction of the organs necessary to life, and, if unaccompanied by any explanation or qualifying words, has a felonious signification, so that words charging a physician and surgeon with having killed six children within one year, if spoken of him in his professional capacity, are actionable per se. Carroll v. White (N. Y.) 33 Barb. 615, 620.

A recognizance, providing that the accused would appear and answer on a charge "of killing one T.," is the same as if the recognizance contained the word "feloniously" immediately before the word "killing," as such word imports a felonious killing against the accused; for the law presumes and holds that every killing of a human being is a felonious killing until the contrary appears. State v. Williams, 17 Ark. 371, 377.

The word "kill," in a charge that another has killed one negro and nearly killed another, made with reference to slaves, does not necessarily impute a charge of felonious killing. The word is capable of two constructions—the one innocent and the other defamatory—and it is a question for the jury in a slander suit to determine in which sense the word was used. Hays v. Hays, 20 Tenn. (1 Humph.) 402.

A charge of "killing" a human being signifies a voluntary and unlawful killing, and therefore is actionable. O'Conner v. O'Conner, 24 Ind. 218, 220.

The words, "He killed her with his bad conduct, and I think he knows more about her being drowned than anybody else," do not, in their natural sense, import any charge of criminal homicide, and therefore the words are not actionable per se. But the words, "He killed her," when taken in connection with other words, that he is to blame for her death and that there was foul play there, may fairly be considered to impute a crime, and therefore are actionable. Thomas v. Blasdale, 18 N. E. 214, 215, 147 Mass. 438.

Words alleging that others "killed cattle no more theirs than mine" in themselves import only a trespass, and not a crime, and therefore are not actionable in themselves. Porter v. Hughey, 5 Ky. (2 Bibb) 232.

As murder.

An instruction that defendant's offense would not be reduced to an aggravated assault, if he assaulted the deceased with a knife, which was a deadly weapon, with intent to kill, was erroneous in concluding with the word "kill," instead of the word "murder," as there exists an intention to kill in manslaughter. Peterson v. State, 12 Tex. App. 650, 656.

In an action on a recognizance, conditioned that accused should appear to answer on a charge of assault and battery with intent to kill, to which there was a demurrer on the ground that the recognizance does not describe an offense known to our laws, the court said: "The inference would be correct, were the premises true. The words 'with intent to kill' certainly do not aggravate the charge, which they were meant to qualify, into a penitentiary offense. To have done that, the intent must have been to 'murder.' But although these words do not add to, they do not destroy, the meaning of those which do actually charge a crime—an assault and battery." Sweetser v. State (Ind.) 4 Blackf. 528.

Where a statute provided that any slave, free negro, or mulatto, who should administer to any person medicine with intent to kill such person, should be adjudged guilty of felony, the words "with intent to kill" were construed to mean with intent to commit murder. Sarah v. State, 22 Miss. (6 Cushm.) 267, 278, 61 Am. Dec. 544.

The words "kill and murder," in an indictment for assault with a dangerous weapon, which charges by way of aggravation that the assault was made with the intent to kill and murder, does not invalidate the indictment, as charging two distinct offenses, as the usual form of charging murder has always been to use in conclusion the words, "kill and murder." Commonwealth v. Clarke, 39 N. E. 280, 162 Mass. 495.

KILL

"Kill" is a Dutch word, signifying a channel or bed of the river, and hence the river or stream itself. French v. Carhart, 1 N. Y. (1 Comst.) 96, 107.

KILO.

A "kilo" is equivalent to slightly more than 2.20 pounds. Richard v. Haebler, 86 App. Div. 94, 103, 55 N. Y. Supp. 583, 584.

KIN.

See "Next of Kin."

Primarily the words "nearest of kin" indicate the nearest degree of consanguinity, and they are perhaps more frequently used in this sense than in any other. Swasey v. Jaques, 10 N. E. 758, 761, 144 Mass. 135, 59 Am. Rep. 65.

The words "nearest of kin," as used in a residuary clause of a will, mean nearest blood relation, when the context does not imply the contrary. Keniston v. Mayhew, 47 N. E. 612, 613, 169 Mass. 166.

The word "kin," as used in Rev. St. c. 120, § 48, providing that, when it shall appear that the justice before whom an action is brought is near of kin to either party, he shall remove the case to some other justice, etc., includes both relations by blood and marriage; and hence a justice of the peace is disqualified from trying a cause to which his son-in-law is a party. The word "kin" is not used here in its strictest sense, as including only relations by blood, but is used in its more general sense, including both relations by blood and marriage. Hibbard v. Odell, 16 Wis. 633, 635.

Rev. St. 1879, § 1894, providing that, when any indictment or information alleges an offense against the person or property of another, neither the injured party nor any "person of kin to him" shall be a competent juror, etc., includes a person whose father was a second cousin to defendant's mother. State v. Walton, 74 Mo. 270, 285.

The word "kin," when standing alone in a will, without anything else to show what kin the testator meant, has received an interpretation to the effect that the kin meant are such kin as could take under the statute of descent and distribution. Lusby v. Cobb, 32 South. 6, 7, 80 Miss. 715.

The words "kin" and "kindred," as applied to the descent of estates, shall be construed to signify kin or kindred by blood, and the degrees of consanguinity shall be computed by the civil-law method; but collateral kindred, claiming through a nearer common ancestor, shall be preferred to those claiming through a more remote ancestor. Rev. Code Del. 1893, p. 43, c. 5, § 1, subd. 6.

KIND.

"Kind of property," as used in St. 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, called the "Public Health Act," declaring that if any kind of property, before the passing of the act, has been exempt from rating by any local act in respect of purposes for which district rates may be levied under the public health act, the same kind of property in respect of the same purposes unto the same extent shall be exempt from district rates, refers to sort of property and not to its locality. That is clearly the meaning of the words in a former part of the statute, and this exempting proviso must use them in the same sense. Taite v. Carlisle Local Board of Health, 2 El. & Bl. 492, 511.

As class.

In Rev. St. § 3449, providing a penalty for any person removing any liquors under any other name than that known to the trade as designating the kind of the contents of the package, the word "kind" does not refer to the maker or quality, or the excellence, of the goods. It means a well-known classification of spirituous and fermented liquors, as whisky, gin, etc. The standard of excellency of a product of any distiller is too varying and indefinite a standard for the measurement of a forfeiture and punishment. United States v. 132 Packages of Spirituous Liquors (U. S.) 65 Fed. 980, 982.

As synonymous with grade.

In an action involving the question whether certain lumber, ordered and charged for as "No. 3 siding," was in fact No. 3 or No. 4 siding, where the witnesses and the court sometimes use the word "grade" to designate the difference between the different kinds of lumber, and it was objected that the word "grade" really distinguished only a quality, and not a "kind," the court said: "We can see no difference in the words themselves as expressive of the same idea. The word 'grade' is perhaps somewhat more technical, but it is perfectly manifest that the classification of the lumber into numbered grades, as Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4, was in the trade a practical division of it into different kinds. At any rate, this was the sense in which the witnesses and the court used the word 'grade,' and the jury could not be misled by it. It is a mere play upon words to say that, because grade means also quality, therefore only quality was meant when the word 'grade' was used. It is true that No. 4 siding was in quality inferior to No. 3, and this was necessarily developed in the examination of the witnesses; but that circumstance does not alter, but rather confirms, the fact that in the trade No. 3 siding was one kind, and No. 4 another." Whitehall Mfg. Co. v. Wise, 13 Atl. 298, 299, 119 Pa. 484.

As kin.

In a will by which testator, who leaves as his only heirs two half-brothers and one nephew of the whole blood residing in Louisiana and certain other nephews and nieces living in Texas, gave, devised, and bequeathed all his property "to all my blood kind in Louisiana and Texas," it was held that "blood kind" should be construed to mean "kin"; and as the testator had only one relative of the whole blood located in Louisiana to which the word "all" would apply, if he had intended to exclude his two brothers of the half blood, the will must be construed to mean such brothers of the half blood. Lusby v. Cobb, 32 South. 6, 7, 80 Miss. 715.

As relating to quantity.

In a statute providing for the partition of land held by joint tenants, and that, if partition be not made between them, "whether they be such as might have been compelled to make partition or not, or of whatever kind the estates or things holden or possessed be, the parts of those who die first shall not accrue to the survivors, but shall descend or pass by devise, and shall be subject to debts, charges, curtesy, or dower," the word "kind" describes the quantity, not the quality, of the estate. The quality was already marked, by calling them "joint tenants." But, as there may be a joint estate in fee, for life, or years, and as it was the intention of the act to abolish the right of survivorship in all joint estates, it uses the expression "of whatever kind the estate" may be. Thornton v. Thornton (Va.) 3 Rand. 179, 187.

KIND AND SOUND.

A representation that a horse is "sound, kind, and true" is a false representation, within the meaning of a statute providing a punishment for obtaining goods by false pretenses, if made knowingly during negotiations for the sale of the horse, with intent to cheat and defraud the purchaser, and the latter is induced to purchase by reason thereof; the falsity not being apparent at the time. Watson v. People, 87 N. Y. 561, 564, 41 Am. Rep. 397.

A statement in the negotiations of a sale that a horse is sound and kind may be a mere affirmation or expression, and may thus come under what is sometimes designated as "dealer's talk" and be treated as only the mere language of commendation by which the seller seeks to enhance the price of his goods. It may be also the assertion of a fact material to the negotiations, which the seller may properly make, if justified in so doing by his knowledge of the animal, as the basis on which the sale is to be made. When so made and intended, if it be false and known to him to be such, the seller is guilty of obtaining property by false pretenses, within the prohibition of the statute, if he thereby induces the buyer to part with his property. Commonwealth v. Jackson, 132 Mass. 16.

The words "sound and kind in every respect," when used to characterize a team of horses, imports that the horses are not in the habit of making sudden plunges without cause, and therefore a warranty in such language is broken if the horses have such habits. Hall v. Colyer, 8 N. Y. Supp. 801, 55 Hun, 611.

KINDERGARTEN.

The name "kindergarten," meaning literally a "garden of children," was devised by Froebel, a German philosopher and educator, to apply to a system which he elaborated for the instruction of children of very tender years. "Children's garden" ought to be taken in its allegorical sense. The child is a plant, the school is a garden, and Froebel calls teachers "gardeners of children." His system guides the children's inclination for activity into organized movement, and invests the games, unknown to the child, with an ethical and educational value, teaching, besides physical exercises, the habits of discipline, self-control, and harmonious action and purpose, together with some definite lesson of fact; and an act making a city a school district, to be governed by a city board of education, and giving such board control over the public schools, with the power to determine the course of study, warranted an action of the board in adopting such a system into the methods of schools under its supervision. Sinnott v. Colombet, 40 Pac. 329, 330, 107 Cal. 187, 28 L. R. A. 594.

KINDLE.

The words "coal for fuel, with sufficient wood to kindle or start the fire," in a policy excepting fires caused by the use of steam engines on the premises insured, other than threshing machine engines, using coal as fuel, with sufficient wood to kindle or start the fire, meant that wood was permitted to be used only with coal, and for the one purpose of igniting the coal by aid of the more combustible quality of the wood, and that when the coal was once sufficiently ignited the use of wood was no longer allowed. Thurston v. Burnett & Beaver Dam Farmers' Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 74 N. W. 131, 132, 98 Wis. 476, 41 L. R. A. 316.

KINDLY TREAT.

A bond given in consideration that the parties to a bastardy suit should marry, and that the bond and mortgage should be security to the wife that the husband would "support and kindly treat" her, should be considered so that the condition is violated where the conduct of the husband is such as to drive his wife from home. Porter v. Caylor, 45 N. E. 648, 649, 146 Ind. 448.

KINDRED.

See "Next of Kindred."

"Kindred," as used in Rev. St. c. 89, § 1, cl. 6, providing that if any intestate leaves a widow or surviving husband, and no "kindred," his or her estate shall descend to such widow or surviving husband, means "such kindred as are capable of inheriting." Wunderle v. Wunderle, 33 N. E. 195, 201, 144 Ill. 40, 19 L. R. A. 84.

The word "kindred," when used in a will, without any specification of what kindred is meant, denotes only such as are within the statute of distributions. Varrell v. Werdell, 20 N. H. 431, 435.

The word "kindred" means a relation by birth or consanguinity. Makea v. Naha, 4 Hawaii, 221, 230.

Adopting parent.

"Kindred," as used in Pub. St. c. 148, § 7, relating to adopted children, and providing that the adopted child shall inherit from the adopting parent, but that such child shall not by such adoption become incompetent to inherit from his natural "kindred," cannot be construed as including the adopting parent. It is intended by this statute to save the right of inheritance from other parties than the adopting parent. Hence a grandson, who had been adopted by his grandfather, could not inherit both as an adopted son and as the representative of his deceased parent. Delano v. Bruerton, 20 N. E. 308, 309, 146 Mass. 619, 2 L. R. A. 608.

Collateral relations.

Kindred means relations by blood, and includes collateral as well as lineal relations. It includes children and their descendants, brothers and sisters, nieces and nephews, cousins, uncles, aunts, and other next of kin. Butler v. Elyton Land Co., 4 South. 675, 676 84 Ala. 384.

"Kindred," as used in Hurd's St. 1897, p. 629, § 1, subd. 6, providing that, if any intestate leaves a widow or surviving husband and no kindred, his or her estate shall descend to such widow or surviving husband, will not be construed in a restrictive sense, so as to apply only to parents, brothers, and sisters, and their descendants, but should be construed in the larger sense, so as to include the phrase "next of kin," and hence the surviving husband of a woman dying intestate without issue, but leaving uncles and aunts, inherits a part only of her estate. Lockwood v. Moffett, 52 N. E. 260, 262, 177 Ill. 49.

"Kindred on the part of the mother," as used in Rev. St. Tex. art. 1657, providing that illegitimate children shall also be entitled to distributive shares of the personal estates of any of their kindred on the part of the mother, etc., embrace solely the mother's collateral relations, and import capacity in such child to take only personal estates from such collaterals. Blair v. Adams (U. S.) 59 Fed. 243, 246.

Illegitimates.

"Kindred," as used in Civ. Code, § 1387, one of the provisions of which, relating to the inheritable blood of an illegitimate child, is as follows: "But he does not represent his father or mother by inheriting any part of the estate of his or her kindred, either lineal or collateral, unless before his death his parents shall have intermarried"—relates to the kindred referred to in section 1386, and means lawful kindred, and is used for the purpose of qualifying the general words used in section 1387, and excluding an illegitimate from inheriting through the latter section the estate of all relatives. In re Magee's Estate, 63 Cal. 414, 416.

In Laws 1820, c. 38, § 19, providing that after the payment of debts, funeral expenses, etc., if there be no kindred of the said intestate, then the widow shall be entitled to the whole of said residue, the term "kindred" means lawful kindred; and where the husband was illegitimate and left no issue, his widow was entitled to the whole of his estate, to the exclusion of his mother and her collateral kindred. Hughes v. Decker, 38 Me. 153, 161.

The word "kindred," in Pub. Laws 1887, c. 14, authorizing a bastard child to inherit from its parents, or their lineal and collective kindred, is not confined to lawful kindred, but is to be construed, in connection with the subject of the statute, to include actual kindred. Messer v. Jones, 34 Atl. 177, 179, 88 Me. 349.

By the rules of the common law the term "all kindred" includes only those who are legitimate, unless a different intention is clearly manifested. McCool v. Smith, 66 U. S. (1 Black) 459, 470, 17 L. Ed. 218.

As kindred by blood.

Rev. St. c. 46, § 5, provides that the kindred of any pauper in the line or degree of father, grandfather, etc., by consanguinity, etc., shall be bound to support such pauper, etc. Section 6 declares that the court of common pleas in the county where any one of such kindred to be charged shall reside, on complaint made by any town or by any kindred who shall have been at any expense for the relief and support of such pauper, may, on due hearing, assess and apportion on such of the kindred a certain amount of the expense for the relief and support of such pauper, etc. Held, that the word "kindred," as used in section 6, should be construed to mean the kindred enumerated in section 5, and who are previously, in the same section 6, termed "kindred to be charged"—that is, kindred by consanguinity; and hence the kindred by affinity of any poor person cannot maintain a complaint under the statute against the father of such person for the expense of his relief and support. Farr v. Flood, 65 Mass. (11 Cush.) 24, 25.

The term "kindred," in a statute making a lunatic's kindred liable for his support, only includes blood relations, and therefore the statute does not make the husband of a lunatic liable for her support. "A husband," said Lord Loughborough, "is not of kin to a wife, nor she to him." Watt v. Watt, 3 Ves. 247. The kin obligated by law, within the meaning of the statute, are manifestly those only who, by Gen. St. c. 70, § 4, are made chargeable for the support of poor persons, namely, kindred in the line or degree of father or grandfather, mother or grandmother, children or grandchildren, of consanguinity. Inhabitants of Brookfield v. Allen, 88 Mass. (6 Allen) 585, 586.

"A man's kindred, in the proper signification of the word, means such persons as are related to him by blood, and does not include relatives by marriage." Wetter v. Walker, 62 Ga. 142, 144.

Primarily the words "nearest kindred" indicate the nearest degree of consanguinity, and they are perhaps more frequently used in this sense than in any other. Swasey v. Jaques, 10 N. E. 758, 761, 144 Mass. 135, 59 Am. Rep. 65.

"Kindred," as used in the statute of descents, is not confined to blood relations, but may include in its meaning a relation by blood and a relation by law. Power v. Haffley, 4 S. W. 683, 685, 85 Ky. 671.

The word "kin" and "kindred," as applied to the descent of estates, shall be construed to signify kin or kindred by blood, and the degrees of consanguinity shall be computed by the civil law method; but collateral kindred, claiming through a nearer common ancestor, shall be preferred to those claiming through a more remote ancestor. Rev. Code Del. 1893, p. 43, c. 5, § 1, subd. 6.

KINDRED OF THE HALF BLOOD.

See "Half Blood."

KINETOSCOPE.

The kinetoscope, briefly described, is a mechanical contrivance involving, among other things, a transparent or translucent narrow film of very great length, on which a series of photographs, very extensive in number, are taken which photographs consecutively represent the continuous development of movement or action in the persons or things which are the subjects of such photographs. This film by a photographic device is caused to pass with great rapidity by a set of lenses, through which, by use of a powerful electric light, the scenes which are the subject of the series of photographs are much enlarged and thrown upon a white screen. As one picture of the scene photographed succeeds another upon the screen with great rapidity, the impression produced upon the retina of the eye by the preceding picture continues longer than does the existence on the screen of the picture which produces the impression. As a result the impression produced by one picture lasts approximately until the impression produced by the next succeeding picture occurs. The result is substantially that one sees a continuous moving picture, reproducing the action and movement of the scenes photographed upon the film. Barnes v. Miner (U. S.) 122 Fed. 480, 487.

KING.

Before the King, see "Before."

KINGDOM.

See "Foreign Kingdom."

The term "kingdom," in its strict sense, means territories belonging to the king. Lonsdale v. Brown (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 855, 857.

KINSMAN.

A kinsman of the whole blood is "he that is derived not only from the same ancestor, but from the same couple of ancestors." Wood v. Mitcham, 92 N. Y. 375, 379 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. p. 227).

KISS MY FOOT.

The words "Kiss my foot," when written by a drawee, together with his signature, on a draft presented to him for acceptance, are equivalent to and signify a refusal to accept. The words should be construed, as they are used in common parlance, to mean and express contempt for the person to whom the words were addressed, and, when used as a reply to a request, they imply, and are understood to mean, a decided, unqualified, and contemptuous refusal to comply with such request. Norton v. Knapp, 19 N. W. 867, 868, 64 Iowa, 112.

KITCHEN FURNITURE.

"Household and kitchen furniture," within the meaning of a statute exempting from execution to the head of a family his household and kitchen furniture, is limited to household and kitchen furniture for the use of the family, and does not include such furniture used in hotels and restaurants beyond that which is used by the family. Heidenheimer v. Blumenkron, 56 Tex. 308, 314.

The household and kitchen furniture of a family, which is exempt by statute from execution, does not include household and kitchen furniture belonging to the head of a family and used in the conduct of a restaurant. Dodge v. Knight (Tex.) 16 S. W. 626, 628.

"Household and kitchen furniture," within the meaning of a statute exempting from execution all household and kitchen furniture of the debtor, includes all the furniture of a widow with one child, who occupies a house of seven or eight rooms, and incidentally keeps boarders for the purpose of support, although a portion of such furniture is in the rooms occupied by the boarders. Mueller v. Richardson, 18 S. W. 693, 694, 82 Tex. 361.

KITING.

"Kiting," in commercial parlance, means the lending of one commercial firm to another of its credit. Thus one friendly firm would borrow from another its check, draft, note, bill, or indorsement to tide over an immediate necessity for money, and when occasion arose the other firm would return the favor. Johnson v. Marx Levy & Bro., 34 South. 68, 71, 109 La. 1036.

As explained by a witness, the term "kiting" means mailing checks out of town for larger amounts than the drawer had in the bank; he at the time knowing or feeling sure that he would have enough money in the bank to meet them when presented. Wood v. American Nat. Bank, 40 S. E. 931, 932, 100 Va. 300.

KITTY.

A "kitty" is a receptacle in a poker table into which a certain number of chips are placed or dropped when hands of a certain value are held by any of the players, and the contents belong to the proprietors of the place or table. Cochran v. State, 29 S. E. 438, 102 Ga. 631.

KLEPTOMANIA.

As insanity, see "Insane—Insanity."

Kleptomania is a well-defined symptom of mania, consisting of an irresistible propensity to steal. Looney v. State, 10 Tex. App. 520, 525.

Kleptomania is a species of insanity which renders its subject morally irresponsible for the crime of theft. Harris v. State, 18 Tex. App. 287, 293.

"Kleptomania" is the scientific name for the disease of stealing. Persons who are victims of it will steal in spite of all restraints. They may be sane in mind in all other respects, may know perfectly well that stealing is wrong in every way, and may have no occasion to steal whatever, not being in want, or having prospect of it, and yet steal they will, at the risk of the terrible exposure detection produces. The disease is of that character which undermines and overthrows the will, rendering its victim powerless to control his conduct with respect to his temptation, though he possesses his will in its entire vigor in all other things. There is no lack of the reasoning power as to the rightfulness or wrongfulness of his conduct or behavior, and yet the power, the ability, to do otherwise than what they do, is wanting. No enlightened criminal system of law punishes him for acts which, if the will was in a healthy state, would never be done, any more than it does the mere idiot, or person who never had any reason at all. State v. Reidell (Del.) 14 Atl. 550, 551, 552, 9 Houst. 470.

The authorities define "kleptomania" as a species of mania, consisting of an irresistible impulse to steal. See 1 Clev. Insan. p. 177. Some of the books, however, regard it as a morbid propensity to steal, whether consciously or unconsciously. If kleptomania is simply an irresistible impulse to steal, regardless of the right and wrong test, then, notwithstanding it was formerly recognized in the state as a defense in theft by the courts of the state, that doctrine has more recently been repudiated. Lowe v. State, 70 S. W. 206, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 224 (citing Hurst v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. R. 378, 46 S. W. 635, 50 S. W. 719).

KNAVE.

Calling one a "knave" imports that he is dishonest and is actionable per se. Harding v. Brooks, 22 Mass. (5 Pick.) 244, 247.

KNEW.

See "Know"; "Well Knew."

KNIT GOODS.

"Knit goods," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, although frequently used interchangeably with "knit fabrics," more appropriately describes manufactured articles, while knit fabrics refer more especially to manufactured material as piece goods. Arnold v. United States, 13 Sup. Ct. 406, 407, 147 U. S. 494, 37 L. Ed. 253.

KNITTING MACHINE

"A knitting machine has nothing in common with a loom for weaving, except that each has a roller, upon which the completed fabric is rolled, and a take-up. The office of the take-up in each machine is to regulate the tension of the cloth. In a loom it is necessary that the warp should be kept tight between the yard beam and the cloth beam. A knitting machine produces a fabric made by a succession of loops, and, as the necessities of manufacture do not require that the yarn or threads should be kept tightly drawn, a smaller expenditure of force is necessary in the take-up than in a loom take-up." Holmes v. Plainville Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 9 Fed. 757, 759.

KNOCKED DOWN.

In common parlance and in the language of the auction room property is understood to be "knocked down" or "struck off" when the auctioneer, by the fall of his hammer or by any other adequate or visible announcement, signifies to the bidder that he is entitled to the property on paying the amount of his bid according to the terms of the sale. Sherwood v. Reade (N. Y.) 7 Hill, 431, 439.

KNOT.

"Knot," as used when the term is applied to a measure of distance, means a marine mile. Rockland, Mt. D. & S. S. Co. v. Fessenden, 8 Atl. 550, 552, 79 Me. 140.

KNOW.

See "Carnally Know."

"Know," as defined by Webster, means "to have knowledge; to possess information, instruction, or wisdom." State v. Ransberger, 17 S. W. 290, 291, 106 Mo. 135.

Code, § 3441, providing that, where the tracks of two railroads cross each other, the engineers and conductors must stop their trains within 100 feet of the crossing, and not proceed until they "know" the way is clear, means that the officers in charge shall be informed or made aware of the situation, shall be certain or made familiar with, and not be doubtful thereof. Southern Ry. Co. v. Bryan, 28 South. 445, 448, 125 Ala. 297.

An allegation in a taxpayer's action to restrain the carrying out of a contract, which alleges that the municipal officer making the contract "knew it to be extravagant," is not equivalent to an allegation that it is extravagant. Madden v. Van Wyck, 72 N. Y. Supp. 135, 137, 35 Misc. Rep. 645.

A verdict by a jury, in answer to a question contained therein that "We do not know," is equivalent to a simple denial. Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Shannon, 16 Pac. 836, 38 Kan. 476.

"Know," in reference to the liability of one who destroys personal property on which he knows there is a mortgage, conveys the idea of actual knowledge or information, and not mere notice. De Vaughn v. Harris, 29 S. E. 613, 614, 103 Ga. 102.

KNOWING.

"Knowing" is equivalent to knowing and understanding. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Kinnare, 60 N. E. 57, 59, 190 Ill. 9.

As actual knowledge or scienter.

The word "knowing," in Gen. St. p. 1334, which enacts that any person who shall cause or procure his name or that of any other person to be registered, "knowing" that he or the person whose name he has procured to be registered is not entitled to vote, shall be punished, etc., means knowledge, mental assurance, or scienter. It is positive, not negative. Such knowledge must be clearly proved, or shown by such circumstances as leave no reasonable doubt on a fair mind. The proof of the knowledge must be clear, not a mere inference that he could have found out by further inquiry. There must have been culpable intent shown, not mere ignorance. State v. McBarron, 51 Atl. 146, 147, 66 N. J. Law, 680 (citing Pier v. Hanmore, 86 N. Y. 95; Stebbins v. Edmands, 78 Mass. [12 Gray] 203; Meirelles v. Banning, 2 Barn. & Adol. 909).

In Act 1848, § 15, providing that, if any certificate or report made by the officers of any manufacturing corporation shall be false in any material representation, "all the officers who shall have signed the same, knowing it to be false," shall be jointly and severally liable for all the debts of the company contracted while they were stockholders thereof, the phrase "knowing it to be false" imports a willful misrepresentation with actual knowledge of its falsity, and not merely such constructive knowledge as can be imputed from the presumption that the officer signing the report knew the law and comprehended the precise import of the language used, when considered with reference to statutory provisions. Pier v. Hanmore, 86 N. Y. 95, 102.

In order to charge an officer of a corporation with signing a statutory report "knowing it to be false," some fact or circumstance must be shown indicating that it was made in bad faith, willfully, or for some fraudulent purpose, and not ignorantly or inadvertently; and this is a question of fact, which must be passed upon before the liability can be adjudged. Pier v. Hanmore, 86 N. Y. 95, 102; Bonnell v. Griswold, 89 N. Y. 122, 125.

As information inducing belief.

As used in reference to a conveyance by a debtor to a person knowing that the debtor was insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, "knowing" means knowledge of such facts as to induce a reasonable belief of his debtor's insolvency. Morey v. Milliken, 30 Atl. 102, 105, 86 Me. 464.

The word "knowing," as used in Code, § 3384, providing that it shall not be lawful for any person to geld any animal, knowing that such animal is kept, etc., for covering mares, does not imply exact knowledge. It is such information as would lead a prudent man to believe that the fact existed, and, if followed by inquiry, must bring knowledge of the fact home to him. Tucker v. Constable, 19 Pac. 13, 14, 16 Or. 407.

KNOWINGLY.

The primary definition of the word "knowingly" is "with knowledge." West v. Wright, 98 Ind. 335, 339.

Pub. St. c. 247, § 3, providing that every person not standing in the relation of husband or wife, parent or grandchild, child or grandchild, brother or sister, by consanguinity or affinity, to another, who shall have committed any offense, or been accessory before the fact to the commission of any offense, who shall be convicted of knowingly harboring or relieving such other person, with intent that he shall escape or avoid detection, arrest, trial, or punishment, shall be punished, etc., must be construed to mean that the person harboring an offender must have knowledge that the principal offense has been committed and that the person harbored had committed it. State v. Davis, 14 R. I. 281, 284.

"Knowingly," as used in Laws 1865, c. 361, authorizing the bringing of actions to recover certain penalties against whoever shall knowingly sell, supply, etc., milk in an improper condition specified, should be construed to mean actual personal knowledge. Verona Cent. Cheese Factory v. Murtaugh (N. Y.) 4 Lans. 17, 22.

Where the president of a corporation did not know of the obstruction of a public road, and had no part therein, he is not guilty of willfully or knowingly obstructing such road. State v. White, 69 S. W. 684, 685, 96 Mo. App. 34.

An indictment alleging that defendant knowingly uttered a forged note is sufficient to charge defendant with uttering a note knowing it to be forged. State v. Williams, 38 N. E. 339, 139 Ind. 43, 47 Am. St. Rep. 255.

An information under Rev. St. 1894, § 2164 (Rev. St. 1881, § 2070), making it a penal offense for any one to have in his possession with intent to sell the meat of any diseased animal, which alleges that defendant unlawfully and knowingly had such meat in his possession, sufficiently charges defendant with knowledge that the meat was diseased. Brown v. State, 42 N. E. 244, 245, 14 Ind. App. 24.

An information which alleges that defendant did knowingly kill, for the purpose of selling for food, certain sick and diseased animals, sufficiently shows that defendant knew the animals were sick; the adverb "knowingly" qualifying not only the verb "did kill," but everything following and connected therewith. Moeschke v. State, 42 N. E. 1029, 1030, 14 Ind. App. 393.

In Act Cong. 1793 (1 Stat. 302), relative to fugitives from labor, which provides that any person who shall knowingly and willingly obstruct or hinder any claimant, his agent, or attorney in seizing or arresting a fugitive from labor, "knowingly" imports a knowledge of such facts as authorize an arrest. Driskill v. Parrish (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 1100, 1101; Giltner v. Gorham (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 424, 425.

In its ordinary acceptation the word "knowingly," when applied to an act or thing done, imports knowledge of the act or thing so done, as well as an evil intent or a bad purpose in doing such thing. So that a charge in an indictment that defendant knowingly deposited in the mails a printed book, etc., the character of which was obscene, lewd, and lascivious, sufficiently charges, after verdict, both that the book is in fact obscene and that the defendant knew it to be so. Price v. United States, 17 Sup. Ct. 366, 367, 165 U. S. 311, 41 L. Ed. 727; Rosen v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 434, 435, 161 U. S. 29, 40 L. Ed. 606.

In commenting on an instruction that if defendant had by his acts, declarations, or silence knowingly given reasonable cause to people to believe that the agent had such authority, then he will be bound by the act of the agent, the court said: "This did not mean, as it was taken by the counsel for the plaintiff, that the defendant must know the effect of his conduct, but that he must know what had been the conduct of his agent. The difference between the court and the plaintiff's counsel, aimed at, if not quite accurately hit, by the charge, and brought out more fully and clearly in the charge, was that the court thought and told the jury that the defendants would not be liable simply because, if they had been sharper or more careful, they would have discovered [the agent's] course of dealing, but that they must actually have known of acts of his conveying to the public the impression that his authority was greater than it was in fact, before their silence could be held to sanction his course, and to give him ostensible authority to continue it." Mt. Morris Bank v. Gorham, 48 N. E. 341, 342, 169 Mass. 519.

As used in Acts 1841, c. 31, providing that any person who shall knowingly vote, not being at the time a qualified elector in the county, shall be adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor, "knowingly" means the knowledge of a state of facts which would disqualify the voter, whether or not the voter knew that such facts did in law disqualify him. McGuire v. State, 26 Tenn. (7 Humph.) 54, 55.

The word "knowingly," when used in an indictment charging that the defendant did knowingly certain acts, supplies the place of a positive averment that the defendant knew the facts subsequently stated. Dunbar v. United States, 15 Sup. Ct. 325, 328, 156 U. S. 185, 39 L. Ed. 390.

A statement recklessly made without knowledge of its truth is a "false statement knowingly made." Cooper v. Schlesinger, 4 Sup. Ct. 360, 363, 111 U. S. 148, 28 L. Ed. 382.

Unlawfully distinguished,

Where a statute provides that, to constitute an offense, the act must be done knowingly, an indictment charging the act as done unlawfully is insufficient, inasmuch as the word "unlawfully" neither comprehends nor is equivalent in meaning to the word "knowingly." Tynes v. State, 17 Tex. App. 123, 126.

"Knowingly," as used in Rev. St. c. 131, § 1, providing a punishment for any one guilty of knowingly selling diseased, corrupted, or any unwholesome provisions, etc., means but what the word imports, that the offense must be committed with a guilty knowledge or evil intent, in order to make the party committing the offense liable according to the provisions of the statute. Commonwealth v. Boynton, 66 Mass. (12 Cush.) 499, 500.

"Knowingly and willfully," as used in a revenue law providing a penalty for so constructing cisterns in a distillery as to permit the abstraction of spirits, do not require an intent to defraud the revenue, but the penalty prescribed by the act is incurred and the offense is complete when the defendants "have left undone those things which they ought to have done and have done those things which they ought not to have done," without any fraudulent or criminal intent. United States v. McKim (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1122.

"Knowingly," in an indictment that a person "willfully, knowingly, maliciously, and falsely" said, deposed, and swore on oath, is equivalent to saying that he corruptly swore; for the words used necessarily involved "corruptly." It could not have been willfully, knowingly, maliciously, and falsely, without being corruptly, done. State v. Bixler, 62 Md. 354, 356.

Where a statute provided that inspectors of election, knowingly receiving the votes of persons not having all the qualifications of an elector, should be guilty of a crime, etc., it was held that the word "knowingly" was used in the sense of "corruptly," that is, with knowledge that the defendant's duty and the obligation of his oath commanded him to act otherwise, and that, where an inspector had exercised the best of his knowledge and discretion in good faith, he was not guilty of knowingly receiving an illegal vote. Byrne v. State, 12 Wis. 519, 527.

The term "knowingly" imports a knowledge that the facts exist which constitute the act or omission a crime, and does not require knowledge of the unlawfulness of the act or omission. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 6842, subd. 4; Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 718.

The word "knowingly" imports only a knowledge that the facts exist which bring the act or omission within the provisions of the Penal Code. It does not require any knowledge of the unlawfulness of such act or omission. Pen. Code Ariz. 1901, par. 7, subd. 5; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2690; Pen. Code Idaho 1901, § 4544, subd. 5; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 7717; Pen. Code S. D. 1903, § 812; Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 7, subd. 5; Pen. Code Mont. 1895, § 7, subd. 5; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 2182; Rev. St. Utah, 1898, § 4053.

"Knowingly" is equivalent to "willfully." Fry v. Hubner, 57 Pac. 420, 421, 35 Or. 184.

KNOWINGLY AND WILLFULLY.

As used in the statute providing that any person who shall "knowingly and willfully obstruct the passage of the mail," etc., the phrase is intended to signify that at the time of committing the offense defendant must have known what he was doing, and with such knowledge proceeded to commit the offense charged, and is used in the statute in contradistinction to "innocently," "ignorantly," or "unintentionally." United States v. Claypool (U. S.) 14 Fed. 127, 128.

As used in Rev. St. § 3995 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2716], providing that any person who shall knowingly and willfully obstruct and retard the passage of the mail shall be fined, the words "knowingly and willfully" refer to those who know that the acts performed, however innocent they may otherwise be, will have the effect of obstructing and retarding the passage of the mail, and they perform the act with the intention that such will be their operation. United States v. Cassidy (U. S.) 67 Fed. 698, 704.

A statute providing that every person who knowingly and willfully obstructs, resists, or opposes any officer of the United States in serving or attempting to serve or execute any mesne process or warrant or any rule or order of any court of the United States, or any legal or judicial writ or process, or assaults, wounds, or beats any officer or other person duly authorized in serving or executing any writ, etc., shall be punishable, etc., implies knowledge of the issuance of the writ or other process and an evil intent to resist the officer in the execution thereof. United States v. Terry (U. S.) 42 Fed. 317, 318.

A person knowingly and willfully claims more than is due in a claim for a mechanic's lien only when he claims something which he knows not to be due, and not when he claims what he honestly, though mistakenly, believes to be due him. Gibbs v. Hanchette, 51 N. W. 691, 692, 90 Mich. 657 (quoting Phil. Mech. Liens, § 355).

Act Cong. March 3, 1825, making it an offense for any person to "knowingly and willfully obstruct or retard the passage of the mail," means any obstruction which is unlawful, although the attainment of other ends may have been the primary object of the offender. United States v. Kirby, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 482, 486, 19 L. Ed. 278.

KNOWINGLY AND WILLINGLY.

The terms "knowingly and willingly" characterize the act of a carrier of live stock in confining animals in carriage for more than 28 consecutive hours without food or water, as prohibited by Rev. St. §§ 4386-4388 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 2995, 2996], which makes carriers liable to a penalty for "knowingly and willingly" failing to comply with the act, even though the act of the carrier is caused by an accident to its train, if such accident is the result of its negligence. Newport News & M. V. Co. v. United States, 61 Fed. 488, 490, 9 C. C. A. 579.

KNOWINGLY PERMIT.

"Knowingly permitting" a house to be used for unlawful purposes, contrary to statute, is not shown by evidence that a lessor, having knowledge of the illegal use of the leased premises, failed to terminate the lease. Crofton v. State, 25 Ohio St. 249, 254.

Rev. St. c. 17, § 4, providing for the punishment of the owners of a building or tenement who "knowingly permits" it to be used for the keeping and sale of intoxicating liquors for tippling purposes, implies permission or consent, as well as knowledge. State v. Stafford, 6 Me. 125.

An owner of premises having knowledge that the lessee is using the same for gambling purposes, and who does nothing whatever to hinder and prevent the lessee from so occupying and using the same, "knowingly permits" such use, within Rev. St. § 4275, providing that, if the owner of the building in which the money was lost knowingly permits this to be used for gambling purposes, such building and the real estate on which it stands shall be liable for the fines and costs and damages and costs recovered. Thompson v. Ackerman, 12 O. C. D. 456, 465.

Rev. St. § 3281 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2127], forfeits personal property owned by a person who has "knowingly permitted" or suffered his premises to be used for purposes of ingress or egress to or from an illicit distillery. Held, that it is a prerequisite to such forfeiture that the person should have known that the ingress or egress over his premises was to or from a distillery. Gregory v. United States (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 1195, 1198.

KNOWLEDGE.

See "Actual Knowledge"; "Best of His Knowledge and Belief"; "Carnal Knowledge"; "Constructive Knowledge"; "Full Knowledge"; "Means of Knowledge"; "No Knowledge or Information"; "Peculiar Knowledge"; "Personal Knowledge"; "To My Knowledge."

"Knowledge," as used in Const. art. 1, § 7, reciting that, religion, morality and knowledge being essential to good government, it shall be the duty of the General Assembly to pass suitable laws to protect every religious denomination in the peaceable enjoyment of its own mode of public worship, and to encourage schools and the means of instruction, should be construed in its generic or unlimited sense. "Knowledge" comprehends in itself all that is comprehended in the other two words, "religion" and "morality," and which can be the subject of human instruction. True religion includes true morality. All that is comprehended in the word "religion," or in the words "religion and morality," and that can be the subject of human instructions, must be included under the general term "knowledge." Nothing is enjoined, therefore, but the encouragement of means of instruction in general knowledge—the knowledge of truth. The fair interpretation seems to be that true religion and morality are aided and promoted by the increase and diffusion of knowledge, on the theory that knowledge is the handmaid of virtue, and that all three, religion, morality, and knowledge, are essential to good government. Board of Education of City of Cincinnati v. Minor, 23 Ohio St. 211, 241, 13 Am. Rep. 233.

The word "knowledge," as used in Rev. St. § 4283 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2943] limiting the liability of owners of vessels for loss occurring without their privity or knowledge, means some personal cognizance, or means of knowledge of which he is bound to avail himself, of a contemplated loss, or of a condition of things likely to produce or contribute to the loss, without appropriate means to prevent it. Lord v. Goodall S. S. Co. (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 884, 887.

As ability.

In an instruction in a homicide case that if there have been circumstances proven tending to show that the defendant was connected with the homicide, and the knowledge to explain such circumstances is plainly shown to be in his possession, and he willfully declines or intentionally omits to explain such circumstances, such omission is a circumstance unfavorable to his innocence, the term "knowledge" is synonymous with "ability." Adams v. State, 10 South. 106, 114, 28 Fla. 511.

As actual knowledge.

The word "knowledge," as used in Code, § 2892, allowing supplementary pleadings alleging facts that have come to the party's knowledge since the filing, etc., means actual, and not constructive, knowledge. Peoples v. Carrol, 58 Tenn. (11 Heisk.) 417, 423.

The word "knowledge," as used in a contract by which a fidelity and casualty company bound itself to make good to a bank such pecuniary loss as the latter might sustain by reason of the fraud or dishonesty of a named employé in connection with his duties, providing that the contract would be void if the bank continued in its service an employé of whose untrustworthiness they had knowledge, means actual knowledge, and not constructive. Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Gate City Nat. Bank, 25 S. E. 392, 394, 97 Ga. 634, 33 L. R. A. 821, 54 Am. St. Rep. 440.

"Knowledge," as used in a statement that the owner of property sought to be subjected to an easement by prescription must have knowledge of the claim and use of such easement, means not only knowledge on the part of the owner of the act of occupation and enjoyment, and of the party occupying and enjoying, but also knowledge that the party in fact claims the right of enjoyment adversely. Woodruff v. North Bloomfield Gravel Min. Co. (U. S.) 18 Fed. 753, 790.

Under the Constitution and statute, providing that the director or officer of a bank who shall receive any deposit when the bank is insolvent, if he shall have had knowledge of the fact that it is insolvent or in sinking circumstances when he assented to the receipt of the deposit, shall be punished, the word "knowledge," so employed, must be taken in its common acceptation; that is, in the plain or ordinary meaning and usual sense of the word. It ought to be so construed that no man who is innocent can be punished or endangered. So treated, we may properly look to the source to which men generally apply for the meaning of the word "knowledge." Webster's Dictionary defines "knowledge" as: "(1) The certain perception of truth; belief which amounts to or results in moral certainty; indubitable apprehension; information, intelligence, as to have knowledge of a fact." The knowledge which the law requires that a director shall have had means a guilty knowledge, not an innocent, bona fide ignorance arising from negligence to keep posted or to inquire. It must be construed as to have been intended as a sword with which to punish the guilty, and a shield to protect the innocent. If this had not been the intention, the liability would have been made absolute and unqualified, instead of dependent upon knowledge. Utley v. Hill, 55 S. W. 1091, 1099, 1100, 155 Mo. 232, 49 L. R. A. 823, 78 Am. St. Rep. 569.

"Knowledge" and "actual knowledge" have been held to be synonymous. The better opinion is, we think, that they are not to be thus regarded. Kirkham v. Moore, 65 N. E. 1042, 1043, 30 Ind. App. 549 (citing 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 592).

As belief.

See, also, "Belief."

Sess. Acts 1845, p. 145, provides that if the prosecuting attorney has knowledge of the commission of an offense, or shall be informed thereof by complaint, etc., he shall file an information, etc. Held, that the word "knowledge" should be construed to mean "with settled belief and reasonable conviction," and that it was not in any case necessary for the prosecuting attorney to have "actual and personal knowledge" as distinguished from "knowledge gained by information." State v. Ransberger, 17 S. W. 290, 291, 106 Mo. 135.

"Knowledge" is nothing more than a man's firm belief, and is distinguished from "belief" in that the latter includes things which do not make a very deep impression on the memory. The difference is ordinarily merely in degree. Hatch v. Carpenter, 75 Mass. (9 Gray) 271, 274.

The meaning of the words "belief" and "knowledge," as defined by lexicographers, will show that there is a distinct and well-defined difference between them. "Believe" is defined by Webster to mean to exercise trust or confidence; and by the Century Dictionary, to exercise belief in; to be persuaded upon evidence, arguments, and deductions, or by other circumstances other than personal knowledge. "Knowledge," according to Webster, is the act or state of knowing; clear perception of fact; that which is or may be known. According to the Century Dictionary it means acquaintance with things ascertained or ascertainable; specific information. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Reynolds, 124 U. S. 374, 8 Sup. Ct. 598, 31 L. Ed. 466, said: "Between mere belief and knowledge there is a wide difference." This expression of Mr. Justice Field was used in criticising and holding erroneous an instruction of the United States Circuit Court for the District of Colorado, in which the words "belief" and "knowledge" were used interchangeably, as conveying the same meaning, and it was said: "The court could not make them synonymous by its charge." Hence an allegation in a complaint in an action for injuries to a servant caused by defective passageway leading to a building which had been repaired by the master, alleging that when such a passageway had been repaired the complainant believed that it was safe, is not equivalent to an averment of want of knowledge. Ohio Valley Coffin Co. v. Goble, 62 N. E. 1025, 1027, 28 Ind. App. 362.

Discovery distinguished.

See "Discovery."

Information distinguished.

The words "information" and "knowledge," as used in the statute requiring a denial on information and belief to allege that the pleader has no knowledge or information upon which to base a belief, are not synonymous, and therefore an allegation that the pleader had not sufficient information on which to base a belief was insufficient. Downing North Denver Land Co. v. Burns, 70 Pac. 413, 414, 30 Colo. 283.

As notice.

See, also, "Notice."

"Knowledge" is not synonymous with notice, but when a person is spoken of as having actual or constructive notice it means no more than that under the indicated circumstances the man is legally chargeable with knowledge. Merrill v. Pacific Transfer Co., 63 Pac. 915, 917, 131 Cal. 582.

Knowledge is equivalent to notice in cases where it is not required to be in writing. Jones v. Vanzandt (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 1047, 1049.

The terms "knowledge" and "notice" are not synonymous or interchangeable, and should not, therefore, be confounded the one with the other. That which clearly does not amount to positive knowledge may often, in a legal sense, constitute actual notice. Accordingly, in applying a statute which contemplates that only actual notice shall affect the rights of one acting in good faith, the language used expressly or by necessary implication negating the idea that he is chargeable with constructive notice as well, the mere fact that he did not have precise and definite knowledge concerning the matter in question cannot be regarded as having any real importance whatever. On the contrary, the distinction to be drawn in a case calling for the application of such a statute is that "between actual and constructive notice, and not between actual knowledge and constructive notice. The difference in meaning between knowledge and notice must not be overlooked, for it is equally important with the distinction between the different kinds of notice. The fact to be established, when the case requires proof of actual notice, is that the party acquired his pretended rights with notice; and this may be true, although the purchase may have been made in actual ignorance of the facts of which knowledge is imputed to the purchaser." Wade, Notice (2d Ed.) § 36a. "Notice is actual when one either has knowledge of a fact, or is conscious of having the means of knowledge, although he may not use them. Actual notice may be divided into express and implied. Express notice embraces, not only what may fairly be called knowledge, from the fact that it is derived from the highest evidence to be communicated by the human senses, but also that which is communicated by direct and positive information, either written or oral, from persons who are personally cognizant of the fact communicated. The implication of notice arises when the party to be charged is shown to have had knowledge of such facts and circumstances as would lead him by the exercise of due diligence to a knowledge of the principal fact." Clarke v. Ingram, 33 S. E. 802, 804, 107 Ga. 565.

"Knowledge" and "notice" are not synonymous, although the effects produced by notice are the same, in many cases, as result from actual knowledge. Levins v. W. O. Peebles Grocery Co. (Tenn.) 38 S. W. 733, 740.

"Knowledge" may be classified in a legal sense as positive and imputed; imputed when the means of knowledge exists, known and accessible to the party, and capable of communicating positive information. When there is knowledge, notice, as legally and technically understood, becomes immaterial. It is only material when, in the absence of knowledge, it produces the same results. However closely actual notice in many instances approximates knowledge, and constructive notice may be its equivalent in effect, there may be actual notice without knowledge; and when constructive notice is made the test to determine priorities of right, it may fall far short of knowledge and be sufficient. When the purpose is to subordinate to a prior existing equity or right in another the subsequently acquired right of a party who has information of collateral facts sufficient to put him on inquiry, which, if pursued, would lead to the truth, such information is regarded as sufficient to charge him with notice of the ultimate fact, but is not tantamount to either knowledge or express notice, nor is either a necessary inference. Knowledge is not equivalent to and synonymous with notice. In reference to the rights of a purchaser from a fraudulent vendee for value and without notice of the fraud, there is a difference between the want of knowledge and the want of notice. Cleveland Woolen Mills v. Seibert, 1 South. 773, 776, 81 Ala. 140.

As property.

See "Property."

Science distinguished.

See "Science."

As suspicion.

"Knowledge" and "suspicion" are not synonymous terms. American Surety Co. v. Pauly (U. S.) 72 Fed. 470, 477, 18 O. C. A. 644.

KNOWLEDGE, INFORMATION, AND BELIEF.

The verification of a bill in chancery praying a discovery and the appointment of a receiver by the complainant as being true to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief, is insufficient, as the words "knowledge, information, and belief," upon the construction most favorable to the complainant, mean that the affiant has knowledge that some of the averments of the bill are true; that, while he does not know, he has been informed and believes that others of the averments are true; and that as to yet other averments he has neither knowledge or information, but, without knowing the facts or ever having been informed of their truth, he believes them to be true. Burgess v. Martin, 20 South. 506, 507, 111 Ala. 656.

The words "to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief," at the end of an affidavit of service, qualified and restricted the prior declarations contained therein; and therefore the affidavit was defective and insufficient. Harrison v. Beard, 30 Kan. 532, 2 Pac. 632.

KNOWLEDGE OF DANGER.

The "knowledge of danger" arising from walking upon a railroad track necessarily involves an appreciation of it. To say that one knows the danger of being run over by a railroad train, if upon the track, and yet does not appreciate the danger of being and remaining upon the track, is contradictory, not only in its terms, but in the very substance of the proposition. That a person must have known the danger of being upon a railroad track is evident from the plain fact that standing upon a railroad track where trains pass necessarily involves danger. St. Louis S. W. Ry. Co. v. Shiflet, 58 S. W. 945, 947, 94 Tex. 131.

"Knowledge of danger" does not necessarily constitute contributory negligence. It is plain that one may exercise due care with full knowledge of the danger to which he is exposed, or to which he lawfully exposes himself. This certainly is not contributory negligence. When knowledge is fastened upon the plaintiff, it is presumptive evidence of contributory negligence, and may be rebutted by proper evidence of the exercise of ordinary care under the circumstances. Holwer-son v. St. Louis & S. Ry. Co., 57 S. W. 770, 777, 157 Mo. 216 (quoting Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 37).

KNOWLEDGE OF THE LAW.

"The knowledge of the law with which every man is charged includes a knowledge of the constituent facts which make the law. That the Legislature enacted a certain law is a fact, but a knowledge of the law imputed to every man comprises a knowledge of that fact. That a certain law is valid or void is another fact, but every man is presumed to know whether it is valid or void, else he could not know the law." Evans v. Hughes County, 52 N. W. 1062, 1065, 3 S. D. 244.

KNOWN.

See "Generally Known"; "Personally Known"; "Well Known Member."

In St. 1825, requiring the certificate of acknowledgment to a deed by a married woman to set forth that the "contents were made known and explained" to her, "made known" is equivalent to "made acquainted with" the contents, as used in the certificate stating that she was made acquainted with the contents of the deed. Bohan v. Casey, 5 Mo. App. 101, 106.

As used in Gen. St. c. 151, § 13, declaring that, in order for a materialman to save his lien on a vessel, he shall file a sworn statement giving a just and true account of the demands due him and the name of the owner of the vessel, "if known," includes a party who has been informed and believes that the vessel was owned by the person who in fact owned it. Story v. Buffum, 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 35, 38.

The owner of land is not "known," within the meaning of Comp. St. art. 5, c. 77, § 4, relating to foreclosure of tax certificates, when the holder of a tax certificate is unable by reasonable diligence and inquiry in the neighborhood of the land in question to learn the whereabouts of the person or persons appearing to have estates therein, or when he is unable to ascertain who has such estates. Leigh v. Green, 90 N. W. 255, 258, 64 Neb. 533.

KNOWN APPLIANCES.

See "Best Known Appliances."

KNOWN AS.

These words, explained by the context in a deed, are a mere formula, to which no restricted effect can be given, so that a deed of a lot in a given plat, "known as lot 1," without further description, would convey the whole of the lot, though the same included a larger area than it was generally supposed to include. Kneeland v. Van Valkenburgh, 46 Wis. 434, 438, 1 N. W. 63, 32 Am. Rep. 719.

"Known as the government reservation," as used in Act 1851, commonly known as the "Water Lot Act," and providing for the disposition of state property, and exempting from its provisions that portion of the property "known as the government reservation," would include all property known by that name, except that part of such reservation the lease of which was confirmed by the act. It is immaterial to the validity of the exception whether the reservation had any legal existence or not. People v. Dana, 22 Cal. 11, 21.

KNOWN CHANNEL.

The word "known," as used in the legal proposition that subterranean waters can only be the subject of riparian rights when flowing in defined or known channels, means the knowledge by reasonable inference from existing and observed facts in the natural or pre-existing condition of the surface of the ground. "Known," in this rule of law, is not synonymous with "visible," nor is it restricted to knowledge derived from exposure of the channel by excavation. Miller v. Black Rock Springs Imp. Co., 40 S. E. 27, 30, 99 Va. 747, 86 Am. St. Rep. 924; City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 57 Pac. 585, 598, 124 Cal. 597.

Underground currents of water which flow in channels, the course of which can be distinctly traced, are known and defined, within the meaning of the law, and are governed by the same rules of law as streams flowing beneath the surface. Medano Ditch Co. v. Adams, 68 Pac. 431, 434, 29 Colo. 317.

The word "known," in an instruction as to the burden of showing that the course of a subterranean stream is known or nocorious, is not synonymous with "visible," but refers to knowledge by reasonable inference. Wyandot Club v. Sells, 9 Ohio Dec. 106-111.

KNOWN CREDITORS.

Acts 1867, p. 19, providing that commissioners appointed to receive and act upon claims presented against the insolvent estates of deceased persons shall give notice of their meetings to all known creditors residing within the probate district, means the creditors known to the executor or the administrator, and not merely the creditors which are known by the commissioners. Appeal of Davis, 39 Conn. 395, 399.

KNOWN DEFECTS.

When it is said that a servant assumes the risk of danger from known defects in implements used in his employment, the obvious meaning is that he assumes the risk of such danger as is apparent to his observation, not such as, on account of his want of experience, he could not reasonably be expected to apprehend. Demars v. Glen Mfg. Co., 40 Atl. 902, 904, 67 N. H. 404.

KNOWN EQUIVALENT.

"Known equivalent," in the patent law in reference to a pioneer machine, means devices which, in mechanics, were recognized as proper substitutes for the devices used by a certain patentee to effect the same results, even though the peculiar form of the work done by the device was unknown before. Otherwise a difference in the particular devices used to accomplish a particular result in a machine would always enable a person to escape the charge of infringement, provided such devices were new with such person in such a machine. Morley Sewing Machine Co. v. Lancaster, 9 Sup. Ct. 299, 309, 129 U. S. 263, 32 L. Ed. 715.

KNOWN INTEMPERATE HABITS.

"A man of known intemperate habits is one whose habit for intemperance is known in the community, just as a man is known in the community either as a good or bad citizen. Zeigler v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 14 Atl. 237, 238.

Act May 13, 1887, § 17, providing a punishment for the offense of selling intoxicating liquors to a "person of known intemperate habits," does not include a person of intemperate habits who conceals such habits. "It is only when his intemperance has become so conspicuous as to form a habit, and that habit is known, not merely to his family or to a night watchman, but to his friends and neighbors, and the community in which he lives, that the law forbids and punishes the sale of liquor to him. Every man has a reputation of sobriety or for intemperance in the community in which he resides, just as every man has a reputation for integrity and for truth, and such reputation is generally known." Commonwealth v. Zeit, 21 Atl. 7, 8, 138 Pa. 615, 11 L. R. A. 602.

"Known intemperate habits," within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors to persons of known intemperate habits, does not import that it is necessary that the person selling liquor has seen the purchaser intoxicated. "To know of a man's intemperate habits, it is not necessary to see him drunk, and know to an absolute certainty, by personal knowledge, that such are his habits. Nor is it necessary that defendant should have had written notice, or even verbal notice, served upon him, telling him that this man was of intemperate habits. If that was his reputation in the neighborhood where he lived, and if defendant knew that such was his reputation, that would be sufficient." Elkin v. Buschner (Pa.) 16 Atl. 102, 104.

KNOWN LODE OR VEIN.

A vein or lode may be known to exist, within Rev. St. § 2333 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1433], providing that a patent for a placer claim shall not include any vein or lode known to exist, so as to except it from the grant, though it has not been located according to law. Sullivan v. Iron Silver Min. Co., 12 Sup. Ct. 555, 556, 143 U. S. 431, 36 L. Ed. 214 (reversing Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Sullivan [U. S.] 16 Fed. 829, 831).

Rev. St. § 2333 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1433], provides that a patent for a placer claim shall not include any vein or lode known to exist within the boundaries of the grant, unless application is also made for such vein or lode, but, if its existence is not known, the title shall pass. Held, that a vein or lode may be known to exist, within the meaning of the statute, though it has not been located according to law. Our conclusions are, first, in respect to the matter of the known vein, that the reasons so clearly stated by Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court, in the case of Noyes v. Mantle, 127 U. S. 348, 353, 8 Sup. Ct. 1132, 32 L. Ed. 168, are unanswerable, and forbid an adjudication that the term "known vein" is to be taken as synonymous with "located vein," and compel a reiteration of the declaration heretofore made that the term refers to a vein or lode whose existence is known, as contradistinguished from one which has been appropriated by location, and, as to the other matter, that the title to portions of this horizontal vein or deposit—"blanket vein," as it is generally called—may be acquired under the sections concerning veins, lodes, etc. The fact that so many patents have been obtained under these sections, and that so many applications for patents are still pending, is a strong reason against a new and contrary ruling. Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Mike & Starr Gold & Silver Min. Co., 12 Sup. Ct. 543, 549, 143 U. S. 394, 430, 36 L. Ed. 201.

"Known veins," mentioned in Rev. St. § 2333 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1433], excepting from the operation of a placer patent veins known to exist at the time of the application, mean veins which have been clearly ascertained at the date of the patent, and are of such extent and value as to justify their exploitation. Casey v. Thiev-lege, 19 Mont. 341, 347, 48 Pac. 394, 398; Brownfield v. Bier, 39 Pac. 461, 463, 15 Mont. 403; Davis v. Wiebbold, 11 Sup. Ct. 628, 635, 139 U. S. 507, 35 L. Ed. 238.

The subsequent discovery of lodes upon the ground, and their successful working, do not affect the good faith of the application. That must be determined by what was known to exist at the time, and on a showing that no work was done on a claim because it was considered valueless and the location was abandoned, and that the only indication of the vein was that exposed by a ditch dug, and that it was not worth developing, it was insufficient to establish a claim for the lode or vein, within Rev. St. § 2333 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1433], exempting such a vein from the grant of a placer patent. Brownfield v. Bier, 39 Pac. 461, 463, 15 Mont. 403.

To meet the designation of veins known to exist, it is not enough that there may have been some indications, by outcroppings on the surface, of the existence of lodes or veins of rock in place, bearing gold or silver, or other metals. The lodes or veins must be clearly ascertained, and be of such extent as to render the land more valuable on that account, and justify their exploitation. Butte & B. Min. Co. v. Sloan, 16 Mont. 97, 40 Pac. 217; Davis v. Wiebbold, 11 Sup. Ct. 628, 635, 139 U. S. 507, 35 L. Ed. 238; Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Mike & Starr Gold & Silver Min. Co., 12 Sup. Ct. 543, 549, 143 U. S. 394, 36 L. Ed. 201; United States v. Iron Silver Mining Co., 128 U. S. 673, 683, 9 Sup. Ct. 195, 32 L. Ed. 571.

Rev. St. § 2333 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1433], provides that a patent for a placer claim shall not include any vein or lode known to exist within the boundaries of the grant, unless application is also made for such vein or lode, but, if its existence is not known, the title shall pass. It is undoubtedly true that not every crevice in the rocks, nor every outcropping on the surface, which suggests the possibility of mineral, or which may on subsequent exploration be found to develop ore of great value, can be adjudged a known vein or lode within the meaning of the statute. In the case of Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Cheeseman, 116 U. S. 529, 536, 6 Sup. Ct. 481, 29 L. Ed. 712, this court sustained an instruction as to what constitutes a lode or vein, given in these words: "To determine whether a lode or vein exists, it is necessary to define those terms; and, as in that, it is enough to say that a lode or vein is a body of mineral or mineral-bearing rock within defined boundaries in the general mass of the mountains. In this definition the elements are the body of mineral or mineral-bearing rock and the boundaries. With either of these things well established, very slight evidence may be accepted as to the existence of the other. A body of mineral or mineral-bearing rock in the general mass of the mountain, so far as it may continue unbroken and without interruption, may be regarded as a lode, whatever the boundaries may be. In the existence of such body, and to the extent of it, boundaries are implied. On the other hand, with well-defined boundaries, very slight evidence of ore within such boundaries will prove the existence of a lode. Such boundaries constitute a fissure, and, if in such fissure ore is found, although at considerable intervals and in small quantities, it is called a 'lode' or 'vein.'" Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Mike & Starr Gold & Silver Min. Co., 12 Sup. Ct. 543, 549, 143 U. S. 394, 36 L. Ed. 201.

Within Rev. St. § 2333 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1433], providing that, where a vein or lode is known to exist within the boundaries of a placer claim, the filing of an application for such placer claim which does not include an application for the vein or lode claim shall be construed as a declaration that the claimant of the placer claim has no right of possession to the vein or lode claim, means a vein of such extent as to render the land more valuable on that account, which is clearly ascertained and known. United States v. Iron Silver Min. Co., 9 Sup. Ct. 195, 198, 128 U. S. 673, 32 L. Ed. 571.

The requisites of a known vein under Rev. St. § 2333 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1433], excluding them from the operation of a patent, are different from those of a vein or lode which will justify a location under section 2320 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1424]. Under the former, the ledge must be known to be so valuable for its mineral as to justify expenditures for their extraction, while under the latter comparatively slight indications of a defined and mineral-bearing ledge are sufficient. To meet the designation of a known ledge, the lodes or veins must be clearly ascertained, and the mineral that they contain must be in sufficient quantity to make them valuable as mineral lands. Montana Cent. R. Co. v. Migeon (U. S.) 68 Fed. 811, 813.

KNOWN PROPERTY.

The term "known property," as used in a statute providing that the statute of limitations shall not run against one who is absent from the state, excepting where he leaves within the state known property, means that the person's ownership of the property must be so notorious that a creditor would have found it by a reasonable search and inquiry. Farnham v. Thomas, 56 Vt. 33, 34.

The phrase "known property," in the statute relating to limitations, means property which by use of ordinary diligence might have been known. Tucker v. Wells, 12 Vt. 240, 243.

Actual knowledge by the plaintiff alone would be sufficient to make it known property, or it might be known property, in the sense of the statute, without knowledge by him, provided it was known by others, and the knowledge of it was so common that plaintiff, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, would have found it. Moore v. Quint, 44 Vt. 97, 104.

Personal property left in a state by a debtor, which fact was known to several persons, but was not generally known, and the creditor resided in another town, 20 miles distant, is not known property, within the statute. Wheeler v. Brewer, 20 Vt. 113, 117.

KNOWN VIOLATION OF LAW.

See "Die in Known Violation of Law."

KNUCKS—KNUCKLES.

The words "knucks" and "knuckles" mean the same thing, so that a bail bond is not insufficient because it recites that defendant is charged with the offense of having and carrying on and about his person "brass knucks," instead of "brass knuckles," on the ground that it sets out no offense against the Penal Code. Mills v. State, 35 S. W. 370, 371, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 71.

KUMSHAW.

The "kumshaw," in the general Canton trade, is a present made by the Hong merchant or broker to the captain or supercargo of a vessel on the completing of a sale. It is voluntary on the part of the Hong. It consists, not of money, but of shawls, fine teas, etc., and is always regarded as the perquisite and private profit of the person to whom it is made. But the kumshaw in the opium trade differs in some respects from that in the ordinary Chinese trade. It is a money fee fixed in amount, and obligatory on the purchaser. The kumshaw is paid only when the opium is delivered to a purchaser or smuggler, and not when it is transshipped. In the different opium ships at Canton, as between the owner and captain, the right to the kumshaw was usually, though not always, a matter of special agreement. In the British ships it was generally divided, while in the only American ship engaged in the opium store trade the captain received the whole kumshaw. Wilcocks v. Phillips (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 1198, 1201.

An assessor, in making an assessment, used the abbreviations "h., l., and stable," and it was held that such assessment was intelligible, the phrase being properly used to mean "house, lot, and stable." Alden v. City of Newark, 86 N. J. Law (7 Vroom) 288.

L. S.

In copying a writ or summons, the facsimile of a seal cannot well be made, and to do it would require more skill than pertains to the profession generally. By long usage and the general understanding of legal writers, "L. S." is regarded as the true representation of a seal in a copy of all legal precepts. If the word "Seal" were written in the place of the seal on the writ or summons, it would not be a true copy, for no such writing is upon the writ or summons. Whether we might receive that as a sufficient representation, it is not necessary to say, but we have no hesitancy in deciding that the letters "L. S." are the proper designation and copy of the seal. Smith v. Butler, 25 N. H. (5 Fost.) 521, 524.

The letters "L. S.," printed between brackets, and following the signatures of the makers of a promissory note, which also contained the words, "given under the hand and seal of each party," were sufficient to make it a sealed instrument. Barnes v. Walker, 41 S. E. 243, 115 Ga. 108.

In O'Cain v. O'Cain (S. C.) 1 Strob. 405, Wardlaw, J., said: "For a seal, the letters 'L. S.,' with a circumflex, are usually adopted; and where a party who signs does himself make these marks plainly after his name, or with his name before them, plainly made on the paper, they furnish of themselves evidence of his intention to do what they usually denote—to seal." McLaughlin v. Braddy, 41 S. E. 523, 524, 63 S. C. 433, 90 Am. St. Rep. 681.

LA.

The letters "La." will not be judicially recognized as an abbreviation for the state of Louisiana. Russell v. Martin, 15 Tex. 238.

LA FAVORITA.

The words "La Favorita," used to designate flour sold by a certain firm, did not indicate by whom the flour was manufactured, but indicated the origin of its selection and classification, and were equivalent to the signature of the firm to a certificate that the flour was the genuine article, which had been determined by them to possess a certain degree of excellence. They did not, of course, in themselves, indicate quality, for it was merely a fancy name in a foreign language; but they evidenced that the skill, knowledge, and judgment of the firm had been exercised in ascertaining that the particular flour so marked was possessed of a merit rendered definite by their examination, and of a uniformity rendered certain by their selecting, and is entitled to be protected as a trade-mark. Menendez v. Holt, 9 Sup. Ct. 143, 144, 128 U. S. 514, 32 L. Ed. 526.

LABEL

A notice posted in a hotel room that packages of value should be properly labeled and deposited in an iron safe kept at the office for that purpose is satisfied by the written name of the owner upon a package deposited with the clerk. The most general idea of a label is not of a separate strip of paper or parchment, but a written description of the article upon which it is placed or made, as to its ownership, or character, or quality, or extent. The name of the owner was a label. It indicated the ownership. A similar indorsement of the word "money" or "valuables" would have been a label. Wilkins v. Earle, 44 N. Y. 172, 185, 4 Am. Rep. 655.

As a trade-mark.

A label is a slip of paper or any other material bearing a name, title, address, or the like, affixed to something to indicate its nature, contents, ownership, destination, or other particulars. That which constitutes the real and whole value of the label is, in connection with its general form and appearance, its statements concerning the origin of the goods to which it is to be attached, and the evidence it furnishes of the genuineness of the goods, as the product of the particular manufacturer whose work is certified to by the stamp of authenticity given by the label, and the change of an immaterial statement on a label will not make it a new label. Perkins v. Heert, 39 N. Y. Supp. 223, 226, 5 App. Div. 335.

"A label is not a trade-mark, as recognized at common law, though it may in fact contain no words, figures, etc., except those which constitute the trade-mark. A person may adopt a label of given material, size, color, etc., and may attach the same to his goods, or the wrappers, cases, etc., in which they are packed, although another person has previously adopted labels of the same materials, dimensions, and color, and used them in the same manner; but labels, like trademarks, may be adopted and used by a manufacturer or seller of goods, to distinguish his goods from those of others; and, when another person uses the same label, or a colorable imitation thereof, it produces the same result as would a copy or colorable imitation of a trade-mark—that is to say, it is a false representation that the goods to which it is attached were manufactured or sold by the person whose label was copied or imitated, and purchasers are deceived and are liable to be defrauded." Burke v. Cassin, 45 Cal. 467, 481, 13 Am. Rep. 204.

A label is only intended to indicate the article contained in the bottle, package, or box to which it is affixed, and not to distinguish it from articles of the same general nature manufactured or sold by others, thus securing to the producer the benefits of any increased sale by reason of any peculiar excellence he may have given to it, as a trade-mark does. Higgins v. Keuffel, 11 Sup. Ct. 731, 732, 140 U. S. 428, 35 L. Ed. 470.

Neither a letter nor a horseshoe, nor any such simple device, can be claimed as a label. Lorillard v. Drummond Tobacco Co. (U. S.) 14 Fed. 111.

That a painting only 7 by 4½ inches in size, painted by an artist employed by a corporation from a design made by its president, may be used as an advertising label, does not affect the right of copyright. The subject is not to be considered a label simply because copies may be so used. Schumacher v. Schwencke (U. S.) 25 Fed. 466, 467.

The manufacturer of goods has no such property interest in the words of a label adopted by him, which merely indicate the quality of the goods, but do not indicate in any manner the manufacturer or place of manufacture, or the kind of goods, as will entitle him to an injunction to restrain another manufacturer from using the same or similar words. Stokes v. Landgraft (N. Y.) 17 Barb. 608, 611.

For instances of men whose services are held to be labor, see subtitle "Laborer."

"The word labor comes from the Latin verb, labo, which is thus rendered in one of the most approved lexicons; to totter, to be ready to fall, to be on the point of falling, to waiver, to be at a loss, to hesitate. Riddle's Lex. By the same authority the Latin noun labor is thus translated: labor, pains combined with physical efforts, or metonymically, activity, industry, hardship, misfortune, trouble, distress. The English word labor is thus defined by Walker: the act of doing what requires a painful exertion or strength, pains, toil, work to be done, work done, performance, exercise, motion with some degree of violence, child-birth, trouble. Webster's definitions are 1, exertion of muscular strength or bodily exertion which occasions weariness, particularly the exertion of the limbs; any occupation by which subsistence is obtained as in agriculture and manufactures in distinction of exertion of strength in play or amusements which are denominated exercise rather than labor. Toil—some work, pains, trouble, any bodily exercise which is attended with fatigue. After the labors of the day the farmer retires and rest is sweet. Moderate labor contributes to the health. What is obtained by labor will of right be the property of him by whose labor it is gained. Rambler. 2, Intellectual exertion, application of the mind which causes weariness, as the labor of compiling and writing a history. 3, exertion of mental powers united with bodily employment, as the labors of the apostles in propagating Christianity. 4, work done or to be done; that which requires wearisome exertion being a labor of so great difficulty the exact performance thereof we may rather wish than look for. Hooker. 5, heroic achievement, as the labor of Hercules, trouble, the pangs and efforts of child-birth, the evils of life, trial, prosecution, etc. They rest from their labors; Rev. 14." Bloom v. Richards, 2 Ohio St. 387, 400.

"Labor" is defined to be physical toil or bodily exertion; also to be hard muscular effort directed to some useful end, as agriculture, manufactures, and the like; also to be intellectual exertion and mental effort. Dixon v. People, 48 N. E. 108, 110, 168 Ill. 179, 39 L. R. A. 116.

"Labor," either as a noun or a verb, is a comprehensive word, and does not seem to carry to its derivative, 'laborer,' as ordinarily used, its full original meaning. The traveling salesman undoubtedly labors, but he is not a laboring man. But an allegation that a judgment is for labor is not equivalent to an allegation that it is for a laborer's wages." Paddock v. Balgord, 48 N. W. 840, 841, 2 S. D. 100.

Labor or service, within the meaning of Act Cong. Feb. 26, 1885, c. 164, 23 Stat. 332 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1290], prohibiting the importation of aliens for labor or service, is limited to cheap and unskilled labor and service, and does not include professional labor or service. United States v. Laws, 16 Sup. Ct. 998, 1000, 163 U. S. 258, 41 L. Ed. 151.

Buying goods.

Services of plaintiff, who expected to be manager of defendant's store, in going east with defendant and assisting him in buying goods, do not constitute labor, within How. Ann. St. § 8749m, authorizing persons having preferred claims for labor to join in chancery in cases of fraud or assignment for the benefit of creditors. Lawton v. Richardson, 77 N. W. 265, 266, 118 Mich. 669.

Contractor's services.

Within the meaning of the Florida statute of June 3, 1887, which gives a superior lien to any persons who shall perform any labor upon or for the benefit of any railroad, etc., the service of a contractor on a railroad is labor. Couper v. Gaboury, 69 Fed. 7, 8.

Execution of contract.

In Cr. Code, § 261, providing that whoever disturbs the peace and good order of society by labor (works of necessity and charity excepted), or by amusement or diversion, on Sunday, shall be fined, etc., the term "labor" does not include mere business; and hence the entering into a contract with a certain person to sail a vessel during a certain season for the other party to the contract is not labor, within the meaning of the word as used in the statute. The word should be construed as having been used in its ordinary term, and not as synonymous with or including "business." Richmond v. Moore, 107 Ill. 429, 438, 47 Am. Rep. 445.

"Laboring," as used in Code Va. 1849, c. 196, § 16, providing that every free person found on a Sabbath day laboring at a trade or calling, excepting household duties or other work of necessity or charity, should forfeit a certain sum, implies something more than only mere physical effort. It imports a continuance of bodily exertion, put forth in a trade or calling—such an exercise of muscular sense as brings on fatigue. Where plaintiff and defendant talked over business matters on Sunday, and came to a conclusion, which another then and there reduced to writing, which was read over and explained to defendant, who then and there signed, sealed, and delivered it—the whole matter taking place within an hour's time on the Sabbath day—there was no laboring, within the meaning of the statute. The laboring done, if any, in and about the transaction, was performed by the party who reduced the agreement to writing and not by the parties to the covenant, unless the talking which they did is considered labor. Neither of the parties was found laboring, in any usual sense of the word. Raines v. Watson, 2 W. Va. 371-402.

The making of a contract does not come within the meaning of the term "labor." Bloom v. Richards, 2 Ohio St. 387, 400.

While the words "all labor," as used in a Sunday law, are equivalent to the words "labor, business, or work," yet the making of a contract on Sunday is not prohibited by the statute; the intention being to prohibit such work as disturbs the religious observances in the quiet of the Sabbath. Holden v. O'Brien, 90 N. W. 531, 86 Minn. 297.

Execution of note or will.

"Labor," as used in Gould, Dig. c. 51, art. 5, § 1, prohibiting labor on Sunday, should be construed to include the execution by the maker, and the receipt by the payee, of a promissory note. Tucker v. West, 29 Ark. 386, 400.

The execution and delivery of a note on Sunday is not labor, within the meaning of the Illinois statute which declares that "whoever disturbs the peace and good order of society by labor (works of necessity and charity excepted) or by any amusement or diversion on Sunday shall be fined." More v. Clymer, 12 Mo. App. 11, 14.

The making and delivery on a secular day of a promissory note dated to take effect on a subsequent Lord's Day is not work or labor prohibited by the statutes for the observance of the Lord's Day. Stacy v. Kemp, 97 Mass. 166, 168.

"Labor," as used in a New Hampshire statute prohibiting all secular work, business, or labor on Sunday, should not be construed to include the execution of a will. George v. George, 47 N. H. 27, 35.

"Labor, business, or work," within the meaning of the statute prohibiting any labor, business, or work, except works of necessity and charity, on the Lord's Day, includes the giving of a promissory note or Sunday in consideration of articles purchased on that day. Towle v. Larrabee, 26 Me. (13 Shep.) 464, 466.

Freight.

"Labor," as used in Act Aug. 13, 1894, c. 280, 28 Stat. 278 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2523], providing that persons who contract with the United States to perform public work shall add to the usual penal bond an obligation to promptly pay all persons who supply labor and materials in the work, does not include a charge by a railroad for freight on materials which are loaded and unloaded by such contractor. United States v. Hyatt (U. S.) 92 Fed. 442, 445, 34 C. C. A. 445

Hiring a horse.

"Labor," as used in a statute prohibiting labor on Sunday, does not include a contract by a livery stable keeper to hire a horse on Sunday, if the hiring is for purposes of charity or necessity. If the contract is made for purposes of business or pleasure, it is labor intended to be prohibited by the statute. Stewart v. Davis, 31 Ark. 518, 520, 25 Am. Rep. 576.

Personal service distinguished.

It is said in Weymouth v. Sanborn, 43 N. H. 171, 80 Am. Dec. 144, that claims for labor would not ordinarily be understood to embrace the services of the clergyman, physician, lawyer, commission merchant, or salaried officer, agent, railroad or other contractor, but would be confined to claims arising out of services where physical toil was the main ingredient, though directed and made more valuable by mechanical skill. The term "labor," in a statute providing that no person summoned as trustee shall be charged as such on account of the personal services or earnings of the wife of the debtor at any time, or on account of any labor performed by the debtor or any of his family after the service of the process or within 15 days prior to such service, is of a more narrow meaning than the term "personal service" or "earnings," as used in the statute. Hoyt v. White, 46 N. H. 45, 48.

Keeping open barber shop.

The term "laboring on the Sabbath," in an indictment charging that defendant unlawfully labored on the Sabbath, is not satisfied by proof that defendant kept his barber shop open on that day, but did no work therein. State v. Frederick, 45 Ark. 347, 348, 55 Am. Rep. 555.

Manufacture of articles.

The provision of Rev. St. c. 208, § 9, exempting from the process of foreign attachment debts due for the labor of defendant performed 15 days before the service of the process and afterward, does not extend to those cases in which other things have been procured by the laborer upon his own responsibility, and blended with his labor, in accomplishing a work undertaken by himself. Robbins v. Rice, 18 N. H. 507, 510.

Mining claims.

Rev. St. 1872, §§ 2325, 2326 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 1429, 1430], relative to the location of mining claims, and providing that there shall be annually expended on certain claims, labor or improvements amounting to $100, mean labor or improvements on any part of property consisting of several consolidated claims. When the labor is performed or the improvements are made for the development of the property as a whole—that is, to facilitate the extraction of the metals it may contain—though in fact such labor and improvements are made on ground which originally constituted only one of the locations, as in sinking a shaft, or be at a distance from the claim itself, as where the labor is performed for the turning of a stream, or the introduction of water, or where the improvements consist in the construction of a flume to carry off the debris or waste material. Such labor or improvement relates to each one of the claims consolidated, and is labor or improvement expended thereon, within the statute. St. Louis Smelting & Refining Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 636, 655, 26 L. Ed. 875; De Noon v. Morrison, 23 Pac. 374, 83 Cal. 163. Labor performed by the owner of the mine in constructing a wagon road thereto for the purpose of developing and operating the same may be treated as a compliance with the statute. Doherty v. Morris, 28 Pac. 85, 86, 17 Colo. 105.

The mining laws of the United States require that not less than $100 worth of labor shall be performed upon every unpatented location. Labor and improvements, within the meaning of the statute, are deemed to be done upon the location when the labor is performed or improvements made for the express purpose of working, prospecting, or developing the ground embraced in the location. Work done outside of the limits of a mining claim, for the purpose of prospecting or developing it, is as available for holding the claim as if done within the boundaries of the location of the claim. Book v. Justice Min. Co. (U. S.) 58 Fed. 106, 117.

Rev. St. § 2334, providing that the holder of a mining claim, to maintain his right of possession, must see that $100 worth of labor shall be performed on such claim, or in improvements made thereon, during each year, should be construed to include the time and labor of a watchman and custodian, expended on the property in taking care of it, though the mining works are idle. Lockhart v. Rollins, 21 Pac. 413, 415, 2 Idaho, 503.

Performance of official duty.

"Labor" is defined as to exert muscular strength; to exert one's strength with painful effort, particularly in servile occupations; to work; to toil. The term, as used in a criminal statute, does not apply to an officer engaged in the performance of his official duties, so that the filing of an application to purchase school lands in the General Land Office on Sunday does not render the application void; it not being labor, within Pen. Code 1895, art. 196, imposing a fine on any person who shall labor on Sunday. Stephens v. Porter, 69 S. W. 423, 424, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 556.

Printing.

"Labor," as used in Comp. Laws, § 607, as amended by Laws 1889, c. 49, § 104, providing for the making of contracts for labor by a county in a certain manner, will be construed to mean manual exertion of a toilsome nature, and hence will not include the printing of a tax list. Dewell v. Hughes County Com'rs, 66 N. W. 1079, 1080, 8 S. D. 452.

Selling goods or waiting on customers.

Mansf. Dig. § 1883, prohibiting laboring on Sunday, except in the performance of ordinary household duties of daily necessity, comfort, or charity, includes the selling of theater tickets for, and the superintending of, an entertainment by the manager of a public theater, that he has caused to be given therein on Sunday. Quarles v. State, 17 S. W. 269, 270, 55 Ark. 10, 14 L. R. A. 192.

A person who sells intoxicating liquors on Sunday is engaged in labor, within Laws 1887, c. 26, imposing a penalty on any one found on Sunday "engaged in any labor except works of necessity, charity or mercy." Cortesy v. Territory, 30 Pac. 947, 948, 6 N. M. 682, 19 L. R. A. 349.

Shaving by barber.

The shaving of a person by a barber, in his usual and ordinary business, is labor, within the meaning of a statute prohibiting labor on Sunday. State v. Nesbit, 8 Kan. App. 104, 109, 54 Pac. 326, 328.

Teams employed.

Laws 1887, Act 229 (3 How. St. § 8427a), giving any person who performs "any labor or service" in manufacturing lumber a lien therefor, includes the labor or services of teams furnished by the person who himself, as a laborer or contractor, performs the labor or services; but there can be no lien in favor of the owner of a team let to the laborer or contractor, where the one who makes use of the team is himself entitled to assert a lien for the services at a gross sum for his own work and that of the team. Mable v. Sines, 52 N. W. 1007, 92 Mich. 545.

Within the meaning of a statute giving a lien to "laborers and for persons furnishing materials to contractors or subcontractors," labor done by a man's team may be fairly regarded as labor done by him; no right arising to any one out of its services, except to him. Chicago & N. E. R. Co. v. Sturgis, 7 N. W. 213, 214, 44 Mich. 538.

"Labor and services," as used in Laws 1877, c. 95, giving a lien on logs for labor and services, should not be construed to mean merely the personal or manual labor and services of the claimant, but include those performed by his teams and servants. Hogan v. Cushing, 5 N. W. 490, 491, 49 Wis. 169.

LABOR ORGANIZATION.

As conspiracy, see "Conspiracy."

LABOR PERFORMED.

"Labor performed," as used in St. 1855, c. 231, § 1, giving a lien on a vessel for labor performed, material used, or labor and materials used in the construction, launching, or repairs of, or for constructing the launching ways for, or for provisions, stores, or other articles furnished for or on account of, the vessel, means merely labor performed for the construction of a vessel; and hence no lien can be claimed for labor or materials which were not actually used in the construction of the vessel, or fitted and prepared for that purpose. The words "or labor and materials furnished" were inserted to make it clear that the statute covered the case of a person who did not himself perform the labor or own the materials, etc., but does not allow labor and materials, as it does stores and provisions, to be merely furnished on account of the ship. Young v. The Orpheus, 119 Mass. 179, 184.

LABOR ON ANY LAND.

Rev. St. 1858, c. 153, § 12, providing that any person performing manual "labor upon any land," etc., shall be entitled to a lien thereon, includes the making of fences on the land. The words include all labor done directly upon the land for the purpose of preparing it for use as such. Bailey v. Hull, 11 Wis. 289, 291, 78 Am. Dec. 706.

LABOR SERVICE.

The janitor of the hall of a town of less than 12,000 inhabitants is not an employé of the town, who can invoke St. 1896, c. 517—providing that, in any towns in which the civil service act has not been applied to the labor service, the selectmen of the towns shall take such action as may be necessary to secure the employment of veterans in the labor service of their respective towns in preference to all other persons except women—in his behalf by mandamus, as a veteran of the late Civil War, as the Legislature intended the words "labor service" to mean such service as defined by the rules of the civil service commissioners, and their rules do not include such an employé. Johnson v. Kimball, 48 N. E. 1020, 1022, 170 Mass. 58.

Within the civil service provisions of the charter of the city of Tacoma, by which the classification of the civil service was made as "official service" and "labor service," official service comprised those positions of a permanent character, and labor service that of temporary employment. The duty of the flume tender was the custody and care of the flume of the waterworks system, which belonged to, and was operated by, the city. Such duties were permanent, and were designated by the city, rather than by contract, and the compensation was properly designated as official service. State v. Smith, 19 Wash. 644, 54 Pac. 33.

LABORER.

See, also, "Mechanic."

See "Agricultural Laborer"; "Chinese Laborer"; "Co-laborer"; "Day Laborer"; "Emigrant Laborers"; "Hand Laborers."

All laborers, see "All."

Every laborer, see "Every."

Other laborer, see "Other."

A laborer, as defined by Webster, is one who works at a toilsome occupation; a man who does work requiring little skill, as distinguished from an artisan; sometimes called a "laboring man." Clerks, agents, cashiers of banks, and all that class of employes whose employment is associated with mental labor and skill, are not considered laborers. Every human being who follows any legitimate employment or discharges the duties of any office is, in a broad sense, a laborer. The President of the United States, a Governor of a state, and the Justices of the Supreme Court are all laboring men, in the sense that they do a good deal of hard work, much of which is, indeed, attended with physical and muscular exertion; but at the same time they cannot properly be termed manual laborers, either in the popular sense in which these words are understood and used, or in the sense in which the term "laborers" was employed in the statute giving a laborer a lien on the property of his employer. In determining whether a particular clerk or other employe is really a laborer, the character of the work he does must be taken into consideration, and he must be classified, not according to the arbitrary designation given to his calling, but with reference to the character of his services. Oliver v. Macon Hardware Co., 25 S. E. 403, 405, 98 Ga. 249, 58 Am. St. Rep. 300; McPherson v. Stroup, 28 S. E. 157, 159, 100 Ga. 228.

The term "laborer" is no more comprehensive than the term "employe." Frick Co. v. Norfolk & O. V. R. Co. (U. S.) 86 Fed. 725, 728, 32 C. C. 31.

Code, § 1241, which provides that the homestead is subject to execution or forced sale in satisfaction of judgments obtained on debts secured by "mechanics', laborers', and vendors' liens" on the premises, does not include a materialman's lien. Richards v. Shear, 11 Pac. 607, 608, 70 Cal. 187.

A laborer is one who labors with physical power, and under the direction of another, at fixed wages. Kansas City v. McDonald, 80 Mo. App. 444, 448.

The word "laborer," as used in the act relating to mechanics' liens, shall be construed to include any mechanic, workman, artisan, or laborer employed in or about any such work for which a lien may be had. Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 10,738.

In the statute giving laborers having claims against insolvent corporations priority, it is provided that the word "laborers" shall be construed to include all persons doing labor or services of whatever character for or as workmen or employes in the regular employ of such corporations. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Oxford Iron Co., 33 N. J. Eq. (6 Stew.) 192, 194; Lehigh Coal & Navigation Co. v. Central R. Co. of New Jersey, 29 N. J. Eq. (2 Stew.) 252, 253.

The Century Dictionary defines a "laborer" as "one who labors or works with mind or body, or both, but specifically one who is engaged in some toilsome physical occupation, or, in a more restricted sense, one who performs work requiring little skill or special training, as distinguished from a skilled workman or one engaged especially in husbandry." Cochran v. A. S. Baker Co., 61 N. Y. Supp. 724, 30 Misc. Rep. 48.

A laborer is one who labors with his physical powers in the service of and under the direction of, another, for fixed wages. Blanchard v. Portland & R. F. Ry., 32 Atl. 890, 891, 87 Me. 241; Meands v. Park, 50 Atl. 706, 707, 95 Me. 527.

A laborer is one who performs manual labor. In re Ho King (U. S.) 14 Fed. 724, 725; Wildner v. Ferguson, 43 N. W. 794, 42 Minn. 112, 6 L. R. A. 338, 18 Am. St. Rep. 495; Milligan v. San Antonio & G. S. Ry. Co. (Tex.) 46 S. W. 918, 919; McPherson v. Stroup (Ga.) 28 S. E. 157, 159; Weatherby v. Saxony Woolen Co. (N. J.) 29 Atl. 326; Coffin v. Reynolds, 37 N. Y. 640, 646; Hovey v. Ten Broeck, 26 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Rob.) 316; 320; Whitaker v. Smith, 81 N. C. 340, 342, 31 Am. Rep. 503; Weymouth v. Sanborn, 43 N. H. 171, 173, 80 Am. Barrills, 41 Pac. 656, 658, 27 Or. 251, 50 Am. St. Rep. 717; Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Baker, 14 Kan. 563, 566; Epps v. Epps, 17 Ill. App. (17 Bradw.) 196, 201.

The word "laborer," as used in the title to Laws 1889, c. 204, entitled "An act to fix the amount of wages of laborers exempt from process of attachment, garnishment, or execution," being used in connection with "wages" may, in a general sense, be applied to employes other than workmen engaged in manual labor, consistently with the provisions of the act. Hence the law will not be in conflict with the constitutional provision which requires the subject of a law to be expressed in its title. Boyle v. Vanderhoof, 47 N. W. 396, 397, 45 Minn. 31.

A laborer, within the statutes exempting from garnishment the wages of a "laborer," is one whose work depends on mere physical power to perform ordinary manual labor, and not one engaged in services consisting mainly of work requiring mental skill or business capacity, and involving the exercise of intellectual faculties. Kline v. Russell, 39 S. E. 477, 113 Ga. 1085 (citing Oliver v. Macon Hardware Co., 98 Ga. 249, 25 S. E. 403, 58 Am. St. Rep. 300).

The term "laborer," as used in a Constitution relating to the exemption of wages of laborers, was intended to apply to manual laborers, whose claims are usually small, and, owing to the necessity of the laborer, promptly enforced. Butler v. Clark, 46 Ga. 466-468.

The statement in an application for a life insurance policy, in answer to the question as to what the applicant's occupation was, that he was laborer, when in fact he had suspended labor for several years prior to the making of the application, either on account of old age or through continuous disability, was misleading, and the policy issued in pursuance of such application is avoided. United Brethren Mut. Aid Soc. v. White, 100 Pa. 12, 17.

A person may be properly referred to as a laborer, or as belonging to the laboring class, although at the particular time to which such reference is made he may, by reason of inability to obtain work, sickness, or other cause, not be actually employed as a laborer. United States v. Chung Ki Foon (U. S.) 83 Fed. 143, 144.

"Laborers," as used in Laws 1892, c. 688, § 54, making stockholders of corporations personally liable for all debts due any of their laborers, servants, or employes, other than contractors, for services performed by them, are those who toil in a menial capacity. Bristor v. Kretz, 49 N. Y. Supp. 404, 405, 22 Misc. Rep. 55.

The term "laborer" includes one employed to puddle iron, though he is paid by the job, and not by the day. Adcock v. Smith, 37 S. W. 91, 92, 97 Tenn. (13 Pickle) 373, 56 Am. St. Rep. 810.

Chief Justice Horton, speaking for the supreme court in State v. Martindale, 47 Kan. 147, 150, 27 Pac. 582, says: "The words 'laborers, workmen, mechanics, and other persons,' in Laws 1891, c. 104, § 1, relating to the employment of such persons by public corporations for more than eight hours per day, evidently do not embrace any officer or employe for whom an annual salary has been specifically named and appropriated by the Legislature. Thus a person contracting to do a certain amount of work for a certain sum of money cannot recover a greater sum for the reason that he has worked over eight hours a day in performing such work." Billingsley v. Marshall County Com'rs, 49 Pac. 329, 5 Kan. App. 435.

"A laborer is defined by Webster to be one who labors in a toilsome occupation; a man who does work that requires little skill, as distinguished from an artisan." Bloom v. Richards, 2 Ohio St. 387, 401.

"Laborers," as used in Act July 23, 1868, giving laborers a lien, is employed to mean one who labors in some toilsome occupation—one who does work that requires little skill. Dano v. Mississippi, O. & R. R. Co., 27 Ark. 564, 567.

Within a statute giving a laborer a lien, a laborer is one who labors in a toilsome occupation; a man who does work that requires little skill, as distinguished from an artisan. Savannah & C. R. Co. v. Callahan, 49 Ga. 506, 511.

In the laborer's lien act of July 23, 1868 (Gantt's Dig. p. 740), the word "laborer" must be understood in its ordinary sense, and is distinguished from "mechanic" or "artisan," as used in other lien acts. Taylor v. Hathaway, 29 Ark. 597, 601.

"Laborer," as used in Act July 3, 1868, providing that laborers who perform work and labor for any person under a written or verbal contract shall have an absolute lien on the product of their labor for such work and labor, should be construed according to its common acceptation, and to mean men who do work that requires little skill, as distinguished from an artisan. It is not to be construed literally, as giving to every laborer a lien for his labor. Guise v. Oliver, 11 S. W. 515, 51 Ark. 356.

Actor or performer.

A laborer is one who is hired to do manual labor, but does not include every person who performs labor for compensation. One who furnishes a performance consisting of music, dancing, and feats of contortion is not a laborer. Wirth v. Calhoun, 89 N. W. 785, 786, 64 Neb. 316.

Agent.

Gen. St. 1878, c. 66, § 310, subd. 11, exempting from garnishment the wages of a laboring man, to a certain amount, means a person whose work is manual; those who are responsible for no independent action, but who do a day's work or stated job under the direction of a superior; those who work for wages, etc. The term does not include an agent who sells goods by sample. Wildner v. Ferguson, 43 N. W. 794, 795, 42 Minn. 112, 6 L. R. A. 338, 18 Am. St. Rep. 495.

A traveling agent is not a laborer, within the meaning of Acts 1848, § 18, making the stockholders of manufacturing corporations individually liable for debts due their "laborers" and servants. Williamson v. Wadsworth (N. Y.) 49 Barb. 294, 298.

A traveling agent of a machine company is not a laborer, within the meaning of Acts 1887, No. 94, giving laborers preferences for salary due from the master, even though such agent occasionally does some manual work in adjusting machines sold and operating new ones, and in making them work properly, and in instructing others in such matters. Appeal of Clark, 59 N. W. 150, 151, 100 Mich. 448.

Apprentice or servant distinguished.

"Laborer" is more distinctive than "servant," and embraces a smaller class, comprehending only such as perform labor with their hands. Hoovey v. Ten Broeck, 26 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Rob.) 316, 320.

As used in a statute conferring a preference on claims for services performed by a "laborer, servant, or apprentice," the word "servant" is limited by the more specified words "laborer" and "apprentice," with which it is associated, and comprehends only persons performing the same kind of service that was due from laborers and apprentices. Vane v. Newcombe, 10 Sup. Ct. 60, 64, 132 U. S. 220, 33 L. Ed. 310 (citing Wakefield v. Fargo, 90 N. Y. 213).

Architect or draftsman.

An architect is not entitled to a lien for drawing plans and specifications for a building, under Pub. St. c. 391, § 1, giving a lien to any person to whom a debt is due for "labor performed or furnished" and actually used in the erection of a building. Mitchell v. Packard, 47 N. E. 113, 114, 168 Mass. 467, 60 Am. St. Rep. 404.

Laws 1862, c. 478, authorizes a lien to be created in favor of any person who shall perform any labor or furnish any material in building any house, etc. Held, that the words "any person who shall perform any labor" mean not only manual labor, but any work done toward the erection of the building, and hence an architect is entitled to a lien. Stryker v. Cassidy, 76 N. Y. 50, 52, 32 Am. Rep. 262 (reversing 10 Hun, 18).

In Laws Ohio 1894, par. 135, giving a lien to a person who performs labor for erecting, altering, repairing, or removing a house by virtue of a contract, etc., "labor" includes not merely manual or unskilled labor, but extends to the labor of an architect in preparing plans and specifications and in superintending construction, where it appears that such plans and specifications were prepared with a view to the particular location where the building was actually erected, and in pursuance of a contract having a substantial financial basis. Phoenix Furniture Co. v. Put-in-Bay Hotel Co. (U. S.) 66 Fed. 683, 685.

Gen. St. p. 589, c. 90, § 1, which provides that whoever performs labor or furnishes materials and machinery for erecting, etc., any house or other building by virtue of a contract or agreement with the owner or agent thereof, shall have a lien, etc., includes the services of one who prepares plans and specifications and superintends the erection of a building. Knight v. Norris, 13 Minn. 473, 475 (Gil. 438, 439).

Under Code, § 318, providing that a person who has done work or labor on a building or improved land may have a lien on the building and the lot of land on which it is erected, the services of an architect in preparation of drawings, plans, and specifications for a building, and in superintending the erection thereof, should be included. Hughes v. Torgerson, 11 South. 209, 96 Ala. 346, 16 L. R. A. 600, 38 Am. St. Rep. 105.

An architect is not a mechanic or laborer, so as to entitle him to a mechanic's lien on a building for which he made drawings and specifications. Price v. Kirk (Pa.) 13 Phila. 497, 498.

A laborer, within the meaning of a statute giving a mechanic's lien to any person for labor performed or materials furnished for the erection and construction of a building, includes one who draws the plans and superintends and directs its construction. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co. v. Rowand, 28 N. J. Eq. (11 C. E. Green) 389, 397.

The terms "mechanic or laborer," within the meaning of the statute preferring the claims of mechanics or laborers, do not include a draftsman. Leinau v. Albright, 10 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 171, 173.

Bartender.

A bartender, whose duties are mainly manual, and who is also required to keep books, as a part of his duties, is a laborer, within the meaning of the law creating a lien in favor of laborers for their labor upon the property of their employers. Lowenstein v. Meyer, 40 S. E. 726, 727, 114 Ga. 709.

Bookkeeper or auditor.

The term "laborer," as used in Rev. St. 1895, § 3312, providing that all mechanics, laborers, and operatives who have performed labor in the construction or operation of a railroad shall have a lien thereon, apparently includes only those who have performed manual labor, and a bookkeeper and auditor in the employ of a construction company which built a railroad is not entitled to a lien for the amount due him for his services. Milligan v. San Antonio & G. S. R. Co. (Tex.) 46 S. W. 918, 919.

Act 1892, providing that laborers and workmen and all persons doing labor or service, of whatever character, in the regular employ of an insolvent corporation, shall have a first and prior lien, includes a bookkeeper, for his services involve "labor," in the strict sense of that word. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Keystone Chemical Co., 35 Atl. 157, 54 N. J. Eq. 309.

A bookkeeper is included in the term "laborer," as used in 2 Rev. St. (5th Ed.) p. 658, § 18, rendering stockholders of a mining company liable for all debts due and owing to their laborers. Hovey v. Ten Broeck, 26 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Rob.) 316, 320.

A bookkeeper of a mining company is not a laborer, within the title of 22 St. at Large, p. 502, entitled "An act to provide for laborers' liens." Malcomson v. Wappoo Mills (U. S.) 86 Fed. 192, 198.

A bookkeeper is neither a laborer nor a servant, in view of an act to protect employes and laborers in their claims for wages (3 Starr & C. Ann. St. 828), and the act concerning voluntary assignments, relating to preferred claims for wages (1 Starr & C. Ann. St. 1305). Signor v. Webb, 44 Ill. App. 338, 339.

A bookkeeper is not a laborer, within Laws 1891, c. 415, § 8, preferring the wages of laborers of insolvent corporations. Cochran v. A. S. Baker Co., 61 N. Y. Supp. 724, 30 Misc. Rep. 48.

A printer's bookkeeper, employed at a weekly salary, is a laborer, and entitled to a prior lien on an insolvent employer's assets, under Laws 1895, p. 242, amending Act June 15, 1887, giving laborers such a lien. Heckman v. Tammen, 56 N. E. 361, 363, 184 Ill. 144.

Clergyman.

Act Cong. Feb. 26, 1835, c. 164, 23 Stat. 832 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1290], prohibits the importation and migration of foreigners and aliens under contract to perform labor or service of any kind in the United States. The act provides that the prohibitions of the act shall not apply to professional actors, artists, lecturers, or singers, nor to persons employed strictly as personal or domestic servants. Held, that the words "labor or service" include the services of an alien clergyman residing in England. The words "labor or service" should not be taken in any restricted sense. Every kind of industry and every employment, manual or intellectual, are embraced within the language used, subject to the specific exceptions. United States v. Church of the Holy Trinity (U. S.) 36 Fed. 303, 305 (reversed in Holy Trinity Church v. United States, 12 Sup. Ct. 511, 513, 143 U. S. 457, 36 L. Ed. 226).

Clerk.

The term "laborer," in a statute exempting the wages of a laborer from garnishment, includes a clerk and bookkeeper. Lamar v. Chisholm, 77 Ga. 306.

The term "laborers," in the clause of the Constitution of 1868 giving mechanics and laborers a lien upon the property of their employers for labor performed or material furnished, does not include clerks or persons doing general service, although they may labor. Richardson v. Langston, 68 Ga. 658, 659.

The services of the clerk of a canal company are not labor performed in the construction of the canal, within the meaning of a statute requiring the company to deposit a certain sum as security for labor performed or furnished in the construction of the canal. Crowell v. Cape Cod Ship Canal Co., 46 N. E. 424, 168 Mass. 157.

The work performed by a mailing clerk of a newspaper corporation, whose duty it is to get out, address, and otherwise deliver papers to the patrons, being mechanical and manual, is embraced within the terms of a statute providing that all debts which shall be owing for labor by any corporation at the time it shall become insolvent shall be preferred. Michigan Trust Co. v. Grand Rapids Democrat, 71 N. W. 1102, 1103, 113 Mich. 615, 67 Am. St. Rep. 486.

A railway clerk, whose services under his contract consisted mainly of work requiring mental skill or business capacity, and involving the exercise of his intellectual faculties, rather than work, the doing of which properly would depend upon a mere physical power to perform ordinary manual labor, is not a laborer, within the statutes relating to the exemption from garnishment of a laborer's wages. Boynton v. Pelham, 33 S. E. 876, 108 Ga. 794; Hunter v. Morgan, 33 S. E. 986, 987, 108 Ga. 409 (citing Oliver v. Macon Hardware Co., 25 S. E. 403, 98 Ga. 249, 58 Am. St. Rep. 300; McPherson v. Stroup, 28 S. E. 157, 100 Ga. 228).

Within the meaning of Code, § 3554, declaring that "all journeymen, mechanics, and day laborers shall be exempt from the process and liability of garnishment of their wages," a man in the employ of a railroad banking company as a forwarding clerk, for which he receives monthly wages, and whose duty is to report daily when the drays commence work, and to attend to the forwarding of goods consigned to said company so long as the drays continue to work, and at the close of his day's work to report at the office of the company to assist in checking up and correcting any mistakes in the shipments or receipts during the day—he being paid monthly, and the company having the right to discharge him at any time that his services are not needed, usually giving a month's notice—is a laborer, and his wages are not subject to garnishment. Claghorn v. Saussy, 51 Ga. 576, 577.

The term "laborer," as used in Code, § 1244, providing that the wages of every laborer or mechanic, to a certain amount, shall be exempt from garnishment or other legal process, means one who subsists by physical toil, in distinction from one who subsists by professional skill, and physical toil being the main ingredient of services rendered. A clerk in a store is a laborer, and his wages are exempt. Williams v. Link, 1 South. 907, 64 Miss. 641.

As used in Code, § 1974, giving a lien to a laborer on the property of his employer, the word "laborer" does not include a clerk in a store. Hinton v. Goode, 73 Ga. 233, 234.

A person employed as a clerk, bartender, and boy of all work, to labor in and about a retail grocery and liquor store, is a laborer, within the meaning of a statute entitling a laborer to a general lien on the property of his employer. Oliver v. Boehm, 63 Ga. 172.

A statute giving laborers a lien for work done for their employers does not include clerks in stores or other establishments, unless they perform manual labor. Ricks v. Redwine, 73 Ga. 273, 275.

A general salesman in a clothing establishment is not a laborer, within the Code, exempting from the process of garnishment the wages of a laborer. Ensel v. Adler, 35 S. E. 334, 110 Ga. 326.

Conductor of street railway.

Civ. Code, § 4732, exempting from the process of garnishment "the wages of a laborer," means one whose work requires mere physical power to perform ordinary manual labor, not requiring mental skill or business capacity, or involving the exercise of his intellectual faculties; and a street railway conductor, whose duties are to keep the car in general order, to couple and uncouple trail cars when used, to keep lights dusted off and in proper condition, to keep the guard rails of the car in proper position, to attend to the trolley and keep it in place, to keep the seats of the car turned, to help passengers on and off the car, to help to put the car back on the track if it gets off, and to help remove all obstructions from the track, is a laborer, within the meaning of the statute. Stuart v. Poole, 38 S. E. 41, 112 Ga. 818, 81 Am. St. Rep. 81 (citing Oliver v. Macon Hardware Co., 98 Ga. 249, 25 S. E. 403, 58 Am. St. Rep. 300).

A conductor of a street car, engaged in performing his ordinary duties on Sunday, while the cars were being operated as they are usually run on secular days for the purpose of accommodating the public generally, and earning money from any one who might see fit to travel upon it, is "laboring," within the statute which prohibits any labor on Sunday, except of necessity or charity; and if injured, while so engaged in violating the law, by collision with another car, he cannot recover for such injury. Day v. Highland St. R. Co., 135 Mass. 113, 114, 46 Am. Rep. 447.

Contractor.

"Laborers," within the meaning of the act of 1872 giving a preference to laborers for claims for wages, includes farm laborers, if the employment be continuous in character, but does not include persons who hire a hay press and threshing machine, which they operate during the season wherever they find employment. They are not farm laborers, but are contractors. Willson v. Gibson, 10 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 191, 193.

A person who contracts to excavate and grade a street at a certain rate per cubic yard, and uses two carts and two or three horses in the prosecution of work, with a number of men sufficient, with himself, to keep the carts and horses going, is not a laborer, within the meaning of the act of April 15, 1845, exempting the wages of any laborer from attachment in execution. Heebner v. Chave, 5 Pa. (5 Barr) 115, 117.

An employee who so far retains the control of the work in his hands that he is not subject to the direction of his employer while engaged thereat is an independent contractor, and not within the exception of Civ. Code, § 531, relative to clerks', laborers', and mechanics' wages. Fox v. McClay, 67 N. W. 888, 889, 48 Neb. 820.

An independent contractor to mine phosphate rock at a certain price per ton, employing others to do the work, is not a laborer or employé, within Act S. O. March 5, 1897, providing for laborers' liens. Malcomson v. Wappoo Mills (U. S.) 85 Fed. 912, 913.

Gen. St. 1878, c. 32, §§ 63-77, giving a lien to laborers for labor upon logs or timber, and providing that the act is intended for the protection of laborers for hire, means those performing manual labor only, and does not include a person interested in contracting, cutting, hauling, banking, or driving logs by the thousand. King v. Kelly, 25 Minn. 522, 524.

Act April 9, 1872, giving a preference to claims of laborers against decedents' estates, does not include one who performs a contract to deliver lumber by hiring teams and drivers, but who does no hauling himself. In the contemplation of the act, laborers are those who perform with their own hands the contract they make with the employer. Appeal of Wentroth, 82 Pa. 469, 471.

Rev. St. c. 91, § 38, as amended by Pub. St. 1889, c. 183, giving a statutory lien to whoever labors on logs, was designed for the protection of the laborer only; and the word "laborer," as used in such statute, is one who performs manual labor for wages, under the direction of his employer, and does not include persons who had taken out a contract to cut and haul logs on a tract, and were independent in their methods of doing it, and were carrying out the contract largely through the labor of others, though they performed some physical labor and used their own teams. They were not mere laborers working for fixed wages, the rate of which would not be varied by circumstances. When they labored themselves, it was not for wages, but to increase the profits by saving wages. Littlefield v. Morrill, 54 Atl. 1109, 1110, 97 Me. 505, 94 Am. St. Rep. 513.

The term "laborer," as used in Code, § 531 providing that nothing shall be exempt from execution or attachment for the wages of clerk, laborer, or mechanic, is one who is hired to do the manual or mental labor of another, but it does not include every person who performs labor for compensation. The statute was designed to furnish relief to persons specifically enumerated in the collection of debts due them for their personal services, and not to those who contract and furnish the labor and services of others. So a contractor is not a laborer. Thus a person who contracts to furnish all help and make and burn brick for a certain price per thousand, and also agrees to keep the machinery furnished by the other party in good repair, to supply oil for the same, and fuel and cars for the team furnished by the other party, is not entitled to the benefit of such statute. Henderson v. Nott, 54 N. W. 87, 88, 36 Neb. 154, 38 Am. St. Rep. 720.

One who built a house under a contract to build it for a certain sum, doing some of the work himself, and employing assistants who worked under him, is not a laborer, within the meaning of Code 1892, § 1963, exempting the wages of every laborer or person working for wages from attachment or garnishment. Heard v. Crum, 18 South. 934, 935, 73 Miss. 157, 55 Am. St. Rep. 520.

The term "laborer," in Laws 1883, c. 349, § 1, providing that all assignments hereafter made for the benefit of creditors which shall contain or give any preference to one creditor or over other creditors, except for wages of laborers, servants, or employes earned within six months prior thereto, shall be void, does not include the owner of a steam wood factory, who, under contract with another who furnishes rough planks, manufactures such planks for the latter. Contractors who have entire control of the work to be done, and are in no way subject to the control or direction of the person with whom they contracted, while performing the work they contracted to do for them, are not laborers, in the sense that they were earning wages of some person for the work to be done by them. To constitute a laborer or employe, who can be said to be earning wages of an employer, they must be holding such a relation to the employer that he can direct and control them in and about the work which they are doing for him. Lang v. Simmons, 25 N. W. 650, 652, 64 Wis. 525.

In Balch v. New York & O. M. R. Co., 46 N. Y. 521, it was held that the words "employer" and "laborer," as used in the general railroad act of 1850, which gives the laborer a claim against the company for the indebtedness of a contractor, are used in their ordinary and usual sense, and imply the personal service and work of the individual designed to be protected. The former does not include one who contracts for and furnishes the labor and services of others, or who contracts for and furnishes a team or teams for work, with or without his own services. Fidelity & Deposit Co. v. Parkinson (Neb.) 94 N. W. 120, 122.

Sand. & H. Dig. § 6251, providing a lien for every laborer or other person who shall do or perform any work or labor on a railroad, includes only those who actually labor, and does not apply to a contractor who does not perform any work or labor personally. Little Rock, H. S. & T. Ry. Co. v. Spencer, 47 S. W. 196, 197, 65 Ark. 183, 42 L. R. A. 334 (citing Gurney v. Atlantic & G. W. R. Co., 58 N. Y. 358; Aikin v. Wasson, 24 N. Y. 482; Lehigh Coal & Navigation Co. v. Central R. Co., 29 N. J. Eq. [2 Stew.] 252).

The term "laborer," as used in 1 & 2 Wm. IV, c. 37, relating to claims by any officer, workman, or laborer, would not include a person who takes the contract to execute a certain cutting on a railway at a certain sum per cubic yard, employing several men under him to assist in doing the work. Riley v. Warden, 2 Exch. 59, 67.

Within the meaning of Const. art. 15, § 7, which provides that the stockholders of all corporations and joint-stock associations shall be individually liable for all labor performed for such corporations or associations, the term "laborer" does not include a contractor who contracts to complete a certain section of railroad. Peck v. Miller, 39 Mich. 594, 599.

The term "laborer" is no more comprehensive than the term "employé." As used in Code 1887, § 2485, giving a prior lien to certain laborers, does not include one who lays the track, constructs the overhead line, and strings feeder wires for an electric company at an agreed price per foot or mile. Such a person is a contractor. Frick Company v. Norfolk & O. V. R. Co. (U. S.) 86 Fed. 725, 738, 32 C. C. A. 31.

Act Ky. March 20, 1876, giving a lien in favor of laborers, employés, etc., for work done and materials furnished in keeping a railroad a going concern, etc., should be construed not to include contractors supplying laborers and teams for the construction and repairs of a railroad, being paid for the same by the day, and either party having the right to stop work at the end of any day. Tod v. Kentucky Union Ry. Co. (U. S.) 52 Fed. 241, 243.

Cook.

A hotel cook is not a laborer, within the meaning of Act April 9, 1872, securing a lien for money due for labor and services by any laborer, miner, mechanic, or clerk, etc. Appeal of Sullivan, 77 Pa. (27 P. F. Smith) 107, 108.

Cropper on land.

Acts 1890, c. 56, making it unlawful to induce a laborer who has contracted to work for another for a specified time to leave his employer before his contract has expired, without the consent of the employer, includes a cropper who has hired to work land for a part of the crop. Ward v. State, 12 South. 249, 250, 70 Miss. 245.

Where a person rented a farm to keep till he had gathered and marketed the crop, one-half of which he was to pay as rent—the owner of the land to furnish team, tools, and feed, but to pay nothing for making the crop—the contract was one of rental and the tenant was not a laborer within Mansf. Dig. § 4451, providing that contracts for labor for a longer period than one year shall be void unless in writing. Mondschein v. State, 55 Ark. 389, 18 S. W. 383.

Domestic distinguished.

"Laborer," as defined by Bouvier, is "a servant in husbandry or manufacture, not living intra mœnia"; and, no doubt, that was the original technical meaning of the word. It was usually applied to those employed in toilsome outdoor labor, as distinguished from domestic servants. Farinholt v. Luckhard, 21 S. E. 817, 90 Va. 936, 44 Am. St. Rep. 953.

Act Feb. 17, 1848, § 18, providing that the stockholders of any company organized under the provisions of the act of which the section forms a part shall be jointly and severally individually liable for all debts that may be due and owing to all their laborers or servants and apprentices for services performed for such corporation, "is not confined to manual laborers, nor those needing protection by reason of presumable ignorance," but, in the case of a newspaper, includes a reporter and an editor, when they are not officers of the corporation. Harris v. Norvell (N. Y.) 1 Abb. N. C. 127, 129.

Employés of a newspaper corporation, whose work consists of writing editorials, the preparation of copy for the printers, the direction of the make-up of the paper, proof-reading, reporting, and gathering news, being engaged in intellectual rather than manual labor, are not entitled to claim the benefits of a statute which provides "that all debts which shall be owing for labor by any corporation at the time it shall become insolvent shall be preferred claims, against the estate of such insolvent debtor." Michigan Trust Co. v. Grand Rapids Democrat, 71 N. W. 1102, 1103, 113 Mich. 615, 67 Am. St. Rep. 486.

Employé distinguished.

See "Employé."

Engineer.

Const. art. 15, § 7, and Comp. Laws, § 2308, making corporation stockholders liable for labor performed for the corporation, does not include the services of an assistant chief engineer of a railroad company. The term "labor," in some extended senses, will include every possible human exertion, mental and physical; and, in that broad signification, it would be hard to find any case which would not come within the law. The precise line between what is commonly called "labor" and other employment cannot be drawn with absolute precision, but the position of an assistant chief engineer would never have been classed as that of a laborer, nor his work as labor, in the popular sense. It is mostly direction and scientific work, involving much more superintendence than personal exertion in manual labor. He is chosen for his knowledge, and not for his muscular capacity, in which latter quality he may or may not be eminent. Brockway v. Innes, 39 Mich. 47, 48, 33 Am. Rep. 348.

Members of the engineers' corps are not included in the term "laborers," as used in Laws 1882, c. 10, requiring railroad companies to pay to the Governor a certain sum, to be expended by him in paying the claims of laborers. State v. Rusk, 13 N. W. 452, 55 Wis. 465.

The term "laborer," in Act April 11, 1849, § 10, incorporating a steamship company, and providing that the stockholders shall be individually liable for all debts due and owing to their laborers and operators, does not include the consulting engineer. "If we should attempt to define the plaintiff, in reference to the services he rendered, we should scarcely describe him as a laborer or an operator. Such words we should ordinarily apply to an entirely different class of men—to a class who obtain their living by coarse manual labor, as distinct from professional men; men who work with their hands, rather than their heads. 'Operative' though very nearly the same signification, is somewhat more comprehensive than 'laborer.' The services of plaintiff were very like those rendered by the lawyer. Each may involve some manual labor, but that is the incident rather than the principal of the services. The plaintiff, in my opinion, correctly described his services as professional, as distinguished from those of a laborer or operative." Ericsson v. Brown (N. Y.) 38 Barb. 390-392.

A laborer is one who works at a toll-some occupation—a man who does work requiring little skill, as distinguished from an artisan. Thus a civil engineer is not a laborer. Pennsylvania & D. R. Co. v. Leuffer, 84 Pa. 168, 24 Am. Rep. 189. Mechanical engineers, electrical engineers, clerks, agents, cashiers of banks, bookkeepers, and all that class of employes whose employment is associated with mental skill and labor, are not considered laborers. Hence a locomotive engineer is not a laborer, so as to exempt his wages as laborer's wages. State ex rel. I X L Grocery Co. v. Land, 32 South. 433, 108 La. 512, 58 L. R. A. 407.

Same—Civil engineer.

Laws 1850, p. 214, § 10, providing that all stockholders of every railroad company shall be jointly and severally liable for all the debts due or owing to any of its laborers and servants for services performed for such corporation, means persons employed in the service of the company who have not a different, proper, and distinctive appellation, such as officers and agents of the company. The engineer, the master mechanic, and the conductor are as fully entitled to its benefits as is the man who shovels gravel. The latter is, in law, no more and no less a servant of the company than either one of the former; and hence a civil engineer, and a rodman in his employ, and all others performing services not as officers and agents, are laborers and servants of the company. Conant v. Van Schaick (N. Y.) 22 Barb. 87, 99.

A civil engineer engaged in the construction of a building, though he may have performed some work with his hands—some work attended with physical and muscular exertion—but whose services, in the main, were not such as depended for their proper performance on mere physical power to do ordinary manual labor, but consisted principally of work requiring mental skill or business capacity, and involving the exercise of his intellectual faculties, is not a laborer, whose wages are exempt from garnishment. McPherson v. Stroup, 28 S. E. 157, 159, 100 Ga. 228.

Acts 1848, § 18, authorizing the organization of manufacturing companies, makes the stockholders of such companies individually liable for debts due their laborers and servants. Held, that the words "laborers and servants" meant those acting in subordination to others, under the direction and control of the others, and hence a civil engineer and traveling agent was not a servant, within the meaning of the statute. Williamson v. Wadsworth (N. Y.) 49 Barb. 294, 298 (citing Richardson v. Abendroth, 43 Barb. 162).

Act Jan. 21, 1843, as supplemented by Act April 4, 1862, giving a lien to contractors, laborers, and workmen upon the railroads, etc., only means persons engaged in manual labor, and does not include a civil engineer. Pennsylvania & D. R. Co. v. Leuffer, 84 Pa. 168, 171, 24 Am. Rep. 189.

"Labor," as used in Ky. Laws 1838, giving a lien to all persons "furnishing or performing labor" for the construction of railroads or other public improvements, means all persons furnishing services, and is not limited to manual labor. A civil engineer who supervises the construction of bridges and the roadbed of a railroad is within the act. Central Trust Co. v. Richmond, N., I. & B. R. Co. (U. S.) 54 Fed. 723, 724.

The term "laborers," as used in Rev. St. art. 3312, providing that laborers in the construction or repair of a railroad shall have a lien for wages due, is used in its ordinary sense. Ordinarily this word cannot be used as embracing persons engaged in learned professions, but, rather, such as gain their livelihood by manual toll. When we speak of laboring or working classes, we do not intend to include therein persons like civil engineers, the value of whose services rests rather in their scientific than in their physical ability. In one sense the engineer is a laborer; but so is the lawyer and the doctor and the banker, yet no statistician has ever been known to include these among the laboring classes. Gulf & B. V. R. Co. v. Berry, 72 S. W. 1049, 1050, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 408 (citing Pennsylvania & D. R. Co. v. Leuffer, 84 Pa. 168, 24 Am. Rep. 189).

Expert.

The term "labor," in some extended senses, would include every possible human exertion, mental and physical. As used in Pub. Acts 1887, No. 94, which provides that all debts which shall be owing for labor by any corporation at the time it shall become insolvent shall be preferred claims against the estate of such insolvent debtor, it includes services performed for a corporation engaged in the manufacturing of mill machinery and fitting out mills by an experienced miller in adjusting and starting machinery in the mills supplied by the corporation. Appeal of Black, 47 N. W. 342, 343, 83 Mich. 513.

"Labor," within the meaning of the mechanics' lien law, providing that a mechanic's lien may be acquired by any mechanic or other person who shall do any labor on, or furnish any materials, machinery, fixtures, for, any building, erection, or other improvement, includes the labor of a man remodeling a gas plant for a period of 30 days in order to test the machinery and cause it to meet the requirements of the guaranty given, but does not include service rendered in instructing the superintendent of the owner as to how to run the plant. Peatman v. Centerville Light, Heat & Power Co., 74 N. W. 689, 691, 105 Iowa, 1, 67 Am. St. Rep. 276.

Fireman and stoker.

A contract employing a fireman or stoker on board a steamer for a trip from London to Havana is a memorandum or agreement for the hire of a laborer, within St. 55 Geo. III, c. 184, exempting from a stamp tax memoranda or agreements for the hire of any laborer. Wilson v. De Zulueta, 14 Q. B. 405, 114.

Foreman.

The term "laborer," as used in Elliott's Supp. § 1606, which provides that debts owing to laborers or employés, which shall have accrued by reason of their labor or employment, to an amount not exceeding $50 to each employé, shall be a preferred debt, includes a man employed by a gas company to have the sole superintendence of the digging of trenches and laying of pipes, with authority to hire and discharge employés at his pleasure. Pendergast v. Yandes, 24 N. E. 724, 124 Ind. 159, 8 L. R. A. 849.

The term "labor," in a statute giving a lien to those who labor at cutting or hauling logs, was undoubtedly employed by the Legislature in its limited and popular sense—to designate that class of workmen who labor with physical force in the service and under the direction of another for fixed wages—and does not include a foreman or superintendent of the entire logging operation, having charge of the men engaged in cutting and hauling the logs, but who performed no person manual labor on the logs. Meands v. Park, 50 Atl. 706, 707, 95 Me. 527 (citing Rogers v. Dexter & P. R. Co., 85 Me. 372, 27 Atl. 257, 21 L. R. A. 528).

The term "labor or work," in a statute giving a lien for labor and work in mines, includes the services of a foreman of a mine, who is employed to boss the men at work in the mine, keep their time, and give them orders for their pay. Capron v. Strout, 11 Nev. 304, 310.

The term "laborer," in a statute providing that all mechanics, laborers and operators who may have performed labor in the construction or repair of any railroad, locomotive, or equipment, or in the operating of a railroad, shall have a prior lien for wages, includes one who performs services under contract with a subcontractor of a railroad as foreman or superintendent of laborers engaged in the construction of the road, and furnishes certain tools and teams to carry on the work of construction, and sometimes uses the tools himself, and at other times directs their use by the laborers. "It has been held that a timekeeper and superintendent in the employ of a contractor is not a laborer. Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Baker, 14 Kan. 563. But we are not disposed so to hold. We think the foreman or superintendent of a company of laborers, who remains with them, directing their work, and sometimes working himself, is within the meaning and intent of the word 'laborer' as used in the statute. While he may not actually work with the shovel, scraper, plow, or other implement, he performs a laborious and necessary part of that work, by overlooking and directing it, and is as indispensable to the construction of the road as the man who actually uses the tools." Texas & St. L. R. Co. v. Allen (Tex.) 1 White & W. Civ. Cas. Ct. App. 568, 570.

A "laborer," within the meaning of Comp. Laws Utah, giving a lien for wages to any person or persons who shall perform any work or labor upon any mine, or furnish any material, etc., includes a person hired by the owner to oversee the miners, and generally to control and direct its workings and developments, who in the performance of his duties does some manual labor. Flagstaff Silver Min. Co. v. Cullins, 104 U. S. 176, 177, 26 L. Ed. 704.

One who has procured a loan for a corporation, and gone to work for such corporation at an annual salary, payable monthly or as he wanted it, acted as foreman, took part in the menial labor required to manufacture the stone made by the corporation, kept the time of the men, solicited orders, collected bills, and did whatever was required of him by the secretary of the company, who acted as its general superintendent, is a "laborer or servant," within the meaning of Laws 1848, c. 40, § 18, making the stockholders of a corporation organized thereunder personally liable for the wages of its laborers or servants. Short v. Medberry (N. Y.) 29 Hun, 39, 40.

General manager.

The term "mechanics or laborers," in Burns' Rev. St. 1894, § 7255, entitling mechanics and laborers employed in a shop to a lien for their services, does not include a general manager of the shop.—Raynes v. Kokomo Ladder & Furniture Co., 54 N. E. 1061, 153 Ind. 315.

"Laborer," as used in Laws 1882, c. 10, requiring a railroad company to pay to the Governor of the state a certain sum of money, to be by him expended in paying the claims of laborers, etc., in the construction of a road, only designates those who have performed labor in and about said work, and not members of the engineer's corp or an assistant general manager. State v. Rush, 13 N. W. 452, 55 Wis. 465.

Acts 1863, c. 63, § 2, providing that stockholders of a corporation shall be liable for all debts that may be due and owing to their laborers, servants, and apprentices for services performed for such corporation, cannot be construed to include a general manager of a corporation. Laborers mean those who perform menial or manual services for the corporation, and who usually look to the reward of a day's labor for immediate or present support, from whom the company does not expect credit, and to whom its future liability to pay is of no consequence. A laborer is one who is responsible for no independent action, but who does a day's work or a stated job under the direction of a superior. "Laborers" is a word of limited meaning, and refers to a particular class of persons, employed for a defined and low grade of service, performed without responsibility for the acts of others, themselves directed to the accomplishment of the task under the supervision of another. A general manager is not ejusdem generis with a laborer. Wakefield v. Fargo, 90 N. Y. 213, 217.

House painter.

House painters are within the provisions and protection of the statutes which give a lien upon buildings to those who furnish labor or materials for the erecting or repairing thereof. Martine v. Nelson, 51 Ill. 422, 423.

Inspector of lumber.

In Laws 1887, Act 94, making all debts for labor by a corporation or person at the time of insolvency preferred claims against the estate, "labor" is not employed in its largest sense, as meaning any one who renders services, and hence does not include the labor of lumber inspectors in measuring and ascertaining the quantity and quality of logs. In re Sayles, 52 N. W. 637, 638, 92 Mich. 354.

Intellectual laborer.

The term "laborer" is not limited to those engaged in manual labor, but extends to intellectual labor as well. Phoenix Furniture Co. v. Put-in-Bay Hotel Co. (U. S.) 68 Fed. 683, 685; Brockway v. Innes, 39 Mich. 47, 48, 33 Am. Rep. 348.

Keeper of stallion.

One whose only occupation was in having the entire care of a stallion moved from stand to stand for breeding purposes was a laborer, within Code, § 4008, exempting from execution certain property to the head of a family, if a laborer. Krebs v. Nicholson, 91 N. W. 923, 118 Iowa, 134, 96 Am. St. Rep. 370.

Lawyer.

A lawyer employed by a railroad company on a yearly salary, payable monthly, is not a laborer, within the meaning of Sand. & H. Dig. Ark. § 1425, providing that no preference shall be allowed among the creditors of insolvent corporations, except for the wages and salaries of laborers and employes. Latta v. Lonsdale (U. S.) 107 Fed. 585.

Legal service rendered by counsel is not labor, within the meaning of Barb. & C. Ky. St. 1894, § 2492, relative to mechanics' liens upon railroads, providing that all persons who perform labor, or furnish labor, materials, etc., shall have a lien on such railroad for such labor, materials, etc.—Richmond & I. Const. Co. v. Richmond, N. I. & B. B. Co. (U. S.) 68 Fed. 105, 113, 15 C. C. A. 289, 34 L. R. A. 625.

Liveryman.

The term "laborer," in the statute exempting from execution the horses, etc., by the use of which the debtor, if a physician, public officer, farmer, teamster, or other laborer, habitually earns his living, may include one who is engaged in the livery business. Root v. Gay, 20 N. W. 489, 490, 64 Iowa, 399.

Mail carrier.

Const. art. 11, § 1, providing that homestead exemptions shall not extend to process issued on a demand "for services rendered by a laboring person," carries with it the idea of actual physical and manual exertion or toll, and is used to denote that class of persons who literally earn their bread by the sweat of their brows, and who perform with their own hands, at the cost of physical labor, the contracts made with their employers; and one engaged in carrying the United States mail, using his own horse and vehicle therefor, is a "laboring person," within the Constitution. Farinbolt v. Luckhard, 21 S. E. 817, 90 Va. 936, 44 Am. St. Rep. 953.

Maker of articles for sale.

"Laborer," as used in Sayles' Civ. St. art. 3179a, giving a lien to laborers who have performed labor on any railroad, means one who performs manual services in the construction, repair, or operation contemplated by the statute, and does not embrace one who may work in repairing something of his own to sell to a railroad company after it has been rendered suitable, through his toll, to be used in the construction or repair of a railway. St. Louis S. W. Ry. Co. v. Lyle (Tex.) 26 S. W. 264, 265; St. Louis, A. & T. Ry. Co. v. Matthews, 12 S. W. 976, 75 Tex. 92.

A mechanic is unquestionably a laborer. Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Baker, 14 Kan. 563, 567.

In defining who may be included within the term "laborer," as used in a statute giving a lien to laborers, the court said: "Although the plaintiff was a mechanic, he was a laborer, within the true intent and meaning of the statute. A contractor may be a mechanic, but, if he does not perform manual labor, he is not entitled to a laborer's lien on the property of his employer. So a laborer may be a mechanic, and, if he performs manual labor as such mechanic, he is entitled to a laborer's lien on the property of his employer; and a laboring mechanic who performs actual manual labor for his employer is as much entitled to a laborer's lien on his property for the value of the labor performed by him as any other class of laborers." Adams v. Goodrich, 55 Ga. 233, 234.

Officer.

Sess. Laws 1891, c. 114, making it unlawful for laborers, workmen, mechanics, or other persons employed by the state of Kansas to work more than eight hours per day, does not include an officer or employé for whom an annual salary has been specifically named and appropriated by the Legislature. State v. Martindale, 27 Pac. 852, 853, 47 Kan. 147.

"Labor," as used in Rev. St. c. 208, § 9, which provides that no person summoned as trustee shall be charged as such on account of any labor performed by the debtor after the service of the process, etc., includes the official services of the mayor of a city; hence the city cannot be charged as trustee on account of such services. Robinson v. Aiken, 39 N. H. 211, 212.

Rev. St. § 63, providing that, in case of the insolvency of any corporation, the laborers in the employ thereof shall have a lien upon the trustees thereof for the amount of wages due to them, etc., and that the word "laborers" shall be construed to include all persons doing labor or service, of whatever character, for, or as workmen or employés in the regulation and employ of, such corporation, should be construed not to include the president of a corporation. The statute does not intend to authorize the directors or officers to employ themselves, and then in case of insolvency to give them the statutory lien, and to prefer them to all the general creditors. The word "laborers" is used in the sense of employés, and does not include the employer. England v. Beatty Organ Co., 4 Atl. 307, 41 N. J. Eq. 470.

Corporation Act, § 63, providing that where a corporation is insolvent the "laborers" and employés shall have a preferred lien for their wages, cannot be construed to include officers. The first legislation upon this subject only provided a preference for laborers. By universal consent, this had reference only to those who performed manual labor, of whatever nature. Weatherby v. Saxony Woolen Co. (N. J.) 29 Atl. 326.

Acts 1848, § 18, authorizing the formation of corporations for manufacturing and mechanical purposes, enacts that the stockholders of any company organized under this act shall be jointly and severally liable for all debts due to their laborers and servants for services performed for the corporation. Held, that the words "laborers and servants" meant those generally designated by such names as performing manual labor, etc., and did not include officers and agents, and hence the secretary of the corporation was not within the statute. Coffin v. Reynolds, 37 N. Y. 640, 646.

In construing the eighteenth section of the general manufacturing corporation act, which imposes liability upon stockholders in corporations for debts owing to laborers, servants, or apprentices, the courts have confined its application to persons occupying subordinate positions, and have excluded from its protection the officers and managers of corporations, on the ground that they were not laborers or servants, within the meaning of the act. Palmer v. Van Santvoord, 47 N. E. 915, 916, 153 N. Y. 612, 38 L. R. A. 402 (quoting Dean v. De Wolf, 82

N. Y. 626; Hill v. Spencer, 61 N. Y. 274; Wakefield v. Fargo, 90 N. Y. 213).

The services of the president of a canal company were not labor performed in the construction of the canal, within the meaning of a statute requiring the company to deposit a certain sum as security for claims for labor performed and furnished in the construction of the canal. Crowell v. Cape Cod Ship Canal Co., 46 N. E. 424, 168 Mass. 157.

Operative distinguished.

See "Operative."

Overseer.

"Laborers," within the meaning of a statute preferring the claims of laborers, does not include overseers on plantations, unless they work as common day laborers. Rust v. Billingslea, 44 Ga. 306-318.

The term, within the meaning of the act giving laborers a lien on crops and also within the meaning of the homestead act, which exempts the products of laborers from levy and sale, does not include an overseer. Isbell v. Dunlap, 17 S. C. 581, 583.

"Laborers," as used in 2 Rev. St. (5th Ed.) p. 658, § 18, rendering stockholders of a mining company liable for all debts due and owing to their laborers, servants, and apprentices, must probably be restricted to those engaging in manual work. The term includes a bookkeeper and overseer. Hovey v. Ten Broeck, 26 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Rob.) 316, 320.

Gantt's Dig. §§ 4079-4097, giving a lien to laborers for their wages, cannot be construed to include a farm overseer. The claimant must perform manual labor, and there must be some product of his labor to which the lien must attach. Flournoy v. Shelton, 43 Ark. 168, 170.

Acts 1870, c. 206, giving a lien to mechanics and other laborers, cannot be construed to include an overseer. In the common use of the word, we mean one who toils—one who labors with his hands. But an overseer is an agent, a superintendent, a sort of alter ego. His business is not to labor, but to oversee those who do work in subjection to his authority. He might in special cases unite both capacities, and be both laborer and overseer; but, where he does not perform any labor except to supervise and superintend a farm and laborers, he is not a laborer. Whitaker v. Smith, 81 N. C. 340, 342, 31 Am. Rep. 503.

"The term 'laborer' is not applicable to any one who does not earn his living by the work of his hands, as by plowing, mowing, hoeing, ditching, carrying a hod, feeding the fire of an engine, etc., but includes an overseer, who, though hired by the year, receives his pay weekly." Caraker v. Matthews, 25 Ga. 571, 576.

An overseer of men employed under a railroad contract is included in the term "laborers," as used in the charter of the Hudson River Railroad Company, making such corporation directly liable for all sums due laborers. Warner v. Hudson R. Co. (N. Y.) 5 How. Prac. 454, 455.

Physician.

"Labor," as used in Homestead Act, § 5, providing that the exemption shall not extend to any claim for labor less than $100, cannot be construed to include a claim for the services of a physician. The common and ordinary signification of the term "labor" agrees with the definition given by the best lexicographers, and is understood to be physical toil. Claim for labor is confined to claims arising out of services where physical toil is the main ingredient, although directed and made more valuable by mechanical skill. Weymouth v. Sanborn, 43 N. H. 171, 173, 80 Am. Dec. 144.

Plasterer.

A plasterer is a laborer, within the law providing that exemptions of homestead shall not extend to laborers' and mechanics' liens. Merrigan v. English, 22 Pac. 454, 457, 9 Mont. 113, 5 L. R. A. 837.

The term "labor," within the meaning of St. 1855, c. 431, § 1, providing that any person who shall actually perform labor in erecting, altering, or repairing any building, etc., shall have a lien thereon, includes a plasterer; and he is entitled to a lien for his own labor and that of his apprentices, but not for that of journeymen and laborers employed and paid by him. Parker v. Bell, 73 Mass. (7 Gray) 429, 430.

Printer.

Under a statute providing that debts for labor against a person whose business shall be suspended by creditors shall be preferred claims, and first paid, persons who perform physical labor, as typesetters, cylinder feeders, pressmen, and one also who kept the books at stipulated wages of so much per week, are entitled to a preference. That in their employment they had acquired and used skill would not render the designation of "laborer" inapplicable. They labored with their hands for their employer for wages, and were clearly laborers, within the meaning of the statute. To so construe the statute as to limit its benefits to mere menial servants performing the lowest forms of labor, requiring no skill, would do violence to the meaning of the act, and leave the evil intended to be cured to remain in existence, only slightly mitigated. While the statute must be confined to those who perform manual services, still it cannot be confined to such services only as require no skill in the performance of them. Heckman v. Tammen, 184 Ill. 144, 56 N. E. 361, 363.

Private secretary.

A private secretary, whose duties, combined, include those of an amanuensis, stenographer, etc., who received dictation and transcribed letters for the president of a corporation, and performed other duties of a similar nature, is held to be a laborer, within the statute exempting laborers' wages from garnishment. Calling him a private secretary, instead of clerk, does not, says the court, change the principle upon which persons performing similar duties have been held to be laborers. Abrahams v. Anderson, 5 S. E. 778, 779, 80 Ga. 570, 12 Am. St. Rep. 274.

Retailer of oil from wagon.

"Laborer," as used in a statute exempting the horse or team and the wagon or other vehicle by the use of which the debtor, if a laborer, etc., habitually earns his living, includes a person retailing oil from a tank wagon, as he is one who labors in a toll-some occupation. Consolidated Tank Line Co. v. Hunt, 48 N. W. 1057, 1058, 83 Iowa, 6, 12 L. R. A. 476, 32 Am. St. Rep. 285.

School teacher.

Act April 15, 1845, creating exemptions in favor of laborers, cannot be construed to include the wages of a school-teacher, as the wages exempted by the act are such as are earned by the personal, manual labor of the debtor. Schwacke v. Langton (Pa.) 12 Phila. 402.

The term "laborer," within the meaning of the statute exempting the wages of laborers from garnishment, includes a school-teacher; but the wages of such teacher are exempted also for the further and better reason that it would be contrary to public policy, as tending to prevent the teacher from being able to support himself, and thus tending to stop the schools. Hightower v. Slaton, 54 Ga. 108, 109, 21 Am. Rep. 273.

A school-teacher is neither a laborer, clerk, servant, nurse, nor other person, within the meaning of the statute providing that in all cases within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, where any action is brought by any laborer, clerk, servant, nurse, or other person for compensation claimed due for personal services performed, the plaintiff, if successful, shall be entitled to recover, as part of the costs, a judgment against the defendant for an attorney's fee. School Dist. No. 94 v. Gautier, 73 Pac. 954, 957, 13 Okl. 194.

Rev. St. § 1697, relating to assignments in insolvency, provides that the wages of "laborers, servants, and employes" shall be given preference. Held, that the words "laborers, servants, and employes" would include every one that was employed by the assignor—even the stockholders of a corporation who were employed by the corporation on a salary. Conlee Lumber Co. v. Ripon Lumber & Mfg. Co., 29 N. W. 285, 288, 66 Wis. 481.

Stream cleaner.

Within the meaning of Laws 1898, c. 186, providing that "laborers and day workmen" employed by the city of New York shall not be subject to competitive examination, includes a stream cleaner, whose duty requires him to keep clean the water running in streams, removing rubbish and other injurious materials therefrom, and to prevent pollution thereof. People v. Dalton, 63 N. Y. Supp. 258, 259, 49 App. Div. 71.

Subcontractor.

Laborer as subcontractor, see "Subcontractor."

Rev. St. c. 51, § 141, imposing a liability on railroad corporations to pay for the work of laborers employed in constructing their roads, cannot be construed to include a subcontractor who personally expends labor, with that of the crew employed by him, upon a section of the railroad which he has contracted to build. Etymologically the word "laborer" may include any person who performs physical or mental labor under any circumstances, but its popular meaning is much more limited. The farmer tilling on his own farm, or the blacksmith working in his own shop, the tailor making clothes for his own customers, is not a laborer. One who performs physical labor, however severe, in his own service or business, is not a laborer, in the common business sense. A contractor who takes the chance of profit or loss is not a laborer in that sense. In the language of the business world, a laborer is one who labors with his physical powers in the service and under the direction of another for fixed wages. This is the common meaning of the statute. Rogers v. Dexter & P. R. Co., 27 Atl. 257, 85 Me. 372, 21 L. R. A. 528.

The term "laborer," as used in Wag. St. 302, providing that a laborer in the employ of a railroad contractor, to whom the contractor is indebted for 30 or less number of days' labor performed in constructing said road, may render the company liable to pay therefor by giving notice, should be construed to mean the ordinary day laborer who performs labor on a railroad for a contractor of the railroad company for the construction of some part of the road. The ordinary construction of the language could not be made to include those who furnish teams and wagons and drivers hired by them to haul and deliver stone or other material in the construction of the road. Groves v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co., 57 Mo. 304, 307.

The term "laborer," as used in Laws 1850, c. 140, § 12, giving a laborer employed in the construction of a railroad a claim against the company for a debt due him from a contractor, on filing a claim therefor with the company, is used in its ordinary and usual sense, and is intended to designate a common laborer, who earns his daily bread by his toil. "The term necessarily implies personal services and work of the individual designed to be protected. The term 'laborer' cannot be construed as designating one who contracts for and furnishes the labor and services of others, or one who contracts for and furnishes one or more teams for work, whether with or without his own services or the services of others to take charge of the teams while engaged in the service." Balch v. New York & O. M. R. Co., 46 N. Y. 521, 524.

A subcontractor of work in constructing a railroad is not a laborer, within the provisions of the statute providing that a contract for construction shall contain a covenant on the part of the contractor to pay for the work and labor of all laborers and teamsters, teams and wagons, employed on the job, and for all materials used thereon, and performance of such contract shall be guaranteed by two or more sureties signing the contract. Kansas City v. McDonald, 80 Mo. App. 444, 448.

Rev. Civ. St. art. 317a, giving a lien to "mechanics, laborers, and operatives" performing labor or working with tools or teams in the construction of a railroad, does not include one who has undertaken and performed a subcontract for the construction of several miles at a specified sum per mile. Krakauer v. Locke, 25 S. W. 700, 701, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 446; Parks v. Locke (Tex.) 25 S. W. 702, 703.

"Laborers," as used in the charter of the Hudson River Railroad Company, making such corporation directly liable for all sums due laborers, meant not only those who personally performed labor, but all who did so by their servants and teams. Warner v. Hudson River R. Co. (N. Y.) 5 How. Prac. 454, 455.

"Laborer," as used in Laws 1850, p. 211, § 2, providing that railroad companies shall be liable to any laborer on their construction, as often as the contractor by whom he is employed is indebted to him for 30 days, or any less number of days, of labor, in a large sense, may include a very extensive class of persons; but in this statute it means laborers, in the strict and primary sense; those supposed to be poor and dependent on their wages. It means one engaged in personal labor with implements used by him, for which no extra charge is ordinarily made. A laborer employing his own teams and an assistant, under an agreement therefor with the contractors, cannot recover against the company for the services of the teams or the assistant; nor can he recover even for his own personal services, unless, perhaps, where his agreement for his own services was separate. A day's labor of a laborer does not include, also, the team which he drives. In a large sense, a person whose teams are employed for another performs labor with them, whether he works himself or not; but, in a stricter sense, and within the meaning of the statute, a day's labor of a man is that which he performs himself. This may include any implement of toil without which labor cannot be performed, but not the use of horse any more than of steam power. Atcherson v. Troy & B. R. Co. (N. Y.) 6 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 329, 337.

Superintendent.

A timekeeper and superintendent in the employ of a railroad contractor is not a laborer, within Laws 1872, p. 286, § 1, requiring railroad companies to take bonds from contractors that they shall pay all laborers. Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Baker, 14 Kan. 563, 566.

The superintendent of a mine is not a laborer, servant, clerk, or operative of a company, within the meaning of a provision of its charter making the stockholders individually liable for the wages of such persons in case the company becomes insolvent. Cocking v. Ward (Tenn.) 48 S. W. 287, 289.

A laborer is defined as one who labors in a toilsome occupation; a man who does work that requires little skill, as distinguished from an artisan; sometimes called a "laboring man"; and "labor," as used in Comp. Laws, § 1520, providing that every person performing labor in any mining claim, building, wharf, bridge, ditch, flume, tunnel, fence, machinery, railroad, wagon road, or aqueduct, or any other structure, will have a lien, etc., will be held to include more than mere manual labor, since some of the subjects are such that no manual labor could be performed upon them, and the work or labor must be ejusdem generis as to all the structures, and will include the manager or superintendent of a mine. Boyle v. Mountain Key Min. Co., 50 Pac. 347, 350, 9 N. M. 237.

"Laborers," as used in the title of 22 Rev. St. S. C. p. 502, entitled "An act to provide for laborers' liens," which word does not appear in the body of the act, giving to employés of factories, mines, etc., a lien for their wages or salaries, does not include the superintendent of a mining company. Malcomson v. Wappoo Mills (U. S.) 86 Fed. 192, 198.

The primary or specific lexical meaning uniformly assigned to the word "laborer" is a workman who labors with physical force in the service and under the direction of another for fixed wages. The foreman or superintendent of an entire logging operation, having charge of the men engaged in cutting and hauling the logs, but who performs no personal manual labor on the logs, is not a laborer. Meands v. Park, 50 Atl. 706, 707, 95 Me. 527 (citing Rogers v. Dexter & P. R. Co., 85 Me. 372, 374, 27 Atl. 257, 21 L. R. A. 528; 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 532; 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 872).

As used in Rev. St. c. 51, § 141, making railroads liable for the wages of laborers employed by contractors, for labor actually performed on the road, the term "laborer" cannot be construed to include one who, at an agreed compensation of $7 a day, superintends the building of bridges, keeps an account of the men's time, and makes out the pay rolls. In the language of the business world, says Mr. Chief Justice Peters, a laborer is one who labors with his physical powers, in the service and under the direction of another, for fixed wages; this is the common meaning of the word, and hence its meaning in the statute; and while etymologically the word "laborer" may include any person who performs physical or mental labor under any circumstances, its popular meaning is much more limited. Blanchard v. Portland & R. F. Ry., 32 Atl. 890, 891, 87 Me. 241.

One who was employed as a woodsman, and whose duties as such included overlooking and superintending a large number of ordinary hands engaged in turpentine operations, who had authority to employ and discharge those hands, who also worked in the commissary in the capacity of a clerk, and who was employed for his skill in rendering services which obviously required mental and business capacity rather than the mere power to do manual toll, which services consisted much more largely of headwork than of handwork, was not a laborer entitled, under Code, § 1974, to foreclose a lien as such, though in the performance of his duties he did a considerable amount of manual labor, and often became physically fatigued. Cole v. McNeill, 25 S. E. 402, 405, 99 Ga. 250.

Acts 1848, c. 40, making the stockholders of a corporation liable for debts due and owing to laborers, servants, and operatives for services performed for the company, does not include within its meaning a superintendent of a mining corporation, who has power to hire and pay workmen, and to make contracts for supplies, ores, etc., under the direction of the company. Krauser v. Ruckel (N. Y.) 17 Hun, 463, 465; Dean v. De Wolf (N. Y.) 16 Hun, 186, 187.

Sess. Laws 1872, p. 147, § 4, which declares that all miners, laborers, and others who work or labor to the amount of $25 or more in or upon any mine, lode, or deposit shall have a lien, etc., includes the work of the superintendent in planning and superintending development work upon the mines, and in planning and supervising the erection of the mills and machinery, but it would not include the work of such superintendent in keeping the books and disbursing the funds of the mining company. Rara Avis G. & S. M. Co. v. Bouscher, 12 Pac. 433, 434, 9 Colo. 385.

"Laborers," as used in Sess. Laws 1850, p. 14, declaring that, whenever any contractor employing laborers on the defendant's work is indebted to such laborers, the latter, by pursuing the course prescribed, may make the defendant liable for their debt, means such persons as, upon the employment of contractors, actually engage in the construction of the work; also those who labor by their servants or agents, and superintendents over others engaged in actual labor on the road. Warner v. Hudson River R. Co. (N. Y.) 5 How. Prac. 454, 456.

Teamster.

"Laborer," as used in Laws 1872, c. 136, providing that, where a railroad company fails to take a bond from the contractor constructing a portion of its road, the company shall be held liable to laborers for services rendered in the construction thereof, includes a teamster employed by a contractor whose work consists in driving the team, handling a plow, and loading and unloading scrapers and wagons. Mann v. Burt, 10 Pac. 95, 97, 35 Kan. 10.

The hauling of lumber and timber on the ground for the construction of buildings upon an oil leasehold is not such labor for or about the construction or erection of any engine, engine house, derrick, etc., as to entitle a party to file a lien as a laborer against such leasehold, under the provisions of the act of June 28, 1879 (Pamph. Laws, 182). Wilson v. Whitcomb, 100 Pa. 547, 550.

The term "mechanics, workmen, and laborers employed by the company," in an act incorporating a slate company, which provides that the stockholders shall be individually liable for debts due mechanics, workmen, and laborers employed by the company, does not include a teamster using his own team and contributing his own time in hauling slate for the company for certain compensation, nor of a wagonmaker repairing wagons for the company, as the liability cast on the stockholders was with a view to an additional security to the operatives of the establishment, who were the producers—the life of it. It is generally only to such that liens are extended in the mining districts. Moyer v. Pennsylvania Slate Co., 71 Pa. (21 P. F. Smith) 293, 298.

The term "laborers," within the meaning of Act March 9, 1889, § 1, giving laborers a lien on any structure for work performed by them thereon, includes a teamster. The spirit and intention of the statute is to prefer laborers as a class, and not to prefer one class of laborers over another, nor one kind of manual or mechanical toil over another, if all come within the general scope of its provisions and comply with its terms. McElwaine v. Hosey, 35 N. E. 272, 275, 135 Ind. 481.

Telegraph operator.

A telegraph operator will be included in the term "laborer," within the title of an act (Laws 1889, c. 204) entitled "An act to fix the amount of wages of laborers exempt from attachment, garnishment, or execution." Boyle v. Vanderhoof, 47 N. W. 396, 397, 45 Minn. 81.

Threshing machine operator.

"Laborer," as used in the laborer's lien act, is one who performs by his own hand the contracts he makes with his employer. Appeal of Seiders, 46 Pa. (10 Wright) 57. The acts are intended to favor those who earn their money by the sweat of their own brows, not those who are mere contractors to have the work done, and whose compensation was the profit they would realize on the transaction. Appeal of Wentroth, 82 Pa. 469. And hence the runners of a threshing machine are not entitled to wages under such laborer's lien act. Johnston v. Barrills, 41 Pac. 656, 658, 27 Or. 251, 50 Am. St. Rep. 717.

Code, § 1975, providing that any "laborer" who shall do labor in sowing or harvesting, or in securing or assisting to secure or house, any crop, shall have a lien therefor on such crop, should not be construed to give a lien on grain for the labor of other persons than the person, asserting the lien, employed by him in threshing the grain, though he was present directing their work; but he may have a lien for his own labor, including the use of his threshing machine and teams. It cannot be said that as a laborer with his sickle is allowed a lien, so the contractor or employer of a large body of men doing the harvesting for him is to be substituted for the single harvester, from the needs of a larger and more extensive system of farming. The purpose of the lien was for the mechanics or laborers dependent on their daily earnings, etc. Mohr v. Clark, 19 Pac. 28, 29, 3 Wash. T. 440.

The term "laborer," within the meaning of Act May 12, 1891, giving priority to wages due laborers, including farm laborers or any other kind of laborers, does not include one threshing grain for another with a steam separator for a compensation of so much per bushel for the grain threshed. A limited sense has been given to the word "laborer," for the very specific reason that in all statutes of this kind the intent has been to protect the class of persons who wholly depend on their manual toil for substance, and who cannot protect themselves. Henry v. Sheaffer, 14 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 237.

Timekeeper.

The term "laborer," in laws making railroads liable for wages of laborers employed by contractors for labor actually performed on the road, cannot be construed to include one who keeps account of the men's time and makes out the pay rolls. Blanchard v. Portland & R. F. Ry., 32 Atl. 890, 891, 87 Me. 241.

"Laborer," as used in Laws 1872, p. 286, § 1, providing that a railroad company shall take a bond from a contractor that the latter shall pay all "laborers," mechanics, etc., all just debts due to such persons, etc., and that in case of a failure to take such bond the company should be liable for such debts, etc., does not include a person in the employ of a contractor with a railroad company simply as timekeeper and superintendent. The word "laborer" is here used in its more common acceptance, and means one who labors in a toilsome occupation; that is, a man who does work that requires little skill, as distinguished from an artisan. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Baker, 14 Kan. 563, 566.

Within the meaning of Const. art. 15, § 7, which makes the stockholder of a corporation liable for labor debts, the term "laborer" would not include a traveling salesman who solicits orders for the sale of goods. Jones v. Avery, 15 N. W. 494, 50 Mich. 326.

As used in General Incorporation Act 1875, § 11, providing that the stockholders of mining, quarrying, and manufacturing companies are jointly and severally liable individually for all moneys due and owing to the "laborers," servants, clerks, and operatives of the company in case it becomes insolvent, the term "laborer" cannot be construed to include a traveling salesman on a salary of $100 per month. Hand v. Cole, 7 L. R. A. 96, 97, 12 S. W. 922, 88 Tenn. 400.

The term "clerk, laborer, or tradesman," in a statute giving a preference out of a fund raised by execution against his employer to a clerk, laborer, or tradesman, does not include a traveling salesman who sells on commission for a furniture manufacturer. Witner v. Miller, 12 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 362.

A traveling salesman is not a "laborer, servant, or employé," within the meaning of the statutes allowing a preferential payment out of the assets of an insolvent employer's estate. Eppstein v. Webb, 44 Ill. App. 341, 342.

"A 'laborer' is popularly understood to be a person who performs manual labor not requiring special knowledge or skill. There is doubtless a sense in which the word 'laborer' may be applied to a person who performs any labor of any character, either physical or mental, but this is not the signification popularly attached to the word." As used in a statute creating exemptions in favor of "laborers," the word does not include a traveling salesman. Epps v. Epps, 17 Ill. App. (17 Bradw.) 196, 201.

The words "laborers, mechanics, and clerks," as used in a statute exempting from execution or garnishment the wages of "laborers, mechanics, and clerks who are the heads of families," etc., are not words of limitation merely, but were intended by the Legislature to designate all such persons as earn their living by wages, and whose compensation is measured by the day, week, month, or year; of course, not including the employés of the government, state, county, or city. Such words would therefore include a traveling salesman working for a fixed sum per month. Wm. Deering Co. v. Ruffner, 49 N. W. 771, 773, 32 Neb. 845, 29 Am. St. Rep. 473.

In Act Jan. 21, 1843, forbidding any corporation empowered to construct any railroad from making any general assignment or transfer of its property while it is indebted to any laborers and workmen, the word "laborer" is employed synonymously with "workman." Leuffer v. Pennsylvania & D. R. Co. (Pa.) 11 Phila. 548.

Workman with helpers.

A miner who by his own labor mines coal at a certain price per ton, and employs a common laborer to assist him at so much per day, is a "laborer," within the meaning of Act April 15, 1845, exempting the wages of laborers from attachment. Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Costello, 33 Pa. (9 Casey) 241, 244.

"Laborers," as used in Act April 2, 1849, entitling laborers to certain preferences, means "those who perform with their own hands the contract they make with the employer; and where a work contracted for is of a nature to require helpers of the chief workman, and he employs his helpers, he is to be considered as authorized to do so by the proprietor, and the wages of such helpers are as much within the protection of the statute as the wages of the chief himself. The statute does indeed limit itself to persons employed by the proprietor, but proprietors may employ hands through an agent, and where the owner of a rolling mill lets a job to a roller, puddler, heater, or other master workman at so much per ton, he impliedly authorizes him to employ all necessary helpers. All laborers employed by the persons or companies referred to in the act are entitled to its benefits, whether the wages agreed to be paid them are measured by time, or by the ton, or by the piece, or any other standard. Appeal of Seidler, 46 Pa. 57, 61.

LACE.

"Webster describes 'lace' as a fabric of fine thread, of linen, silk, or cotton, interwoven with figures; a delicate tissue of thread, worn as an ornament by ladies. Thus, it will be seen that 'lace' derives its name, not from the material which entered into its manufacture, but the term is designated to describe a certain peculiar and delicate texture into which may be woven indifferently any one or more of several materials. Nor do such materials, however costly, give to lace any but an inconsiderable value. It is the delicacy, intricacy, and beauty of its tissue, woven at the expense of immeasurable toil, patience, and skill, that gives to this fabric its chief intrinsic value." Ocean Steamship Co. v. Way, 17 S. E. 57, 60, 90 Ga. 747, 20 L. R. A. 123.

Schedule 1, Tariff Act March 3, 1883, provides that cotton laces shall be subject to a duty of 40 per cent. ad valorem. The word "lace" is thus defined in the dictionaries: "A fabric of fine threads of linen, silk, or cotton, interwoven in a net, and often ornamented with figures." Cotton lace, made-up articles, such as collars, cuffs, tidies, parasol covers, etc., are within the meaning of the term "lace," unless the term has in trade a special restricted meaning which would exclude such articles. Sidenburg v. Robertson (U. S.) 41 Fed. 763, 765. So, also, Hamburg net, Nottingham curtain net, taped and not taped, Nottingham pillow shams, Nottingham tidies, and Nottingham bedspreads, unless the goods were at the time of the passage of the act known in trade and commerce by various trade names, and that the term "lace" had in the parlance of trade and commerce a restricted meaning, which excluded the goods in question. Clafin v. Robertson (U. S.) 38 Fed. 92, 93.

Silk spot nets and dotted nets are "laces," within section 8 of Tariff Act June 30, 1864, imposing a duty of 60 per cent. ad valorem on silk laces, "lace" being defined by Webster as a fabric of fine threads of linen, silk, or cotton interwoven in a net, and often ornamented with figures or a delicate tissue of thread. Morrison v. Miller (U. S.) 37 Fed. 82, 83.

LACHES.

Laches is negligence or omission to assert a right. Ring v. Lawless, 60 N. E. 881, 883, 190 Ill. 520; United States v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. (U. S.) 67 Fed. 969, 971, 15 C. C. A. 117.

Laches is such neglect or omission to do what one should do as warrants the presumption that he has abandoned his claim and declines to assert his right. Wissler v. Craig's Adm'r, 80 Va. 22, 30.

"Laches" has been defined to be such negligence or omission to assert a right as, taken in conjunction with lapse of time, more or less great, and other circumstances causing prejudice to an adverse party, will be a bar in a court of equity. Morse v. Selbold, 35 N. E. 369, 371, 147 Ill. 318; Treadwell v. Clark, 77 N. Y. Supp. 350, 356, 73 App. Div. 473.

What would be laches in one case might not constitute such in another. The question is one addressed to the sound discretion of the court, depending upon all the facts of the particular case. The Queen of the Pacific (U. S.) 61 Fed. 213, 216.

As a definition of "laches," it is sufficiently correct to say that it is the neglecting or the omitting to do what in law should have been done, and this for an unreasonable and unexplained length of time, and in circumstances which afforded opportunity for diligence. This definition will be found adequate as a test to be applied in the vast majority of cases. Babb v. Sullivan, 21 S. E. 277, 279, 43 S. C. 436.

"Laches" is defined as inexcusable delay in asserting a right. One who acts as soon as possible after learning of his right, or that his right has been invaded, cannot be charged with delay. Byrne v. Schuyler Electric Mfg. Co., 31 Atl. 833, 837, 65 Conn. 336, 28 L. R. A. 304.

Under the Code of Procedure it is held that "laches" is an equitable defense, which, unless disclosed by the complaint, must be proved by the answer, and the mere appearance of the lapse of time is not sufficient to raise the issue. Gay v. Havermale, 67 Pac. 804, 806, 27 Wash. 390.

The absence of diligence in compelling specific performance of a contract has long since become crystallized in the legal term "laches," which is incapable of an exact definition, and dependent upon neither the lapse of time nor the force of those statutes which in actions at law determine generally the plaintiff's rights. The defense of laches is in no sense dependent on the statute of limitation. The lapse of time and the staleness of the claim are undoubtedly the governing considerations, but the parties are always held bound to proceed with reasonable diligence in the enforcement of their rights. Hagerman v. Bates, 38 Pac. 1100, 1104, 5 Colo. App. 391.

The term "laches," in its broad legal sense as interpreted by courts of equity, signifies such unreasonable delay in the assertion of and attempted securing of equitable rights as to constitute in equity and good conscience a bar to recovery. The doctrine is founded upon the universally conceded justice and paramount importance of the proposition that the repose of titles and the security of property are manifestly promoted by acting upon the maxim, "Vigilantibus, non dormientibus, jura subveniunt." A learned judge has aptly and beautifully said that this bar as exercised by courts of equity is well symbolized by the emblem of Time, who is depicted as carrying a scythe and an hourglass; that while with one he cuts down the evidence which might protect innocence, with the other he metes out the period when innocence can be no longer assailed. Graff v. Portland Town & Mineral Co., 54 Pac. 854, 856, 12 Colo. App. 106.

Abandonment distinguished.

See "Abandon—Abandonment."

Acquiescence distinguished.

While the words "laches" and "acquiescence" are often used as similar in meaning, the distinction in their import is both great and important. Laches imports a merely passive nonaction, while acquiescence implies active assent, and, when there is no statutory limitation applicable to the case, the courts of equity would discourage laches and refuse relief after great and unexplained delay; yet when there is such statutory limitation they will not anticipate it, as they may where acquiescence has existed. Laches, in fact, amounts only to that inferior species of acquiescence described in the following terms by Lord Kindersley in Rochdale Canal Co. v. King, 2 Sim. (N. S.) 89: "Mere acquiescence, if by 'acquiescence' is to be understood only abstaining from legal proceedings, is unimportant. Where one party invades the right of another, the other does not in general deprive himself of the right of seeking redress, merely because he remains passive, unless, indeed, he continues inactive so long as to bring the case within the purview of the statute of limitations." Wood on Limitations, § 62; Lux v. Haggin (Cal.) 10 Pac. 674, 678; Kenyon v. National Life Ass'n, 57 N. Y. Supp. 60, 74, 39 App. Div. 276.

Change in status of parties or property.

Laches is not, like limitation, a mere matter of time, but principally a question of the inequity in permitting the claim to be enforced; an inequity founded upon some change in the conditions, or the relations of

"Laches" is a term of flexible import, and whether it exists in a given case depends upon facts and circumstances peculiar to that case. It means something more than mere delay; some other element must be connected with the delay to constitute laches, and hence in some cases a party has been concluded by a delay of months, or even weeks, while in other cases his rights have been held unaffected by a delay of years. The question ordinarily is whether, during the period of delay, such changes have taken place in the position of the parties relative to the subject-matter in litigation as to render it inequitable to permit the enforcement of rights concerning which otherwise there might be no difficulty. DuBois v. Clark, 55 Pac. 750, 753, 12 Colo. App. 220.

Delay alone, unaccompanied by other circumstances, will not necessarily preclude relief. In every instance where the defense is founded on mere delay—that delay, of course, not amounting to a bar of any statute of limitations—the validity of the defense must be tested on principles substantially equitable. Two circumstances, always important in such cases, are the length of the delay, and the nature of the acts done during the interval which might affect either party and cause a balance of justice or injustice in taking one course or the other, so far as relates to the remedy. The doctrine of laches, as understood in courts of equity, implies injury to the party pleading it as a defense. Where the situation of the parties has not been altered, and one has not been put in a worse condition by the delay of the other, the defense of laches does not generally apply. Parker v. Bethel Hotel Co., 34 S. W. 209, 217, 96 Tenn. 252, 31 L. R. A. 706.

"Laches," in legal significance, is not mere delay, but delay that works a disadvantage to another. So long as parties are in the same condition, it matters little whether one presses a right promptly or slowly, within the limits allowed by law; but when, knowing his rights, he takes no steps to enforce them until the condition of the other party has in good faith become so changed that he cannot be restored to his former state, if the right be then enforced, delay becomes inequitable, and operates as an estoppel against the assertion of the right. The disadvantage may come from loss of evidence, change of title, intervention of equities, and other causes, but when a court sees negligence on one side, and injury therefrom on the other, it is a ground for denial of relief. Chase v. Chase, 20 R. L.

202, 37 Atl. 804 (cited and approved in Gorham v. Sayles, 50 Atl. 848, 850, 23 R. I. 449).

The doctrine of laches in courts of equity is not an arbitrary one. When it would be practically unjust to give a remedy, either because the party has, by his conduct, done that which might be regarded as equivalent to a waiver, or by his neglect has, though perhaps not waiving that remedy, put the other party in a situation in which it would be unreasonable to place him if the remedy were afterwards to be asserted, in either of these cases lapse of time and delay are most material. Two circumstances, always important to be considered, are the length of the delay, and the nature of the acts done during the interval, which might affect either party. Hall v. Otterson, 28 Atl. 907, 912, 52 N. J. Eq. (7 Dick.) 522.

The question of laches turns not simply upon the number of years which have elapsed between the accruing of the right and the assertion of it, but also upon the nature and evidence of the right, the changes of value, and of circumstances occurring during that lapse of years. Galliber v. Cadwell, 12 Sup. Ct. 873, 874, 145 U. S. 368, 36 L. Ed. 738.

Mere delay does not constitute laches, and if a relator shows that his delay in moving has been founded on sufficient reason and good faith, it is impossible to say he has been guilty of laches. In short, every case must rest upon its own special facts and circumstances. People v. Scannell, 59 N. Y. Supp. 679, 680, 27 Misc. Rep. 662.

"Laches" is such neglect or omission to assert a right as, taken in conjunction with lapse of time more or less great, and other circumstances, causes prejudice to the adverse party, and operates as a bar in a court of equity. Something more than mere lapse of time is implied in the term "laches." Ordinarily, there must be other circumstances, causing prejudice to the adverse party, which would make it inequitable to grant the relief prayed for. Thus, where the delay of plaintiff to enforce an obligation was due mainly to the defendant's repeated and urgent appeals for time and to his inability to meet his obligations, plaintiff will not be held guilty of laches because he yielded to the request for delay. Hellams v. Prior, 42 S. E. 106, 107, 64 S. C. 296.

The determination of whether a party is guilty of laches in a particular case is attended with much difficulty. Laches is neglect to do something which a party ought to do, and mere lapse of time, unaccompanied by some circumstances affording evidence of a presumption that the right has been abandoned, is not considered laches.

Claims are considered stale only where gross laches is shown, with unexplained acquiescence in the operation of an adverse right. It is unquestionably true that a court of equity will refuse its aid to enforce stale demands where the party has slept upon his rights or acquiesced for an unreasonable length of time, but whether the lapse of time is sufficient to bar a recovery must of necessity depend upon the particular circumstances of each case. Bell v. Wood, 27 S. E. 504, 506, 94 Va. 677.

Laches is such negligence as results in the omission to do what one is by law required to do to save a right, and which warrants a presumption that the claimant of it has abandoned it and declines to assert it. When the assertion of the right is neglected or omitted for a period of time more or less great, and under such circumstances as to cause prejudice to an adverse party, it may operate as a bar in equity. Although a proper ingredient in the law of laches, the instances seem to be rare where courts have declared that mere lapse of time might effect a positive bar, even in cases of purely equitable jurisdiction; while, on the other hand, relief has frequently been granted, notwithstanding great delay, when substantial justice could yet be done between the parties. Therefore mere lapse of time, where the parties remain in the same relative position, the delay working no serious wrong to the adverse party, and justice being possible, will not operate as a bar in equity. Hamilton v. Dooley, 49 Pac. 769, 772, 15 Utah, 280.

Laches, as has been well said, does not, like limitation, grow out of the mere passage of time, but is founded on the inequity of permitting the claim to be enforced—an inequity founded on some change in the condition or relation of the property or the parties. Whenever such a manifest inequity does not appear, the case does not fall within the operation of the rule if the suit is for the recovery of property, real or personal, unless it is apparent on the face of the bill that, for the period prescribed as a bar to the corresponding legal remedies, there has been a possession hostile to the title the complainants assert. First Nat. Bank v. Nelson, 18 South. 154, 155, 106 Ala. 635.

In determining whether a party has been guilty of laches so as to bar his right to be relieved from a judgment on the ground of mistake, inadvertence, etc., a proper regard must be had to the just claim of other business, to the terms of the court, and any other material facts. A delay of a month after the entry of the judgment will not necessarily constitute such laches as to bar the relief, nor will the failure to renew the application at the first term of court after the cause was removed from the Supreme Court, where the merits of the application were already settled by the Supreme Court, and where the application was renewed the next month at the succeeding term of court. Butler v. Mitchell, 17 Wis. 52, 60.

Laches is not, like limitation, a mere matter of time, but principally a question of the inequity of permitting the claim to be enforced, an inequity founded on some change in the condition or relation of the property or the parties; and, where the question of laches is in issue, plaintiff is chargeable with such knowledge as he might obtain on inquiry, providing facts already shown by him were such as to put a man of ordinary intelligence on inquiry. Johnson v. Atlantic, G. & W. I. Transit Co., 15 Sup. Ct. 520, 531, 156 U. S. 618, 39 L. Ed. 556.

Knowledge of rights implied.

Laches is inexcusable delay in ascertaining a right, and is an equitable defense determinable by the particular facts. Anderson's Law Dictionary, 593. But the term implies knowledge of one's rights, and therefore it cannot be imputed to one who is non compos mentis. Trowbridge v. Stone's Adm'r, 26 S. E. 363, 365, 42 W. Va. 454.

As a presumption.

The defense of laches is in equity only permitted to defeat an acknowledged right on the ground that it affords evidence that the right has been abandoned. Cottrell v. Watkins, 17 S. E. 328, 331, 80 Va. 801, 19 L. R. A. 754, 37 Am. St. Rep. 897.

Laches is the neglect or omission to do something which the party ought to do, and mere lapse of time, unaccompanied by any circumstances to make it to the interest of a creditor to call in the investment, and during all of which time the debtor is scrupulously fulfilling all of his obligations, can never amount to such laches or neglect on the part of the creditor as to defeat his rights. Such lapse is only permitted in equity to defeat an acknowledged right, on the ground of affording evidence of a presumption that that right has been abandoned, and it therefore never prevails when that presumption is outweighed by opposing facts and circumstances. So the failure of the obligee in a bond for the payment of money, executed in 1844, to institute a suit thereon until 1877, was not laches, where the obligor in the bond regularly and promptly paid semiannual interest thereon up to the year 1872. Cole's Adm'r v. Ballard, 78 Va. 139, 147.

As neglect of legal duty.

Lapse of time alone is not sufficient to bar equitable relief. The term "laches" involves the idea of negligence, a neglect or failure to do what ought to be done under the circumstances to protect the rights of the parties to whom it is imputed, or involving injury to the opposite party through such neglect to assert rights within a reasonable time. Ripley v. Sellman, 50 N. W. 143, 147, 88 Mich. 177.

Delay is not the sole factor that constitutes laches. If it were so, some period fixed by statute or by the common law of the courts would afford a safe and unvarying rule. Laches denotes not only undue lapse of time, but also negligence, and opportunity to have acted sooner, and all three factors must be satisfactorily shown before the bar in equity is complete. Babb v. Sullivan, 21 S. E. 277, 279, 43 S. C. 436 (cited in Wagner v. Sanders, 39 S. E. 950, 955, 62 S. C. 73).

Strictly speaking, and using the term as it is understood in the law, "laches" is such neglect or omission to assert a right as, taken in conjunction with lapse of time, more or less great, and other circumstances causing prejudice to an adverse party, operates as a bar in a court of equity. Lord Ellenborough, in the case of Selbag v. Abitbol, 4 Maule & S. 462, said: "Laches is a neglect to do something which by law a man is obliged to do. Whether any neglect to call at a house, where a man informs me that I may get the money due on a bill of exchange, amounts to laches, depends on whether I am obliged to call there." Obviously, then, there must be a legal duty to do some act, a failure to do that duty, and attendant circumstances which cause prejudice to an adverse party, before the doctrine can be successfully invoked. Mere lapse of time, without more, unless of sufficient duration to amount to and constitute the bar of the statute of limitations, will not be sufficient. De Muth v. Old Town Bank, 37 Atl. 266, 268, 85 Md. 315, 60 Am. St. Rep. 322.

LACK OF JURISDICTION.

The expression "lack of jurisdiction," in special assessment proceedings, does not necessarily mean that there was no authority of law to levy the assessment under any circumstances; it covers as well a case where there was legal authority to make the assessment, but when there has occurred some material defect or omission in the proceedings at any stage. Schintgen v. City of La Crosse, 94 N. W. 84, 87, 117 Wis. 158.

LADEN.

Within the meaning of Ohio Act 1831, and Pennsylvania Act 1831, relating to the control of the Cumberland road, and exempting from toll any wagon or carriage laden with the property of the United States, etc., "laden" does not mean fully laden. Hence a carriage which contained the United States mail would be "laden" with property of the United States within the meaning of the acts above referred to, and hence exempt from toll. Searight v. Stokes, 44 U. S. (3 How.) 151, 169, 11 L. Ed. 537.

LADIES' NOTIONS.

A mortgage describing mortgaged property as a general stock of millinery stock of "ladies' notions," consisting of hats, etc., now on hand or to be purchased or used in the business of a general millinery store, covers only such property as is specifically described, immediately following said expression or term. Chapin v. Garretson, 52 N. W. 104, 105, 85 Iowa, 377.

LADING.

LAGER BEER.

"Lager beer is a beer which is used in Germany, where it is kept in casks on a frame, 'lager' (signifying bed), placed in a cellar for that purpose." And it is the name of a similar beverage now largely manufactured in the United States. It is obviously called "lager beer" here to indicate that it is like the German beer. The fact that the word "lager" is prefixed to the term "beer" does not convey the idea that it is a fermented liquor made of malt, this idea being involved in its being called "beer," since that is a fermented liquor chiefly made from malt. United States v. Ducournau (U. S.) 54 Fed. 138, 139; Johnson v. State (Tex.) 66 S. W. 552, 553.

Lager beer is beer called "lager beer" because it is contemplated that it has been stored some time after being made. United States v. Ellis (U. S.) 51 Fed. 808, 812.

Lager beer is and has been for many years a familiar beverage in this country. Its constituents are enumerated not only in books of science, but in popular encyclopedias. It is a malt liquor of the lighter sort, and differs from ordinary beers and ales, not so much in its ingredients, as in its process of fermentation. Seaman v. Burnham, 16 N. W. 38, 41, 57 Wis. 568 (citing State v. Goyette, 11 R. I. 592).

Lager beer is beer with less per cent. of alcohol than contained in ordinary beer—that is, it is the second brew or draw of that manufactured—and, under a statute prohibiting the introduction into any Indian reservation of any "ardent spirits, ale, beer, wine, or intoxicating liquors of whatsoever kind," lager beer cannot be concealed or hidden under the name of "Rochester Tonic," "Vegetable Bitters," "Malt Nutrients," and numberless other pretended health restoratives; and such alleged restoratives which contain a less per cent. of alcohol than contained in beer, but composed of the same ingredients, could not be sold or introduced in such reservations. United States v. Cohn, 52 S. W. 38, 46, 2 Ind. T. 474.

As ardent spirits.

See "Ardent Spirits."

As an intoxicating liquor.

The term "lager beer," of itself, imports an intoxicating liquor made from malt and hops. State v. Church, 60 N. W. 143, 144, 6 S. D. 89.

Lager beer, being a malt liquor, is to be regarded as an intoxicating liquor, within the meaning of a statute regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors. State v. Rush, 13 R. I. 198, 199.

Lager beer is, by the express provisions of St. 1869, c. 415, § 30, an intoxicating liquor. Commonwealth v. Chappel, 116 Mass. 7.

The term "intoxicating liquors" does not include liquors containing alcohol in so slight a quantity as not to unduly excite the human system. Lager beer falls within the term "intoxicating liquors" if the use of it is ordinarily attended with entire or partial intoxication, and whether such is the fact is to be decided by the jury. People v. Zeiger (N. Y.) 6 Parker, Cr. R. 355, 359.

Under a statute prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, and declaring that lager beer shall be deemed intoxicating, lager beer may be described in the indictment as an intoxicating liquor, and cannot be proved to be otherwise. Commonwealth v. Anthes, 78 Mass. (12 Gray) 29, 32.

"We agree with Wells, J., when he says, in Commissioners of Excise of Tompkins County v. Taylor, 21 N. Y. 173, 178, 'that but one safe and sensible line of distinction can be drawn between the different kinds of liquor containing alcohol, in order to determine upon which of them the statute was intended to operate, and that is between those which are capable of causing intoxication, and those containing so small a percentage of alcohol that the human stomach cannot contain sufficient of the liquor to produce that effect.' Of course, we are not unmindful of the fact that different liquors and different quantities will produce different effects upon different persons, and that the effect upon persons may depend upon their habits, their health, their age and constitutions. In Rau v. People, 63 N. Y. 277, 279, the Court of Appeals said: 'Hitherto the courts have not been willing to take notice that lager beer is intoxicating, but have submitted the question, when controverted, to the jury, to be determined upon the evidence. Where the liquors are not such as are known to the courts to be intoxicating, their character as intoxicating or not must be determined upon competent evidence as a question of fact.' People v. Schewe (N. Y.) 29 Hun, 122.

Judicial knowledge of character.

The courts will take judicial notice of the fact that lager beer is a malt liquor. Netso v. State, 5 South. 8, 9, 24 Fla. 363, 1 L. R. A. 825; Pedigo v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 70 S. W. 659.

The court will take judicial cognizance, without evidence, that lager beer is a malt liquor, it being said in the course of the opinion: "Lager beer is, and has been for many years, a familiar beverage in this country. Its constituents are enumerated not only in books of science, but in popular encyclopedias. It is a malt liquor of the lighter sort, and differs from ordinary beers and ales, not so much in its ingredients, as in its process of fermentation. The government might almost as well be required to prove that gin or whisky or brandy is a strong liquor as to prove that lager beer is a malt liquor." State v. Goyette, 11 R. I. 592.

Under an indictment for selling lager beer, it is not necessary to prove that it was a malt and fermented liquor, as the court properly treated it as a matter of common knowledge. Waller v. State, 38 Ark. 656, 660; Watson v. State, 55 Ala. 158, 160; Tinker v. State, 8 South. 855, 856, 90 Ala. 647.

The court cannot take judicial notice that lager beer is within the statute forbidding the sale of wine, beer, or strong liquors. People v. Hart (N. Y.) 24 How. Prac. 289.

In an action in which defendant was convicted of selling intoxicating liquors upon evidence that he sold lager beer, the court said: "We have no more hesitation in holding that the liquor known as 'lager beer' is intoxicating than we should have in holding that spruce beer is not; and we should put both rulings upon the same ground, to wit, that such is the common understanding resulting from common observation." State v. Church, 60 N. W. 143, 144, 6 S. D. 89.

As strong or spirituous liquor.

Lager beer is a malt liquor, of which fact the court will take judicial notice; and a prohibition of the sale of spirituous liquor, as, for instance, in Rev. St. U. S. § 2139, prohibiting the introduction of spirituous liquor into the Indian country, will not be construed to include beer. Sarlis v. United States, 14 Sup. Ct. 720, 721, 152 U. S. 570, 38 L. Ed. 556.

Lager beer, if proved to be intoxicating, comes within the prohibition against the sale of strong and spirituous liquors. Dillman v. People, 4 N. Y. Wkly. Dig. 251, 252.

Lager beer is a malt liquor made by fermentation. It is not included in the prohibition of Rev. St. U. S. § 2139, prohibiting the introduction of spirituous liquor or wine into the Indian country. Sarlis v. United States, 14 Sup. Ct. 720, 722, 152 U. S. 570, 38 L. Ed. 556.

As wine.

See "Wine."

LAID.

See "Lay—Laid."

LAID UP FOR REPAIRS.

A yacht is "laid up for repairs," within the meaning of that phrase in a charter party, where it is at rest, having some damage made good which to a material degree impaired its ability to sail as a yacht, though the charterer may continue to eat and sleep and entertain friends on board. Dahlgren v. Whitaker (U. S.) 124 Fed. 695, 696.

LAKE.

A "lake" occupies a basin of greater or less depth, and may or may not have a single prevailing direction. A "river" is characterized by its confining channel banks, which give it a substantially single course throughout. Jones v. Lee, 43 N. W. 855, 856, 77 Mich. 35.

It is said that the controlling distinction between a stream and a lake or pond is that in one case the water has a natural motion, while in the other the water in its natural state is substantially at rest, and this entirely irrespective of the size of the one or the other. But not every sheet of water which has a current from head to its outlet is a stream. It is said that even the large lakes have such a current; and a small stream which spreads into a body of water some 50 rods wide and 3 miles long, and then reappears as a stream filled with rushes, and navigable only by small skiffs, is not a water course, but a lake. Ne-pee-nauk Club v. Wilson, 71 N. W. 661, 662, 96 Wis. 290.

As a boundary.

Where a lake is made a boundary of land in a grant thereof, the grant only extends to the water's edge, and not to the center, as is the case when a grant extends to a river. State v. Town of Gilmanton, 9 N. H.

461, 463; State of Indiana v. Milk (U. S.) 11 Fed. 389, 395.

The term "lake," when used in reference to a navigable body of fresh water in a conveyance describing one boundary of the land as being on the lake, is to be construed as fixing the boundary at the line at which the water usually stands when free from disturbing causes. Seaman v. Smith, 24 Ill. (14 Peck) 521, 524; Fletcher v. Phelps, 28 Vt. 257, 261.

The term "lake," when used to designate a boundary of land on a natural non-navigable lake, operates to fix the boundary at the natural shore of the lake, and the owner does not acquire the bed of the lake which is made dry by drainage and the natural action of a river in filling it up. Noyes v. Collins, 61 N. W. 250, 92 Iowa, 566, 26 L. R. A. 609, 54 Am. St. Rep. 571.

The term "lake," when used in a conveyance to designate a boundary of land which fronts on a nonnavigable lake, is to be construed as fixing the boundary at the center of the lake. Ledyard v. Ten Eyck (N. Y.) 36 Barb. 102, 124.

As a coloring matter.

The term "lake" is a compound of mineral or vegetable coloring matter and a metallic oxide. The term in a tariff act fixing a duty on colors and paints, including "lakes," is to be given such a meaning, in the absence of evidence showing the term to have a peculiar meaning in trade and commerce. Sykes v. Magone (U. S.) 38 Fed. 494, 497.

LAKE ERIE.

In one sense, the name "Lake Erie" embraces only the main water, excluding land, locked bays, and harbors; in another sense, all of its bays and harbors are part of the lake. In a grant of land bounded on the north by the shore of Lake Erie, the name would include the harbors. Hogg v. Beerman, 41 Ohio St. 81, 98, 52 Am. Rep. 71.

LAME—LAMINA.

The Century Dictionary defines "lame" and "lamina" as follows: "A plate; a blade; a thin plate. See 'lamina,' which is defined in the same dictionary as 'a thin plate or scale; a thin plate of wood, metal, etc.; a leaf, layer, etc.'" As used in Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, Schedule C, par. 179, cl. 1, 30 Stat. 166 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1644], fixing a duty on laces, embroideries, braids, galloons, trimmings, or other articles made of lame, the term includes metallics produced by cutting lame into very minute scales of definite size. Marsching v. United States (U. S.) 113 Fed. 1006, 1007.

LAMP.

"The word 'lamp,' considered with reference to the general idea conveyed, is as definite as any word in the language; but with regard to the particular form, material, and method of operation of the instrument itself, and the substance used as a light producer, it is as vague as the name of any concrete article in daily use can well be." Hence its meaning must depend largely on the context, and on the time, place, and habits of the people with reference to which it is used; and as used in a contract under which a gas company agreed to furnish natural gas to a village, free of charge, for all street lamps, it is held to mean open lights, such as had been in use previous to the time of making the contract. Saltsburg Gas Co. v. Borough of Saltsburg, 20 Atl. 844, 845, 138 Pa. 250, 10 L. R. A. 193.

Blackstone defines "land" as comprehending all things of a permanent, substantial nature, it being a word of very extensive signification, and while distinct from, it includes, tenements. In a legal sense it signifies everything that may be holden, provided it be of a permanent nature, whether it be of a substantial, or of an unsubstantial, ideal kind. Nessler v. Neher, 26 N. W. 471, 472, 18 Neb. 649.

"It is elementary that 'land' itself, in legal contemplation, extends from the sky to the depths. Coke says, 'The term "land" includes, not only the ground or soil, but everything which is attached to the earth, whether by the course of nature, as trees, herbage, and water, or by the hand of man, as houses and other buildings; and it has an indefinite extent upwards as well as downwards, so as to include everything terrestrial under or over it.' Co. Litt. 4a. Blackstone says: 'Land comprehends all things of a permanent and substantial nature, being a word of very extensive signification; also, if a man grants all his "lands," he grants all his mines of metals, and his fossils, his woods, his waters, and his houses, as well as his fields and meadows.' 2 Bl. Comm. 16-18. Washburn says: 'Land is always regarded as real property, and, ordinarily, whatever is erected or growing upon it, as well as whatever is contained within it or beneath its surface, such as minerals and the like, upon the principle that "cujus est solum, ejus est usque ad cœlum" in one direction, and "usque ad orcum" in the other.' 1 Washb. Real Prop. 3. Land is the surface of the earth, whatever is attached to it by nature or by the hand of man, and all that is contained within or below it." Higgins Oil & Fuel Co. v. Snow (U. S.) 113 Fed. 433, 438, 51 C. C. A. 267.

"Land," in its full legal signification, comprehends not only the soil, but any building on it, and includes not only the face of the earth, but everything under it or over it. Lightfoot v. Grove, 52 Tenn. (5 Heisk.) 473, 477.

The term "land," at common law, has a twofold meaning. In its more general sense it is held to comprehend any ground, soil, or earth whatsoever, as meadows, pastures, woods, marshes, furze, etc. 2 Bl. Comm. 18. In its more limited sense the term denotes the quantity and character of the interest or estate which the tenant may own in lands. Johnson v. Richardson, 33 Miss. 462, 464.

"Land," in its legal signification, comprehends any grounds, soil, or earth whatever. Mitchell v. Warner, 5 Conn. 497, 517 (citing 1 Inst. 4a); Lux v. Haggin (Cal.) 4 Pac. 919, 920; Taylor v. Robinson (U. S.) 34 Fed. 678, 681.

The word "land" includes not only the conveyance of the earth, but everything under it or over it. He who owns a piece of land, therefore, is the owner of everything underneath in a direct line in the center of the earth, and everything above the surface. Winton v. Cornish, 5 Ohio (5 Ham.) 477, 478.

"Land" has, "in its legal significance, an indefinite extent, upwards as well as downwards. Whatever is in a direct line between the surface of any land and the center of the earth belongs to the owner of the surface. So that the word 'land' includes not only the face of the earth, but everything under it or over it." Smith v. City of Atlanta, 17 S. E. 981, 92 Ga. 119; United States Pipe-Line Co. v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 41 Atl. 759, 767, 62 N. J. Law, 254, 42 L. R. A. 572; Weems v. Mayfield, 22 South. 892, 75 Miss. 286; Hilton & Dodge Lumber Co. v. Murray, 62 N. Y. Supp. 35, 37, 47 App. Div. 289 (quoting and adopting Mott v. Pal- mer, 1 N. Y. [1 Comst.] 564; Seager v. McCabe, 52 N. W. 299, 301, 92 Mich. 186, 16 L. R. A. 247.

"Land," in the English colonies, was considered as partaking much more than in England of the nature of mere commercial property. Coombs v. Jordan (Md.) 3 Bland, 284, 22 Am. Dec. 236.

The word "land" is comprehensive in its import, and includes many things besides the earth we tread on, as water, grass, buildings, fences, trees, and the like, for all these may be conveyed by the general designation of "land." Harder v. Plass, 11 N. Y. Supp. 226, 227, 57 Hun. 540; Warren v. Leland (N. Y.) 2 Barb. 613, 618.

"Land" is that species of property which, by its fixed situation and qualities, has engrossed the term "real" as its peculiar descriptive. Myers v. League, 62 Fed. 654, 659, 10 C. C. A. 571.

The word "land," when used in a deed, includes not only the naked earth, but everything within it, and the buildings, trees, fences, and fixtures upon it. A deed to land passes all the incidents to the land as well as the land itself, and as well when they are not expressed as when they are. Mott v. Palmer, 1 N. Y. (1 Comst.) 564, 569.

"Land" signifies any ground forming part of the earth's surface which can be held as individual property, whether soil or rock, or water-covered, and everything annexed to it, whether by nature, as trees, water, etc., or by the hand of man, as buildings, fences, etc. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Wood, 74 N. W. 656, 657, 115 Mich. 444.

"Lands," as used in statutes providing for taking lands for a proposed street, should be construed in its broadest signification, and includes all things affixed to lands. Paul v. Newark, 6 Am. Law Rev. 576.

Certain words usually employed in a lease, as "house," "farm," "land," and the like, have, if necessary, a very wide meaning, and, where such general and comprehensive terms are employed, all things usually comprehended within the meaning thereof will pass, unless the circumstances of the case show very clearly that the intention of the parties was otherwise. Riddle v. Littlefield, 53 N. H. 503, 508, 16 Am. Rep. 388.

"Land," as used in Hutchinson's Dig. § 917, providing that every head of a family shall be entitled to hold, own, and possess, free from sale under execution, 160 acres of land, was employed in its general and popular sense to describe the particular subject of property which was designed to be brought within the exemption, and not to define the nature and quality of the interest or estate which was intended to be protected. The term "land," at common law, has a twofold meaning. In its more general sense it is held to comprehend any ground, soil, or earth whatsoever, as meadows, pastures, woods, marshes, furze, etc. In its more limited sense the term denotes the quantity and character of the interest or estate which the tenant may own in lands. When used to describe the quantity of the estate, it is understood to denote a freehold estate at the least. Johnson v. Richardson, 33 Miss. 462, 464 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 18).

Statutory definitions.

By statute in Arkansas (Sandels & H. Dig. § 6401) it is provided that the terms "real property" and "lands," as used in the act relating to taxation, include not only the land itself, with all things thereon contained, but also all buildings, structures, and improvements and other fixtures of whatever kind thereon, and all rights and privileges belonging or in any wise pertaining thereto. Union Compress Co. v. State, 41 S. W. 52, 64 Ark. 136.

The term "land," in the chapter of the New York statute in reference to taxation, is expressly defined "to include the land itself, all buildings and other articles erected upon or adverse to the same, all trees and underwood growing thereon, and all mines, minerals, quarries, and fossils in and under the same, except mines belonging to the state." People v. Board of Assessors of City of Brooklyn, 39 N. Y. 81, 87.

By statute in Oregon it is provided that "property," "real property," and "land" shall be held to mean and include not only the land itself, whether laid out in town lots or otherwise, but also, unless otherwise specified, buildings, structures, and fixtures of whatever kind, and all rights and privileges belonging or in any wise appertaining thereto. Chapman v. First Nat. Bank, 47 N. E. 54, 56, 56 Ohio St. 310.

By statute in Utah the terms "lands," "real estate," and "real property" include land, tenements, hereditaments, water rights, possessory rights, and claims. Conant v. Deep Creek & Curlew Val. Irr. Co., 66 Pac. 188, 189, 23 Utah, 627, 90 Am. St. Rep. 721.

The words "land," "real estate," and "premises," when used in the chapter relating to conveyances of real estate, or in any instrument relating to real property, are synonyms, and shall be deemed to mean the same thing, and, unless otherwise qualified, to include lands, tenements, and hereditaments. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 887.

Land is the solid material of the earth, whatever may be the ingredients of which it is composed, whether soil, rock, or other substance. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 659; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4022; Duggan v. Davey, 26 N. W. 887, 890, 4 Dak. 110; Rev. Codes N.

For the purpose of assessment, the soil shall be known as "land." Ky. St. 1903, § 2984.

The words "land," "lands," and "real estate" shall include lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and all rights thereto and interests therein; and pews or slips in places of public worship shall be treated as real estate. V. S. 1894, 9.

The term "land," when used in any statute, shall include all corporeal hereditaments whatever, and any interest therein, whether an estate for years or a different estate. Code Miss. 1892, § 1507.

The terms "real property," "real estate," "land," or "lot," whenever used in the chapter relating to the assessment and collection of the revenue, shall be held to mean and include not only the land itself, whether laid out in town or city lots or otherwise, with all things pertaining therein, but also all buildings, structures, and improvements and other permanent fixtures, of whatsoever kind, thereon, all shot towers and all machinery therewith connected, all smelting furnaces and all machinery therewith connected, all gristmills, sawmills (except portable mills of every description), oilmills, tobacco, hemp, and cotton factories, tobacco stemmeries, ropewalks, manufactories of iron, nails, glass, clocks, and all other property belonging to manufactories of whatever kind, all wool-carding machines, all distilleries, breweries, all tanneries, all iron, copper, brass, and other foundries, and all rights and privileges belonging or in any wise pertaining thereto, except where the same may be otherwise denominated by the chapter. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 9123.

The terms "real property," "real estate," and "land," when used in the article relating to cities of the second class, shall include not only the land itself, but all buildings, fixtures, improvements, rights, and privileges appertaining thereto. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 5647.

The word "land" or "lands," and the words "real estate" or "real property," include lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and all rights thereto and interests therein, except chattel interests. Code W. Va. 1899, p. 134, c. 13, § 17.

The word "land," when used in the revenue act, shall be construed to include not only the land itself, whether laid out in town or city lots or otherwise, with all things contained therein, but also all buildings, structures, and improvements, and other permanent fixtures, effects of every kind thereon, and all rights and privileges belonging or in any wise pertaining thereto, except where the same may be otherwise denominated by this act. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1494, c. 120, § 292, subd. 12.

The terms "land," "real estate," and "real property" include lands, tenements, hereditaments, water rights, possessory rights, and claims. Rev. St. Utah, 1898, § 2498.

In the title relating to taxation the term "land" shall be held to mean and include not only land itself, whether laid out in town lots or otherwise, with all things contained therein, but also, unless otherwise specified, all buildings, structures, and improvements, and fixtures of whatever kind thereon, and all rights and privileges belonging or in any wise appertaining thereto. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 2730.

The word "land" includes rights and easements of an incorporeal nature. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, §§ 1538-907.

The term "lands," as used in the act concerning conveyances, shall be construed as coextensive in meaning with "lands, tenements, and hereditaments," and shall include in its meaning all possessory right to the soil for mining and other purposes. Comp. Laws Nev. 1900, § 2713.

The terms "land," and "real estate," as used in the chapter relating to conveyances, shall be construed as coextensive in meaning with the terms "lands, tenements, and hereditaments," and as embracing all mining claims and other chattels real. Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 456.

The word "lands," as used in the chapter relating to special taxes in cities, shall mean any unsubdivided real estate. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 261.

The terms "real property," "real estate," and "lands," when used in the revenue act, except as otherwise provided, shall include city and village lots, and all other land and buildings, fixtures, improvements, mines, minerals, quarries, mineral springs and wells, oil and gas rights, and privileges pertaining thereto. Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 10,400.

By Gen. St. 1901, § 7503, it is declared that the terms "real property," "real estate," and "land" usually, except as otherwise provided, include not only the land itself, but the buildings, fixtures, improvements, etc. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Miami County Com'rs, 73 Pac. 103, 105, 67 Kan. 434.

The term "land" as used in the chapter relating to frauds shall be construed as coextensive in meaning with "lands, tenements and hereditaments." Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 5971; Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 2325; Horner's Rev. St. Ind. 1901, § 1285; Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 4160; Hyatt v. Vincennes Nat. Bank, 5 Sup. Ct. 573, 576, 113 U. S. 408, 28 L.

In the construction of statutes the word "land" or "lands" and the words "real estate" shall include lands, tenements, hereditaments, and all rights thereto and interest therein. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 255, subd. 8; Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 88, c. 8, § 5, subd. 8; Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 59, c. 1, § 6, subd. 10; Ky. St. 1903, § 458; Alexander v. Miller's Heirs, 54 Tenn. (7 Heisk.) 65, 82.

In the construction of statutes the word "land," and the phrases "real estate" and "real property," include lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and all rights thereto and interest therein, equitable as well as legal. Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 7342, subd. 8; Code Iowa 1897, § 48, subd. 8; Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 63; Strong v. Garrett, 57 N. W. 715, 716, 90 Iowa, 100.

As agricultural land.

"Land," as used in 6 Geo. IV, c. 77, § 38, providing that, in the collection of rates for the purpose of lighting the town of C. with gas, no person shall be rated for or on account of any land whatsoever, refers to land used only for agricultural purposes, and for purposes ancillary thereto. Regina v. Midland Ry. Co., 30 Eng. Law & Eq. R. 399, 400.

The word "land," in a local act for rating a borough, providing that no person should be rated for or on account of any land whatsoever, means land occupied for cultivation, and uses ancillary thereto, so that a line of railway through such borough was properly rated. Regina v. Midland Ry. Co., 4 El. & Bl. 958, 962.

"The word 'land' in the Dutch language, it is well known, conveyed the same sense with its present technical acceptation, where it is used simply. It meant arable land, and no other was considered as arable but the rich lowlands or flats." Van Gordon v. Jackson (N. Y.) 5 Johns. 440, 454.

"Land," as used in Code, c. 94, § 1, providing that, "if there be a tenancy for life or other uncertain interest in land which is let to another, the lessee may hold the land to the end of the current year of the tenancy, paying rent therefor," denotes only agricultural land rented for an annual rental, and not town lots used for building purposes alone. Shufflin v. House, 31 S. E. 974, 45 W. Va. 731, 72 Am. St. Rep. 831.

As estate in fee.

Under the general railroad act, § 12, empowering any railroad company incorporated thereunder to take by condemnation "lands" or materials required for the use of such company in the construction of its road, a company taking property for its roadbed by condemnation must take for its possession and use such an estate or interest therein as in a legal sense is comprehended in the term "land," whereof the unqualified use and possession for the legitimate purposes of the company will be transferred by the condemnation proceedings. Where the petition for the appointment of commissioners, describing the lands desired, states that it is not intended to acquire any right or easement of support for the track or roadbed of the railroad by the ores lying beneath, and that the owner shall be at liberty after reasonable notice to remove the ores, notwithstanding the removal may weaken or destroy the roadbed, and that, if the support of the roadbed be destroyed or materially weakened by the removal of ores, then the company shall have the right to support said roadbed by timbers placed across the tunnel or by other means, the right in the lands as so qualified would not give the company the lands, and such qualified right it cannot acquire by condemnation under the statute. De Camp v. Hibernia Underground R. Co., 47 N. J. Law (18 Vroom) 43, 53.

As an estate in the soil.

The term "land" embraces "all titles, legal or equitable, perfect or imperfect, including such rights as lie in contract, those which are executory as well as those which are executed." Fish v. Fowlie, 58 Cal. 373, 375.

In St. 38 Geo. III, c. 5, § 4, providing that all bodies corporate, having or holding any lands or hereditaments, shall be charged to the land tax, the word "land" means a legal interest in the soil, though it may, in a statute passed to throw a charge upon the occupier, mean the ground on which a chattel is deposited in the exercise of an easement. The term as used in the statute does not include land occupied by the pipes of a waterworks company. Chelsea Waterworks Co. v. Bowley, 17 Q. B. 358, 360.

The term "land," at common law, has a twofold meaning. In its more general sense it is held to comprehend any ground, soil, or earth whatsoever, as meadows, pastures, woods, marshes, etc. In its more limited sense the term "land" denotes the quantity and character of the estate or interest which the tenant may own in lands. "The land is one thing," says Plowden, "and the estate in the land is another thing; for an estate in the land is a time in the land or land for a time." When used to describe the quantity of the estate, "land" is understood to denote a freehold estate at the lowest. Hence it is held that the term "lands," as used in Hutch. Dig. 917, providing that every head of a family shall be entitled to hold, own, and possess, free from sale under execution, 160 acres of land, etc., includes an interest in lands for years for life, or any greater estate of freehold. Johnson v. Richardson, 33 Miss. 462, 464.

"Land," as used in Act 3 & 4 Wm. IV, c. 27, § 2, providing that no person shall make an entry or distress or bring an action to recover any land or rent but within 20 years next after the time at which the right to make such entry or distress or to bring such action shall have first accrued, means the inheritance of land, the freehold of land, and the act does not deal with land in any other sense than in that where a person has a right to the land itself. The Dean of Ely v. Bliss, 19 Eng. Law & Eq. 190, 197.

The undivided half of a fee is "land." Coombs v. Anderson, 138 Mass. 376, 378.

Where an execution directs the officer to cause it to be satisfied of the goods, chattels, or lands of the judgment debtor, the word "lands" embraces any interest authorized in law to be taken. Holmes v. Jordan, 39 N. E. 1005, 1006, 163 Mass. 147.

A statute providing for compensation to owner of "lands" taken is broad enough for any interest which a person may have in lands affected by an improvement, whether a fee or an estate less than a fee. Schoff v. Upper Connecticut River & Lake Imp. Co., 57 N. H. 110, 112.

The term "lands," when not restricted in meaning by related provisions in statutes, includes all interest therein. Zumstein v. Consolidated Coal & Mining Co., 43 N. E. 329, 330, 54 Ohio St. 264.

"Lands," as used in P. L. 1835, p. 25, providing that a railroad company may take, have, and hold lands, and may condemn the same, and when the proceedings are consummated as provided by the act, and the price paid, the company shall be deemed to be seised and possessed in fee simple of all such lands, means "land" in its legal signification; that is, a corporeal hereditament. United States Pipe-Line Co. v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 41 Atl. 759, 762, 62 N. J. Law, 254, 42 L. R. A. 572.

As used in Act Jan. 26, 1828, § 27, providing that the power of a canal company to take land shall be so construed as not to authorize the company to take or appropriate to the use of their canal, or under color or pretense that the same are necessary therefor, any lands, etc., except such as are actually necessary for its necessary towing-paths and works, is equivalent to "right" or "estate." New Jersey Zinc &

Iron Co. v. Morris Canal & Banking Co., 15 Atl. 227, 231, 44 N. J. Eq. (17 Stew.) 398, 1 L. R. A. 133.

As land and improvements.

The term "land," in 12 Stat. U. S. 127, § 3, subd. 6, admitting Kansas as a state, and providing that government land should never be taxed by the state, includes improvements on homesteads, and hence such improvements are not taxable before final proof of settlement and cultivation is made. Chase County Com'rs v. Shipman, 14 Kan. 532, 537.

In a statute relating to mechanics' liens, providing that where a mortgagee has the prior lien the mortgagee shall retain his priority and be preferred to the extent of the value of the land at the time the contract is made with the mechanic or materialman, "land" means the land with such improvements as there were upon it at the time of the execution of the mortgage. If, for example, the owner of unincumbered real estate with a building upon it executes a mortgage thereon, and afterwards has repairs made on the building for which a mechanic's lien is enforced, such lien would take priority over the mortgage only to the extent of the additional value given to the property by the improvements. Croskey v. The Western Mfg. Co., 48 Ill. 481, 483.

As property.

See "Personal Property"; "Property."

Award.

An award is not land, and is only treated as land in equity when necessary to adjust the rights of the parties. It is a claim or right presented to the owner of the land; it is personal property, that passes at death to the personal representative, and not to the heir. In re Seventh Ave., 59 App. Div. 175, 177, 69 N. Y. Supp. 63, 64.

Bridge.

Where a charter of a turnpike company authorizes it to construct a road on a route which includes a public county bridge, and requires it to pay to the owners of land over which the road should pass all damages sustained, the compensation clause applies to the bridge, which is included in the term "land," and of which the county is the owner. Freeholders of Monmouth County v. Red Bank & H. Turnpike Co., 18 N. J. Eq. (3 C. E. Green) 91, 94.

Building.

At common law, "land" includes all buildings of a permanent nature standing thereon. Union Cent. Life Ins. Co. v. Tillery, 54 S. W. 220, 221, 152 Mo. 421, 75 Am. St. Rep. 480.

The word "land," in its legal significance, comprehends any ground, soil, or earth whatever, and also has an indefinite extent upward as well as downwards, and therefore includes all castles, houses, and other buildings standing thereon. Stevenson v. Bachrach, 48 N. E. 327, 328, 170 Ill. 253.

The word "land," in a conveyance of land, includes the buildings situated thereon. Gibson v. Brockway, 8 N. H. 465, 470, 31 Am. Dec. 200.

Within the meaning of the statute which makes it the duty of the auditor to transfer for taxation, in the name of the owner of lands, town lots and parts thereof which have been conveyed, a building, whenever it is a permanent improvement, is "land," for the purpose of taxation. Cincinnati College v. Yeatman, 30 Ohio St. 276, 282.

Where authority is given to a railroad company to appropriate land, the term "land" is sufficiently broad to include buildings of a permanent and fixed character. Chicago, I. & K. R. Co. v. Knuffke, 13 Pac. 582, 583, 36 Kan. 367.

A fine of "land" will pass houses thereon, unless a particular intent to the contrary is manifested. Bulkley v. Wilford, 8 Dowl. & R. 549.

The term "land," in its general and legal meaning, embraces the structure of a tenant for a term of years, which would be part of the realty if the tenants owned the fee, though the lease stipulates that the lessee may remove the buildings at the end of the term, and on proceedings to condemn such land for a public park the lessee is entitled to damages in the value of the buildings. Mills, Em. Dom. § 223, says: "When land is condemned, the condemnation carries with the land all the erections upon it, including buildings, fences, gravel, stone, or wood-paving planks, flagstones, bridges, culverts, guard or lamp posts." In re Appointment of Park Com'rs, 1 N. Y. Supp. 763, 765.

"Land," as used in a New York statute providing that all land within the state, owned by individuals or by corporations, shall be liable to taxation, should be construed to include the land itself, and all buildings and structures erected upon or affixed to the same. People v. Barker, 47 N. E. 46, 47, 153 N. Y. 98.

The word "land" includes not only the soil, but everything attached to it, whether attached by the course of nature, as trees, herbage, and water, or by the hand of man, as buildings and fences. Crawford v. Hathaway (Neb.) 93 N. W. 781, 788 (citing McGee Irrigating Ditch Co. v. Hudson [Tex.] 22 S. W. 967).

A conveyance of land likewise conveys the buildings thereon. Isham v. Morgan, 9 Conn. 374, 377, 23 Am. Dec. 361.

Chattels real.

"Land," as used in Const. art 15, § 9, providing that a homestead to the extent of 160 acres of farming land shall be exempt, etc., includes a leasehold estate in land. Hogan v. Manners, 23 Kan. 551, 558, 33 Am. Rep. 199.

Under the provision of a statute providing that the word "land" or "lands" may be construed to include lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and rights thereto and interest therein, a leasehold comes within the term "lands, tenements, and hereditaments," as used in the statute of frauds. Potter v. Arnold, 5 Atl. 379, 381, 15 R. I. 350.

The term "lands" does not comprehend chattel interests nor incorporeal hereditaments. Therefore a statute declaring that no bargain sale, etc., of "houses or lands," shall be good unless the deed be properly acknowledged, did not extend to a lease for years and a right of way. Stone v. Stone, 1 R. I. 425, 428.

Blackstone says that "land" comprehends all things of a permanent, substantial nature, and that all corporeal hereditaments may be included under the general denomination of "land." By the name "land," which is nomen generalissimum, everything terrestrial will pass. The term "land" is not descriptive of a particular estate or class of estates, but merely as the terraqueous subject-matter of real estates. In other words, land is the physical thing out of which all terrene estates are formed, from a freehold of inheritance down to a tenancy at will, but is not in itself descriptive of any given estate or estates. The term, in a statute relative to the recording of mortgages on lands and tenements, includes chattels real. Ex parte Leland (S. C.) 1 Nott & McC. 460, 462.

When the term "lands" is used in statutes protecting the property of married women, or giving mechanics' liens, or providing for the descent of the property, leaseholds are embraced, as Code, § 51, provides that the term, when used in the Code, shall include lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and all rights thereto and interest therein, equitable as well as legal. Lewis v. Glass, 20 S. W. 571, 572, 92 Tenn. (8 Pickle) 147.

Crops.

In an action for injury caused by overflowing "land," an instruction stated the measure of plaintiff's damages for each year was the difference, between the fair market value of the land immediately before the injury each year and its fair market value immediately after such injury. Held, that the "land" as used in the instruction included growing crops. Sullens v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 38 N. W. 545, 548, 74 Iowa, 659, 7 Am. St. Rep. 501 (citing Drake v. Chicago).

R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 19 N. W. 215, 63 Iowa, 302, 50 Am. Rep. 746).

Growing crops, before maturity, and uncovered from the soil, are, as a general rule, part of the "land." Bagley v. Columbus Southern Ry. Co., 98 Ga. 626, 642, 25 S. E. 638, 34 L. R. A. 286, 58 Am. St. Rep. 325.

Easements and incorporeal hereditaments.

"Land," as subject to the lex loci rei sitæ, includes servitudes, easements, rents, and other incorporeal hereditaments and interests in and appurtenant to land. Butler v. Green, 19 N. Y. Supp. 890, 894, 65 Hun, 99.

The term "land" includes such real property only as has corporeal existence, and excludes incorporeal hereditaments. In re Metropolitan Electric R. Co., 2 N. Y. Supp. 278, 281.

Within Gen. St. c. 3, § 7, cl. 10, declaring that "land" shall include tenements, hereditaments, and all rights thereto and interests therein, the term "land" includes an easement. Googins v. Boston & A. R. Co., 30 N. E. 71, 155 Mass. 505.

The term "lands" does not comprehend chattel interests nor incorporeal hereditaments. Stone v. Stone, 1 R. I. 425, 428.

"Land" has various meanings, and it may, in a statute touching assessment of companies for the relief of the poor in respect of pipes for the conveyance of water or gas as "occupiers of land," mean the ground on which a chattel is deposited in the exercise of an easement, though in other acts of Parliament it means a legal interest in the soil. Chelsea Water Works v. Bowley, 17 Q. B. 358, 361.

"Land," as used in Rev. St. c. 4, § 7, excepting from the jurisdiction of justices of the peace actions wherein the title of lands, tenements, and hereditaments is involved, etc., is sufficiently comprehensive to include a right of way over the real estate of another, whether held by the public or an individual. Whitman v. Town of Pownal, 19 Vt. 223, 227.

A devise of "lands" does not include an advowson. Westfaling v. Westfaling, 3 Atk. 459, 464.

The term "land," in statutes conferring power to condemn, is taken in its legal sense, and includes both the soil and buildings and other structures on it, and any and all interests therein. An easement may be taken under authority to take land. State v. King County Superior Court, 72 Pac. 89, 92, 31 Wash. 445 (citing 1 Lewis on Eminent Domain, § 285).

"The word 'land' has, in law, a well-settled meaning, which includes the surface of the ground and everything that is on it and under it, but does not comprehend incorporeal hereditaments." Whitlock v. Greacen, 21 Atl. 944, 48 N. J. Eq. (3 Dick.) 359.

Technically, "land" applies only to corporeal property, but it may, when appearing to have been used with such intent, include an incorporeal interest in lands (Brower v. Tichenor, 41 N. J. Law [12 Vroom] 345; Boston Water Power Co. v. Boston & W. R. Corp., 40 Miss. [23 Pick.] 360, 395), and is so used in a deed which, after describing the land conveyed, provided that there was also conveyed a certain strip along a ditch to secure a free flow of water through the ditch, where the granting clause recited a conveyance only of the land hereinbefore described. Overton v. Moseley, 33 South. 696, 698, 135 Ala. 599.

At the common law the word "land" never included incorporeal hereditaments. Hegan v. Pendennis Club, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 861, 863, 64 S. W. 464.

Franchise of corporation.

Within Rev. St. c. 13, tit. 1, § 2, declaring that the term "land" shall be construed to include the land itself, all buildings or other articles erected upon or affixed to the same, all trees and underwood growing thereon, and all mines, minerals, quarries, and fossils in and under the same, except mines belonging to the state, "land" does not include the franchise of a corporation. People v. Commissioners of Taxes, 10 N. E. 437, 441, 104 N. Y. 240, 248.

A railroad's franchise is an incorporeal hereditament, as distinguished from "land," which is a corporeal hereditament. Gibbs v. Drew, 16 Fla. 147, 149, 26 Am. Rep. 700.

Where a borough charter authorized certain officers to pave the public streets, and gave them power to determine what lands and buildings would be specially benefited by such improvements, and to apportion the cost accordingly, a railroad franchise was not "lands and buildings" within the charter. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Borough of Ansonia, 61 Conn. 76, 85, 23 Atl. 705.

Highway or right of way.

Under a charter authorizing the assessment of abutting "lands or lots" for the improvement of a street, a railroad right of way is included, it being land. Indianapolis & V. Ry. Co. v. Capitol Pav. & Const. Co., 54 N. E. 1076, 1077, 24 Ind. App. 114.

"Lands," as used in 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, providing that railway companies shall maintain fences to separate the right of way from the "adjoining lands" not taken, includes land which adjoined the railway, but was used for a public highway; and, where a railway company's right of way joined the highway, it was the duty of the company to maintain a fence between the right of way and the highway. Manchester, S. & L. Ry. Co. v. Wallis, 14 O. B. 213, 223.

In Gen. St. § 3461, authorizing railroad companies to change the location of their roads with the approval of the railroad commissioners, and take lands for additional tracks, depots, etc., "lands" includes public highways or streets. "The word 'lands' is comprehensive, and may include anything that may be classed as real estate." State v. Railroad Com'rs, 15 Atl. 756, 56 Conn. 308.

In 1 Rev. St. 360, § 1, providing that all lands within this state, whether owned by individuals or by corporations, shall be liable to taxation, etc., the word "lands" includes a street railway. People v. Cassity, 46 N. Y. 46, 49.

In an ordinance providing that a street improvement shall be paid for by a special taxation upon lands, blocks, or parcels of land contiguous to the improvement, "land" should be construed as synonymous with the word "property" as used in a statute authorizing special assessments, and hence not to exclude the intersecting streets along the property to be taxed. Cunningham v. City of Peoria, 41 N. E. 1014, 1016, 157 Ill. 499.

A railroad right of way in a public street is "land," within the meaning of the Illinois statute authorizing special assessments on parcels of land specially benefited, etc. Rich v. City of Chicago, 38 N. E. 255, 260, 152 Ill. 18.

The phrase "owners of such required land," in a statute authorizing a railroad to take land by eminent domain on compensation paid to the "owners of such required land," includes all owners of titles in or growing out of land whose rights are capable of actual privation by the taking. It includes the owner of a right of way. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Williams, 54 Pa. (4 P. F. Smith) 103, 107.

Ice.

The ice formed by the congealing of a flowing stream running in its natural channel, attached to the soil, constitutes a part of the land, and belongs to the owner of the bed of the stream. It is the attaching of property to something else by which the owner of one thing becomes possessed of the right to another, and does not differ from alluvian or accretion, which is but an imperceptible deposit or addition of earth, ers, floods, or other causes upon land. State v. Pottmeyer, 33 Ind. 402, 403, 5 Am. Rep. 224.

Leasehold.

The Tennessee Code provides that the word "land" shall be held to include lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and all rights thereto and interests therein, and hence a leasehold is "land" under the statute. Burr v. Graves, 72 Tenn. (4 Lea) 552, 556; Kelley v. Shultz, 59 Tenn. (12 Heisk.) 218, 219.

Mine.

See "Mine."

Under Comp. Laws, c. 83, § 5, relating to taxation, and providing that the term "land" shall not be construed to include mining claims, mines to which patents have been issued are within the definition of the word "lands," and subject to taxation. Waller v. Hughes (Ariz.) 11 Pac. 122, 123.

Minerals.

Coal and minerals in places, the title to which has been severed from the title to the surface, constitute "land," within Rev. St. c. 83, § 7, providing that whenever a person having color of title, made in good faith, to vacant and unoccupied land, shall pay all taxes legally assessed thereon for seven successive years, he shall be adjudged as the legal owner, etc. Catlin Coal Co. v. Lloyd, 52 N. E. 144, 147, 176 Ill. 275.

Petroleum oil as it is found in the crevices of the rock is a part of the realty, and embraced in the comprehensive idea which the law attaches to the word "land." South Penn. Oil Co. v. McIntire, 28 S. E. 922, 926, 44 W. Va. 296; Wilson v. Youst, 28 S. E. 781, 784, 43 W. Va. 826, 39 L. R. A. 292.

"Lands," as used in 1 Rev. St. p. 220, § 16, providing that the canal commissioners might enter on and take possession of and use all lands, streams, and waters, the appropriation of which, for the use of certain canals and works, shall in their judgment be necessary, includes the stone in the earth appropriated. Baker v. Johnson (N. Y.) 2 Hill, 342, 348.

In Rev. St. c. 51, § 14, authorizing a railroad company to take land for the location, construction, repair, and convenient use of its road, the word "land" has its comprehensive, common-law signification, including not only the face of the earth, but everything over it or under it, at least so far as necessary for the location, construction, repair, and convenient use of the railroad. State v. Railroad Com'rs, 56 Conn. 308, 15 Atl. 756; Davis v. Jefferson Gas Co., 147 Pa. 130, 23 Atl. 218. It includes marble or lime rock within the strip taken by the railroad company. Lime Rock R. Co. v. Farnsworth, 29 Atl. 957, 958, 86 Me. 127.

"Lands," as used at common law, entitling a wife to dower of all lands and tenements of which the husband died seised, "comprehends all things of a substantial nature, which includes any ground, soil, or earth whatever; and hath in its legal signification an indefinite extent upwards as well as downwards." "Therefore," says Blackstone, "if a man grants all his 'lands,' he grants thereby all his mines of metal and other fossils, his woods, his waters, and his houses, as well as his fields and meadows." Lenfers v. Henke, 73 Ill. 405, 408, 24 Am. Rep. 263.

Object extending over land.

"'Land' hath also, in its legal signification, an indefinite extent, upwards as well as downwards. * * * The word 'land' includes not only the face of the earth, but everything under it or over it." 2 Bl. Comm. p. 18. It therefore follows that one is liable in an action of ejectment for a projection of his roof over another's land. Murphy v. Bolger, 15 Atl. 365, 367, 60 Vt. 723, 1 L. R. A. 309.

Under the definition in the tax law (2 Swan & C. St. 1439) of "land" and "real property" as including all structures thereon and privileges thereto appertaining, one part thereof within the meaning of section 13, relating to transfers by the auditor, need not be beside another part. There may be distinct tenements in the same building under the same roof, one over the other. Cincinnati College v. Yeatman, 30 Ohio St. 276, 281.

Real estate to be converted into money.

A devise of real estate, to be converted into money and distributed among devisees, is a devise of money, and not a devise of "land." Nevitt v. Woodburn, 51 N. E. 593, 595, 175 Ill. 376.

Remainders.

In Ohio Code, § 421, declaring that a judgment shall be a lien on the lands and tenements of the debtor, the words "lands and tenements," though not embracing mere equities in lands or tenements, include remainders vested under legal titles, as well as legal estates in lands and tenements in possession, of the debtor. Lawrence v. Belger, 31 Ohio St. 175, 180.

By the term "land," in a deed, a remainder or reversion in land will not pass. Pond v. Bergh (N. Y.) 10 Paige, 140, 156.

Submerged land.

Under a statute making it unlawful to shoot game on the lands of another when the owner has posted notice forbidding hunting on the premises, it is held that lands covered by a navigable stream are nevertheless "lands" within the meaning of the statute. State v. Shannon, 36 Ohio St. 423, 428, 38 Am. Rep. 599.

Swamp land.

Swamp and boggy land along the outer edge of which a meandered line had been run is to be regarded as land, and not water, in determining whether certain land borders on water and is entitled to riparian rights, or borders on other lands. Niles v. Cedar Point Club, 20 Sup. Ct. 124, 126, 175 U. S. 300, 44 L. Ed. 17.

"Lands," as used in a grant of land to colonists without including the lands "overflowed by the swellings and currents of the rivers," meant tule or swamp lands. The Sutter Case, 69 U. S. (2 Wall.) 562, 585, 17 L. Ed. 881.

Tenements distinguished.

"'Land,' in its most general sense, comprehends any ground, soil, or earth whatsoever, as meadow, pastures, woods, moors, waters, marshes, furzes and heaths," while "tenements" is a word of greater meaning and extent sometimes, and includes not only land, but rents, commons, and several other rights and interests issuing out of or concerning land. Canfield v. Ford (N. Y.) 28 Barb. 336, 338.

Town lots.

"Lands," as used in Act Jan. 10, 1857, § 1, limiting to two years the right to maintain an action for the recovery of any lands, or for the possession thereof, against any person who may hold such lands by virtue of a purchase thereof at a sheriff's or auditor's sale for the nonpayment of taxes, or under an auditor's deed, should be construed to include town lots. City of Helena v. Horner, 23 S. W. 966, 58 Ark. 151.

Trees.

The word "land" is a comprehensive term, including standing trees, buildings, fences, stones, and waters, as well as the earth we stand on. Standing trees must be regarded as part and parcel of the land in which they are rooted and from which they draw their support. Kingsley v. Holbrook, 45 N. H. 313, 319, 86 Am. Dec. 173.

The word "land," in the ordinary legal sense, comprehends everything of a fixed and permanent nature, and therefore embraces growing trees. The setting fire to and destroying growing fruit trees is therefore an injury to land, and an action to recover damages for such destruction must be brought in the county in which the land is situated, under Rev. St. art. 1194, subd. 14, requiring suits for the recovery of damages to land to be brought in the county in which the land is situated. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Foster (Tex. Civ. App.) 44 S. W. 198, 199.

By the common law, trees are a part and parcel of the land upon which they are growing or standing, for the term "land" embraces not only the soil but its natural productions, and trees growing or standing upon land are not distinguishable in their character of real estate from the soil until they are actually severed from the soil. Fox v. Pearl River Lumber Co., 31 South. 583, 80 Miss. 1.

The term "land," when used without any qualification, refers not only to the soil, but to everything else which is attached to it or which constitutes a part of it, the buildings, mines, trees, growing crops, etc. Even trees which have been cut and which are lying on the land have been said to pass under a grant of the land. Gulf Red Cedar Lumber Co. v. O'Neal, 30 South. 466, 472, 131 Ala. 117, 90 Am. St. Rep. 22.

Water and water power.

The word "land" includes the water in the earth, which is the result of natural and ordinary percolation through the soil, such water being a part of the land itself. Edwards v. Haeger, 54 N. E. 176, 177, 180 Ill. 99.

"Land" includes water power, used or unused. Kimberly & Clark Co. v. Hewitt, 44 N. W. 303, 75 Wis. 371.

As the term "land" is used when speaking of land as a subject of ownership, it includes land covered with water. Hardin v. Jordan, 11 Sup. Ct. 808, 814, 140 U. S. 371, 35 L. Ed. 428 (citing Lord Coke).

By the statutes of Maine the word "land" includes all tenements and hereditaments connected therewith, and all interest therein. Hence the right of a riparian proprietor to the use of the water flowing in a natural stream is to be regarded as land; not as a mere easement or appurtenance, but inseparably connected with the soil itself. Hamor v. Bar Harbor Water Co., 3 Atl. 40, 43, 78 Me. 127.

The word "land" includes not only the soil, but everything attached to it, whether attached by the course of nature, as trees, herbage, and water, or by the hand of man, as buildings and fixtures. The diversion of water which only has a right to flow in a certain channel is in effect "taking land," within Gen. Laws Tex. 1899, p. 102, providing for the organization of irrigating ditch companies, and that they may obtain the right of way over private land by condemnation, and also within Rev. St. art. 628, § 6, authorizing canal companies to condemn any land necessary for their uses. McGee Irrigating Ditch Co. v. Hudson (Tex.) 22 S. W. 967, 968.

Priv. Laws 1851, p. 61, incorporating a certain railroad company, and granting it a right of way through the state, authorizing it to take and use any "lands," streams, and materials of every kind belonging to the state for the location of depots, construction of bridges, station grounds, etc., necessary for the maintenance and complete operation of the road, provided that nothing should be done to interrupt the navigation of such streams, cannot be construed to include lands belonging to the state covered by the waters of Lake Michigan, and hence the company has no authority to fill up and use such lands. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. City of Chicago, 50 N. E. 1104, 1107, 173 Ill. 471, 53 L. R. A. 408.

LAND AND BUILDING CORPORATION.

Corporations organized for the erection of buildings and making other improvements on real property may raise funds in shares not exceeding $200 each, payable in periodical installments. Such bodies are known as "land and building corporations," and may be organized with or without a capital stock. Civ. Code, Idaho, 1901, § 2298.

LAND CERTIFICATE.

See "Valid Land Certificate."

As personal property, see "Personal Property."

Unlocated land certificate as real estate, see "Real Property."

LAND DAMAGES.

In fixing the valuation of real estate of a railroad company within a town for purposes of taxation, the expression "land damages," as used in the report of the referee on objections to an assessment for taxation of railroad property, in which he added to the valuation what the railroad would have been obliged to pay in addition to the price of the land as land damages, is understood to mean those damages which the railroad would have been compelled to pay for depreciation of land, adjoining that actually taken by the railroad, by reason of such taking. People v. Hilts, 58 N. Y. Supp. 434, 435, 27 Misc. Rep. 290.

As used in Laws 1872, c. 882, § 8, providing that commissioners shall, as soon as practicable, ascertain and determine the costs, expenses, and land damages of certain drainage, "land damages" includes the expense of a right of way for the drain acquired by purchase from the owner. In re Lent, 62 N. Y. Supp. 227, 231, 47 App. Div. 349.

LAND DEPARTMENT.

"Land Department" is a special tribunal intrusted with the power of determining what lands are subject to grants and exceptions therein. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Barden (U. S.) 46 Fed. 592, 617.

The Land Department of the United States (including in that term the Secretary of the Interior and Commissioner of the General Land Office and their subordinate off-cers) constitutes a special tribunal, vested with judicial power to hear and determine the claims of all parties to the public lands which it is authorized to dispose of, and also the power to execute its conveyance to the parties it decides are entitled to it. United States v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. (U. S.) 67 Fed. 948, 956, 15 C. C. A. 96.

LAND DELIVERED.

A return of "land delivered" on an elegit is a legal satisfaction of the judgment, and, if the judgment be afterward revived on a scire facias against the defendant alone, this will not preclude the terre tenant from setting up such defense. Hinesly v. Hunn's Adm'r (Del.) 5 Har. 236.

LAND DISTRICT.

"Land district," as used in Rev. St. § 2334 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1435], which provides "that the Surveyor General may appoint in each land district, containing mineral lands, as many competent surveyors as shall apply for appointment to survey mining claims," means a division of the state or territory, as the case may be, created by law, in which is located a land office for the disposition of the public lands therein. United States v. Smith (U. S.) 11 Fed. 487, 491.

LAND FORCES.

Unquestionably, in a certain and general sense, the terms "army" and "land forces" do embrace militia in actual service. The militia do serve on land, and therefore, in a popular sense, are a part of the land forces; but in the Constitution and laws of the United States, the militia, though in service, and the army or land forces are quite distinct. In the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution it is declared, among other things, that Congress shall have power to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a navy, to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces, to provide for calling forth the militia, and to provide for organizing the army and disciplining the militia. If the militia employed in the service of the United States were, in the constitutional sense, a part of the "land forces," there would have been no necessity or propriety, after prescribing that Congress should have power to provide for the government of the United States forces, to also provide by a separate clause that they should have power to govern such part of the militia as might be employed in its service. Ex parte Henderson (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 1067, 1073.

LAND HELD IN FEE.

Act June 16, 1893, § 72, authorized the property of a public corporation, not essential to the purposes of the corporation, to be levied on and sold, and authorized its other property to be reached by sequestration. Act April 7, 1870, provides for sale on execution of all the property of such a corporation, "except lands held in fee," and is expressly declared to be "in addition" to the provisions of Act June 16, 1836, § 72, and "in lieu" of the proceedings by sequestration under that act. Held, that the exception as to "lands held in fee" is limited to land not only held in fee, but also not dedicated to corporate purposes, or essential to the exercise of the corporate franchises, which is still to be sold on execution under the act of 1836. A right to take natural gas from the land of another is not "land held in fee," nor are the appliances and privileges necessary to the enjoyment of the right. Greensburg Fuel Co. v. Irwin Nat. Gas Co., 29 Atl. 274, 275, 162 Pa. 78.

LANDS LET TO LEASE.

"Lands let to lease" are those conveyed only for life, years, or at will. Wright v. Hardy, 24 South. 697, 699, 76 Miss. 524.

LAND LINE.

The words "land line," as used in an instruction in an action of ejectment concerning a boundary, will be construed as synonymous with "boundary." Henderson v. Dennis, 53 N. E. 65, 66, 177 Ill. 547.

LAND-LOCKED SALMON.

For the purpose of the chapter relating to fish and fisheries, the term "land-locked salmon" means any of the species or varieties of salmon that do not periodically and habitually run to the sea, being the same locally known as "salmon trout" and "black spotted trout." Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 375, c. 40, § 32.

LAND OFFICE.

"Land Office," as used in Act Cong. May 27, 1880, c. 105, 21 Stat. 142 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1502], providing that all legal surveys returned to the Land Office before March 3, 1857, on entries made prior to a certain date, shall be valid, should be construed to mean "General Land Office." Fussell v. Gregg, 5 Sup. Ct. 631, 638, 113 U. S. 550, 28 L. Ed. 993.

LAND ON WHICH IT STANDS.

As used in a deed conveying a store building and the land on which it stands, without other description of boundaries, the phrase "land on which it stands" includes the fee of the land to the middle of the highway on the line of which the store is located. Gear v. Barnum, 37 Conn. 229, 231.

LAND POOR.

A person is land poor when he has a great deal of unproductive land and perhaps is obliged to borrow money to pay taxes, but it does not follow, because a person is land poor, that he is not responsible in a financial way. Matteson v. Blackmer, 9 N. W. 445, 446, 46 Mich. 393.

LAND PROPERTY.

When a man devises his "land property," it is as much as to say all his interest in the subject devised. Foster v. Stewart, 18 Pa. (6 Harris) 23, 24.

LAND SOLD BY CONGRESS.

Act March 3, 1845, c. 76, provided for the admission of the state of Iowa into the Union, and Act April 18, 1818, c. 67, authorized the admission of Illinois. Both acts declare that 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of land lying within the state, and afterwards "sold by Congress," shall be reserved and appropriated for certain public purposes of the state. Held, that the words "lands sold by Congress" were limited to public land lying within the state, belonging to the United States, at the time of the admission of the states into the Union, which were actually sold by Congress for a pecuniary consideration, and did not include bounty lands or lands disposed of by the United States in satisfaction of military land warrants. Iowa v. McFarland, 4 Sup. Ct. 210, 216, 110 U. S. 471, 28 L. Ed. 198.

LAND USED IN OPERATING A RAILROAD.

An exemption of "land used in operating a railroad" did not exempt land belonging to the railroad and forming a part of its depot grounds, but which was included within the inclosure of one owning adjoining lands under the mistaken belief of all that it belonged to him. Vicksburg & M. R. Co. v. Lewis, 10 South. 32, 68 Miss. 29.

LAND WARRANTS.

As certificates, see "Certificate."

LANDS OF UNITED STATES.

Under Rev. St. § 5388 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3649], which provides a punishment for every person who unlawfully cuts, etc., any timber standing upon the "lands of the United States," lands granted to the Cherokee Tribe of Indians by the treaty of May 6, 1828, and subsequent treaties, are not included. United States v. Reese (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 742, 745.

LANDS, TENEMENTS, AND HEREDITAMENTS.

In the construction of statutes the words "real estate" or "real property" shall be deemed synonymous with the phrase "lands, tenements, and hereditaments." Rev. Code Del. 1893, p. 43, c. 5, § 1, subd. 7.

The term "lands, tenements, and hereditaments" is generally construed to include all lands and interest in lands, corporeal or incorporeal, which would descend to an heir at law. Bedlow v. Stillwell, 36 N. Y. Supp. 129, 91 Hun, 384.

An assignment by an insolvent debtor of all lands, tenements, and hereditaments is sufficient to pass all the grantor's real estate, without a more particular description. Pingree v. Comstock, 35 Mass. (18 Pick.) 46, 52.

The terms "land" and "real estate," as used in the chapter relating to conveyances, shall be construed as coextensive in meaning with the terms "lands, tenements, and hereditaments," and as embracing all mining claims and other chattels real. Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 456.

"Lands, tenements, and hereditaments," as used in the act concerning conveyances (Revision, p. 155, § 14), which provides that every deed or conveyance of or for any "lands, tenements, or hereditaments" to any purchaser of the same shall be recorded, does not include leases for years, but only applies to freehold estates. Hutchinson v. Bramhall, 7 Atl. 873, 875, 42 N. J. Eq. (15 Stew.) 372.

LANDS, TENEMENTS, AND PROPERTY.

As used in Act April 10, 1867, authorizing a certain railroad company to enter upon, acquire, take, and appropriate such "lands, tenements, and property" along, adjoining, etc., to the railroad or elsewhere that they may deem necessary, etc., should be construed to exclude established roads and streets. Appeal of Pennsylvania R. Co. (Pa.) 5 Atl. 872, 875.

LANDS WHICH MAY BELONG TO HIM.

The phrase "lands which may belong to him," in a grant of a ferry right to a certain person operating a ferry across a certain river from lands that may belong to him, operates to limit the right to lands which may belong to the grantee, and cannot be extended to any lands which his heirs or assigns may subsequently acquire, although the grant is made to the original grantee, his heirs and assigns. Mills v. St. Clair County, 7 Ill. (2 Gilman) 197, 229.

LANDED.

The owner of oil, insuring it for inland transportation, took out a marine policy, which provided that the risk should continue until the goods were safely "landed," but the "rider" on the policy stated that the insurance was on oil in tank cars in transit. Held, that the word "landed" did not mean that the risk continued until the oil was removed from the cars, but the risk terminated on delivery of the oil by placing the oil on the consignee's siding at its refinery. Crew-Levick Co. v. British & Foreign Marine Ins. Co. (U. S.) 77 Fed. 858, 859.

Where an act of Parliament provided that the owners of a certain wharf should be entitled to charge for all goods which should be "landed or discharged" at such rates as are generally taken or received for any goods "loaded or discharged" on any of the wharves in the port of London, the owners had no right to claim wharfage for goods shipped off from their wharves. The Dock Co. v. La Marche, 8 Barn. & C. 42.

LANDED ESTATE.

All my landed estate, see "All."

In an act of the Legislature dated March 12, 1852, authorizing the police jury to levy a tax on landed estate to pay the amount of subscription to the stock of corporations undertaking works of internal improvement, the phrase "landed estate" embraces not only the land, but all houses, fixtures, and improvements of every kind thereon, and all machinery, neat cattle, horses, and mules, when attached to and used on a plantation or farm. The ordinary meaning of the words "landed estate" seems to be an interest in and pertaining to lands. Thus we say a "landed proprietor," and mean thereby any person having an estate in lands, whether highly improved or not. Police Jury of Parish of St. Mary v. Harris, 10 La. Ann. 676, 677.

In construing a will in which testator devised all his real and personal estate to two daughters, equally to be divided between them as tenants in fee, and containing a subsequent clause that, "notwithstanding the former devise for the benefit of my wife and daughters, I empower my executors to do all acts and execute all instruments which they may consider requisite to the partition of my 'landed estate,' and I devise the same to them as joint tenants," the court said that "the term 'landed estate,' which was used in the will, was not intended merely to be descriptive of the réalty as distinguished from the personality," and it was held that the devise to the executors gave them a legal estate in fee, and that they took such estate not only by virtue of the terms "estate" or "landed estate," employed in the will, but by necessary implication from the power given to them to sell and dispose of the property. Bradstreet v. Clarke (N. Y.) 12 Wend. 602, 662.

LANDED PROPERTY.

"Landed property," as used in the taxation act, is synonymous with "real estate." United Railways & Electric Co. v. City of Baltimore, 49 Atl. 655, 656, 93 Md. 630, 52 L. R. A. 772.

Under an act (2 Md. Assem. 1888, c. 98, § 19) annexing certain territory to a municipal corporation, and providing that until a certain year the rate of taxation on the landed property in the territory annexed should not exceed the rate in the county in which the city was situated, etc., it is held that the term "landed property" means rural property, in contradistinction to real estate located in the city, and for all practical purposes was any property before laid out in city lots. Sindall v. City of Baltimore, 49 Atl. 645, 647, 93 Md. 526.

LANDING.

See "Public Landing"; "Reserve Landing."

"Landing in the United States," as used in Act July 5, 1884, c. 220, § 11, 23 Stat. 117 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1310], making it a crime to aid in the landing in the United States from any vessel any Chinese person not lawfully entitled to enter the United States, does not refer to persons already within the United States, or to persons who arrive on a vessel from a port or place within the United States. United States v. Wilson (U. S.) 60 Fed. 890, 894.

As unloading.

Merchandise was taken from a vessel during the night in a boat and taken to the wharf. Part of the goods were unloaded on the wharf, but afterwards the whole of the merchandise was returned to the vessel. Held, that this was not a "landing," within the meaning of the act of Congress of March 2, 1799, prohibiting landing, etc., under certain circumstances. United States v. Smith (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 1246.

The act of 1807 fixes the rates of wharfage in the city of Charleston: "For 'landing' every bale or case of cotton, 4 cents per bale or case; for 'shipping' every bale or case of cotton, 4 cents per bale or case." Held, that the words "landing" and "shipping," as used in the statute, should be construed to mean that the wharf owner is entitled to 4 cents per bale only for receiving the cotton from drays, railroad cars, and other vehicles and loading it on vessels. "Landing" means taking the cotton from the ship and putting it on the land, and "shipping" means putting the cotton on board of a ship to be transported; the two operations being the exact opposite of each other. "Landing" should not be construed to be a part of "shipping," so as to entitle a wharf owner to 4 cents per bale for receiving cotton from vehicles, etc., and 4 cents additional for loading it on the ship, since such construction would make the charge for shipping 8 cents per bale instead of 4, as the act declares. The "landing" and "shipping" meant by the statute are two separate and distinct things, and not different parts of the same transaction of shipping, and the act was intended to fix the charge in case of possible importation, as well as in case of exportation. Lesesne v. Young, 12 S. E. 414, 417, 33 S. C. 543.

The act of December 22, 1839 (Cobb, Dig. 38), fixed rates for the wharfage of vessels for the "landing" of produce and goods and for the "shipping" of the same, giving to the owners or occupiers of such wharves the right to charge certain fixed rates. Under the port regulations of Savannah two vessels were allowed to lie abreast at a wharf, and, for the sake of convenience in transshipment, the cargo was not actually landed upon the wharf and then reshipped to the second vessel, but was carried directly from one to the other, it being the unvarying interpretation that such transshipment included both landing and shipping, and it was held that the wharf owner would have the right to charge the rates allowed for landing and shipping, in the absence of any contract to the contrary. The word "landing," as used among the shippers and wharfingers of the port, means taking the cargo out of a vessel, and the word "shipping," putting the cargo into a vessel, either with or without the intervention of the wharf, and where a cargo is transferred from one vessel to another, both lying abreast at the same wharf, there is both a "landing" and a "shipping." Robertson v. Wilder, 69 Ga. 340-345.

As wharf or place for unloading.

A "landing" implies a place where vessels can be moored and loaded or discharged. Waite v. O'Neill (U. S.) 76 Fed. 408, 417, 22 C. C. A. 248, 34 L. R. A. 550.

The act of 1836 dedicating land for a "public landing" should be construed to comprehend a wharf. It is undoubtedly true that a "landing" does not necessarily include a wharf, but the difference is simply that a wharf is an improved landing, and no less a landing because it is a wharf. Reighard v. Flinn, 44 Atl. 1080, 1082, 194 Pa. 352.

The term "landing" means either the bank or wharf to or from which persons or things may go from or to some vessel in the contiguous waters, or it is the yard or open place which is used for deposit and the convenient communication between the land and water. State v. Graham (S. C.) 15 Rich. Law, 310.

A "landing" is defined to be a place on a river or other navigable water, for lading and unlading goods, or for the reception and delivery of passengers. "It is either the bank or wharf to or from which persons may go from or to some vessel in the contiguous waters." Portland & W. V. R. Co. v. City of Portland, 12 Pac. 265, 269, 14 Or. 188, 58 Am. Rep. 299. A landing "is a bank or wharf to or from which persons may go from or to some vessel in the contiguous waters." City of Napa v. Howland, 25 Pac. 247, 248, 87 Cal. 84; State v. Randall (S. C.) 1 Strob. 110, 111, 47 Am. Dec. 548.

An indictment for obstructing a "public landing" is not sustained by proof that a public road leading to the landing was obstructed by the defendant at a place within 100 yards of the landing. State v. Graham (S. C.) 15 Rich. Law, 310.

Act Feb. 17, 1871, provides that in all proceedings, etc., to procure the right to construct lateral railroads or for the acquisition of wharves or landings, the appeal to the courts from the report of the viewers shall extend to the necessity of the proposed railroad, wharf, or landing. Held, that the word "landing" as used in the statute means a wharfage place for crafts, not a harbor for them, whether laden or empty. Hays v. Briggs, 74 Pa. (24 P. F. Smith) 373, 375.

LANDING NET.

A "landing net" is a kind of scoop net used to bring to land or hand a fish which has been caught. Its use is not to catch fish separately as they are caught in drift nets and seines, but its use is to land the fish when caught. A fish is caught when hooked, and a landing net is not necessarily a part of the act of catching, but simply a convenient means of obtaining physical possession. It is useless as a separate appliance for catching fish, and is in no sense a complete appliance for so doing, and the use of it after a fish is caught with a hook is not a violation of Act May 22, 1899, prohibiting the catching of fish with a net. Commonwealth v. Wetherill, 8 Pa. Dist. R. 653, 655.

LANDLORD.

The person letting the land is called the "landlord," and the party to whom the lease is made is called the "tenant." Becker v. Becker, 43 N. Y. Supp. 17, 22, 13 App. Div. 342; Jackson v. Harsen (N. Y.) 7 Cow. 323, 328, 17 Am. Dec. 517.

A "landlord," who may appear in an action of ejectment and defend the cause in the name of the tenant or in his own name, means one whose title is connected to and consistent with the possession of the occupant. Williams v. Brunton, 8 Ill. (3 Gilman) 600, 620; State v. Call, 22 South. 266, 268, 39 Fla. 504 (citing Troublesome v. Estill, 4 Ky. [1 Bibb] 128; Layton v. Ten, 13 N. J. Law [1 J. S. Green] 66; Fair-Claim v. Sham-Title, 3 Burrows, 1290; Roe v. Doe, Barnes, 193; Sherry v. State Bank [Ind.] 8 Blackf. 542; Newell, Eject. p. 225, § 8).

"Landlord," as used in 1 Rev. St. 505, § 33, providing that whenever any half year's rent or more shall be in arrear from any tenant to his landlord, and no sufficient distress can be found to satisfy the rent due, the landlord may bring an action of ejectment for the recovery of the possession of the demised premises, does not mean a person holding the whole interest, instead of a person claiming a part of the whole interest in the lease. It is not unreasonable to say that by descent each heir becomes the landlord of the portion of the estate which descends to him, and thus comes within the words of the statute. Cruger v. McLaury, 41 N. Y. 219, 224.

Lessor's grantee.

"Landlord," as used in Civ. Proc. § 2231, subdiv. 1, providing that a tenant may be removed for holding over without the landlord's permission, is not restricted to designate the lessor only, but includes the grantee of the latter's estate. Lang v. Everling, 23 N. Y. Supp. 329, 332, 3 Misc. Rep. 530.

As occupant of land.

See "Occupant—Occupier."

Owner not equivalent.

An allegation, in a petition in summary proceedings to obtain the possession of real estate, that the petitioner is the "landlord" of the defendant, is not equivalent to an allegation that plaintiff is the owner, and therefore is not in compliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 2235, requiring the petition to state the interest of the petitioner. "It is not a statement that the petitioner is the owner of the premises so far as the term 'landlord' may be taken as synonymous with 'owner,' but is a mere allegation of the relations of the parties, without setting forth a description of the petitioner's interest in the premises involved in the proceedings." Engel, Heller Co. v. Henry Elias Brewing Co., 75 N. Y. Supp. 1080, 1082, 37 Misc. Rep. 480.

Innkeeper not equivalent.

An allegation that plaintiff is a "landlord, proprietor of the M. House," in a suit to enforce an alleged lien on baggage, etc., of a guest, is not sufficient as an allegation that plaintiff is a tavern keeper. Southwood v. Myers, 66 Ky. (3 Bush) 681, 685.

LANDOWNER.

A township which, under Rev. St. 1896, § 5630, is subject to an assessment for a public drain, payable from the township fund, is a "landowner" within the meaning of the provision that petitions shall be dismissed on representation of two-thirds of the landowners. Zumbro v. Parnin, 40 N. E. 1085, 1087, 141 Ind. 430.

LANE.

The term "lane" is not a legal term. It signifies simply a narrow way, which may be either public or private, and is oftener, perhaps, private than public. The description of a proposed highway, in proceedings for its establishment, as starting from the easterly side of a certain "lane," is sufficiently definite, though the lane be private property. Hunter v. City of Newport, 5 R. I. 325, 331.

Where a statute imposed a penalty on any person who should smoke or have in his possession any lighted pipe or cigar, in any street, "lane," or passage way, it was held that the terms street, lane, or passage way include any way which was actually open and used for the ordinary purposes of an open way. Commonwealth v. Thompson, 53 Mass. (12 Metc.) 231, 232.

As a public highway.

A lane is not necessarily a public highway, and therefore a showing that a heifer was killed at a place where a "lane" crossed a railroad does not show that it was killed at a highway crossing. Indianapolis & C. R. Co. v. McClure, 26 Ind. 370, 375, 89 Am. Dec. 467.

The term "lane," as used in St. 1803, c. 11, annexing South Boston to Boston, and providing that the selectmen of Boston were authorized to lay out such streets and lanes as in their judgment would be for the common benefit of the proprietors of the land and of the town of Boston, etc.; should be construed as synonymous with "public ways" or "highways." Commonwealth v. City of Boston, 33 Mass. (16 Pick.) 442, 445.

"Lanes," as used in a statute giving a gas company the right or privilege to dig up public streets and lanes for the purpose of laying down their mains and pipes, does not signify the land of individuals over which there is only a private right of way, but, construed with reference to the maxim noscitur a sociis, must be held to mean only such ways as the public have acquired a right to use. The right which the company has is only to use land, the whole beneficial use of which has been previously taken from the owner and appropriated for a public use. Commonwealth v. Lowell Gaslight Co., 94 Mass. (12 Allen) 75, 76.

LANGUAGE.

Language "is the conveyance in which thoughts and ideas are transmitted from one to another. The multiplicity of thoughts and complexity of ideas necessitate either a startling increase in the coinage of words, or the giving to existing words many meanings, such as primary or secondary, general or specified, popular or technical." Cavan v. City of Brooklyn, 5 N. Y. Supp. 758, 759.

The word "language" is broad enough to include words written as well as words spoken. Stevenson v. State, 16 S. E. 95, 96, 90 Ga. 456.

The word "language," in Pen. Code, § 103, declaring that opprobrious words or abusive language may or may not, as shall be determined by the jury, amount to the justification of an assault or of an assault and battery, does not include grimaces or facial expressions of contempt, made in the presence of accused, to hold him up to contempt and ridicule. Behling v. State, 86 S. E. 85, 110 Ga. 754.

LANZAS.

In Trevino v. Fernandez et al., 13 Tex. 630, 660, "lanzas" is defined to consist of a certain service in money which the nobles and grandees pay each year.

LAPPAGE.

Within the rule that color of title only extends to the boundaries marked by the color,—the deed,—and can extend no further, though they may be circumscribed, as they will not even cross another line unless there is actual possession across that line, or "lappage" as it is called. Johnston v. Case, 42 S. E. 957, 958, 131 N. C. 491.

LAPSE.

In an action to recover possession of a mining claim, a finding that the claim of one of the parties had "lapsed" did not amount to a finding that such claim was forfeited, as the term "lapsed" is unknown to mining usage or laws. Contreras v. Merck, 63 Pac. 336, 337, 131 Cal. 211.

"Lapse," as used in 3 Litt. & S. St. Law, 400, providing that legacies and devises to children and grandchildren shall not lapse by the dying of the legatee or devisee before the testator, provided such legatee or devisee shall have children living at the death of the testator, who would take as heirs by descent or as distributee of the legatee or devisee, "is not to be restricted in its construction to cases where legacies or devises technically fall back into the estate, but applies to all cases where it would have fallen back or gone to others under the will." Yeats v. Gill, 48 Ky. (9 B. Mon.) 203, 206.

"Lapse," as used in a will in which the testatrix devised certain property to her niece M., and provided that, "should she not survive me or should she die leaving no heirs of her body, then in either such case this bequest and devise is to lapse and go to my residuary legatees hereinafter named, and it is so to lapse if she fails to have issue of her body, whether she should or should not survive me," is not used in its technical sense of "nonvest," but is employed in a sense broad enough to designate either the falling in of the estate in the event that the testatrix's niece should not survive her, or the falling in of such estate on the happening of the limitation or condition subsequent; that is, the death of the niece without issue living. Hence, M.'s estate vested immediately on the death of the testatrix. Van Pretres v. Cole, 73 Mo. 39, 45.

LAPSED DEVISE.

There is a distinction between a "lapse" and a "void" devise. In the former case the devisee dies in the intermediate time between the making of the will and the death of the testator, but in the latter case the devise is void from the beginning, as if the devisee be dead when the will was made. Murphy v. McKeon, 32 Atl. 374, 53 N. J. Eq. (8 Dick.) 406.

LAPSED LEGACY.

A "lapsed legacy" is one which has never vested or taken effect. It has been defined as one which, originally valid, afterwards falls because the capacity or willingness of the donee to take has ceased to exist before he obtained a vested interest in the gift. Booth v. Baptist Church, 28 N. E. 238, 241, 126 N. Y. 215.

A "lapsed legacy" is a legacy which fails by reason of the death of the legatee before the death of the testator, where no other words are found in the will to prevent such a lapse. It presupposes the existence of such legacy and of a legatee. A gift to a person deceased prior to the execution of the will is not a legacy, but is void because there is no one in existence to take, and in such a case as that there can be no lapsed legacy. Meeker v. Meeker (N. Y.) 4 Redf. Sur. 29, 30.

Every legacy is said to "lapse" that fails by reason of the death of the legatee in the life of the testator. Brown, Law Dict. "Lapse," 304. The disposition made by the law, in the absence of any statutory provision, is not material. It went to the residuary legatees or devisees, if there were such, and if not it went to the heir, or, where the failure occurred in a devise to a class by the death of one of the members, it went to the survivors. But whether it went to residuary legatees, or to the heir, or to the survivors of a class, it did not affect the essential character of the extinguished gift. It was, properly speaking, a lapsed legacy or devise in either case. Woolley v. Paxson, 24 N. E. 599, 601, 46 Ohio St. 307.

In some places a distinction has been taken between "lapsed devises" and "lapsed legacies." A lapsed legacy is in law the same as no legacy, for residuary purposes. Mann v. Hyde, 39 N. W. 78, 80, 71 Mich. 278.

LARCENOUS INTENT.

A "larcenous intent" exists where a man knowingly takes and carries away the goods of another without any claim or pretense of right, with intent wholly to deprive the owner of them or convert them to his own use. Wilson v. State, 18 Tex. App. 270, 274, 51 Am. Rep. 309.

LARCENY.

See "Grand Larceny"; "Mixed Larceny"; "Petit Larceny"; "Simple Larceny"; "Single Larceny."

Key as subject of, see "Key."

Marten as subject of, see "Marten."

"Larceny" is derived from the Norman-French "larcyn," and signifies a felonious, wrongful, and fraudulent taking and carrying away by any person of the personal goods of another, with the felonious intent to convert them to his own use and make them his own property without the consent of the owner. Under the common law, to make a thing "larceny" it must have been felonious. A wrongful taking of another's property did not necessarily constitute larceny. By larceny was meant an intentional taking, a taking without claim of right, a taking in knowing disregard of the rights of the owner, a taking with the intent of stealing. State v. Rechnitz, 52 Pac. 264, 265, 20 Mont. 488.

"Larceny," by the common law, is the felonious or fraudulent taking and carrying away by any man or woman of the mere personal goods of another, neither from the person nor by night, from the house of the owner. State v. South, 28 N. J. Law (4 Dutch.) 28, 31, 74 Am. Dec. 250 (quoting 3 Co. Inst. 107, c. 47); State v. Hawkins (Ala.) 8 Port. 461, 463, 33 Am. Dec. 294; State v. Chambers, 22 W. Va. 779, 786, 46 Am. Dec. 550. A definition conformable to this is also given in Hammon's Case, 2 Leach, 1089, describing larceny as a "felonious taking of the property of another." United States v. Moulton (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 11, 12.

Blackstone, in his Commentaries, defines "larceny" as the felonious taking and carrying away of the goods of another. Book 4, p. 230. Bishop, in his Criminal Law, defines "larceny" to be the taking or removing by trespass of personal property which the trespasser knows to belong either generally or specially to another, with intent to deprive such owner of his ownership therein, and, perhaps it should be added, for the sake of some advantage to the trespasser. Wharton defines it to be the taking and carrying away of a thing unlawfully, without claim of right, with intention of converting it to a use other than that of the owner. Whart. Cr. Law, § 862. Hawkins (P. C. c. 33, § 1) says simple grand larceny is the felonious and fraudulent taking and carrying away by any person of the mere personal goods of another, not from the person nor out of the house, above the value of 12 pence. State v. Chambers, 22 W. Va. 779, 786, 46 Am. Rep. 550.

Archbold defines "larceny" thus: "When a man knowingly takes and carries away the goods of another without any claim or pretense of right, with intent wholly to deprive the owner of them and to appropriate or convert them to his own use." State v. South, 28 N. J. Law (4 Dutch.) 28, 29 (citing Archb. Cr. Law, 119); State v. Chambers, 22 W. Va. 779, 786, 46 Am. Rep. 550; State v. Hawkins (Ala.) 8 Port. 461, 463, 33 Am. Dec. 294.

"Larceny" is defined to be the wrongful or fraudulent taking and carrying away by any person of the mere personal goods of another from any place, with a felonious intent to convert them to his, the taker's, use, and make them his property without the consent of the owner. State v. South, 28 N. J. Law (4 Dutch.) 28, 29, 74 Am. Dec. 250 (cited and approved in 3 Chit. Cr. Law, 679; 2 East, P. C. c. 16, § 2; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 467; 2 Russ. Crimes [4th Ed.] 93; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 150); State v. Fitzpatrick (Del.) 32 Atl. 1072, 1073, 9 Houst. 385; Gardner v. State, 26 Atl. 30, 33, 55 N. J. Law (26 Vroom) 17; People v. Nichols (N. Y.) 3 Parker, Cr. R. 579, 581; Tamplin v. Addy (N. Y.) 8 Cow. 239, 241, note; In re Gannett, 39 Pac. 496, 497, 11 Utah, 283; Fetkenhauer v. State, 88 N. W. 294, 296, 112 Wis. 491; State v. Chambers, 22 W. Va. 779, 786, 46 Am. Rep. 550.

Larceny is the felonious stealing, taking, and carrying away the personal property of another. State v. Parry, 21 South. 30, 31, 48 La. Ann. 1483. See, also, Keeton v. State, 66 S. W. 645, 70 Ark. 163; State v. Parker, 34 Ark. 158, 160, 36 Am. Rep. 5; Commonwealth v. James, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 375, 383; State v. Brown, 68 Tenn. (9 Baxt.) 53, 54, 40 Am. Rep. 81; Bailey v. State, 18 Tex. App. 426, 431; Edmonds v. State, 70 Ala. 8, 9, 45 Am. Rep. 67; People v. Nichols (N. Y.) 3 Parker Cr. R. 579, 581; Barnhart v. State, 154 Ind. 177, 178, 56 N. E. 212, 213.

Larceny was an offense at the common law, and includes the felonious taking of any personal property. It is a crime malum in se. In re Gannett, 39 Pac. 496, 497, 11 Utah, 283.

Larceny consists of the unlawful taking of the personal property of another with the felonious intent to deprive the owner of it. People v. Johnson, 45 N. W. 1119, 1120, 81 Mich. 573.

Larceny is the felonious taking and carrying away of the goods of another, with the intent to convert them to the use of the taker without the consent of the owner. State v. Pullen (Del.) 50 Atl. 538, 539, 3 Pennewill, 184; State v. Conlan (Del.) 50 Atl. 95, 3 Pennewill, 218; State v. Butler (Del.) 43 Atl. 480, 2 Pennewill, 127; United States v. Otey (U. S.) 31 Fed. 68, 70; State v. Patton (Del.) 41 Atl. 193, 194, 1 Marv. 552.

Larceny is the felonious stealing, taking and carrying, riding or driving away, the personal property of another. Haywood v. State, 41 Ark. 479, 482, 484, 485.

Larceny is the wrongful and unlawful taking and carrying or leading away of a thing, with felonious intent, without claim of right, and without the owner's consent, with intention of permanently converting it to a use other than that of the owner. Philamalee v. State, 78 N. W. 625, 626, 58 Neb. 320.

A person who, with intent to deprive or defraud the true owner of property, or of the use and benefit thereof, or to appropriate the same to the use of the taker or of any other person, either takes from the possession of the true owner, or secretes, withholds, or appropriates to his own use, or that of any other person, other than the true owner, any money, personal property, etc., is guilty of larceny. People v. Bosworth, 19 N. Y. Supp. 114, 117, 64 Hun, 72.

The definition of "larceny" as "the felonious taking and carrying away of the personal goods of another" is defective in omitting the word "stealing," which, as applied to larceny, is a technical word, and absolutely essential to a proper definition of the crime. Hix v. People, 41 N. E. 862, 863, 157 Ill. 382.

The word "larceny," as used in a bond insuring a firm against any pecuniary loss from the fraudulent or dishonest acts of its agents amounting to larceny, means larceny as defined in the criminal law, and therefore, unless larceny is proven against the agent, the sureties on the bond are not liable for his acts. Reed v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 42 Atl. 294, 189 Pa. 596.

Simple larceny is the felonious taking and carrying away of the personal goods of another. Commonwealth v. Prewitt, 6 Ky. Law Rep. 195, 82 Ky. 240; State v. Berryman, 8 Nev. 262, 270.

Larceny is the felonious taking and carrying away of the property of another with intent to convert it to the carrier's own use and deprive the owner of his use thereof. State v. Patton (Del.) 1 Marv. 552, 553, 41 Atl. 193.

To constitute the offense of larceny in any form, there must be a taking from the possession, a carrying away against the will of the owner, and a felonious intent to convert it to the offender's use. State v. Rutherford, 53 S. W. 417, 419, 152 Mo. 124.

Larceny is the wrongful or fraudulent taking and carrying away by any person of the mere personal goods of another, with a felonious intent to convert them to the taker's own use, and make them his own property, without the consent of the owner. State v. Waghalter, 76 S. W. 1028, 1031, 177 Mo. 676.

"Larceny" is usually defined as the felonious and fraudulent taking and carrying away by any person of the goods of another. United States v. Moulton (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 11, 14.

It is an essential element of the crime of larceny that the property of the owner has been wrongfully taken and carried away, or that the person accused of the larceny has knowingly abetted, aided, encouraged, and advised such wrongful taking before the actual theft of the property or at the time thereof. Watts v. People, 68 N. E. 563, 565, 204 Ill. 223.

Statutory definitions.

"Larceny" is defined by the statute to be the felonious stealing, taking, carrying, leading, or driving away the personal property of another. State v. McKee, 53 Pac. 733, 734, 17 Utah, 370.

To constitute larceny under Gen. St. 1878, c. 117, § 5, making conversion or embezzlement by the trustee, etc., larceny, it is necessary (1) that the person was acting as a trustee, etc.; (2) that the money or property alleged to have been stolen was in his possession by virtue of such office or appointment; (3) that he secreted or withheld it, or appropriated it to his own use or to that of a person other than the true owner entitled to it. State v. Farrington, 59 Minn. 147, 149, 150, 60 N. W. 1088, 28 L. R. A. 395.

"Larceny" is defined by Pen. Code, § 580, as the taking of personal property, accomplished by fraud or stealth, and with intent to deprive the owner thereof. Territory v. Anderson, 50 N. W. 124, 6 Dak. 300.

"Larceny," as defined by Pen. Code, § 528, embraces every act which was larceny at common law, and some others which were formerly indictable as false pretenses or embezzlement. People v. Walker, 83 N. Y. Supp. 372, 374, 85 App. Div. 556.

Under the statutes a person who, with intent to deprive or defraud the true owner of his property, obtains possession of it from the true owner by color or aid of fraudulent or false representations or pretense, or of any false token or writing, is guilty of larceny. State v. Southall, 77 Minn. 296, 298, 79 N. W. 1007.

"Larceny" is defined by Pen. Code, § 528, as follows: "A person who with intent to deprive or defraud the true owner of his property, or of the use and benefit thereof, or to appropriate the same to the use of the taker, or of any other person either takes from the possession of the true owner or secretes, withholds or appropriates to his own use, or that of any person other than the true owner any money or personal property is guilty of larceny." People v. Bosworth, 19 N. Y. Supp. 114, 117, 64 Hun. 72; People v. Smith, 33 N. Y. Supp. 989, 991, 86 Hun. 485.

"Larceny" is defined by statute in North Dakota as the taking of personal property, accomplished by fraud or stealth, with intent to deprive another thereof. State v. Tough (N. D.) 96 N. W. 1025, 1028.

"Larceny" is defined by statute in Massachusetts as a criminal taking, obtaining, or converting the personal property, with intent to defraud or deprive the owner permanently of the use of it; including all forms of larceny, criminal embezzlement, and obtaining by criminal false pretenses. Commonwealth v. Kelley, 68 N. E. 346, 347, 184 Mass. 320.

"Larceny" is defined by the Pen. Code, § 484, as the felonious stealing, taking, carrying, leading, or driving away the personal property of another. People v. Lopez, 27 Pac. 427, 90 Cal. 569; People v. Smith, 44 Pac. 663, 665, 112 Cal. 333; People v. Davis, 31 Pac. 1109, 97 Cal. 194. See, also, 1 Starr & C. Ann. 8t p. 800; Hix v. People, 41 N. E. 862, 863, 157 Ill. 382. It is held that under this definition the indictment or information need not allege the taking to be against the will of the owner. People v. Davis, 31 Pac. 1109, 97 Cal. 194; People v. Ammerman, 50 Pac. 15, 118 Cal. 23; People v. Jones, 53 Cal. 58, 59; People v. De Coursey, 61 Cal. 134, 135; People v. Nelson, 56 Cal. 77, 80. Under this definition it is held that a charge stating that grand larceny is the stealing, taking, or carrying away of the property of another is incorrect for failure to incorporate the word "feloniously." People v. Cheong Foon Ark, 61 Cal. 527, 528.

Blackstone defines "larceny" to be the "felonious taking and carrying away the goods of another." 4 Bl. Comm. 230. This taking and carrying away, he says, must also be felonious; that is, done animus furandi; or, as the civil law expresses it, lucri causa. It is thus defined by Lord Coke in his Institutes, and by Hawkins in his Pleas of the Crown. 1 Hawk. P. C. 93. This definition has been objected to as not being sufficiently certain, the word "felonious" itself requiring a definition; and Archbold submits the following: "Larceny, as far as respects the intent with which it is committed (and the intent here is a material part of the offense), may perhaps be correctly defined thus: Where a man knowingly takes and carries away the goods of another, without any claim or pretense of right, with intent wholly to deprive the owner of them, and to appropriate or convert them to his own use." And Chief Justice Eyre, in Pears' Case, defined the offense thus: "The wrongful taking of goods, with intent to spoil the owner of them, lucri causa." It is apparent from the definition, and is so expressly laid down in the books, that the criminal intention constitutes the offense, and is the only criterion by which to distinguish a larceny from a trespass. According to this definition, to constitute the offense, it is not sufficient that the goods be taken for the purpose of destruction, as, if one should take the horse of another, for the purpose of destroying him, to injure his neighbor, and should destroy him, such an offense would be punishable as malicious mischief, but it would want one of the essential ingredients of larceny, the lucri causa—the intention to profit by the act—by the conversion of the property. State v. Hawkins (Ala.) 8 Port. 461, 463, 33 Am. Dec. 294.

Eyre, C. B., says: "Larceny is the wrongful taking of the goods, with the intent to spoil the owner of them, lucri causa." Blackstone says the taking must be felonious; that is, done animus furandi, or, as the civil law expresses it, lucri causa. The point arrived at by these two expressions, "animus furandi" and "lucri causa," the meaning of which has been much discussed, seems to be this: that the goods must be taken into possession of the thief with the intention of depriving the owner of his property in them. State v. Slingerland, 7 Pac. 280, 282, 19 Nev. 135 (citing Roscoe, Cr. Ev. p. 621); State v. Hawkins [Ala.] 8 Port. 461, 463, 33 Am. Dec. 294. A taking and carrying away without the felonious intent would not be larceny. Keeton v. State, 66 S. W. 645, 70 Ark. 163.

Larceny is the felonious taking and carrying away of the personal goods of another. To be felonious, the taking must necessarily be willful. Haul v. State, 75 Tenn. (7 Lea) 685, 686.

To constitute larceny, there must be a taking and a carrying away of personal property with intent to steal it. Such intent in all cases at common law renders the taking and carrying away felonious, and taking without carrying away is not larceny. For this reason it has always been held necessary that an indictment for larceny should allege both these facts. Commonwealth v. Adams, 73 Mass. (7 Gray) 43, 44.

Larceny is the unlawful taking and carrying away by any person of the personal goods of another from any place, with a felonious intent to convert them to the taker's own use without the consent of the owner. The felonious intent is the peculiar and distinctive element of this wrongful taking of the goods of another, and is the gist of the offense. State v. Hollingsworth (Del.) 41 Atl. 143, 1 Marv. 528.

Larceny is the felonious taking and carrying away of the personal goods of another with the intent to deprive the owner permanently of his property. The taking must be with a felonious intent, otherwise there is no larceny. If one should take the property of another believing that it was with the latter's consent, there could be no larceny, because no criminal intent. Mead v. State, 25 Neb. 444, 445, 41 N. W. 277.

The felonious and fraudulent taking of property with intent to deprive the owner thereof is larceny, even if the defendant did not intend to convert the same to his own use. People v. Jaurez, 28 Cal. 380, 381.

To constitute the crime of larceny, a felonious intention is, as a general rule, an indispensable ingredient. This intent must be either to appropriate the property to the use and benefit of the taker, or to wholly and permanently deprive the owner of it. And taking property with the intent to conceal it, for the purpose of inducing the owner to offer a reward for its return and to obtain the reward, is sufficient to constitute the crime. A delivery of property on condition of immediate payment does not transfer the right of possession to such property unless condition is performed, and if the receiver wrongfully retains it without making payment, and with felonious intent, he is guilty of larceny. Currier v. State, 60 N. E. 1023, 1024, 157 Ind. 114.

In a prosecution for larceny, the act of the prisoner, the mere taking, does not constitute the offense, but the act coupled with the intent to steal. State v. Welch, 21 Minn. 26. In larceny the crime does not consist in the wrongful taking of the property, for that might be a mere trespass, but it consists in the wrongful taking with felonious intent; and if the defendant, for any reason whatever, indulged no such intent, the crime has not been committed, so that evidence of defendant's intoxication as bearing on the question of intent is admissible. State v. Koerner, 78 N. W. 981, 983, 8 N. D. 292, 73 Am. St. Rep. 752.

The taking of a bird cage of inconsiderable value, with no motive of gain, but rather in a spirit of wanton mischief, for the purpose of retaliation and without an intention of converting the property to the use of the taker, does not constitute a larceny. In re Crocheron (N. Y.) 1 City H. Rec. 177.

An intention to obtain money under a fraudulent and false pretense, meaning at the time to appropriate the money under this pretense, is evidence from which the jury may infer the animus furandi necessary to constitute larceny, but it is not the animus furandi itself. There may be a fraudulent intent to obtain money which is not a felonious intent. So there may be a taking of money by a man with intention to obtain it under a fraudulent and false pretense, and to appropriate it to himself under that pretense, which might not be a felonious taking. An instruction in such a case in larceny without finding the felonious intent or the intent to steal is not perfectly correct in law. Weston v. United States (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 823, 824.

To constitute the crime of larceny, there must be evidence of a felonious intent in the taking. Something more than the mere act of taking is necessary to be shown before the jury can proceed to inquire into the intent. There must be evidence to show that the taking was done under circumstances inconsistent with an honest purpose, such as in doing clandestinely, or, when charged with, denying the fact, or secretly or forcibly or by artifice, and that there was original felonious intent, general or special, at the time of taking. State v. Foy, 42 S. E. 934, 935, 131 N. C. 804.

The crime of larceny cannot be perpetrated without a criminal intent—animus furandi, or intent to steal. Where one, therefore, takes the property of another, honestly believing that he has a legal right to it, or, in other words, under a bona fide claim of right, there can be no larceny, although the taking may constitute an inexcusable trespass. It is not sufficient, however, for the taker to have a mere impression that he has a claim of right to the property, in order to exempt him from the charge of larceny in the taking of it. This might amount to a vague notion, unaccompanied with honesty of conviction. Morrisette v. State, 77 Ala. 71, 74.

To constitute the offense of larceny, it is absolutely necessary that the taking of the goods be with a felonious intent. Hence one who drives away and sells stock of another, thinking it his own, is not guilty of larceny, because of the absence of felonious intent. People v. Devine, 30 Pac. 378, 379, 95 Cal. 227.

One tenant in common of an outstanding crop cannot be guilty of larceny of any part or the whole of the crop thus held in common, and parties cannot be guilty of larceny of property, the ownership or title of which they honestly believe to be in themselves. Bonham v. State, 65 Ala. 456, 457.

It is apparent from the definitions, and is so expressly laid down in the books, that the criminal intention constitutes the offense, and is the only criterion by which to distinguish a larceny from a trespass. According to this definition, to constitute the offense, it is not sufficient that the goods be taken for the purpose of destruction, as, if one should take the horse of another for the purpose of destroying him, to injure his neighbor, and should destroy him, such an offense would be punishable as malicious mischief, but it would want one of the essential ingredients of larceny—the lucri causa,—the intention to profit by the act—by the conversion of the property. State v. Hawkins (Ala.) 8 Port. 461, 463, 33 Am. Dec. 294.

Larceny is the felonious taking and carrying away the personal goods of another. The taking must be lucri causa, and done without the least color of right or excuse for the act, with the intent to deprive the owner not temporarily, but permanently, of the property. Fields v. State, 46 Tenn. (6 Cold.) 524, 526.

After citing all of the numerous well-known definitions of "larceny," the court concludes that larceny may be safely defined as follows: "The wrongful taking possession of the goods of another with intent to deprive the owner of his property in them," observing that it is not necessary to add to this definition the words "without any claim or right by the taker," as that is excluded by the latter branch of the definition relating to the intent; nor is it necessary to say that the taking must be against the will of the owner, as that is included in the word "wrongful." State v. Moore, 14 S. W. 182, 183, 184, 101 Mo. 316.

"Larceny" is defined in St. 1893, § 2371, as the taking of personal property, accomplished by fraud or stealth, and with intent to deprive another thereof. The gist of the crime is clearly the intent to deprive another of the property described in the indictment. Stell v. Territory, 71 Pac. 653, 654, 12 Okl. 377.

The word "larceny," as used in the statute relative to the unlawful branding and marking of live stock, is used in its ordinary sense, so as to include a criminal intent. Bradley v. People, 9 Pac. 783, 784, 8 Colo. 599.

Larceny implies a taking with felonious intent, and where that intent is impossible the crime is impossible. People v. Cummins, 11 N. W. 184, 186, 47 Mich. 334.

St. 1893, § 2371, defines "larceny" as the taking of personal property, accomplished by fraud or stealth, and with intent to deprive the owner thereof. To constitute larceny under this statute, it is not necessary that the taking should be with the purpose to convert the thing stolen to the pecuniary advantage or gain of the taker, but it is sufficient if the taking be fraudulent or by stealth, and with the intent to wholly deprive the owner of the property. The intent must be felonious, and must be to deprive the owner not temporarily, but permanently, of the property, and need not be lucri causa. A taking of personal property with the intent to deprive the owner of it temporarily and return the same to him is not larceny, but is trespass; it is not a felony, but a misdemeanor. Mitchell v. Territory, 54 Pac. 782, 784, 7 Okl. 527.

To constitute larceny, there must be a felonious intent, which means to deprive the owner temporarily or permanently of his own property without color of right or excuse therefor, and to convert it to the taker's use without the consent of the owner; and where one hires a team and buggy of another, pretending that he wants them to drive to a certain place and to be gone a specified time, when in fact he merely intends to take them for a ride to another or more distant place and then leave them for the owner to get again, with no intention to permanently use the team or to deprive the owner of them entirely, the intent necessary to constitute the crime does not exist. In re Mutchler, 40 Pac. 283, 284, 55 Kan. 164.

The gist of common-law larceny is the felonious taking of what is another's, with the simultaneous intent in the taker of misappropriating it. State v. Rigall, 70 S. W. 150, 151, 169 Mo. 659.

To constitute the offense of larceny in any form, there must be a taking from the possession, a carrying away against the will of the owner. East, in his Pleas of the Crown, defines "larceny" to be the wrongful or fraudulent taking or carrying away by any person of the personal goods of another from any place, with a felonious intent to convert them to his own use and make them his property, without the consent of the owner. The taking must be done animo furandi, or, as civilians express it, lucri causa. The felonious intent is the material ingredient of the offense. State v. Waller, 74 S. W. 842, 843, 174 Mo. 518 (citing Witt v. State, 9 Mo. 671).

To constitute larceny, it must be shown that the property was taken and carried away with the specific felonious intent to steal it. State v. Kavanaugh (Del.) 53 Atl. 335.

An instruction that larceny is the taking and carrying or leading away the personal property of another without his consent and against his will, with intent to appropriate the same to the use of the taker, is held erroneous because omitting to charge that the taking must be with a felonious intent. Thompson v. People, 4 Neb. 524, 528.

Larceny is committed whenever a person wrongfully takes and carries away the personal goods of another without any pretense of right, with a felonious intent to deprive the owner of them or to appropriate them to the taker's use. It is essential that there should exist at the time of the taking a felonious intent to deprive the owner of his property against his will. Robinson v. State, 113 Ind. 510, 512, 16 N. E. 184.

To constitute larceny, there must have been a felonious intent animo furandi. The malicious killing of a horse is a misdemeanor under the Penal Code. These two offenses are distinct; in either case there is a trespass, but in larceny the taking must be for the purpose of converting to the use of the taker, while in malicious mischief no such intent is necessary. People v. Woodward (N. Y.) 31 Hun, 57, 60.

Same—At time of taking.

To constitute the crime of larceny, there must be a simultaneous combination of an unlawful taking and asportation and an intent to steal, and where a person received an overpayment by mutual mistake, and after discovering it feloniously converted it, there was no larceny. Cooper v. Commonwealth, 60 S. W. 938, 939, 110 Ky. 123, 52 L. R. A. 136, 96 Am. St. Rep. 426.

In order to convict of larceny, the jury must be satisfied that the taking of the property by the accused was with felonious intent. It is not sufficient to find that after the taking it was converted to the use of the defendant with a felonious intent, but it is necessary to find that the felonious intent existed at the time of the taking. People v. Miller, 11 Pac. 514, 4 Utah, 410.

The Supreme Court in Kentucky has held, in the case of Elliott v. Commonwealth, 75 Ky. (12 Bush) 176, that: "The material ingredients to constitute the crime of larceny are that the goods must be taken animo furandi and against the will of the owner of them. Hence, in a class of cases when it appears that the goods were taken by the delivery or consent of the owner or of some one having authority to deliver them, and they are converted by the party to whom they are delivered, it is often a very difficult question to determine the nature of the offense;" and when property comes lawfully into the possession of a person, either as agent, bailee, part owner, or otherwise, a subsequent appropriation of it is not larceny, unless the intent to appropriate it existed in the mind of the taker at the time it came into his possession. Smith v. Commonwealth, 27 S. W. 852, 96 Ky. 85, 49 Am. St. Rep. 287.

An intent to steal, existing at the time of obtaining the property, is an essential element of the crime of "larceny," both at common law and as defined by Wagner's St. p. 456, § 25, but not of the crime of larceny by a bailee by section 37. Hence, where defendant had borrowed a wagon and horses from the owners, and was making away with them and attempting to convert them to his own use when he was arrested, he cannot be convicted on an indictment in the ordinary form for grand larceny without proof that he obtained the property with the intent of stealing them, and it did not matter that upon the evidence he might have been found guilty of larceny by embezzlement, under section 37, without such proof. State v. Stone, 68 Mo. 101, 104.

To establish the charge of larceny, it is necessary to show that the property of another was taken and carried away by accused with intent to steal it. The intent to steal it at the time of taking and carrying away must be established, because if that is not established, even supposing all the other essentials of the evidence were established, the accused is not guilty of larceny. State v. Patton (Del.) 41 Atl. 193, 194, 1 Marv. 552.

In larceny the taking must be with a felonious intent to deprive the owner, not temporarily, but permanently, of his property. Where a horse, alleged to have been stolen, had been running upon a ranch for a number of years, during which time people were in the habit of catching him and riding him off for temporary purposes, it not being known who was his owner or whether he had any owner, the catching and riding of such horse by defendant was not larceny. He could not have intended to deprive the owner of his property. No owner was known to be in existence. To make the case one of larceny, it must be shown that at the time of the taking the defendant had formed the felonious intention. Johnson v. State, 36 Tex. 375, 377.

The most approved definition of "larceny" is the wrongful or fraudulent taking and carrying away by any person the mere personal goods of another from any place, with the felonious intent to convert them to his, the taker's, own use and make them his property, without the consent of the owner. Under this definition it is held, that lost goods may be the subject of larceny, but that the finder of lost goods who takes possession of them, not intending to steal them at the time of the original taking, is not rendered guilty of larceny by any subsequent felonious intention to convert them to his own use. Ransom v. State, 22 Conn. 153, 156. Where an iron safe containing money was thrown into the river by the blowing up of a steamboat, and several months thereafter was found by persons who did not know to whom it belonged, and there were no marks to indicate the ownership, the fact that they refused to give it up when told as to the ownership, and claimed that they were entitled to it because they had found it in the river, did not make them guilty of larceny. To constitute larceny, the intention to steal must have been formed at the time of the taking. State v. Conway, 18 Mo. 321, 323.

In order to convict of larceny, it is necessary to show that the property was taken with the intent then existing in the mind of the defendant to steal the property. This intent may be shown by the subsequent acts and conduct of the defendant. But if the original purpose is innocent, and the defendant afterwards conceives the purpose of appropriating the property to his own use, he is not guilty of larceny. State v. Wood, 46 Iowa, 116, 117.

To constitute larceny, there must be a taking and carrying away the personal property of another with a felonious intent. But that rule has been somewhat modified in various particulars. The intent to steal need not have existed at the time of obtaining possession of the property, if followed by a felonious appropriation, and the theft is complete at the time of such appropriation. Where, however, the felonious intent exists at the time the property is obtained by false pretense, it is larceny, and the crime is complete at the time possession of the property is so obtained. State v. Davenport, 17 S. E. 37, 38, 38 S. O. 348.

Larceny is the felonious taking of property of another without the knowledge or consent of that other, and with the intent of the party taking, at the time of the taking, to permanently deprive the owner thereof, and with the further intent at said time to wholly and permanently appropriate it to the use of the party taking it. State v. Minor, 77 N. W. 330, 331, 106 Iowa, 642.

Asportation.

To constitute larceny, there must be a taking and a carrying away of personal property with intent to steal it. Taking without carrying away is not larceny. Commonwealth v. Adams, 73 Mass. (1 Gray) 43, 44.

"Larceny" is defined by Pen. Code, § 484 to be "the felonious stealing, taking or carrying away the personal property of another." Under this statute, evidence that defendant was found in possession of an overcoat taken from a dummy, but still fastened to it by a chain through the sleeves, the dummy being on the sidewalk and tied to the building by a string, does not show larceny, as there was no asportation, and to constitute larceny the goods must be carried away. People v. Myer, 17 Pac. 431, 75 Cal. 383.

The mere possession of another's property with intent to steal it is not larceny until intent is ripened into act. State v. Newman, 9 Nev. 48, 57, 16 Am. Rep. 3.

Larceny is the felonious taking and carrying away the personal goods of another, with the intention of appropriating the same to one's own use without the consent of the owner. To constitute the offense, there must be a taking, which is as essential an ingredient of the crime as the asportation. Taking is a material part of the larceny, but it may be presumed from the possession of the goods. When there is no trespass in taking the goods, the offense is not larceny. State v. Copeland, 86 N. C. 691, 695.

A conviction of larceny cannot be sustained on the testimony of a witness to the effect that he gave the defendant an ax and cut some corn, and by dropping some of the corn on the ground tolled a hog for a distance of 20 rods, when defendant struck the hog with the ax and the hog squealed whereupon the witness and defendant immediately ran away, leaving the hog where it was. The usual definition of "larceny" is a felonious taking and carrying away of the personal goods of another. There must be a taking possession of the goods with intent to deprive the owner of his property. The facts of this case, taken alone, do not constitute larceny. It is not a reasonable inference from them that there was such a complete asportation as to consummate the offense. Edmonds v. State, 70 Ala. 8, 9, 45 Am. Rep. 67.

"To constitute larceny, it is necessary that the property should be taken from the possession of the owner or person in possession thereof with a felonious intent, and it may be committed by any person." People v. Burr (N. Y.) 41 How. Prac. 293, 294.

When the taking is from the person, no further asportation is necessary in order to constitute a larceny. People v. Lonnen, 73 Pac. 586, 587, 139 Cal. 634.

Asportation to new jurisdiction as new offense.

Larceny consists in the wrongful taking and carrying away of chattels of another with felonious intent to convert them to the taker's own use, and is a crime at common law, and consequently an offense in every jurisdiction in which the common law is part of the governing law. And at common law every asportation is a new taking. So it is held that, when a person steals goods in another state and brings them into this state, the person stealing cannot be indicted and punished here for the crime committed in the former state, but the act of bringing the stolen goods into this state is a new larceny, for which the party may be indicted and punished in the courts of this state. Worthington v. State, 58 Md. 403, 409, 42 Am. Rep. 338.

Though, to constitute larceny, a taking and carrying away of the goods by trespass and an intent to steal them must concur, if, after one has taken what completes the theft, he continues travelling away with and still intending to steal them, each step may be treated as a new trespass and fresh larceny, so that he may be indicted either in the county where he first took the goods, or in any other into which, the intent to steal continuing, he carries them. It is immaterial to this result whether the taking to the new county is immediate or long after the original theft, but it must be felonious in the new county. People v. Prather, 66 Pac. 483, 484, 134 Cal. 386.

The very essence of the crime of larceny is the felonious taking and removal of the property stolen. The taking being the chief factor or principal ingredient of the crime, there can be no crime unless there is a felonious taking, and the taking is the act by which control and dominion of the thing stolen is gained by the thief and lost to the owner. Having possession of the property after being feloniously taken, or removing it from place to place after the commission of the crime, cannot be said, in the ordinary sense of the word, to be a new "taking," or the commission of a new offense. Therefore the bringing into the state of Nebraska of goods stolen in another state is not larceny. Van Buren v. State, 91 N. W. 201, 203, 65 Neb. 223.

The bringing into a state by the thief of goods stolen in another state is not larceny in the state to which the goods are brought. People v. Loughridge, 1 Neb. 11, 12, 93 Am. Dec. 325.

The stealing of property in one state, and the bringing of it into another state, animo furandi, is larceny in the state into which the property is brought. State v. Ellis, 3 Conn. 185, 188, 8 Am. Dec. 175.

Burglary distinguished.

Larceny is the felonious taking of the goods or the property of another with intent to deprive the owner thereof and to convert the same to the taker's use, while burglary is the entering of any house, room, apartment, tenement, shop, or warehouse, etc., in the nighttime, with intent to commit a felony. Burglary and larceny are thus two distinct crimes, and larceny is not necessarily included in a burglary. In order to sustain an indictment for burglary, it would only be essential to prove a felonious entry with the intent, while to convict on a charge of larceny it becomes necessary to show a taking, for the entry may have been without any felonious intent. Territory v. Willard, 21 Pac. 301, 302, 8 Mont. 328.

Larceny is an offense against personal property; burglary is an offense against realty and the security of its occupant. Larceny and burglary are therefore distinct crimes, and an acquittal of the former is not a bar to an indictment for the latter. Commonwealth v. Tadrick, 1 Pa. Super. Ct. 555, 565.

The consent of the authorized agent of the owner would be in legal effect the consent of the owner. Fetkenhauer v. State, 88 N. W. 294, 296, 112 Wis. 368.

Larceny may exist although the possession of the alleged stolen goods is obtained with the consent of the owner, if that consent is obtained by deception, and with the intent not to return the same, but to appropriate them and deprive the owner of them. Crum v. State, 47 N. E. 833, 835, 148 Ind. 401.

If, by trick or artifice, the owner of property is induced to part with the custody or naked possession of it to one who receives the property animo furandi, the owner still meaning to retain the right of property, the taking will be larceny. Thus it is larceny where the defendants so fraudulently conduct a gambling game or lottery as to give the prosecutor no chance of winning, and he parts with his money through fraud or fear. State v. Skilbrick, 66 Pac. 53, 54, 25 Wash. 555, 87 Am. St. Rep. 794.

Larceny is the felonious stealing, taking, and carrying away of the personal property of another. When the act of taking coexists with a felonious intent to deprive the owner of his property, the offense is complete. Hence, it is held that a person obtaining possession of property with the consent of the owner, but with the intention to deprive the owner of it, is guilty of larceny, because a fraudulent receipt of the property of another amounts to a taking without his consent. People v. Salorse, 62 Cal. 139, 141.

The fact that the owner may voluntarily deliver over the custody of his property does not protect the person procuring it from being guilty of larceny, where it is received by him with a felonious intention. If a party takes goods from the owner, though with the owner's consent, with an intent to steal them, such taking amounts to larceny. Macino v. People (N. Y.) 12 Hun, 127, 129.

Even though the owner is induced to part with his property by fraudulent means, yet if he actually intends to part with it, and delivers up possession absolutely, it is not larceny. But it is held that where two persons conspire together fraudulently to get possession of the money of another, with a felonious intent to convert it to their own use, and by means of a fraudulent contrivance or device succeed in inducing the owner to deliver the temporary possession thereof for a specific purpose, and then without his consent, and against his wishes, convert the same to their own use, they are guilty of larceny. Loomis v. People, 67 N. Y. 322, 326, 23 Am. Rep. 123.

Larceny may be committed of a box of matches which were placed on the counter of a store, to be used by the public in lighting their pipes and cigars in the room and for their accommodation. By so placing the matches the owner had not abandoned his right to them. They could only be appropriated in a particular manner, and in a very limited quantity, with his consent. Taking them by the boxful without felonious intent would have been a trespass, and with it a larceny. Mitchum v. State, 45 Ala. 29, 30.

The offense of larceny at common law is established by proof on the part of the prosecution showing that defendant obtained possession of the property by some trick, fraudulent device, or artifice, with the intention of appropriating it to his own use or that of another. People v. Walker, 83 N. Y. Supp. 372, 374, 85 App. Div. 558.

"Larceny" is defined to be "the felonious taking and carrying away of the personal goods of another," or "the wrongful and fraudulent taking and carrying away by one person of the mere personal goods of another from any place, with a felonious intent to convert them to the taker's own use and make them his own property without the consent of the owner." From this definition it is seen that there must be a taking, and this implies that the consent of the owner of the goods is wanting. If the owner of the goods deliver them to the offender upon any trust, a violation of the trust will not afford any ground of a larceny. So, where a quantity of pig iron in bars was delivered to a common carrier to transport by canal, and on the passage the carrier stopped his boat and with felonious intent put off from the boat 100 bars of the iron, and then proceeded and delivered the remainder, the facts do not constitute larceny at common law, but the carrier was guilty of embezzlement. People v. Nichols (N. Y.) 3 Parker, Cr. R. 579, 581.

To constitute larceny, it is not needful that the property stolen should have been taken from the possession of the owner by a trespass; but if a person obtains possession of property from the owner for a special purpose by some device, trick, artificial fraud, or false pretense, intending at the time to appropriate it to his own use, and he subsequently does appropriate it to his own use, and not to the special purpose for which he received it, he is guilty of larceny. People v. Laurence, 21 N. Y. Supp. 818, 820, 66 Hun, 574.

Defendant broker, in negotiating a sale of land for his principal, solicited complainant to purchase it, and falsely represented that he had an arrangement by which it could be transferred to another person at a larger profit. It was agreed that the profits, when made by a resale, were to be equally divided between them. Complainant paid a small amount on the purchase price, and a few days later was told by defendant that the principal would reduce the price one-third on the immediate payment of $1,000. Complainant then delivered $1,000 to defendant, under an agreement that it should not be paid to anybody until the former had a chance to examine the title. Defendant never paid the $1,000 to any one, and he had never intended to. Held, that the facts established a common-law larceny, and not the offense merely of procuring money by false pretenses, within the rule that one who obtains possession of property from the owner for a special purpose by a false pretense, intending at the time to appropriate it to his own use, and who subsequently does appropriate it to his own use, and not to the special purpose for which he received it, is guilty of larceny. People v. Sumner, 53 N. Y. Supp. 817, 33 App. Div. 338.

Conversion of property found.

A person who finds lost property under circumstances which give him knowledge or means of inquiry as to the true owner, and who appropriates such property to his own use, or to the use of another person who is not entitled thereto, without first having made every reasonable effort to find the owner and restore the property to him, is guilty of larceny. Pen. Code N. Y. § 539; People v. Seaton, 15 N. Y. Supp. 270, 272, 60 Hun, 584.

Different grades.

Larceny, at the common law, was divided into simple, and mixed or compound. Blackstone defines "simple larceny" as the felonious taking and carrying away of the personal goods of another. Of "mixed or compound larceny" he says: "It has all the properties of simple larceny, but is accompanied with either one or both of the aggravations of taking from one's home or person." It would therefore seem that compound larceny is not, in character or general distinction, in any wise different from simple larceny. It is different only in the aggravated circumstances of being committed in a house or from a person. Blackstone says that, "although attaching to itself a higher degree of guilt than simple larceny, yet it is not at all distinguished from the other at common law." State v. Tofte, 54 Pac. 1062, 1063, 59 Kan. 753.

The word "larceny," in Rev. St. Ill. c. 38, § 23, which declares that an assault with intent to commit murder, rape, mayhem, robbery, larceny, or other felony shall subject the offender to imprisonment in the penitentiary, is broad enough to embrace all grades of larceny, and therefore includes both grand larceny and petty larceny, and makes an assault with intent to commit the latter crime a penitentiary offense. Kelly v. People, 24 N. E. 56, 132 Ill. 363.

In Iowa the offense of "larceny" is defined by statute. Rev. St. 173, §§ 40, 41, describe the offense of larceny, declaring that if the property stolen is of the value of $25 and upwards it should be deemed larceny, and section 44 provides that every person who is convicted of larceny shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary. By these sections it is clear that the Legislature recognized and applied the term "larceny" as meaning grand larceny, in contradistinction to petty larceny. To that sense the application of those sections appears to be exclusively confined. Section 45 defines "petty larceny" as stealing property of a value less than $25. State v. Chambers (Iowa) 2 G. Greene, 308, 309.

The word "larceny" will comprehend petty larceny as well as grand larceny. State v. Smith, 16 Mo. 550, 551.

A statement of the value of the property is a necessary part of a description of the offense of larceny, for the reason that the punishment of larceny is graduated by statute with reference to the value of the property taken. State v. Perley, 30 Atl. 74, 75, 86 Me. 427, 41 Am. St. Rep. 564.

The term "larceny," in the Constitution, providing that the Legislature shall have power and shall enact the necessary laws to exclude from the right of suffrage all persons convicted of perjury, bribery, "larceny," or infamous crime, and in the statute providing that persons hereafter convicted of felony, bribery, perjury, "larceny," or other infamous crime shall not be entitled to vote, embraces petit larceny, which, under the Declaration of Rights in the Constitution, is an infamous crime. State v. Buckman, 18 Fla. 267, 270.

Larceny, or theft, at common law is distinguished into two sorts, the one called "simple larceny" or "plain larceny," unaccompanied with any other atrocious circumstance, and "mixed larceny" or "compound larceny," which also includes in it the aggravation of a taking from one's house or person. Simple larceny, then, is the felonious taking and carrying away of the personal goods of another; mixed or compound larceny is such as has all the properties of the former (simple larceny), but is accompanied by either one or both of the aggravations of taking from one's house or person. "Larceny from the person" is either by privately stealing from a man's person, as by picking his pocket, or by open and violent assault. "Open and violent larceny from a person," or "robbery," is the felonious and forcible taking from the person of another of goods or money to any value by violence or putting him in fear. Anderson v. Winfree, 4 S. W. 351, 352, 85 Ky. 597.

Hill's Ann. Laws, § 1763, provides if any person shall steal any goods or chattels, the property of another, such person shall be deemed guilty of larceny. Larceny at common law was classed as "simple larceny," and "larceny accompanied with violence or putting in fear," which was denominated "robbery." Simple larceny was subdivided into "grand larceny," which consisted in the felonious taking of goods above the value of 12 pence, and "petit larceny," in which the value of the property so taken was 12 pence or under. 1 Hale, P. C. 503. "Simple larceny" was unaccompanied with any atrocious circumstances, while "mixed larceny" or "compound larceny" included the aggravation of a taking from one's house or person. 4 Bl. Comm. 229. By Hill's Ann. Laws, § 1764, larceny of goods in a building renders the person convicted thereof subject to punishment by imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than seven years, regardless of the value of the property feloniously taken. It will thus be seen that the grade of the offense is not measured by such value, nor by penalty imposed for a violation of the property rights of another, but is determined by the circumstances which aggravate the taking. State v. Savage, 60 Pac. 610, 611, 36 Or. 191.

The word "larceny," as used in Rev. Laws, § 4133, providing that a person who in the nighttime breaks and enters a dwelling house, church, or either of the other places or buildings described, with intent to commit murder, rape, robbery, larceny, or other felony, shall be imprisoned in the state prison, etc., includes not only grand but petit larceny. State v. Keyser, 56 Vt. 622, 623.

To constitute the offense of "larceny," according to our definitions, there must be at least a wrongful taking of the property of another with a felonious intent. And the offense of the violation of the sanctity of the mails by one sworn to protect it, committed by taking out of the mail any of the things described in the statutes, aiming at an offense similar in character to and having the ingredients of the common-law offense of larceny, is an aggravated larceny, because committed by one in a place of trust, but still it is larceny. Jones v. United States (U. S.) 27 Fed. 447, 450.

Embezzlement distinguished.

See, also, "Embezzle—Embezzlement."

The crime of "larceny" is distinguished from that of "embezzlement" in that in the former case property is unlawfully taken and retained, while in the latter it comes lawfully into the hands of the party embezzling, by virtue of the position of trust he occupies, and is unlawfully appropriated by him. United States v. Lee (U. S.) 12 Fed. 816, 818.

To constitute larceny, there must be a taking, and this implies that the consent of the owner of the goods is wanting. If the owner of the goods deliver them to the offender upon any trust, a violation of the trust will not afford any ground of a larceny. People v. Nichols (N. Y.) 3 Parker, Cr. R. 579, 581.

The gist of common-law "larceny," as distinguished from "embezzlement," is the felonious taking of what is another's with the simultaneous intent in the taker of misappropriating it, while in statutory embezzlement there is no felonious taking, for the thing comes to the servant by delivery either from the master or a third person. Spalding v. People, 49 N. E. 993, 998, 172 Ill. 40.

False pretenses distinguished.

To constitute the crime of larceny, there must be a trespass committed and a felonious intent, and without these elements no such offense can be made out. "The distinction," says the court, "which exists between larceny and false pretense is a very nice one, but no case has gone to the extent of holding that where the owner of property parts with the possession, intending to surrender absolutely his title thereto, the case is one of larceny." Thorne v. Turck, 94 N. Y. 90, 95, 46 Am. Rep. 126.

If by trick or artifice the owner of property is induced to part with the custody or naked possession to one who receives the property animo furandi, the owner still meaning to retain the right of property, the taking will be larceny; but if the owner part not only with the possession, but the right of property also, the offense of the party obtaining it will not be larceny, but that of obtaining goods by false pretenses. Smith v. People, 53 N. Y. 111, 114, 13 Am. Rep. 474; Commonwealth v. Elchelberger (Pa.) 13 Atl. 422, 426, 4 Am. St. Rep. 642; People v. Rae, 6 Pac. 1, 2, 66 Cal. 423; State v. Kube, 20 Wis. 217, 224, 225, 91 Am. Dec. 890.

As a generic term.

The terms "larceny" and "embezzlement," in a bond conditioned to reimburse an employer for such pecuniary loss as he may sustain by any act of fraud or dishonesty, amounting to larceny or embezzlement, committed by a designated employé, are used as generic terms to indicate the dishonest and fraudulent breach of any duty or obligation upon the part of an employé to pay over to his employer or account to him for any money, securities, or other personal property, the title to which is in the employer, that may in any manner come into the possession of the employé. Champion Ice Mfg. & Cold-Storage Co. v. American Bonding & Trust Co., 75 S. W. 197, 198, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 239.

As infamous crime.

See "Infamous Crime."

As offense against state.

Larceny is no more an offense against the particular political subdivision in which the offense occurs than against the person whose property he unlawfully takes. It is a crime in the arrest and punishment for which counties have no corporate duty to perform, but it belongs exclusively to the state. It is an offense against the state, and not against the county, it being a matter not of local but of general concern that persons guilty of such offense should be apprehended and tried. Northern Trust Co. v. Snyder, 89 N. W. 460, 467, 113 Wis. 516, 90 Am. St. Rep. 867.

As involving personality only.

At common law "larcenies" are restricted to personal property. Real estate could not be the subject of the offense of larceny; hence it is held that words charging plaintiff with stealing the door of a house are not actionable per se, as they impute only the offense of a trespass of property, and do not involve moral turpitude. Blackburn v. Clark (Ky.) 41 S. W. 430, 431.

In designating the constituent elements of "larceny" of a thing which is or has been a part of the realty, the court cites with approval Blackstone's explanation of the distinction between the taking of things personal and of things which savor of the realty, as follows: "These things [things that savor of the realty] were parcel of the real estate, and therefore, while they continued so, could not by any possibility be the subject of theft, being absolutely fixed and immovable; and if they were severed by violence, so as to be changed into movables, and at the same time, by one and the same continued act, carried off by the person who severed them, they could never be said to be taken from the proprietor in their newly acquired state of mobility." But if the act of severance and that of carrying away be separated, so that they do not constitute one and the same continued act, the distinction between personal goods and those that savor of the realty ceases to protect the wrongdoer from a criminal prosecution, and a charge of larceny can be sustained. So it is held that while the waste coal carried from a mine by a stream on the land of another is real estate, and belongs to such other, yet one who unlawfully enters on the land in a boat, scoops up the coal lodged along the channel and bank of the stream, cleans and sifts it, deposits the cleaned coal, little by little, on a flatboat, transports the boat load to bins, and shovels the coal from the boat to the bins, may be convicted of larceny, since the loading, transportation, and unloading are not so connected with the severance of the coal from the land as to be one and the same continuous act of trespass. Commonwealth v. Steimling, 27 Atl. 297, 299, 156 Pa. 400.

"Larceny" is described in the Criminal Code of Utah as the felonious stealing, taking, carrying, leading, or driving away the personal property of another. "Personal property" may be said generally to include everything the subject of ownership, not being landed or an interest in land. Books containing a phonographic report of the testimony taken on a trial, and having no value except for such report, are personal property, not title deeds or choses in action, and are the subject of larceny under the statute. People v. McGrath, 17 Pac. 116, 117, 5 Utah, 525.

"Larceny," at common law, was confined to goods and chattels. It did not refer to land, because land could not be feloniously taken and carried away except in insignificant parcels thereof. People v. Cummings, 46 Pac. 284, 285, 114 Cal. 437..

Presumed to be a crime.

In determining whether a person demanded as a fugitive from justice in extradition proceedings is charged with a crime against the laws of the state from whose justice he is alleged to have fled, it may be presumed that larceny is a crime in a state where the common law prevails. Katyuga v. Cosgrove, 50 Atl. 679, 680, 67 N. J. Law, 213.

Property of another.

An indictment failing to allege that the property was the property of another does not charge the crime of larceny. People v.

Hanselman, 18 Pac. 425, 426, 76 Cal. 460, 9 Am. St. Rep. 238.

Larceny is the taking possession and carrying away the goods of another, with a felonious intent to convert them to the use of the taker or of some other person. There are, it is said, exceptional cases where the owner may be guilty of stealing his own goods. Black v. State, 3 South. 814, 815, 83 Ala. 81, 3 Am. St. Rep. 691.

Larceny is the felonious taking and carrying away of the personal goods of another. Hence a man cannot be guilty of larceny of his own property from a bailee. Commonwealth v. Tobin (Pa.) 2 Brewst. 570.

Larceny is the felonious taking and carrying away of the personal property of another, which the thief knew at the time of the taking was the property of another, with intent to deprive him of the ownership of his own property. State v. Dredden, 41 Atl. 925, 38 Md. 413.

The gist of the offense of larceny consists in feloniously taking the property of another, and the quality of the act is not affected by the fact that the property stolen, instead of being owned by one or by two persons jointly, is the several property of different persons. State v. Kieffer (S. D.) 95 N. W. 289, 290.

Robbery is the felonious taking of personal property of another by violence or putting in fear; or, perhaps we may say, it is the felonious taking of the personal property of another by subduing him by actual violence, or a show of it. It is not simply stealing from the person of another, and it is different from all stealing. We might steal from the person of another; for instance, from one who was asleep. That would be larceny, and not robbery. Commonwealth v. Hollister, 27 Atl. 386, 387, 157 Pa. 13, 25 L. R. A. 349.

Larceny and robbery are generically the same, the one being merely an aggravated form of the other. Each is the felonious taking of the personal property of another, although in robbery the felonious taking is accomplished by force or threats. The textbooks speak of robbery as an aggravated species of larceny. People v. Crowley, 35 Pac. 84, 100 Cal. 478. See, also, Keeton v. State, 66 S. W. 645, 70 Ark. 163; People v. Cleary, 13 Pac. 77, 78, 72 Cal. 59.

Larceny and robbery are each the felonious taking of the personal property of another, although in robbery the taking is accomplished by force or threats. People v. Crowley, 35 Pac. 84, 100 Cal. 478.

Stealing distinguished.

The word "steal" cannot be accepted as the equivalent of "larceny." It is but one word in the definition, and does not even define all the verb action. "Steal, take, and carry away" have always been indissolubly conjoined, each as essential to the other in order to constitute the crime of larceny. Barnhart v. State, 56 N. E. 212, 214, 154 Ind. 177 (citing Hale, P. C. 513).

In Hughes v. Territory, 56 Pac. 708, 8 Okl. 28, it was held that Sess. Laws 1825, p. 20, art. 1, § 1, making it criminal to steal any mare, colt, etc., created a separate and distinct offense from "larceny" as defined by St. 1893, § 2371. Mr. Justice Burwell said: "An examination of the authorities will show that 'larceny' and 'stealing' at common law had the same meaning; and consequently 'stealing,' as here defined, is the wrongful or fraudulent taking and removing of personal property, by trespass, with a felonious intent to deprive the owner thereof, and to convert the same to his (the taker's) own use." The Legislature has modified the meaning of the word "larceny" as used in the crimes act, so that the taking of personal property, accomplished by fraud or stealth, and with intent to deprive another thereof, is larceny, regardless of whether or not it was taken for the purpose of depriving the owner thereof, and for the purpose of converting it to the use of the taker. Therefore, while "stealing" and "larceny" at common law were synonymous terms, our statute has given to the word "larceny" a much broader meaning than it then had, while "steal" or "stealing" has not been defined by our statutes, and must be construed according to its common-law meaning. Sullivan v. Territory, 58 Pac. 650, 8 Okl. 499.

Theft synonymous.

"Larceny" is synonymous with 'theft.' "Mathews v. State, 36 Tex. 675, 676.

Things savoring of realty.

"Mr. Wharton, in treating of larceny, holds that at common law larceny cannot be committed of things which savor of the realty, though when severed the rule is otherwise; but the common-law rule that, to constitute theft of an article attached to the realty, there must be a severance prior to the asportation, does not obtain in this state, and hence the removal of rails from a fence, and with larcenous intent, is theft." Harberger v. State, 4 Tex. App. 26, 28, 30 Am. Rep. 157.

Trespass.

"Larceny," by the common law, is defined to be the felonious taking and carrying away of the personal goods or property of another. From this definition it follows that every larceny necessarily includes a trespass, for a trespass to personal property is nothing more than the unlawful and forcible taking of the goods of another without such felonious intent. Johnson v. People, 113 Ill. 99, 103.

LARCENY BY BAILEE.

See "Embezzle—Embezzlement."

Within the meaning of the criminal law, a "bailment," says Bishop in his work on Criminal Law, is where one has personal property intrusted to him, to be returned or delivered to another in specie when the object of the trust is accomplished, and the offense of "larceny by bailee" consists in the unlawful and felonious conversion of the property or money by the bailee to his own use. In Welsh v. People, 17 Ill. (7 Peck) 339, Caton, J., in distinguishing between "simple larceny" and "larceny by bailee," where the alleged larceny is perpetrated by obtaining the possession of the goods by the voluntary act of the owner under the influence of false pretenses and fraud, says: "There is no real difficulty in deducing the correct rule by which to determine whether the act was a larceny and felonious, or a mere cheat and swindle. The rule is plainly this: If the owner of the goods alleged to have been stolen parts with both the title and the possession to the alleged thief, then neither the taking nor the conversion is felonious. It can but amount to a fraud; it is obtaining goods under false pretenses. If, however, the owner parts with the possession voluntarily, but does not part with the title, expecting and intending that the same thing shall be returned to him, or that it shall be disposed of on his account, or in a particular way, as directed or agreed upon for his benefit, then the goods may be feloniously converted by the bailee, so as to relate back and make the taking and conversion a larceny." State v. Skinner, 46 Pac. 368, 369, 29 Or. 599.

LARCENY FROM THE HOUSE.

"Larceny from the house" is defined by Code, § 4413, as the breaking or entering any house with intent to steal, or, after breaking and entering, of stealing any goods, wares, merchandise, or any other thing of value. Roberts v. State, 83 Ga. 369, 370, 375, 9 S. E. 675.

LARCENY FROM THE PERSON.

Robbery distinguished, see "Robbery."

"Larceny from the person," as mentioned in 22 Stat. 530, providing a penalty for that crime, consists in the wrongful and fraudulent taking, and does not include the idea of force and violence, or fraud accompanied by force, nor does it imply that the taking must be secret. Williams v. United States, 3 App. D. C. 335, 345.

Larceny from the person is considered a higher offense than was stealing, because involving an invasion of the person of the citizen, as well as the stealing of the property. It includes all cases of pocket-picking and similar offenses, and extends to every case of stealing where the property stolen is on the person or in the immediate charge and custody of the person from whom the theft is made. State v. Eno, 8 Minn. 220 (Gil. 190, 192).

LARD.

In its ordinary meaning, "lard" is the fat of swine which is melted and separated from the flesh, but as used in the title of Acts 22d Gen. Assem. c. 79, entitled "An act to prevent fraud in the sale of lard and to provide punishment for the violation thereof," it is construed to include not only pure lard, but adulterations thereof, hence the act is not unconstitutional on the ground that the subject is not expressed in the title. State v. Snow, 47 N. W. 777, 778, 81 Iowa, 433, 11 L. R. A. 355.

LAREM.

The word "larem" in 2 Domat. p. 487, which provides, "Ubi quis larem ac fortunarium suarum summam constituit," if viewed according to its signification in writers of acknowledged authority, will be found to designate either the tutelary deity of the hearth or the only home of the family. Chaine v. Wilson (N. Y.) 16 How. Prac. 552, 562.

LARGE.

See "At Large."

In a contract of sale of "all the large cottonwood and sycamore trees" on a certain island, to be paid for by measurement of the logs cut from such trees, the purpose indicated was to sell all the cottonwood and sycamore trees on the island large enough to be made into logs which could be taken to the bank and there measured as logs. Bement v. Claybrook, 31 N. E. 556, 557, 5 Ind. App. 193.

In the charter of a turnpike corporation providing that at each place where the toll shall be collected a signboard shall be erected with the rates of toll "fairly and legibly written thereon in large or capital letters," the term "large or capital letters" means letters of a large size. The general object of the Legislature was to have the letters legible, and they intended that if the letters were large it should be sufficient, although they were not capitals, and that if they were capitals they should nevertheless be of a large size. What are usually called "small letters," if made large, should seem to be more easy to read than capital letters. Nichols v. Bertram, 20 Mass. (3 Pick.) 342, 344.

An indictment charging the setting fire to, burning, and destroying of "large parts" of a courthouse will be understood to mean that defendant set fire to the courthouse itself. Lavelle v. State, 36 N. E. 135, 136, 138 Ind. 233.

LARGER.

"Larger portion," as used in St. c. 39, § 9, providing that all ratable personal property shall be taxed in the town in which the owner shall have had his actual place of abode for the "larger portion of the 12 months" next preceding the 1st day of April in each year, means more than half of them in duration of time, and hence persons who have had no actual abode in the state for more than 6 of the 12 months before the 1st day of April preceding the assessments are not subject to this provision. Allman v. Griswold, 12 R. I. 339, 342.

LASCIVIOUS.

"Lascivious" means that which tends to excite lust. United States v. Britton (U. S.) 17 Fed. 731, 733.

The word "lascivious," as used in Rev. St. § 3893, prohibiting the deposit of lewd, obscene, "lascivious," or indecent publications in the mails, is to be construed as having the same meaning as given to it at common law in prosecutions for obscene libel. United States v. Clark (U. S.) 38 Fed. 500, 501; Swearingen v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 562, 563, 161 U. S. 446, 40 L. Ed. 765.

The words "lascivious," "lewd," "obscene," or "of an indecent character," in the federal statute prohibiting the sending of such matter through the mail, does not necessarily mean that the separate words are of such a character, but the character of the letter is to be determined by treating it as a whole. United States v. Hanover (U. S.) 17 Fed. 444.

"Lascivious," as used in Rev. St. § 3893, making it a criminal offense to place in the mails any obscene, lewd, or "lascivious" publication, signify that form of immorality which has relation to sexual impurity. Swearingen v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 562, 563, 161 U. S. 446, 40 L. Ed. 765; United States v. Males (U. S.) 51 Fed. 41, 42.

An instruction was approved, in a prosecution for the violation of a statute prohibiting the mailing of "obscene, lascivious, lewd, or indecent" publications, that the question what constitutes obscene, lewd, lascivious, or indecent publications is largely a question for the conscience and opinion of the jury, but that before it can be said that a publication is "lascivious" it must be calculated, with the ordinary reader, to deprave his morals or lead to impure purposes. Dunlop v. United States, 17 Sup. Ct. 375, 380, 165 U. S. 486, 41 L. Ed. 799.

The words "obscene, lewd, or lascivious," in Rev. St. U. S. § 3893, prohibiting the sending through the mail of any obscene, lewd, or lascivious book, pamphlet, picture, paper, letter, writing, print, or other publication of an indecent character, are not descriptive of language of merely an insulting character, but is limited to the use of words or pictures appealing to the animal passion, stimulating it, corrupting and debauching the mind and heart. United States v. Durrant (U. S.) 46 Fed. 753.

The words "obscene, lewd, and lascivious," in Rev. St. U. S. § 3893, making it criminal to transmit any obscene, lewd, or lascivious book, etc., through the mail, does not clearly characterize letters inclosed in envelopes, directed to a debtor, on which the words "dead beats" are printed in such a manner as to attract attention. The purpose of the act was to prevent the mails from being used to circulate matter to corrupt the morals of the people. The history of this legislation clearly shows that Congress determined to exclude from the mails impure and immodest writings, and that rough and coarse language are not within the terms of the act. Ex parte Doran (U. S.) 32 Fed. 76, 77.

Imputation of crime.

Rev. St. U. S. § 3893, prohibiting the transmission of any "obscene, lewd, or lascivious" print, writing, etc., through the mails, etc., does not include a letter imputing to the person addressed an atrocious crime, though exceedingly coarse and vulgar, where it has no tendency to excite libidinous thoughts or impure desires, or to deprave and corrupt the morals of those whose minds are open to such influences. The words imply something tending to suggest libidinous thoughts or excite impure desires. United States v. Wightman (U. S.) 29 Fed. 636.

That a man and woman did "lasciviously and lewdly associate" is shown by an indictment for adultery which alleges that they did unlawfully associate, bed, and cohabit together, and did commit adultery. State v. Stubbs, 13 S. E. 90, 108 N. C. 774.

As lewd.

25 Stat. 496, forbidding the sending of obscene or lascivious pamphlets, writings, etc., through the mail, "lascivious" means one describing dissolute or unchaste acts, scenes, or incidents, or one the reading whereof, by reason of its contents, is calculated to excite lustful and sensual desires in those whose minds are open to such influences. The word is synonymous with "lewd." United States v. Clarke (U. S.) 88 Fed. 732, 733.

"Lascivious" is defined to mean loose, wanton, lewd, lustful, tending to produce voluptuous or lewd emotions. The word is used in such sense in Rev. St. U. S. § 3893, prohibiting the transmission in the mails of obscene, "lascivious" books, pamphlets, etc. United States v. Bebout (U. S.) 28 Fed. 522, 524.

"Lascivious" is defined by Webster as synonymous with "wanton," "lewd," or "loose." State v. Lawrence, 27 N. W. 128, 129, 19 Neb. 307.

LASCIVIOUS BEHAVIOR.

Rev. St. c. 99, § 8, making "gross lewdness and lascivious behavior" punishable by imprisonment, etc., includes an indecent exposure of the person of a man to a woman, with a view to excite unchaste desires on her part and to induce her to yield. The crime does not depend upon the number of persons to whom a man thus exposes himself, whether one or many. State v. Millard, 18 Vt. 574, 578, 46 Am. Dec. 170.

LASCIVIOUSLY ASSOCIATE.

"Lascivious carriage and behavior" means "all those wanton acts between persons of different sexes, flowing from the exercise of lustful passions, which are grossly indecent and unchaste, and which are not otherwise punished as crimes against chastity and public decency." Fowler v. State (Conn.) 5 Day, 81, 84.

LAST.

The term "commercial lasts" is one indicating a vessel's carrying capacity, and a "last" is taken as the equivalent of 6,000 pounds. Reck v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 29 N. E. 137, 138, 130 N. Y. 160.

Former implied.

A statute providing that every illegitimate child shall be deemed to be settled in city or town of the "last" legal settlement of the mother supposes that the settlement of the mother might be changed. Canajoharie v. Johnstown (N. Y.) 17 Johns. 41, 44.

The word "last," as used in Act March 3, 1883, c. 97, 22 Stat. 473, providing that all officers of the navy shall be credited with the actual time they may have served as officers or enlisted men in the regular or volunteer army or navy, or both, and shall receive all the benefits of such actual service in all respects in the same manner as if all said service had been continuous, and in the regular navy, in the lowest grade having graduated pay held by such officer since "last entering" the service, does not imply entering the service more than once. Where a person has entered the service once, it is his last entry as well as his first entry. Where an officer has entered the service twice, his second entry in his last entry, and that entry is to be taken and applied in the statute to his case. But where an officer has entered the service but once, that entry is to be taken as the "last entry" within the meaning of the statute. United States v. Mullan, 8 Sup. Ct. 79, 80, 123 U. S. 186, 31 L. Ed. 140.

Sole not equivalent.

"Last," as used in a will which testator designated as his last will, is not equivalent to "sole," and does not necessarily revoke all former wills. Freeman v. Freeman, 27 Eng. Law & Eq. 351, 357.

LAST ANTECEDENT.

The rule of grammar, which is also the rule of construction in law, is that the relative clause relates to the nearest antecedent that will make sense. The rule is as ancient as the language. Finch, in his Discourse on Law (Ed. 1759, bk. 1, c. 3, p. 8), states it thus: "Words of construction must be referred to the nearest antecedent, where the matter itself does not hinder." 5 Com. Dig. marg. p. 333, says the relative is referred to the "last antecedent," and cites numerous cases. Croom, in his Maxims, cites Noys to the effect that relative words refer to the next antecedent, and says the "last antecedent" is the last word that can be made an antecedent so as to make sense." Wood v. Baldwin, 10 N. Y. Supp. 195, 196, 56 Hun, 647.

LAST ASSESSMENT.

"Last assessment," as used in Const. art. 9, § 12, which limits the power of counties to contract indebtedness to 5 per cent. of the last assessment for state and county taxes, means the assessment as fixed by the State Board of Equalization, and not as made by the local assessors. People v. Hamill, 29 N. E. 280, 134 Ill. 666.

"Last assessment roll," as used in an act relating to the issue of bonds for the aid of a railroad, and requiring affidavits of the assessors as to the required consent of taxpayers, the assessment roll used in the affidavit to be the last assessment roll, means the last assessment roll preceding the making of such affidavit, and not the last assessment preceding the issuing of the bonds. Phelps v. Lewiston (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 450, 459.

"Last assessment roll," as used in Act 1857, § 2, providing that it should be lawful for a town commissioner to borrow on the faith and credit of the town, provided the consent in writing of a majority of the taxpayers representing a majority of the taxable property in the town appearing on the last assessment roll should be first obtained for subscribing for the stock of a railroad company, means the last assessment roll next preceding the subscription, and not the one next preceding the passage of the act or any amendment to it. Town of Duanesburgh v. Jenkins (N. Y.) 40 Barb. 574, 580.

LAST CHILD.

"Last or only child," as used in Act 1843, providing that a mother, after having intermarried, shall not be entitled to any part or portion of the estate of a child who shall die intestate and without issue, unless it shall be the "last or only child," means the last surviving child, the only child, and not the latest child born. Holder v. Harrell, 6 Ga. 125, 127.

LAST CLEAR CHANCE.

The term "doctrine of the last clear chance" has been used in personal injury cases to designate the doctrine of discovered peril. "It raises the question whether defendant could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have prevented the injury notwithstanding the negligence of the deceased, and whether the negligence of the defendant could, under all the circumstances of the case, be held to be such gross and continuing negligence as would be deemed the proximate cause of the injury. If, in spite of the negligence of the deceased, the defendant could, by the exercise of reasonable care, have discovered the dangerous situation of the deceased, and have prevented the accident by any means that would not have really endangered the safety of its train, the defendant would have been guilty of negligence, and such negligence would be the immediate, and therefore proximate, cause of the injury." McLamb v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 29 S. E. 894, 898, 122 N. C. 862.

"Last clear chance" is the doctrine that notwithstanding the previous negligence of a plaintiff, if, at the time the injury was done, it might have been avoided by the exercise of reasonable care on the part of the defendant, the defendant will be liable for the failure to exercise such care. Styles v. Receivers of Richmond & D. R. Co., 24 S. E. 740, 741, 118 N. C. 1084 (citing Gunter v. Wicker, 85 N. C. 310; Davies v. Mann, 10 Mees. & W. 545).

LAST DAY OF TERM.

"Last day of the term," as used in Code 1880, § 2282, providing that the minutes of the circuit court shall be entered and read and signed on the last day of the term, means the day of the final adjournment, and is synonymous with the "end of the term" in section 1718, requiring a bill of exceptions to be presented within 10 days before the end of the term. Jones v. Williams, 62 Miss. 183, 184.

Where the condition of a bond was that the obligor would, 15 days after the "last day of the term" at which judgment should be rendered in a certain suit, notify the judgment creditor, etc., the phrase "after the last day of the term" had reference to the last day of the term, and not to the day on which a special judgment had been entered up. Parsons v. Hathaway, 40 Me. 132, 133.

LAST EQUALIZED VALUATION.

Laws 1885, c. 187, § 1, provides for county aid to towns in building bridges whose cost exceeds one-fourth of 1 per cent. of all the taxable property of the town "according to the last equalized valuation." Held, that the phrase "last equalized valuation" meant last valuation before the annual town meeting in April, 1886, and hence referred to the valuation of 1885. State v. Pierce County Sup'rs, 37 N. W. 233, 234, 71 Wis. 327.

LAST GENERAL ELECTION.

The term "last general election," in 2 Comp. Laws, par. 3070, providing that a board of county commissioners consisting of three members shall be elected in each county, but that in any county in which at the last general election there were polled 4,000 or more votes the board shall consist of five members, must be construed to mean the last general election preceding the time when the commissioners are required by law to assume the duties of the office, so that where the right to five commissioners had accrued by the required vote, if at the election at which the extra commissioners are voted for less than 4,000 votes are cast, the right to five commissioners is lost, and the election of extra commissioners void. State v. Woodbury, 30 Pac. 1006, 1008, 17 Nev. 337.

LAST HEREINBEFORE DESCRIBED.

A tax deed contained several distinct descriptions of real estate, and the granting clause provided "that the real property last hereinbefore described is conveyed," etc. Held, that the words "last hereinbefore described," as so used, applied only to the last entire description of real estate, and rendered the conveyance invalid on its face as to any tracts other than that intended in such last description. Spicer v. Howe, 16 Pac. 825, 827, 38 Kan. 465.

Where, in a deed, four lots were described together, and in subsequent recitals all four were referred to as "such property," the subsequent phrase in the granting clause of "the real property last hereinbefore described" included all of them, and the deed effectually conveyed them all. Cartwright v. Korman, 26 Pac. 48, 49, 45 Kan. 515.

LAST ILLNESS.

See, also, "Last Sickness."

A "last illness," within the meaning of Act Feb. 24, 1834, making a physician's bill for attendance and medicine furnished during the last illness of a decedent a preferred claim against his estate, means the immediate illness resulting in the decedent's death. It does not include the illness of one caused by a serious injury from which he so far recovers that he is able to attend to business, but has a subsequent relapse from which he dies, and therefore the claim of the physician attending him before the relapse is not preferred. In re Reese's Estate (Pa.) 2 Pears. 482. Nor can it be construed to include a lingering illness that has stretched across many months or many years. Men sometimes die from disease of the heart, lungs, or other organs, which commence with infancy, terminating only with old age. They are never well, always complaining, but lingering on throughout the usual period allowed to human life. In other instances the disease runs its course in a shorter time, but still the patient lingers, down at times, up and about at others. Such cases, where the illness is so protracted, the statute certainly does not contemplate. Where the disease assumes a fatal form, runs its course rapidly, the patient virtually prostrated, and the services of a physician constantly necessary, the case just as certainly is contemplated. Where a person suffered from softening of the brain, the progress of disease being gradual and slow, the patient living for more than a year after the doctor's attendance commenced, going about the house, waiting upon herself generally, once visiting abroad for several weeks, the disease manifesting itself only in weakness and irritability up to within a short time of her death, when it resulted in apoplexy, prior to which time the doctor's attendance was irregular, he going only when called, but subsequently to the apoplexy his visits were regular and pretty constant, the latter period is the "last illness" for the services during which the doctor is entitled to preference. In re Duckett's Estate (Pa.) 1 Kulp, 227.

The term "last illness," in Act Feb. 24, 1834 (P. L. 70), includes any sickness for which a physician is called, which continues until the death of the patient. It is not necessary that the sickness should in the first instance confine the patient to her room. In re Wasson's Estate, 8 Pa. Dist. R. 480, 481.

The term "last illness," within the rule that claims against the estate of a decedent during his last illness are to be preferred, includes medical services rendered to deceased for a year and a half prior to his death, during which time he was suffering from an incurable progressive disease which resulted in his death. In re Stagger's Estate, 8 Pa. Super. Ct. 260, 263.

LAST MENTIONED.

Where, in an action for forgery, in the second count the check was set out in the identical language of the check described in the first count, but it was distinguished throughout by being described as the "last-mentioned check," the court said that it was not possible "from the face of the indictment to say that the same check was intended to be described in both counts, and, though the copies are alike verbatim et literatim, it is not to be assumed that each is a copy of one and the same original instrument." People v. Shotwell, 27 Cal. 400. Certainly not, because such a presumption would be contrary to the plain meaning and intent of the words "last-mentioned check" as used in the second count. State v. Malin, 14 Nev. 288, 290.

If, in a pleading, subject A. is mentioned, and then subject B., and afterwards a statement is made respecting "the last-mentioned" subject, the court will refer the words "the last-mentioned" to A., when by referring them to B. an incongruity would be occasioned, and where the opposite party, instead of demurring on the ground of ambiguity, has pleaded over. Brancker v. Molyneux, 1 Mann. & G. 710, 720.

LAST PAST.

"Last past," as used in a declaration in ejectment in which the lease was stated to have been made on the 7th of July, 1825, to hold from the 6th day of July then last past, is construed to refer to the 6th day of July, 1825, not to the 6th day of July, 1824, which was before plaintiff's lessor's title accrued. Burhans v. Vanness, 10 N. J. Law (5 Halst.) 102, 107.

Arbitration bonds were dated August 21, 1813, and the award was dated August 23, 1813, and recited, "Bonds dated the 21st of August last past." Held, that the words "last past" should be construed to refer to the day—that is, the 21st—last past, and not to the month of August. Brown v. Hankerson (N. Y.) 3 Cow. 70, 72.

LAST PLACE OF ABODE.

A proof of service of summons on a person at his "last and usual place of abode in C. county" is equivalent to "usual place of abode," as required by Rev. St. § 2636. It means that the service was made at the person's last and usual place of abode, and that such place of abode was then in C. county. The words "last and" are mere surplusage. The last and usual place of abode of a person is necessarily his present usual place of abode. Healey v. Butler, 27 N. W. 822, 823, 66 Wis. 9.

One who owned real estate and carried on business in Massachusetts until the year 1841, when he removed to another state, where he continued to reside, will in 1843 be deemed to have a "last and usual place of abode" in Massachusetts. Tilden v. Johnson, 60 Mass. (6 Cush.) 354, 359.

LAST PORT OF DISCHARGE.

A policy on a vessel insured her from London to any port or ports on the river Platte until her arrival at her "last port of discharge" on that river. It was the master's intention to discharge her cargo at Buenos Ayres, but before reaching Buenos Ayres he heard that that place was in the hands of the enemy, and therefore went to Montevideo, with an intent to make a complete discharge if the market were favorable, but otherwise to proceed to Buenos Ayres, if possible. After discharging a part of the cargo, and not finding the market so favorable as he expected, but while he was still discharging, a loss happened by a peril of the sea under the policy. Held, that since Buenos Ayres, to which other port in the Platte he had contemplated to go, was at the time of his arrival in that river, and continued up to the time of the loss, in the hands of the enemy, so that he could not legally go there, Montevideo must be taken to be the ship's "last port of discharge," within the meaning of those words in the policy, and hence that the risk terminated on her arrival at that port. Brown v. Vigne, 12 East, 283.

LAST PUBLICATION.

The words "last publication," in the statute providing that the printer shall receive no pay for publication of the notice of a sale for delinquent taxes unless the affidavit of publication is transmitted within six days after the last publication of the statement and notice, should be taken in their natural and ordinary sense, as referring to the last issue of the paper in which the statement and notice were legally published, and not to the completed period of publication. Chippewa River Land Co. v. J. L. Gates Land Co., 95 N. W. 954, 118 Wis. 345; Pinkerton v. J. L. Gates Land Co., 95 N. W. 1089, 1093, 118 Wis. 514.

LAST SECTION.

A reference to the "last" or "preceding" section, or other provision of a statute, means the section or other division immediately preceding. Laws N. Y. 1892, c. 677, § 10.

LAST SICKNESS.

The "last sickness" is considered to be that of which the debtor died. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3199.

"Last sickness," as used in St. 1821, c. 51, § 25, making the expenses of the last sickness of an insolvent a preferred claim against his estate, means "the sickness which is terminated by his death." The question whether a certain sickness continued until testator's death is a question for the jury. Huse v. Brown, 8 Me. (8 Greenl.) 167, 169.

In a statute requiring that nuncupative wills must be made "in the time of the last sickness," the words must be taken in their ordinary signification. It is a reasonable and necessary implication that the testator, at the time of making the will, supposed that his sickness would prove his last sickness; that he should be impressed with the probability that he would never recover. Harrington v. Stees, 82 Ill. 50, 54, 25 Am. Rep. 290.

"Last sickness," within the meaning of statutes giving preferences to expenses of the last sickness, cannot be determined by the application of any definite rule. "The court can lay down no rule or limitation for the duration of the last sickness of a man, nor for the degree of attention to be paid for him. A wounded man may linger a long time in a helpless state, and chronic diseases run through more time than a year. We must construe the act liberally, and let it inure to its proper end—the full relief of the sick and the infirm." McVoy v. Percival (S. C.) Dud. Law, 337, 339.

Where, subsequent to an alleged donatio causa mortis, a will is made and regularly proved, the making of such will is conclusive evidence that the gift was not made during such a "last sickness" as the law requires to constitute a disposition of property causa mortis. Adams v. Nicholas (Pa.) 1 Miles, 90, 93.

As in extremis.

The phrase "last sickness," in the statute declaring that no will shall be good unless made in the last sickness of the deceased, means in extremis. Prince v. Hazleton (N. Y.) 20 Johns. 503, 513, 11 Am. Dec. 307.

"Last sickness," with reference to nuncupative wills, means in extremis. This expression was understood by writers before 29 Car. II to mean the veriest extremity, when a man "leth languishing for fear of sudden death, and dareth not to stay the writing of his testament." Sykes v. Sykes (Ala.) 2 Stew. 363, 369, 20 Am. Dec. 40.

"Last sickness," as used in Revision, p. 1245, providing that nuncupative wills must be made at the time of the last sickness of the testator, should be construed as meaning "in extremis," and hence an alleged nuncupative will made by testatrix during her last illness, nine days before her death, cannot be admitted to probate where the proof is clear that she had time and capacity to subsequently make a written will if she had so desired. Carroll v. Bonham, 9 Atl. 371, 42 N. J. Eq. (15 Stew.) 625.

The term "last sickness," as used in Code 1880, providing that a nuncupative will made during a person's last sickness, etc., shall be valid, etc., does not include a lingering illness which did not incapacitate the testator. The words "last sickness" should not be extended over a lingering disease covering months or weeks, during which and after the spoken words there was afforded, both by the mental and physical condition of the party, every opportunity and inducement to prepare a written will. Sadler v. Sadler, 60 Miss. 251, 255; Prince v. Hazleton (N. Y.) 20 Johns. 502, 515, 11 Am. Dec. 307.

"The 'last sickness' means the sickness which results in death. It may be more or less extended, according to the circumstances of the disease. If it is an acute disease, where a man was well until he was confined to his bed, and then died, it would count only from the time in which he was prostrated and confined to his bed. But if it was lingering, admitting of transient temporary recuperation, followed immediately by relapses, and every day adding to his aggregate weakness, the last sickness would commence from the time the final and fatal relapse commenced." United States v. Frisbie (U. S.) 28 Fed. 808, 810.

LAST SICKNESS EXPENSES.

The "last sickness expenses," within the meaning of a statute directing a preference as to funeral and other expenses of the last sickness, includes a debt due to plaintiff as a nurse. McVoy v. Percival (S. C.) 1 Dud. Law, 337, 339.

LAST THREE DAYS OF THE SESSION.

The phrase "last three days of the session," as used in Const. Minn. art. 4, § 11, providing that within three days after an adjournment of the Legislature the Governor may approve, sign, and file in the office of the Secretary of State any act passed "during the last three days of the session," and the same shall become law, means working days when the Legislature is in actual session for the transaction of business, and hence does not include Sunday. Therefore a bill passed on Saturday was within the provision, though the adjournment did not occur until the following Tuesday. John V. Farwell Co. v. Mathels (U. S.) 48 Fed. 363, 634.

LAST WILL.

In the construction of statutes the words "last will" shall be construed as meaning "last will and testament." Ky. St. 1903, § 463.

A "last will," says Swineburn, "is a lawful disposing of that which any one would have done after death." It is a voluntary disposition of property, in the mode recognized by law, to take effect after death. Reagan v. Stanley, 79 Tenn. (11 Lea) 316, 322.

LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT.

"A 'last will and testament' may be defined as the disposition of one's property to take effect after death." Barney v. Hayes, 29 Pac. 282, 284, 11 Mont. 571, 23 Am. St. Rep. 495 (quoting 1 Redf. Wills, 5).

The words "will and testament" and the phrase "last will and testament" are exactly synonymous by common usage all over the world. Hill v. Hill, 35 Pac. 360, 7 Wash. 409.

LASTLY.

The use of "lastly," in the conclusion of a will, denotes that the intentions of the testator with relation to the subjects of that paper were final. Cogbill v. Cogbill (Va.) 2 Hen. & M. 467, 507.

LATA CULPA.

"Lata culpa" is the term used in the civil law to designate gross faults or neglects. Brand v. Schenectady & T. R. Co. (N. Y.) 8 Barb. 368, 378.

LATE.

The term "late in May" means a date later than the 17th. Thus, evidence that payment was demanded of the debtor "late in May" is not sufficient to show that the demand was made before he was attached as trustee on the 17th of the month. "We should not call the 13th, two days previous to the middle of the month, 'early' in the month, and we cannot say that the 17th day, two days subsequent to the middle, is 'late' in the month. The 17th day is about the middle of the month, and we must consider a demand to have been made subsequent to that day." Erskine v. Erskine, 13 N. H. 436, 443.

Death implied.

In the trial of a slave for a capital offense, it was necessary to prove his ownership, and it was alleged that he was the property of "the late W. C." Held that, in the sense in which the adjective "late" is here used, it means existing at a period not long since past, but now departed this life, and therefore, as the accused was alleged to be the property of a person nonexistent, and hence not capable of owning property, the ownership of accused was not alleged, and the indictment was defective. Pleasant v. State, 17 Ala. 190, 191.

Expiration implied.

Where mandamus is directed to certain persons as township committee, and returned by them as "late" township committee, it is in effect saying that they were the committee when the writ was awarded, but that their office had since expired. State v. Griscom, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 136, 137.

Removal implied.

The use of the word "late" in a petition for letters of administration, describing the deceased as "late" a resident of the county, is to be construed as showing that deceased was "last" a resident of the county; and therefore it is a sufficient showing of facts giving the court jurisdiction, in compliance with the statute that administration shall be granted in the county where the deceased was a resident at or immediately previous to his death. Beckett v. Selover, 7 Cal. 215, 233, 68 Am. Dec. 237.

Where a record of the probate court described the will "as the last will of a person 'late' of B. county, deceased," it was insisted that the word "late" showed that the deceased was not a resident. The court said: "We have consulted all the standard dictionaries of the English language and several of the best law dictionaries, and we do not find that the word 'late' was ever used in the sense of 'last,' but always, when used as here, in the sense of 'recently' or 'formerly.' We have found but one case, Beckett v. Selover, 7 Cal. 215, 68 Am. Dec. 237, in which it seems to have been construed in the sense of 'last,' while in Holmes v. Custance, 12 Ves. 279, where the description was 'Robert Holmes, late Norwich,' Sir William Grant, Master of the Rolls, said: 'Every one knows that the sense of "late" is not "recently," but "formerly," of Norwich.' Thus the record does not show that the deceased was a non-resident. Hoffman v. Fleming, 64 N. E. 63, 65, 66 Ohio St. 143.

LATELY.

The use of the word "lately," in a bill to set aside a deed of property to a wife on the ground that it had been bought and paid for with her husband's money, and was held by her for the benefit of her husband, and to aid him in defrauding his creditors, who were plaintiffs, and praying that such premises be declared to be held in trust for the complainants, alleging that the business "lately" carried on upon the premises was carried on by the husband in the name of the wife, and that they claimed and pretended that both the premises and the business belonged to the wife, made the charge indefinite, but the court considered it as going back to the purchase of the property. Quidort's Adm'r v. Pergeaux, 18 N. J. Eq. (3 C. E. Green) 472-479.

LATENS.

"'Latens' is that which seemeth certain and without ambiguity, for anything that appeareth on a deed or instrument, but there is some collateral matter out of the deed that breedeth the ambiguity." Pringle v. Rogers, 44 Atl. 275, 276, 193 Pa. 94 (citing Lycoming Mut. Ins. Co. v. Sailer, 67 Pa. [17 P. F. Smith] 108).

LATENT.

"The ordinary meaning of the word 'latent,' when used in the description of any substance possessing inherent power, would import that such power was not manifest, was hidden, concealed, not visible or apparent. It would not fairly describe a condition where the power was in part displayed or manifest." Celluloid Mfg. Co. v. Cellonite Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 42 Fed. 900, 906.

LATENT AMBIGUITY.

See, also, "Ambiguitas Latens."

A "latent ambiguity" occurs where a writing is perfect and intelligible upon its face, but from some circumstance admitted in proof a doubt arises as to the applicability of the language employed to a particular person or thing; but it is by no means a universal rule that general parol evidence is admissible to explain even latent ambiguities or that such questions in every instance are questions of fact for the jury. Cases of latent ambiguity may be classed under three heads: The first arises when the description contained in a written instrument is applicable with equal certainty to each of several subjects, as a devise to "my cousin John," when the testator has two cousins John. The second class of cases of latent ambiguity is where the name or description, or both, of the person or thing intended to be referred to, is in some respect so far incomplete or erroneous as not to refer with precision to any particular person or thing, and therefore the defect or omission has to be supplied by implication, as, for example, a devise to "Katherine Earnly," while no person of that name claimed the legacy, but one Gertrude Yardly did. The third class of cases of latent ambiguity is where the name used applies perfectly to one person or thing, while a description applies as perfectly to another, as in devise in a will to "Anna Maria German, wife of Jonathan German," there is a latent ambiguity, it appearing that Anna Maria was not in fact the wife, but the daughter, of Jonathan German, but that his wife was named Katherine. Stokeley v. Gordan, 8 Md. 496, 505; Flood v. Kerwin, 89 N. W. 845, 847, 113 Wis. 673; Patch v. White, 6 Sup. Ct. 710, 712, 117 U. S. 210, 29 L. Ed. 860; Whitcomb v. Rodman, 40 N. E. 553, 554, 156 Ill. 116, 28 L. R. A. 149, 47 Am. St. Rep. 181.

"Latent ambiguity exists where on the face of the paper no doubt or uncertainty exists, but by proof aliunde the language is shown to be alike applicable to two or more persons, things, etc. When this is the case, the uncertainty or ambiguity may be explained or cleared up by the same character of proof as that by which it is made to appear." Chambers v. Ringstaff, 69 Ala. 140, 143; Smith v. Jeffries, 15 Mees. & W. 561, 562; Bartlett v. Town of Nottingham, 8 N. H. 300, 304; Petrie v. Trustees of Hamilton College, 53 N. E. 216, 217, 158 N. Y. 458; Webster v. Paul, 10 Ohio St. 531, 534; Hayward Homestead Tract Ass'n v. Miller, 26 N. Y. Supp. 1091, 6 Misc. Rep. 254; Austin v. Southworth, 34 N. Y. Supp. 88, 90, 13 Misc. Rep. 45; Eckford v. Eckford, 58 N. W. 1093, 1096, 91 Iowa, 54, 26 L. R. A. 370 (citing Wig. Wills, 197).

"A latent ambiguity is that which seemeth certain for anything that appeareth upon the deed or instrument, but there is some collateral matter out of the deed that breedeth the ambiguity." Craven v. Butterfield, 80 Ind. 503, 510 (approvingly cited in Mudd v. Dillon, 65 S. W. 973, 975); Lycoming Mut. Ins. Co. v. Sailer, 67 Pa. (17 P. F. Smith) 108, 112; Bradley v. Washington, A. & G. Steam Packet Co., 38 U. S. (13 Pet.) 89, 97, 10 L. Ed. 72; Cubberly v. Cubberly, 12 N. J. Law (7 Halst.) 308, 311; Putnam v. Bond, 100 Mass. 58, 60, 1 Am. Rep. 82; Aldrich v. Griffith, 29 Atl. 376, 378, 66 Vt. 390; Hammond v. Ridgeley's Lessee (Md.) 5 Har. & J. 245, 255, 9 Am. Dec. 522; Door v. School Dist. No. 26, 40 Ark. 237, 241; Cleveland v. Burnham, 25 N. W. 407, 409, 64 Wis. 347; Jackson v. Sill (N. Y.) 11 Johns. 201, 215, 6 Am. Dec. 363; Hawkins v. Garland's Adm'r, 76 Va. 149, 152, 44 Am. Rep. 158; Lathrop v. Blake, 23 N. H. 46, 60; Trustees of South New Market Methodist Seminary v. Peaslee, 15 N. H. 317, 327; Eckford v. Eckford, 58 N. W. 1093, 1096, 91 Iowa, 54, 26 L. R. A. 370; Deery v. Cray, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 263.

"A latent ambiguity therefore exists in a sentence or expression only when the real meaning or intention of the writer is hidden or concealed. It does not appear on the face of the words used, nor is its existence known until these words are brought into contact with collateral facts. It is only when you come to apply the words, bringing them alongside the facts which existed when used, and to read them in the exact light in which they were written, that you make up the latent ambiguity, if one exists." Hawkins v. Garland's Adm'r, 76 Va. 149, 152, 44 Am. Rep. 158 (citing Bac. Max. 23).

Latent ambiguity arises where the words of a written instrument are plain and intelligible, but by reason of extraneous facts a certain and definite application of those words is found impossible. In such case, to preserve the instrument, to give it operation and effect, to prevent it from being defeated by uncertainty, parol evidence to explain its intent and to fix its application is admissible. Where a devise is to a particular person by name, and there are two or more of that name; where a bequest is made to a person by name, and there is no person of that name; where a bequest is to a person by description, and there are more persons than one answering that description; where a testator gives a particular chattel, and he has two or more of the same description; where the testator gives a sum, part of his 4 per cent. bank annuities, and had no such stock, but stock of a different kind, called "long annuities"—in such cases facts outside the will render uncertain the application of words in themselves plain, and without explanation from parol evidence the devise or bequest must be void and inoperative." Hand v. Hoffman, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 71, 72.

It is sometimes difficult to say when an ambiguity is apparent on the face of the instrument and when it results from extraneous matters, to which the instrument relates, but which are not defined or specified in it. There seems to be an intermediate class of cases, partaking of the nature both of patent and latent ambiguities, as where the words are all sensible, and have a settled meaning, but at the same time consistently admit of two interpretations, according to the subject-matter in the contemplation of the parties. Martin v. Bell, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 167, 169.

Latent ambiguities in written instruments are those ambiguities which do not arise from the equivocal character of the language employed by the parties, but which arise from facts which are not apparent on the face of the instrument; and it is immaterial whether this fact be judicially known to the court or is shown by parol evidence. Ives v. Kimball, 1 Mich. 308, 313.

When the intention of a party or parties is clearly expressed, and a doubt exists, not as to the intention, but as to the object to which the intention applies, it is a latent ambiguity. Breckenridge v. Duncan, 9 Ky. (2 A. K. Marsh.) 50, 51, 12 Am. Dec. 359.

Ambiguities are of two kinds, latent or patent. A latent ambiguity occurs where the instrument is sufficiently certain and free from ambiguity, but the ambiguity is produced by some extrinsic or some collateral matter out of the instrument, as, for example, where a man devised property to his cousin A., and he has two cousins of that name, the ambiguity is latent, and parol evidence is admissible to explain the same; while a patent ambiguity occurs where a clause in an instrument is so defectively stated that a code of law which has to put a construction on the instrument is unable to collect the intention of the parties. Where by the terms of a contract of subscription a party undertook to give for the purpose of the subscription 20 acres of land, the uncertainty of the description or ambiguity was patent, and could not be rendered certain or explained by parol evidence. Palmer v. Albee, 50 Iowa, 429, 431.

There is a latent ambiguity in the description of premises conveyed in a deed when it is necessary to resort to surrounding circumstances to determine the description intended. Lego v. Medley, 48 N. W. 375, 377, 79 Wis. 211, 24 Am. St. Rep. 706.

A latent ambiguity is one which arises from some collateral circumstance or extrinsic matter, in cases where the instrument is itself sufficiently certain and intelligible. Grimes' Ex'rs v. Harmon, 35 Ind. 198, 208, 9 Am. Rep. 690.

A latent ambiguity arises from circumstances dehors the instrument. Bruckner's Lessee v. Lawrence, 1 Mich. (1 Doug.) 19, 27.

Error and mistake distinguished.

See "Error"; "Mistake."

Patent ambiguity distinguished.

See "Patent Ambiguity."

LATENT DANGERS.

"Latent dangers" are those not seen or perceptible to the senses by their presence. Williams v. Walton & Whann Co. (Del.) 32 Atl. 726, 729, 9 Houst. 322.

LATENT DEED.

A "latent deed" is a deed kept for 20 years or more in a man's scrutoire or strong box. Such a deed, when unaccompanied with actual, distinctive, and adverse possession, is entitled to no consideration in a court of justice, and it is no ground for recovery in an action of ejectment against the actual possessor. Wright v. Wright, 7 N. J. Law (2 Halst.) 175, 177, 11 Am. Dec. 546.

LATENT DEFECT.

In ship.

Under the law of England a provision in a bill of lading exempting the shipowner from liability for damage caused by a latent defect covers damages from a defective rivet in the bulkhead side of a water tank, where the ship being a new one, the tank had been tested by hammer and water pressure, and the defect was where no external examination would have discovered it. The Carib Prince (U. S.) 63 Fed. 266, 268.

The term "latent defects," in a bill of lading exempting the owner from liability for loss occurring by latent defects in hull, even existing before shipment or sailing, does not include an open port, though unknown to the master on sailing. Putnam v. The Manitoba (U. S.) 104 Fed. 145, 151.

A leaky port on a new vessel, so near the water line as would render the steamer unfit for the carriage of cargo in the compartment into which such port opened, cannot be regarded as a "latent defect," since it was easily discoverable upon inspection by the water test, a test which is easily made, and which is customarily made, and which reasonable prudence requires to be made, as respects ports near the water line before a ship sails on her first voyage. The Phoenix (U. S.) 90 Fed. 116, 118.

A defect, in order to be latent, within the exceptions in a bill of lading of injuries arising from latent defects in hull, etc., must have been not discoverable at the time of the shipment. Such exception includes a latent and undiscovered defect in a rivet which existed at the commencement of the voyage, and therefore limits the implied warranty of seaworthiness if due diligence has been exercised. The Carib Prince (U. S.) 68 Fed. 254, 255, 15 C. C. A. 385.

In title.

A latent defect in the title of the vendor of real estate, entitling the vendee to a rescission of the contract, is one not discoverable by inspection made with ordinary care. A survey which would have disclosed the condition of the lot is too extreme diligence to be required. Newell v. Turner (Ala.) 9 Port. 420, 422.

LATU SENSU.

"Latu sensu" generally includes persons related or connected in the ascending line by consanguinity or affinity, and in a more restricted sense it includes only those related by consanguinity. Bernard v. Vignaud (La.) 10 Mart. (O. S.) 482, 561.

LATERAL RAILROAD.

According to Webster "lateral" means proceeding from the side, as the lateral branches of a tree, lateral shoots; and this is the sense in which this word is to be understood when branch or lateral railroads are spoken of, and a lateral railroad is nothing more than an offshoot from the main line or stem, and the mere fact that a contemplated road runs in the same general direction with the main track will not deprive it of the character of a branch or lateral road, within the meaning of a charter giving the railroad power to construct branch or lateral roads. Blanton v. Richmond, F. & P. R. Co., 10 S. E. 925, 926, 86 Va. 618.

A "lateral road" is but another name for a branch road. Both must have a principal road from which they proceed. They are appendages to, and are properly a part of, the main line, and must proceed from some part of the main trunk between its termini. Newhall v. Galena & C. U. R. Co., 14 Ill. (4 Peck) 273, 276.

Whether a particular portion of a railway is a lateral or branch railroad, or not, does not depend upon its length or direction; but it must be connected with and lead from a main line already constructed in order to be such, and where a charter of a railroad company empowers it to construct only one specified branch road, another road, incorporated by the law of a different state, operated by the first road, is not a branch of such road, within a deed reserving a right of way over the granted premises in favor of such road or any of its branches; the word "branches" being taken to mean such branches as the railroad company was or might be legally authorized to construct. Biles v. Tacoma, O. & G. H. R. Co., 32 Pac. 211, 213, 5 Wash. 509.

LATH.

"Lath" is defined to be a thin strip of wood, nailed to studs and furring to support the plastering, which is defined to be a mixture of lime, hair, and sand, to cover lath work between timbers or roof walling; and where the specifications of a building contract contain a general heading called "Plastering," under which lathing and plastering is described, and a contractor undertakes to do the plastering, it will be construed to mean all included under the general title, including the lathing. Mellen v. Ford (U. S.) 28 Fed. 639, 642, 644.

LATTER PART.

A contract fixing the time for performance as the "latter part of January" should be construed to mean the whole of that part. A suit is not maintainable until after the expiration of that time. Bailey v. Ricketts, 4 Ind. 488, 491.

LAUDANUM.

Laudanum "is an alcoholic preparation of opium, known in medical science as the tincture of opium, but properly known as laudanum; and very many people have no knowledge that the liquid known to them as 'laudanum' contains any opium whatever." Higbee v. Guardian Mut. Life Ins. Co. of New York (N. Y.) 66 Barb. 462, 472.

LAUNCH.

To launch is to cause to move or slide from the land into the water. The launching is a definite period, one well understood in shipbuilding. Homer v. The Lady of the Ocean, 70 Me. 350, 352.

LAUNDRY.

A laundry is a place where clothes are washed. Commonwealth v. Pearl Laundry Co., 49 S. W. 26, 28, 105 Ky. 259.

LAUNDRYMAN.

A laundryman is one whose business it is to wash clothes. This term, however, does not include persons who merely receive and collect soiled clothes to be washed, acting as agents of those engaged in the laundry business, and receiving by way of compensation a discount from the price charged the general public. Commonwealth v. Pearl Laundry Co., 49 S. W. 26, 28, 105 Ky. 259.

Law is the enforcement of justice among men. McAllister v. Marshall (Pa.) 6 Bin. 338, 350, 6 Am. Dec. 458.

"The definitions of the term 'law,' as found in our older text-books and in the English writers, failed to express the American idea of that term. Blackstone defines it to be 'a rule of action prescribed by the supreme power of a state, commanding what is right and forbidding what is wrong.' A definition of law in the sense in which it is used in America is 'a rule of conduct prescribed to the state or people thereof in accord with the Constitution of the United States and of the states, when enacted by a state Legislature.'" State v. McCann, 72 Tenn. (4 Lea) 1, 9.

Law is such rules as are prescribed by the supreme authority for the government of human action. State v. Hockett, 70 Iowa, 442, 454, 30 N. W. 742, 744. "Law is a rule of action." People v. Tiphaine (N. Y.) 3 Parker, Cr. R. 241, 244 (quoting 1 Bl. Comm. 44). Law is a rule of conduct. Johnson v. Detrick, 53 S. W. 891, 893, 152 Mo. 243. Law is a rule of civil conduct, prescribed by the supreme power of the state. Thorne v. Cramer (N. Y.) 15 Barb. 112, 114.

Law is the rule of action prescribed by a superior, which an inferior is bound to obey. People v. Quant (N. Y.) 12 How. Prac. 83, 89.

Law is a rule of action prescribed by the supreme power in the state. This involves the idea, not of local regulation, but of a general rule, alike applicable to all the state. Pope v. Phifer, 50 Tenn. (3 Heisk.) 682, 701.

Law is defined as a rule of conduct or right. The term implies that it is a rule for future cases. O'Donoghue v. Akin, 63 Ky. (2 Duv.) 478, 480.

Law is a rule, not a transient, sudden order from a superior to or concerning a particular person, but something permanent, uniform, and universal. In re Opinion of the Justices, 33 Atl. 1076, 1078, 66 N. H. 629.

Law is a mode of human action respecting society, and must be governed by the same rules of equity which govern every private action. State v. Ludington, 33 Wis. 107, 116.

"Law signifies a rule of action, and in its most general and comprehensive sense it applies indiscriminately to all kinds of actions. Law is a rule of civil conduct prescribed by competent authority." Davis v. Ballard, 24 Ky. (1 J. J. Marsh.) 563, 576.

Law is a system of rules conformable to the standards of justice and on an enlarged view of the relations of persons and things as they practically exist. It is a mass of principles classified, reduced to order and put in the shape of rules, agreed on by ascertaining the common consent of mankind. Duncan v. Magette, 25 Tex. 245, 253.

"Laws," when used in reference to the legislative power to make laws and to alter and repeal them, means rules of civil conduct or statutes which the legislative will has prescribed. State v. Denny, 21 N. E. 252, 254, 118 Ind. 382, 4 L. R. A. 79 (citing Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 90).

Law is not an exact science, and, as said in Citizens' Loan, Fund & Sav. Ass'n v. Friedley, 23 N. E. 1075, 123 Ind. 143, 7 L. R. A. 669, 18 Am. St. Rep. 320, there is no attainable degree of skill or expense at which all differences of opinion or doubt in respect to questions of law are removed from the minds of lawyers and judges. Hill v. Mynatt (Tenn.) 59 S. W. 163, 167, 52 L. R. A. 883.

The laws of a state are the rules and enactments promulgated by the legislative authority thereof, or long-established local customs having the force of laws. Phelps v. The City of Panama, 1 Wash. T. 518, 523.

The word "law" has a fixed and definite meaning. In its general sense it imports a rule of action, and more particularly it means a rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power in the state, commanding what is right and prohibiting what is wrong. The law is an emanation from the supreme power, and cannot originate elsewhere. It is a rule which every citizen of the state is bound to obey. Baldwin v. City of Philadelphia, 99 Pa. 164, 170.

Law is a solemn expression of the will of the supreme power of the state. Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 5150; Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 4466.

A law is a rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power of a state, which under the Constitution and for this purpose is the Legislature. Leavenworth

County Com'rs v. Miller, 7 Kan. 479, 501, 12 Am. Rep. 425.

Law is a rule of civil conduct, prescribed by the lawmaking power of the state, commanding what is right or prohibiting what is wrong. Budd v. State, 22 Tenn. (3 Humph.) 483, 490, 39 Am. Dec. 189; Appeal of Locke, 72 Pa. (22 P. F. Smith) 491, 508, 13 Am. Rep. 716.

Law is a rule of property and of conduct prescribed by the sovereign power. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 2690; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2.

The term "laws" includes, not only written expressions of the governing will, but also all other rules of property and conduct, in which the supreme power exhibits, and according to which it exerts, its governmental force. Phelps v. The City of Panama, 1 Wash. T. 518, 523.

Law is the solemn expression of legislative will. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 1.

The law in a state is defined to be those rules which are ordained and made known by the Legislature, for the government of the people in the state, which they are bound to obey. Blackstone says it is a rule of civil conduct. "Law is," says he, "not a transient order from a superior to or concerning a particular person or thing, but something permanent, uniform, and universal. Therefore a particular act of the Legislature to confiscate the goods of Titus, or to attain him of high treason, does not enter into the idea of the law, for the operation of this act is spent on Titus only, and has no relation to the community in general." In Jacob's Law Dictionary, law is thus defined: "It is a rule and bond of men's actions, or it is a rule for the well government of a civil society, to give to every man that which doth belong to him." Rutherford, a writer on Natural Law, defines law to be, as applicable to the actions of men, a rule to which men are obliged to make their actions conformable. 1 Ruth. Inst. p. 15. Judge Kent defined law to be "a rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power in a state." State, to Use of Gentry, v. Fry, 4 Mo. 120, 189.

Law is defined as a rule prescribed by the sovereign power, and incidentally it is said there is no such thing as a general commercial or general common law separate from and irrespective of a particular state or government whose authority makes it law. By whom is a general commercial law prescribed, and what tribunal has authority or recognition to declare or enforce it outside of the local jurisdiction of the government it represents? Even the law of nations, the widest reaching of all, is a law only in name. The so-called commercial law is likewise only a name. Upon many questions arising in the business dealings of men the laws of modern civilized states are substantially the same, and it is therefore common to say that such is the commercial law, but except as a convenient phrase such general law does not exist. There must be a state or government of which every law can be predicated and to whose authority it owes its existence as a law. Without such sanction it is not law at all. Forepaugh v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 18 Atl. 503, 504, 128 Pa. 217, 5 L. R. A. 508, 15 Am. St. Rep. 672.

"Every law may be said to consist of several parts: One declaratory, whereby the rights to be observed and the wrongs to be eschewed are clearly defined and laid down; another directory, whereby the subject is instructed and enjoined to observe those rights and abstain from the commission of those wrongs; a third remedial, whereby a method is pointed out to recover a man's private rights or redress his private wrongs; to which may be added a fourth, usually termed the sanction or vindicatory branch of the law, whereby it is signified what evil or penalty shall be incurred by such as commit any public wrongs and transgress or neglect their duty. Of all the parts of the law the most effectual is the vindicatory; for it is but lost labor to say, 'Do this,' or 'Avoid that,' unless we also declare, 'This shall be the consequence of your noncompliance.' The main strength and force of a law consists in the penalty annexed to it." State v. Sawn, 44 N. W. 492, 493, 1 N. D. 5.

As act.

The language of the constitutional provision that no legislative enactment shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title, differs in some respects in the different states. In some the word "act" is used, while in others the word "bill" or "law" is used. However, each of these provisions, as presented to the courts, means the final determination of the Legislature upon the particular subject embraced in such bill, act, or law. The word "act" is probably the best word to use; for it includes no action of the Legislature or of any person prior to the final act of the Legislature, and it includes the whole of the act, nothing more and nothing less. The word "law" is probably the worst word to use; for a portion of any act may be law, as well as the whole of the act. The word, however, as used in such connection, is intended to be synonymous with "act." Sedgwick County Com'rs v. Bailey, 13 Kan. 600, 608.

In the Constitution of New York the words "bill," "law," and "act" are used somewhat indefinitely; but it seems that there is little difference between the terms. People v. Lawrence (N. Y.) 36 Barb. 177, 187.

As all legislative enactments.

In Const. art. 14, § 15, providing that the General Assembly shall by law fix the compensation of certain officers according to the population in their respective counties, and that such law shall fix the scale of fees to be charged, the word "law" is not synonymous with "act." The word "law" means here law in a general sense, whatever has been enacted by the Legislature, whether it is embodied in one act, or in any number of acts; and, so far as the use of the term "law" in this section is concerned, it cannot be construed as compelling the Legislature to embody in one act provision for fees and salaries. Airy v. People, 40 Pac. 362, 365, 21 Colo. 144.

As both statute and common law.

The term "law," in R. L. § 4365, providing that, where an offense is declared by law to be punishable by imprisonment, etc., shall be construed to mean that it shall be in the house of correction, is not limited to statute law, but includes the common law, whenever it defines an offense and makes it punishable by imprisonment. State v. Dyer, 32 Atl. 814, 817, 67 Vt. 690.

"Laws of the state," as used in Rev. Laws, §§ 3610, 3618, providing that, before an insurance company located in a sister state could make a valid contract of insurance in Vermont, it must obtain from the Secretary of State a license for that purpose, and must be responsible by "the laws of the state" in which it is situated for the acts and neglects of its agents, as between the company and the assured and applicants for insurance, should not be construed as meaning only statute laws, but includes as well the common law, though the words "laws of the state" are more usually understood to mean the rules and enactments promulgated by the legislative authority thereof. Lycoming Fire Ins. Co. v. Wright, 12 Atl. 103, 107, 60 Vt. 515.

As common law.

While in an enlarged sense the word "law" may include positive, as well as common, law, yet in technical precision the word "law" is usually restricted to the common law, and other words, such as "statute" or "act," are applied to legislative provisions. So it is held that a conclusion of a declaration of debt for a penalty under a statute, "contrary to the law in such case made and provided," is not equivalent to a conclusion "contrary to the statute in such cases made and provided." Smith v. United States (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 694, 696.

Contract distinguished.

"There is a distinction," says Blackstone, "between a contract and a law. A law is called a rule, to distinguish it from a contract or agreement." So it is held that a public law, the objects and purposes of which were of a public nature, is not a contract, so as to be beyond the future control of the legislative power. Landon v. Town of Litchfield, 11 Conn. 251, 266.

Corporate charter.

The charter of a private corporation, enacted by the Legislature of another state, is a law, within the meaning of Code Proc. § 426, which declares that "printed copies in volumes of statutes, codes, or other written law" of other states shall be admissible in evidence in courts of this state. Persse & Brooks Paper Works v. Willett (N. Y.) 19 Abb. Prac. 416.

Decisions.

The term "law," as used in section 34 of the federal judiciary act of 1789, refers to the acts of Legislatures or to established local customs having the force of law, and the decisions of state courts do not constitute law within the meaning of the act. They are merely evidence of what the laws are. Phipps v. Harding (U. S.) 70 Fed. 468, 473, 17 C. C. A. 203, 30 L. R. A. 513.

Within Code, § 291, providing that "existing provisions of law" not in conflict, etc., shall apply to executions, etc., includes the law as established by the courts, as well as that established by the Legislature. Nelson v. Kerr (N. Y.) 2 Thomp. & C. 299, 301.

The decisions of courts are not law, but only evidence of the law. In Paul v. Davis, 100 Ind. 422, the court said: "A judicial decision does not make unalterable law, nor is it the law in the sense that statutes are law." So, also, the case of Yates v. Lansing, 9 Johns. 395, 415, 6 Am. Dec. 290, holding that the decisions of courts are not the law, but only evidence of the law. In another case it was said: "I hope we shall consider what a decision really is, and treat it accordingly, not as the law, nor as giving the law, but simply evidence of the law, and not conclusive evidence, but only prima facie evidence, of what the law is." Falconer v. Simmons, 41 S. E. 193, 194, 51 W. Va. 172 (citing Henry v. Bank of Salina [N. Y.] 5 Hill, 523, 535).

The term "law" includes decisions of courts, as well as legislative acts. Miller v. Dunn, 14 Pac. 27, 29, 72 Cal. 462, 1 Am. St. Rep. 67.

Judiciary Act 1789, c. 20, § 34, provides that "the laws of the several states, except where the Constitution and treaties or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, where they apply"; and it was claimed that this furnished a rule obligatory on the court in all cases to which they apply. In order to maintain the argument, it is essential, therefore, to hold that the word "laws" in this section includes within the scope of its meaning decisions of the local tribunals. In the ordinary use of language it will hardly be contended that the decisions of courts constitute laws. They are at most only evidence of what the laws are, and are not of themselves laws. The laws of a state are more usually understood to mean the rules and enactments promulgated by the legislative authority thereof, or long-established local customs having the force of laws. In all the various cases which have hitherto come before us for decision, this court has uniformly supposed that the true interpretation of this section limited its application to state laws strictly local; that is to say, to the positive statutes of the state and the construction thereof adopted by the local tribunals, and to rights and titles to things having a permanent locality, such as the rights and titles to real estate and other matters immovable and intraterritorial in their nature and character. It never has been supposed by us that the section did apply or was designed to apply to questions of a more general nature, not at all depending upon local statutes or local usages of a fixed and permanent operation, as, for example, to the construction of ordinary contracts or other written instruments, and especially to questions of general commercial laws, where the state tribunals are called upon to perform the like functions as ourselves; that is, to ascertain upon general reasoning and legal analogies what is the true exposition of the contract or instrument, or what is the just rule furnished by the principles of commercial law to govern the case. Swift v. Tyson, 41 U. S. (16 Pet.) 1, 18, 19, 10 L. Ed. 865; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Baugh, 13 Sup. Ct. 914, 915, 149 U. S. 368, 37 L. Ed. 772.

"The decisions of the highest court of a state are not the laws of that jurisdiction. As was said by Mr. Justice Story in the case of Swift v. Tyson, 41 U. S. (16 Pet.) 1, 10 L. Ed. 865: 'In the ordinary use of language, it will hardly be contended that the decisions of courts constitute laws. They are, at most, only evidence of what the laws are, and are not of themselves laws. They are often re-examined, reversed, and qualified by the courts themselves, whenever they are found to be either defective, ill-founded, or otherwise incorrect.'" United States Savings & Loan Co. v. Harris (U. S.) 113 Fed. 27, 35.

Act under delegated power.

A law is not a complete law, when it is nothing more than a delegated power attempted to be given by the Legislature to some other department of the government to make the law, so that the provisions of an act that the compensation of a clerk of the Court of Appeals shall be fixed by the court is a violation of the constitutional provision that the compensation of such officer shall be fixed and provided by law. Commonwealth v. Addams, 26 S. W. 581, 582, 95 Ky. 588.

By Consolidation Act, § 83, as amended by St. 1865-66, p. 436, it is declared that the term "law," or "laws," as used in the act, shall not be understood as applicable to any regulation of the board of education or of the board of supervisors, but only applicable to the Constitution and the laws made or adopted by the Legislature in pursuance thereof. City and County of San Francisco v. Broderick, 111 Cal. 302, 307, 43 Pac. 960.

As domestic laws.

"Law," within the meaning of the rule that ignorance of law will not excuse, is limited to the laws of one's own country, and does not include foreign laws, which are to be treated as facts. Marshall v. Coleman, 58 N. E. 628, 637, 187 Ill. 556.

As used in the collateral inheritance tax act, which provides that certain named societies, exempted by law from taxation, should not be liable to the tax, "law" means the law of New York; and hence a legacy to an institution falling within those exempted, but located in and incorporated under the laws of another state, is subject to the tax. In re McCoskey's Estate, 1 N. Y. Supp. 782, 783, 6 Dem. Sur. 438.

"A law is a rule of conduct prescribed by the lawmaking power of the state. 1 Kent, Comm. 447. The term 'law' is confined to enactments of the Legislature of the state. In re Burchard (N. Y.) 27 Hun, 429, 436. When the Legislature speaks in general terms of the laws, or of things authorized by law, the expression must be understood as having exclusive reference to the laws of this state. People v. Sturdevant (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 418, 420." The term "law" in Pen. Code, § 96, making it perjury for any person to falsely swear that any certificate made by him as required by law is true, is limited to certificates required by the law of the state, and therefore an officer of a foreign corporation making a false oath before a notary public as to the amount of the capital stock, as required by the laws of a foreign state, but not by the state of New York, is not guilty of perjury. People v. Martin, 76 N. Y. Supp. 953, 954, 38 Misc. Rep. 67.

Fact distinguished.

See "Fact."

Future law.

As used in the bond of a collector of customs, conditioned that he should faithfully discharge the duties of his office according to law, any law is meant that was on the statute books at the date of the bond, or that might be passed during the collector's term, prescribing the powers and duties of his office. United States v. Gausson (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 1207.

The term "law and equity," as used in the federal Constitution relating to the judicial power of the United States, though intended to mark and fix the distinction between the two systems of jurisprudence as known and practiced at the time of its adoption, does not restrict the jurisdiction to the rights and remedies then recognized. Ellis v. Davis, 3 Sup. Ct. 327, 334, 109 U. S. 485, 27 L. Ed. 1006.

It has often been deemed that the term "law and equity," as used in the Constitution, giving to the courts of the United States jurisdiction in cases in law and equity, although intended to mark and fix the distinction between the two systems of jurisprudence as known and practiced at the time of its adoption, does not restrict the jurisdiction conferred by it to the very rights and remedies then recognized and employed, but embraces as well not only rights newly created by statutes of the states, as in cases of action for the loss occasioned to survivors by the death of a person caused by the wrongful act, neglect, or default of another, but new forms of remedies to be administered in the courts of the United States according to the nature of the case, so as to save to suitors the right of trial by jury in cases in which they are entitled to it according to courts and analogy of the common law. Ellis v. Davis, 3 Sup. Ct. 327, 334, 109 U. S. 485, 27 L. Ed. 1006.

As general law.

As used in Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 2400, requiring each surveyor general to survey all logs and timber running out of any boom chartered by law in his district, the term "chartered by law" does not refer simply to corporations incorporated under special acts, but includes also corporations organized under the general law, with authority to maintain booms. They are as much chartered by law as those organized under special acts. Lindsay & Phelps Co. v. Mullen, 20 Sup. Ct. 325, 329, 176 U. S. 126, 44 L. Ed. 400.

The term "law," when used without restriction or qualification, refers not to a special charter or private act, but to the public law of the state or sovereignty. McMurray v. Wright (Colo. App.) 73 Pac. 257, 261; Aichele v. Chamberlain, Id.

As general mass of jurisprudence.

The term "law," as used in its popular sense and in its common acceptance by those for whom laws are made, includes the whole body or system of rules of conduct, including the decisions of courts, as well as legislative acts. It is not confined to those rules which are constitutional and technically perfect. It is so used under Const. art. 4, § 32, which forbids the Legislature to pay claims against the state under an agreement made without express authority of law. Miller v. Dunn, 14 Pac. 27, 29, 72 Cal. 462, 1 Am. St. Rep. 67.

As used in Rev. St. c. 37, § 24, providing that no deed of trust or mortgage shall be valid at law to pass any property as against creditors or purchasers for a valuable consideration, except from the registration of such deed, does not "mean simply that it shall be held invalid in a court of law only, but invalid in all courts. 'At law' is not an expression which in a statute signifies merely a legal tribunal, as distinguished from the equitable jurisdiction, but generally our system of jurisprudence, whether legal or equitable." Fleming v. Burgin, 37 N. C. 584, 589; Hooker v. Nichols, 21 S. E. 207, 208, 116 N. C. 157.

The term "law," as used in the constitutional provision that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, embraces all legal and equitable rules defining human rights and duties and providing for their enforcement, not only as between man and man, but also between the state and its citizens. Jenkins v. Ballantyne, 30 Pac. 760, 8 Utah, 245, 16 L. R. A. 689.

Comp. Laws 1884, providing that the jurisdiction of the probate court shall be "as limited by law," refers not only to laws to be thereafter made by the territorial Legislature, but includes also the general history of jurisprudence and the organic act itself. Perea v. Barela, 23 Pac. 766, 770, 5 N. M. 458.

The phrase "as limited by law," in the organic act (10 Stat. 172), creating the territorial probate courts, and providing that their jurisdiction should be "as limited by law," was construed in Ferris v. Higley, 87 U. S. (20 Wall.) 375, 22 L. Ed. 383, to mean that the territorial probate courts should have such jurisdiction as the history of England and American jurisprudence shows to have been conferred upon courts organized for the establishment of wills and the administration of the estates of decedents, with such functions as have been added by statute concerning the guardianship of infants, allotment of dower, and others relating more or less to the same general subject. In that case a statute which had attempted to make the probate courts of Utah courts of general jurisdiction co-ordinate to the district court was held invalid; it being argued that the word "law," in the phrase "as limited by law," meant the acts of the territorial Legislature, in the absence of congressional enactment. But this position was denied, although the court said that it was not prepared to say that no law made by the Legislature of the territory was embraced in the word "law" as used in the phrase. It was held in the case at bar that the provision of the statutes of Washington authorizing probate courts to construe wills was not in conflict with the organic act. Webster v. Seattle Trust Co., 35 Pac. 1082, 1083, 7 Wash. 642.

Within the meaning of Const. Minn. art. 6, § 7, providing for the office of clerk of a probate court and that his duties shall be prescribed by law, the word "law" is not used as synonymous with "statute," but in the broader sense includes both statutory and common law. Hence, when a Legislature provided that the clerk should perform such duties assigned to him by law and by such judge, and that before entering on the duties of the office such clerk shall take the oath required by law and execute a bond, it is fairly implied that, when such clerk acts in a manner to indicate that he is the custodian of the records and the keeper of its seal, he is exercising the functions of a clerk of a judicial tribunal, and a certificate to a decree of distribution authenticated by the clerk is sufficient. Fitzpatrick v. Simonson Bros. Mfg. Co., 90 N. W. 378, 381, 86 Minn. 140.

Justice distinguished.

See "Justice."

As law of insurrectionary state.

"Law," as used in a bond given by a guardian, conditioned that, if the said guardian well and truly performed all the duties which might be by law required of him as guardian, then the obligation shall be void, the bond being executed on the 16th day of April, 1861, in the state of Alabama, is construed to mean the law of the insurgent government of Alabama. Van Epps v. Walsh (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 986.

As law of the case.

The words "according to law," as used in a judgment of the appellate court remanding a cause to the trial court for further proceedings according to law, mean according to the opinion of the court filed upon that appeal; for, without regard to the merit or demerit of that opinion, it necessarily became the law of the case. Winner v. Hoyt, 32 N. W. 128, 130, 68 Wis. 278.

As legal obligations.

"Law," as used in Rev. St. § 753 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 592], providing that a party seeking the benefit of a writ of habeas corpus must show that he is in custody for an act done or omitted in pursuance of a law of the United States, includes any obligation fairly and properly inferable from the Constitution of the United States or any duty of a United States marshal to be derived from the general scope of his duties under the laws of the United States. An act done by a United States marshal to protect the person of a United States judge from injury is an act done pursuant to a law of the United States. Cunningham v. Neagle, 10 Sup. Ct. 658, 666, 135 U. S. 1, 34 L. Ed. 55.

As legal proceedings.

"Benefit of law," as used in St. 1818, c. 113, requiring a physician to be licensed or graduated to entitle him to the benefit of law for the recovery of compensation, is to be construed as equivalent to the phrase "benefit of legal proceedings," and to include "all modes in which payment of a debt may be obtained by process of law or other legal proceedings, such as set-off, claim before commissioners of insolvency, and the like." Hewitt v. Wilcox, 42 Mass. (1 Metc.) 154, 155.

Municipal ordinance.

"Law," as used in Const. art. 10, § 7, prohibiting the Legislature from passing any local or civil law regulating the affairs of towns or boroughs, cannot be construed to include an ordinance of a borough. Klinger v. Bickel, 11 Atl. 555, 557, 117 Pa. 326.

"Law of this state," as used in Pen. Code, § 435, providing that every person carrying on any business, trade, profession, or calling for which a license is required by any law of this state, without taking out or procuring such license, is guilty of a misdemeanor, should be construed to include a city ordinance requiring a person to pay a tax carrying on business as a liquor dealer. Ex parte Lawrence, 11 Pac. 217, 218, 69 Cal. 608; Ex parte Christenson, 24 Pac. 747, 748, 85 Cal. 208.

Const. art. 6, § 7, provided that the judges of the Court of Appeals, etc., should severally receive for their services the compensation to be established by law. By an act passed shortly after the adoption of the Constitution the Legislature fixed the salary of such judges at a certain amount. By Act April 16, 1852, the board of supervisors of the county of New York were authorized to raise by tax upon said county, and pay to the justices of the Supreme Court, resident in the First district, such additional annual compensation as they may deem proper. It was held that the additional compensation fixed by the board of supervisors, pursuant to the statute, was established by "law" within the meaning of the Constitution. In the course of this opinion, the court said: "A general law can be enacted only by the state Legislature. A special law, however, may be passed by the board of supervisors of the county, where the requisite power has been conferred upon it by the sovereign legislative authority. In the case under consideration, the power was expressly conferred. If the resolution of the board of supervisors has not all the attributes of the local law, it may yet be valid as an exercise of the power conferred by the Legislature. The Constitution does not require that the amount of compensation shall be specified in any general statute. It calls for legislative action. That is the basis required, but the superstructure may be fashioned pursuant to such provisions as may be established by the Legislature. An act is as essentially accomplished by law, when performed pursuant to the statute, as if consummated by the statute itself. The power of determining whether an expenditure shall be met by general or local taxation is vested solely in the state Legislature." People v. Edmonds (N. Y.) 15 Barb. 529, 533.

"Laws," as used in a city charter authorizing the common council to pass all proper and necessary laws, is to be construed as meaning ordinances. The terms "laws" and "ordinances," when applied to municipal corporations, are synonymous terms. Pimental v. City of San Francisco, 21 Cal. 351, 361.

Order.

See "Order (In Parliamentary Law)."

As part of an act.

"Laws," as used in Act 1882, relating to distribution of the revenue from all sources, except the poll tax, and its disposition, and providing that "all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed," does not include a provision of a prior act applying a poll tax to the county school fund. A law is a rule of action prescribed by the Legislature. A complicated revenue act, prescribing the modes of assessment, collection, paying over, and distribution of taxes by the various officers designated by law for the purpose, contains several separate and distinct rules of action, and in that sense the revenue act may be regarded as containing several separate and distinct laws. There is one law for the assessment of the property tax, another for the assessment of the poll tax, several for the assessment of the various license taxes, another for the collection of taxes, others for the distribution of the tax moneys, and still others for the payment of the same to the respective county and territorial treasurers. Repealing the laws or rules of action in regard to the various modes of raising revenue, which relate alone to the assessment and collection of taxes, does not of itself necessarily repeal the law or rule of action as to the distribution of the revenue after it has been raised. Territory v. Luna, 3 Pac. 241, 244, 3 N. M. 146.

As practice of law.

In the Century Dictionary "law" is described as "a lucrative science, a professional science," and with it are included medicine and theology. United States v. Massachusetts General Hospital (U. S.) 100 Fed. 932, 938.

Private act.

A joint resolution of the General Assembly, authorizing a particular suit to be brought against the state in a certain county, was held in Commonwealth v. Haly, 51 S. W. 430, 106 Ky. 716, not to be a law, within Const. Ky. § 231, providing that "the General Assembly may by law direct in what manner and in what courts suits may be brought against the commonwealth." Our Legislature is clothed with the simple power to enact laws and do some other things expressly authorized by the Constitution. Beyond this the Legislature has no power at all. To grant a divorce is not to enact a law. An expression of the will of the lawmaking power that the marriage relation is dissolved is no law. It is a decree, an order, a judgment, and not a law. A law is a rule, something permanent, uniform, and universal. A divorce begins with the parties, and ends with the parties. It is a single act, and begins and expires with the performance of a single function. Bingham v. Miller, 17 Ohio, 445, 448, 49 Am. Dec. 471.

The expression of the will of the lawmaking power that a marriage relation is dissolved is no law. It is a decree, a sentence, an order, a judgment, but not a law. A law is a rule; something permanent. To grant a divorce is not to enact a law. Bryson v. Miller, 17 Mo. 590, 594 (citing Bingham v. Miller, 17 Ohio, 445, 448, 49 Am. Dec. 471).

Resolution.

"Law," as used in Const. art. 4, § 31, which declares that no money shall be drawn from the treasurer but in pursuance of an appropriation made by law, does not include a resolution of the state Senate requiring its president and secretary to certify the accounts of its duly elected and appointed officers for their per diem compensation during the recess. Reynolds v. Blue, 47 Ala. 711.

A resolution is not a law, but merely the form in which the legislative body expresses an opinion. Chicago & N. P. R. Co. v. City of Chicago, 51 N. E. 596, 598, 174 Ill. 439; Village of Altamont v. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co., 56 N. E. 340, 341, 184 Ill. 47.

State Constitutions.

The Constitution of a state is a "law" of that state, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States prohibiting states from passing laws impairing obligations of contracts. Bier v. McGehee, 13 Sup. Ct. 580, 581, 148 U. S. 137, 37 L. Ed. 397; New Orleans Gaslight Co. v. Louisiana Light & Heat Producing & Mfg. Co., 6 Sup. Ct.

"Law," as used in Const. art. 4, § 23, providing that no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by "law," should be construed to include the Constitution, when it declares that certain officers shall receive a certain sum as compensation. State v. Hickman, 23 Pac. 740, 743, 9 Mont. 370, 8 L. R. A. 403.

Under a constitutional provision that no money shall be drawn from the treasury except in pursuance of a specific appropriation made by law, it is held that another constitutional provision fixing the salary of an officer and providing that the auditor shall draw warrants of the state quarterly therefor, which shall be paid out of any other fund not otherwise appropriated, is an appropriation made by law within the meaning of the provision first quoted; the Constitution being the supreme law of the state. State v. Weston, 4 Neb. 216, 218.

As used in the clause of the federal Constitution prohibiting the states from passing any law impairing the obligation of a contract, the term "law" includes a provision in a state Constitution which impairs such contracts, as well as a statute. Fisk v. Jefferson Police Jury, 6 Sup. Ct. 329, 330, 116 U. S. 131, 29 L. Ed. 587.

"Laws now in force," in a constitutional provision that all laws now in force which are not in conflict or inconsistent with this Constitution shall continue in force until amended or repealed by the General Assembly, means statutes passed by the Legislature, and not constitutional provisions, which cannot be amended or repealed by the Legislature. Evans v. Clark, 40 S. W. 771, 773, 1 Ind. T. 216.

As statute.

"Law," as used in a statute relating to things "exempt from attachment by law," means exempt by statute. In re Keene, 3 Atl. 418, 419, 15 R. I. 294.

Const. art. 3, § 13, providing that no "law" shall extend the term of any public officer, or increase or diminish his salary or emoluments after his election or appointment, has a fixed and definite meaning, and applies only to acts of the Legislature. McCormick v. Fayette County, 24 Atl. 667, 668, 150 Pa. 190.

"The term 'law,' as defined by the elementary writers, emanates from the sovereignty, and not from its creatures. The legislative power of the state is vested in the state Legislature, and their enactments are the only instruments that can in any proper sense be called laws." People v. Common Council of Bay City, 36 Mich. 186, 190.

"Law," as used in Const. art. 4, § 7, par. 4, providing that no act shall be passed which shall provide that any existing law, or any part thereof, shall be made or deemed a part of the act, or which shall enact that any existing law, or any part thereof, shall be applicable, except by inserting it in such act, means an enactment of the Legislature, and not every rule of civil conduct, and does not include the by-laws of game protective societies. Allen v. Wyckoff, 2 Atl. 659, 661, 48 N. J. Law (19 Vroom) 90, 57 Am. Rep. 548.

Every bill which has been passed by the Legislature, as provided by the Constitution and statutes, and been approved and signed by the Governor, or which he shall not have returned with objections within the prescribed period, or, if returned with objections, should be agreed to by the requisite number of each house, thereupon becomes a law within the meaning of that word as used in Code, § 426. Persse & Brooks Paper Works v. Willett, 24 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Rob.) 131, 145.

Acts 1885, No. 232, § 17, provides that any corporation organized under its provisions may amend its articles of association in any manner not inconsistent with the act, and such amendment shall have the same force and effect as though such amendment had been included in the original articles. Section 33 provides that any corporation organized under this act, whose corporate existence is about to "terminate by limitation of law," may by resolution continue its corporate existence for a further term, not exceeding 30 years. Const. art. 15, § 10, provides that no corporation shall be created for a longer period than 30 years. Held, that the words "terminate by limitation of law," in section 33, Act 1885, apply only to the statutory or constitutional limitation of 30 years, and not to the limitation expressed in the articles of association, and a corporation created under Act 1885, whose corporate existence is fixed by its by-laws at less than 30 years, may extend such corporate existence by amending its by-laws under section 17. Ovid Elevator Co. v. Secretary of State, 51 N. W. 536, 90 Mich. 466.

Expressions in statutes, such as "required by law," "prescribed by law," "regulated by law," etc., refer to statutory provisions only; and so it is held that the expression "liability created by law," in Code

Civ. Proc. § 394, providing that that chapter shall not affect an action against a director or stockholder of a moneyed corporation to recover a penalty or forfeiture, or to enforce a liability "created by law," refers to a statute of the state, and not to the general law recognized therein. Brinckerhoff v. Bostwick, 1 N. E. 663, 665, 99 N. Y. 183.

Const. art. 7, § 20, declares that the Governor and certain other officers shall receive for their services a compensation as fixed by law, which shall not be diminished or increased, so as to affect the salary of any officer during his term, and that the compensation of the officers named, until otherwise provided by law, is fixed as follows, etc. A statute was passed during relator's incumbency as Governor, fixing the salaries of such officers, which raised the Governor's salary from $2,000, as fixed by the Constitution, to $4,000, and at the same session an appropriation was made for the salaries of such officers for the current and succeeding years at the sums fixed. It was held that the word "law," used in a constitutional provision that the compensation of the officers named, until otherwise provided by law, is as follows, meant statutory law, which excluded the Constitution itself, so that the salaries named in the statute were the salaries provided by law, and the statute did not constitute an increase of the salary provided by law, within the prohibition of the Constitution. In reaching this conclusion the court cites various other sections of the statute in which the term "law" is obviously used in the sense of "statutory law," and bases its holding largely on the rule that, where a word is repeatedly used in the statute, it will be presumed to bear the same meaning throughout the statute, unless there is something to show that another meaning is intended. State v. Tingey, 67 Pac. 33, 34, 24 Utah, 225.

The word "laws," in Rev. St. U. S. § 5197 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3493], providing that national banks may charge and receive interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the state or territory where the bank is located, is to be construed to mean statute laws. Daggs v. Phoenix Nat. Bank (Ariz.) 53 Pac. 201, 204.

As used in the national banking act, authorizing national banks to charge and receive interest at the rate allowed by the "laws of the state or territory" where the bank is located, and declaring that when no rate is fixed by the laws of the state or territory they are allowed a certain rate, means the statute law. Hinds v. Marmolejo, 60 Cal. 229, 231.

"Law," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 2319 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1424], providing that all valuable mineral deposits in lands belonging to the United States are free and open to exploration and purchase "under regulations prescribed by law," etc., includes not only the laws of Congress, but also the laws of the territory in which they are located. O'Donnell v. Glenn, 19 Pac. 302, 306, 8 Mont. 248.

As statute of distribution.

"Laws of New Jersey," in a will directing testator's property to pass to his next of kin according to the laws of New Jersey, is to be construed as meaning the statute of distributions. Duffy v. Hargan, 50 Atl. 678, 679, 62 N. J. Eq. 588.

Unconstitutional act.

A legislative act, which takes or undertakes to authorize the taking of private property for a private object, either by taxation, or by the exercise of the power of eminent domain, or by any other means, is not a law, but an arbitrary decree, whereby the property of one citizen may be transferred to another, and is without legal force or effect. Dodge v. Mission Tp. (U. S.) 107 Fed. 827, 829, 46 C. C. A. 661, 54 L. R. A. 242.

The statutory provision that no money shall be paid out of the state treasury, except in pursuance of the appropriation "by law," does not mean that the power to appropriate money out of the state treasury is unlimited. It can only be so appropriated by law, and that means a valid law. State v. Davidson, 90 N. W. 1067, 1068, 114 Wis. 563, 58 L. R. A. 739.

An act passed with all the formalities requisite under the Constitution, though unconstitutional, was nevertheless a law in the sense that it would support an appropriation to pay for the work done under color of its apparent grant of authority and before its invalidity had been declared by the courts. Mullan v. State, 46 Pac. 670, 672, 114 Cal. 578, 34 L. R. A. 262.

The term "law" is not confined to those rules which are constitutional and technically perfect. Miller v. Dunn, 14 Pac. 27, 29, 72 Cal. 462, 1 Am. St. Rep. 67.

It is useless to apply ironclad rules of interpretation to any phrase or word used in the Constitution. Especially is this true of a word which has a technical, as well as a popular, meaning. There is no word in the language which in its popular and technical application takes a wider or more diversified signification than the word "law." Its use in both regards is illimitable. The term as used in its popular sense, and in its common acceptance, by "those for whom laws are made," it may be admitted, includes the whole body or system of rules of conduct, including the decisions of courts, as well as legislative acts; but it certainly does not include that refined, technical, and astute idea which recognizes nothing within the meaning of the term which is not constitutionally and technically perfect. So an act to appropriate money to pay indebtedness incurred by the state of California under an act to promote drainage, which was afterwards declared unconstitutional, was not itself unconstitutional, under Const. art. 4, § 32, forbidding the Legislature to pay claims against the state under an agreement made without express authority of law. Miller v. Dunn, 72 Cal. 462, 14 Pac. 27, 28, 1 Am. St. Rep. 67.

LAW ACTION.

See "Action—Action at Law."

LAW CHARGES.

"Law charges" are such as are occasioned by the prosecution of a suit before the courts. But this name applies more particularly to the costs, which the party cast has to pay to the party gaining the cause. It is in favor of these only that the law grants the privilege. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3195.

LAW DAY.

At law a tender of payment, in order to defeat the estate of the mortgagee, had to be made at or before the "law day," as the day for payment is called. Ward v. Lord, 28 S. E. 446, 447, 100 Ga. 407.

"The 'law day' means the exact time specified for paying money under a contract." Moore v. Norman, 45 N. W. 857, 858, 43 Minn. 428, 9 L. R. A. 55, 19 Am. St. Rep. 247.

"Law day" was the appointed day for the payment of money to secure which a mortgage was given, which became known in legal parlance as the "law day." Kortright v. Cady, 21 N. Y. 343, 345, 78 Am. Dec. 145.

LAW DIRECTS.

See "As the Law Directs."

LAW MERCHANT.

See "Commercial Law."

The "law merchant" is merely a vaguely defined portion of the common law, or, in its widest interpretation, of the law of all European countries having the Roman and Frankish law for its parents. Aslanian v. Dostumian, 54 N. E. 845, 846, 174 Mass. 328, 47 L. R. A. 495, 75 Am. St. Rep. 348.

The "law merchant" is part of the common law of England, and as such is adopted by our Constitution as our law also. Indeed, it is the law of the whole mercantile world. It is to be taken notice of by the judges as such, and to be understood and declared by them in the same way as all other parts of the law are to be interpreted and declared. When it becomes a question what the law merchant is in any particular case in forensic discussion, the question must be answered by the judges, and not by the jury; for this law merchant cannot, no more than any other part of the common law, be proved before a jury by witnesses as a matter of fact, and so be subjected to them to determine what it is. Ferris v. Saxton, 4 N. J. Law (1 Southard) 1, 18.

LAW OF THE CASE.

Where a court has once declared the law in a case, such declaration continues to be the law of that case, even on a subsequent appeal. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Baker, 4 Ind. App. 66, 68, 30 N. E. 431; Morgan County Com'rs v. Pritchett, 85 Ind. 68, 69; Richmond St. R. Co. v. Reed, 83 Ind. 9; Howe v. Fleming, 123 Ind. 262, 263, 24 N. E. 238; Anderson v. Kramer, 93 Ind. 170, 172; Jones v. Castor, 96 Ind. 307, 309; Braden v. Graves, 85 Ind. 92, 96.

The law of the case consists, not in the reasoning of the court or in the illustrations given, but in the propositions of law actually decided and applicable to the facts in judgment. Heidt v. Minor, 45 Pac. 700, 701, 113 Cal. 385.

A rule once made in a case by an appellate court, while it may be overruled in other cases, is binding both upon the inferior court and upon the appellate court itself. In a subsequent proceeding neither the lower court nor the court making the rule can depart from such ruling. A ruling so made is said to be the law of the case. City of Hastings v. Foxworthy, 63 N. W. 955, 957, 45 Neb. 676, 34 L. R. A. 321.

The decision of an appellate court on a question arising in a case is not only binding on the trial court, but is the law of the case in the appellate court itself on a subsequent writ of error or appeal. Standard Sewing Mach. Co. v. Leslie (U. S.) 118 Fed. 557, 559, 55 C. C. A. 323.

The rule of the law of the case has been confined to questions of law determined between the same parties at former hearings in this court, but has never extended to questions of fact, except when essentially the same questions were presented for a second review. Phelps County Farmers' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Johnston (Neb.) 92 N. W. 578, 577 (citing Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Fox, 60 Neb. 538, 83 N. W. 774; State v. Board of Commissioners of Cass County, 60 Neb. 566, 567, 83 N. W. 733).

Where the judgment announced in a case appealed to the Supreme Court could not have been reached without expressly or impliedly deciding the questions presented on a second appeal, the judgment will be conclusive as the law of the case, and such questions will not be again considered. Forgeron v. Smith, 104 Ind. 246, 247, 3 N. E. 866.

Questions which were open to dispute, and were either expressly or by implication decided on a first appeal, are not open for review on a second appeal; the former appeal having become the law of the case. McKinney v. State, 117 Ind. 26, 27, 19 N. E. 613.

When a judgment of the Supreme Court reverses a judgment of the court below as to all the parties against whom the judgment was rendered, and directs a new trial as to the whole case, the new trial operates on all the parties to the record, and the decision that the complaint stated a good cause of action against all the defendants remains the law of the case through all its subsequent stages. Mason v. Burk, 120 Ind. 404, 412, 22 N. E. 119.

The rule of law applied by the Supreme Court in the decision of a cause is the law of the case, and remains such throughout such subsequent proceedings therein. Continental Life Ins. Co. v. Houser, 111 Ind. 266, 268, 12 N. E. 479.

Where a judgment has been reversed, and the cause remanded to the court below, and from the proceedings a second appeal is taken, that appeal brings before the Supreme Court nothing but the proceedings subsequent to the reversal; the former decision having become law of the case as to all of the questions presented and decided on the first appeal. Willson v. Binford, 81 Ind. 588, 591.

When the Supreme Court on appeal holds a complaint to be good, and reverses the judgment and remands the cause, the question is irreversibly settled for that suit, and becomes the law of the case in all its subsequent stages. Armstrong v. Harshman, 93 Ind. 216, 218.

LAW OF EVIDENCE.

The "law of evidence" is a collection of general rules established by law (1) for declaring what is to be taken as true without proof; (2) for declaring the presumption of law, both those which are disputable and those which are conclusive; (3) for the production of legal evidence; (4) for the exclusion of whatever is not legal; (5) for determining in certain cases the value and effect of evidence. Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 678.

LAW OF THE FLAG.

Under what is called in international law "the law of the flag," a shipowner who sends his vessel into a foreign port gives notice by his flag to all who enter into contracts with the shipmaster that he intends the law of that flag to regulate those contracts, and that they must either submit to its operation or not contract with him or his agent at all. Ruhrstrat v. People, 57 N. E. 41, 45, 185 Ill. 133, 49 L. R. A. 181, 76 Am. St. Rep. 30 (citing 1 Bouv. Law Dict. [Rawle's Rev.] 799, 800).

LAW OF THE LAND.

LAW OF NATURE.

The law of nature "is those fit and just rules of conduct which the Creator has prescribed to man as a dependent and social being, and which are to be ascertained from the deductions of right reason, though they may be more precisely known and more explicitly declared by divine revelation." Wightman v. Wightman (N. Y.) 4 Johns. Ch. 343, 349.

LAWS OF OLERON.

The laws of Oleron were introduced into England by King Richard, the crusader, and are to a large extent the basis of the maritime law of that country, as well as of the United States, and the principle of this particular article is observed by maritime courts in all countries. It is contended that the English merchants' shipping act has superseded the general maritime law on this subject, by providing that the expenses incidental to the cure of sick and disabled seamen shall be paid by the owners of the vessel, and that this provision exempts the ship from liability. It appears, however, by the provisions of that act itself, that there was no intention to deprive seamen of a remedy by proceedings against the ship; for it expressly provided that if a seaman or apprentice, becoming ill, has through the neglect of the master or owner of the ship not been provided with proper provisions and water, and with such medicines and medical stores as are required by said act, then the owner or master shall be liable to pay all expenses, not exceeding three months' wages, properly and necessarily incurred either by the seaman himself or by the crown; "but this provision shall not affect any further liability of the master or the owner for the neglect, or any other remedies possessed by the seaman or apprentice." The Troop (U. S.) 118 Fed. 769, 771.

LAW OF REMEDY.

In its most comprehensive sense, the law of remedy includes all lawful methods of redressing violations of legal rights, but as more commonly used it covers only the forms of redress which may be had through the agency of courts of justice. Clark v. Eddy, 10 Ohio Dec. 539, 542.

LAW OF THE ROAD.

"In Shear. & R. Neg. § 649, it is said that it is the universal custom in America for travelers, vehicles, and animals under the charge of man to take the right hand of the road, meeting each other, if it is reasonably practicable to do so." Riepe v. Elting, 56 N. W. 235, 286, 89 Iowa, 82, 26 L. R. A. 769, 48 Am. St. Rep. 358.

The "law of the road" is found in Hornor's Rev. St. 1897, § 5087, wherein it is provided that people driving vehicles shall pass to the right. City of Decatur v. Stoops, 52 N. E. 623, 624, 21 Ind. App. 397.

LAW SHEEP.

See "Sheep."

LAW OF THE STATE.

A state insolvency law, although its operation upon insolvents is suspended during the existence of the national bankruptcy law, remains a "law of the state," within the meaning of Bankr. Act, § 64b (5), giving priority of payment to debts entitled to priority under the "law of the state," and hence, where a law of the state makes a debt due to a county a preferred claim, it will be entitled to priority in bankruptcy. In re Wright (U. S.) 95 Fed. 807, 810.

The expression "laws of the state" includes the Constitution of the state and the Constitution of the United States, and treaties and laws made in pursuance thereof. Code W. Va. 1899, p. 134, c. 13, § 17.

LAWFUL.

See, also, "Legal."

As peaceable or quiet.

"Lawful," as used in Rev. 1833, p. 280, providing that a complainant in an action of forcible entry and detainer shall not be compelled to make further proof of forcible entry and detainer than that he was lawfully possessed of the premises and that the defendant unlawfully entered into and detained the same, "is not a very definite phrase, and in common parlance has a very different meaning from that which the strictness and accuracy of legal phraseology has annexed to it. I take it that nothing more is meant by the term 'lawful' in this section than peaceable or quiet possession, contradistinguished from possession which is not merely constructively tortious, but actually so." Michau v. Walsh, 6 Mo. 348.

As legally enforceable.

"Lawful," as used in a Minnesota statute providing that every conveyance of an estate or interest in lands, made with intent to hinder or defraud creditors or other persons of their lawful suits, damages forfeitures, debts, or demands, shall be void as against the person so hindered or defrauded, means enforceable in a court of justice. Bruggerman v. Hoerr, 7 Minn. 337, 345 (Gil. 264, 271), 82 Am. Dec. 97.

Legal distinguished.

The word "legal," when used as a qualifying adverb, is synonymous with "lawful." State v. Bulling, 15 S. W. 367, 371, 105 Mo. 204.

"Of the meaning and force of the word 'lawful,' Anderson in his Dictionary (page 610) says: 'Legal' looks more to the letter, and 'lawful' to the spirit, of the law. 'Legal' is more appropriate for conformity to positive rules of law; 'lawful' for accord with ethical principals. 'Legal' imports rather that the forms of law are observed, that the proceeding is correct in method, and that rules prescribed have been obeyed; 'lawful' that the act is rightful in substance, that moral quality is secured.'" State v. Whealey, 59 N. W. 211, 212, 5 S. D. 427.

LAWFUL ACT.

A lawful act is one not forbidden by the penal law, and which would give no just occasion for a civil action. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 685.

LAWFUL AGE.

"Lawful age," as used in a will providing that, $1,000 should be paid to each of the testator's grandchildren if they should attain a lawful age, means that the legacy should be paid to a female grandchild when she arrived at the age of 18 years, where such age was the time at which a female infant was capable of receiving an estate. McKlim v. Handy, 4 Md. Ch. 228, 237.

LAWFUL AUTHORITIES.

"Lawful authorities," as used in the eighth article of the treaty with Spain, whereby the United States acquired the territory and sovereignty of the Floridas, means those persons who exercised a granting power by the authority of the crown. Mitchell v. United States, 34 U. S. (9 Pet.) 711, 734.

LAWFUL AUTHORITY.

"Lawful authority," as used in a fire policy, providing that the company shall not be liable for damage by fire caused by any persons engaged in resistance of lawful authority, includes a mutinous resistance of the convicts of a state prison to the authority of the guards and warden. Straus v. Imperial Fire Ins. Co., 6 S. W. 698, 94 Mo. 182, 4 Am. St. Rep. 368.

In an affidavit of defense filed to a scire facias sur mortgage, setting out that one acting as attorney in fact, for and with due and lawful authority from the assignee of the mortgage, executed under seal an agreement not to sue the mortgagor, the term "due and lawful authority" implies an instrument under seal. May v. Forbes (Del.) 43 Atl. 839, 2 Pennewill, 194.

Where an indictment for an illegal sale of intoxicating liquors charged that defendant was a common seller of intoxicating liquors, without any lawful authority, etc., the words "lawful authority" should be construed to mean "without appointment," where the only authority prescribed by law for the sale of intoxicating liquors was an appointment in each city or town of some suitable person as the agent of the town to sell intoxicating liquors to be used therein for medicinal and mechanical purposes. Act June 2, 1851, § 2. State v. Keen, 34 Me. 500, 505.

LAWFUL BUSINESS.

Other lawful business, see "Other."

The test of the lawfulness of a business is not based upon its inherent lawfulness, in an action brought to abate it as a nuisance, but its lawfulness in one locality and its unlawfulness in the other, measured by its effect on the plaintiff's property right. No court, apart from the legislative declaration, would pronounce any useful industry or manufacturing enterprise unlawful under all circumstances, irrespective of the locality and surroundings; but in certain localities or surroundings the common experience of mankind, of which the courts take judicial notice, has found certain pursuits to be universally injurious to health and damaging to property, no matter how carefully conducted. Hence in such neighborhoods those pursuits are declared to be nuisances per se. Such businesses in such localities are prima facie unlawful, because prima facie nuisances to near-by property holders; and others are prima facie lawful, because not necessarily attended with such results. Evans v. Reading Chemical Fertilizing Co., 28 Atl. 702, 708, 160 Pa. 209.

LAWFUL CAPTURE.

A lawful capture is one made by a declared enemy lawfully commissioned and according to the laws of war. Mauran v. Alliance Ins. Co., 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 1, 10, 18 L. Ed. 836.

LAWFUL CHARGES.

"Lawful charges," which a judgment debtor, seeking to redeem, is required to pay, include any claim or demand held by the purchaser, except such as may be in the nature of a lien or incumbrance on the land. Richardson v. Dunn, 79 Ala. 167.

LAWFUL CITIZEN.

An allegation that a justice of the peace is a lawful citizen and inhabitant of a town cannot be construed as an allegation that he is liable to pay taxes therein. Pierce v. Butler, 16 Vt. 101, 105.

LAWFUL CLAIM OR DEMAND.

"Lawful claim or demand," as used in a covenant in a deed by which a grantor covenanted to warrant and defend the title to the premises to the grantee against the lawful claims and demands of all persons, etc., meant not only legal claims and demands, but included as well an equitable claim or demand; such a claim being a lawful claim to the same extent as if it were a legal one. Kramer v. Carter, 136 Mass. 504, 507.

"Lawful claim," as used in Pre-emption Act July 26, 1866 (14 Stat. 251), declaring that all the lands granted by the act, or any act to which the act was an amendment, did not defeat or impair any pre-emption, homestead, swamp-land, or any lawful claim, nor include any government reservation or mineral lands, meant a pre-existing right of possession, constituting a valid claim to the continued use of the land, either then established or a new one. Lux v. Haggin, 10 Pac. 674, 726, 69 Cal. 255.

The term "lawful claims," in a covenant to warrant and defend the title to property against the lawful claims of all persons, contemplates merely lawful claims to the title conveyed, and not to mere charges against the property, which may or may not be established as liens thereon, and hence does not include a charge for a street improvement which has been made, but the lien of which has not attached. Cemansky v. Fitch, 96 N. W. 754, 756, 121 Iowa, 186.

LAWFUL CURRENCY.

"Lawful currency of the United States" includes the silver coin of the United States, as it is recognized by the Constitution of the United States as lawful currency of that government, and is made thereby a legal tender in payment of debts. Blount v. State, 76 Ga. 17, 18.

Where the price to be paid for land sold by a contract under seal was to be paid in lawful currency of New Jersey, such clause was satisfied by a tender of bank bills which at the time of the contract were called "money," were received as such, and were convertible into gold and silver coin; they being the universal, and almost the only, currency in New Jersey. M'Eowen v. Rose, 5 N. J. Law (2 Southard) 582, 583.

Where a bond was conditioned for payment in 1782 of a certain sum "in lawful current money of Pennsylvania," such words should be construed to mean the paper money issued under authority of Congress. Wharton v. Morris (Pa.) 1 Dall. 125, 126, 1 L. Ed. 65.

The phrase "lawful currency of the United States" is held in Spencer v. State (Tex.) 55 S. W. 58, to sufficiently describe the property alleged to have been stolen in an indictment for larceny.

LAWFUL DEED.

"Lawful deed of conveyance," as used in articles of agreement for the conveyance of land, means a deed conveying a good or lawful title. Dearth v. Williamson (Pa.) 2 Serg. & R. 498, 499, 7 Am. Dec. 652.

LAWFUL DEFENSE.

"Lawful defense," as used in Pen. Code, § 205, providing that homicide shall be justifiable when committed in lawful defense of the wife, means in defending her against the danger of a felony or of great personal injury. People v. Downs, 8 N. Y. Supp. 521, 524, 56 Hun, 5.

LAWFUL DISOBEDIENCE.

"Lawful disobedience," sufficient to authorize the discharge of a servant before the expiration of a contract of employment, "means something more than a conscious failure to obey. It involves a wrongful or perverse disposition, such as to render the conduct unreasonable and inconsistent with proper subordination. We are not prepared to hold that, even in what is known as menial service, every act of disobedience may be lawfully punished by the penalty of dismissal, and the serious consequences which it entails upon the servant put out of place." Schaver v. Ingham, 28 N. W. 162, 165, 58 Mich. 649, 55 Am. Rep. 712.

LAWFUL FENCE.

See "Good and Lawful Fence"; "Legal Fence."

Under Revision 1860, § 1544, specifying what shall be a lawful fence, and that such other construction as in the opinion of the viewers would be of equal strength may be considered lawful, a bluff, a hedge, a trench, a wall, a tressel, or the like, if found in fact to be of equal security with the defined lawful fence, may be a lawful fence. Hilliard v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 37 Iowa, 442, 445.

The term "lawful fence," in a statute making a railroad company liable for stock killed by its trains, but providing that the section shall not apply to any accident occurring on any part of said road that may be inclosed by a lawful fence, means a fence as defined by the statute, and is not satisfied by the erection of a fence which the law does not prohibit, but which is not of the kind fixed by statute. The word "lawful," in the connection found, applies merely to the quality of the fence, its height, material, etc. Russell v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 83 Mo. 507, 511.

A post and plank fence $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet high is a lawful fence, within Wag. St. c. 37, art. 2, § 43, requiring a railway to erect lawful fences along its right of way, and to maintain the cattle guards. King v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 79 Mo. 328.

"Lawful fence," as used in Act 1885, § 2, prescribing the mode of construction of lawful fences, when of wire, post and rail, and various other material, providing that any fence, which by reliable evidence shall be declared as strong, substantial, and well suited to the protection of inclosures as either of those described, shall be a lawful fence, should be construed to include a fence which forms a perfect inclosure, and is sufficient to turn stock, which is good, strong, and substantial, and built of stone. The ultimate object of a lawful fence is to so inclose land as to prevent the ingress and egress of such domestic animals as are usually nurtured and confined thereon, and to protect the premises inclosed from unlawful encroachment. Lawful fences may consist, either of the specific structures enumerated, or of any other barrier, which by reliable evidence shall be declared as strong, substantial, and well suited to the protection of inclosures as those described. Meade v. Watson, 8 Pac. 311, 312, 67 Cal. 591.

Under an act providing that, if any horse, etc., shall break into any grounds inclosed by a lawful fence, the owner shall be liable, etc., it is held, in the absence of any statutory definition, that the term "lawful fence" implies that the fence must be high enough, and sufficient in other respects, to prevent ordinary stock from breaking into the inclosure. Chase v. Chase, 15 Nev. 259, 264.

A fence made of three rails of good, substantial material, or three boards not less than six inches wide and three-quarters of an inch thick, such rails or boards to be fastened in or to good, substantial posts, not more than ten feet apart where rails are used, and not more than eight feet apart where boards are used, where either wholly or in part, substantially built and kept in good repair, or any other kind of fence which, in the opinion of the fence viewers, shall be equivalent thereto, shall be declared a lawful fence: provided, that the lowest or bottom rail, wire, or board shall not be more than twenty or less than sixteen inches from the ground, and that such fence shall be fifty-four inches in height, except that a barb-wire fence may consist of three barb wires, or four wires, two of which shall be barbed, the wires to be firmly fastened to the posts not more than two rods apart, with two stays between the posts, or with posts not more than one rod apart without such stays, the top wire to be not less than fifty-four, nor more than fifty-eight inches in height, and the bottom wire to be not more than twenty nor less than sixteen inches from the ground. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 72.

The word "inclosed," as used in St. Mont. c. 373, § 1, declaring that, if any cattle shall break into any ground inclosed by a lawful fence, the owner of the animal shall be liable to the owner of such inclosed premises for all damages sustained by such trespass, is held to require a substantial compliance with the statute; an immaterial variation in the height of the fence from a lawful fence not being sufficient to prevent the fence from being a lawful one, nor to render the ground uninclosed, while a fence not entirely surrounding the premises does not render them inclosed within the meaning of the statute. Smith v. Williams, 2 Mont. 195, 201.

A lawful fence is defined by Cod. St. 373, 476, as $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet in height, whether constructed of poles, rails, or boards. Smith v. Williams, 2 Mont. 195, 201.

LAWFUL FREEHOLDERS.

In an officer's return of a levy on real estate, that the appraisers were good and lawful freeholders of the vicinity imports that the appraisers had all the qualifications required by statute, and hence imports that they were disinterested. Day v. Roberts, 8 Vt. 413, 417.

LAWFUL FUNDS.

"Lawful funds," as used in a promissory note payable in lawful funds of the United States or its equivalent, means gold or silver, which is the only lawful tender of the United States. Ogden v. Slade, 1 Tex. 13.

LAWFUL GOODS.

"Lawful goods," as used in a marine policy on lawful goods, means "goods not prohibited by the laws of the country to which the vessel belongs. Articles contraband of war are lawful goods," within the meaning of the term as so used. Juhel v. Rhinelander (N. Y.) 2 Johns. Cas. 120; Skidmore v. Desdouty, Id. 77; Seton v. Low (N. Y.) 1 Johns. Cas. 1, 12.

LAWFUL HEIRS.

"Lawful heirs," as used by a testator in providing that, if either of his sons "should happen to die without any lawful heirs of their own," then the share of him who may first decease shall accrue to the other survivor or his heirs, means lineal descendants or issue. Abbott v. Essex Co., 59 U. S. (18 How.) 202, 215, 15 L. Ed. 352.

The words "heirs," or "lawful heirs," used in a will, must be construed in their legal and ordinary sense, unless other provisions of the will show that the testator meant other persons than those who would be heirs in the legal sense. Crockett v. Robinson, 46 N. H. 454.

Where a testator devised lands to his only son, and provided that, in case of the death of such son without any lawful heir, the lands should go to the testator's brother on the expiration of the widowhood of testator's wife, the phrase "any lawful heir" should be construed to mean "issue," although such may not be its strict technical sense. Rollins v. Keel, 20 S. E. 209, 115 N. C. 68.

A devise of lands to C. during his lifetime, provided he will live on and occupy the same, and, on his refusal to occupy, then to the said C.'s lawful heirs, created a vested estate in remainder in the children of C.; the term "lawful heirs," as so used, signifying "children." Conger v. Lowe, 24 N. E. 889, 891, 124 Ind. 368, 9 L. R. A. 165.

Where property was devised for life, with remainder to the testator's "lawful heirs," the words "lawful heirs" were held to have reference to those persons who were the lawful heirs of the testator at the time of his death. In re Tucker's Will, 63 Vt. 104, 21 Atl. 272, 25 Am. St. Rep. 743.

The phrase "lawful heirs," as used in a will whereby the testator devised to his son L. "and to his lawful heirs, but, in case the said L. should die without any lawful heirs, then the property to revert back and be equally divided" among the testator's children who might survive him, except the one-third part, which should belong to his widow so long as she should continue as such, means lineal descendants. Moody v. Snell, 81 Pa. (31 P. F. Smith) 359, 362.

LAWFUL HOLDER.

In speaking of the "lawful holder" of negotiable paper, that term may include one who holds the paper merely as trustee for the real owner, for the purpose of collecting the same in his own name for the benefit of such real owner. Thompson v. Cartwright, 1 Tex. 87, 46 Am. Dec. 95.

The words "lawful holder" in Code, § 894, providing for notice to the lawful holders of tax-sale certificates, mean the person who in law is the owner of the certificate and entitled to the rights and benefits which may accrue under it. Territory v. Perea, 30 Pac. 928, 931, 6 N. M. 531. See, also, Swan v. Whaley, 35 N. W. 440, 442, 75 Iowa, 623.

LAWFUL INTEREST.

"Lawful interest," in Code, § 2054, providing that all judgments in the state bear "lawful interest" on the principal amount recovered, means interest at 7 per cent., if the contract stipulates no other rate; but they mean the contract rate, if stipulated and within the lawful limit. In a case where no rate is agreed on, 7 per cent. is the lawful interest. Daniel v. Gibson, 72 Ga. 367, 369, 53 Am. Rep. 845.

LAWFUL ISSUE.

As children.

"Lawful issue," as used in a will devising $20,000 to the testatrix's executors, to be divided into as many shares as there shall be "lawful issue" of a certain person, was intended to have no greater significance than the word "children," and the testatrix must have had in mind the children of such person. Palmer v. Horn (N. Y.) 20 Hun, 70, 72.

In Morrow v. McMahon, 35 Misc. Rep. 348, 71 N. Y. Supp. 961, 964, a devise to "lawful issue" was construed not to have been used in its strict technical meaning, as including all descendants, lineal or collateral, to the remotest degree, but to be confined to children living at the testator's death and surviving at the death of testator's wife. Such construction was based upon the intention of the testator, as appeared from the entire will, and it was held any other construction would have been unreasonable.

As children born in wedlock.

In 1886 the words "lawful issue" had a clear, distinct, and well-settled meaning and meant issue born in wedlock. At that time illegitimate children, or those born out of wedlock, were incapable of taking; so that, when a testator bequeathed certain property to his son for life, with remainder over to his lawful issue, the lawfully begotten children of such son must have been understood, and the fact that by Laws 1896, c. 272, it was provided that illegitimate children whose parents have intermarried should have all the rights of legitimate offspring would not affect an illegitimate child of the son born prior to the making of the will, though thereafter his parents intermarried. United States Trust Co. v. Maxwell, 57 N. Y. Supp. 53, 56, 26 Misc. Rep. 276.

"Lawful issue," as used in a will giving property to testator's adopted daughter, providing that, in case the daughter died without lawful issue surviving, she should have power and authority to devise or appoint the property to testator's sister, or to all or any or either of the lawful issue of testator's sister, means descendants, and not children, and therefore includes grandchildren of the testator's sister. Drake v. Drake, 3 N. Y. Supp. 760, 762.

The words "lawful issue," when used in a domestic will, ordinarily and generally mean descendants. Palmer v. Horn, 84 N. Y. 516, 519; Chwatal v. Schreiner, 148 N. Y. 683, 43 N. E. 166; Johnson v. Brasington, 156 N. Y. 181, 50 N. E. 859. Where there is nothing to the contrary to be found in the context of the instrument, or in extraneous facts proper to be considered, that is the sense in which they are presumed to be used in the will. Thus testatrix, whose domicile was in New York in 1853, went to live with a married daughter in Saxony, where she executed her will in 1878, bequeathing a portion of her estate on her daughter's death to her daughter's "then living lawful issue," if any; otherwise to testatrix's grandchildren. No reference was otherwise made to an adopted child of her daughter, who was then 40 years of age, and had no living issue. This child had been legally adopted in 1873 by the daughter and her husband under the laws of Saxony, and after her mother's death claimed under the will, as "lawful heir." Held, that such term referred alone to her daughter's offspring, and hence did not include children by adoption. New York Life Ins. & Trust Co. v. Viele, 55 N. E. 311, 314, 161 N. Y. 11, 76 Am. St. Rep. 238.

As words of limitation.

Where testator devised property to certain devisees and their lawful issue, as tenants in common, and, if they should die without having lawful issue, then over, the words "lawful issue," as so used, should be construed as words of limitation creating a fee-tail, which was converted into a fee simple by statutory enactment (Act April 27, 1855). Reinoehl v. Shirk, 12 Atl. 806, 808, 119 Pa. 108.

As words of purchase.

A devise by codicil to testator's daughter, and to her heirs and assigns, for her sole use, she to receive the profits thereof, and after her death the same to vest in her lawful issue, except that her husband, sur-living her, should after her death enjoy a third of the profits for life, he to control no part of the property during her life, is a life estate only to the daughter, and not an estate in tail; the words "lawful issue" being words of purchase. Shalters v. Ladd, 30 Atl. 283, 284, 163 Pa. 509.

In a deed to a person for the term of his natural life, and at his death to his lawful issue forever, the words "lawful issue" are words of purchase, and not of limitation. Hancock v. Butler, 21 Tex. 804, 807.

Where a will stated that the purpose of one of its provisions was to secure to testator's daughter certain property for her sole use and that of her lawful issue during her life, not in any wise to be subject to the control of her husband, and that upon her dying without child or children, or issue thereof, the estate to go over to testator's mother, sisters, and brothers, the words clearly indicated that by "lawful issue" the testator meant such child or children of his daughter as she might have living at her death, and not an indefinite line of descendants, and were words of purchase, and not of limitation. Gaboury v. McGovern, 74 Ga. 133, 143.

LAWFUL JURORS.

A venire facias directing the sheriff to summon good and lawful men to serve as jurors is sufficient, without specifying the particular qualifications necessary to constitute them good and lawful jurors; the court observing that the word lawful includes everything that the law requires in order to constitute a party a competent juror. State v. Alderson, 18 Tenn. (10 Yerg.) 523, 524.

LAWFUL MANNER.

The test whether a thing is done in a lawful manner or not is the probability of injury to others, and that, of course, depends on circumstances. "It is quite manifest that injury or mischief, whether it be to life, limb, or property, would or would not be probable, not simply according to the act done, but according to the time at which it was done, and the locality where the occurrence took place." The Europa, 2 U. S. Month, Law Mag. 497, 499.

"Lawful manner," in Code 1873, § 3483, providing that it is not permissible to question the action of the grand jury in finding a bill of indictment, or of the trial jury in the trial of a cause, nor of a court or judge when acting within their legitimate province and in a lawful manner, has reference "to the method or mode of acting, more than to the degree of perfection or correctness in the conclusion or results arrived at. The statute seems to have a reference to the methods or means of obtaining results, and, if a court observes such methods or means, it may be said to be acting in a lawful manner, though it may err in the application of legal principles to such an extent as to involve reversible error. It is not, of course, to be understood that a court has acted in a lawful manner when the judgment it pronounces is absolutely void, for such a judgment has no support in the law." Elsner v. Shirgley, 45 N. W. 393, 394, 80 Iowa, 30; In re McDonald, 33 Pac. 18, 22, 4 Wyo. 150.

LAWFUL MEN.

See "Good and Lawful Men."

LAWFUL MERCHANDISE.

"Lawful merchandise," as used in the stipulation of a charter party to take a cargo of lawful merchandise, necessarily implies that the articles composing the cargo should be in such condition, and be put up in such form, that they could be stored and carried without one part damaging the other. Boyd v. Moses, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 316, 318, 19 L. Ed. 192.

LAWFUL MONEY.

Lawful money is any currency usually and lawfully employed in buying and selling, and hence, where an indictment charged that defendant received on deposit lawful money of the United States, and the proof showed that it was any national currency, greenbacks, or silver certificates, there was no variance. State v. Boomer, 72 N. W. 424, 426, 103 Iowa, 106.

"Lawful money," as used in a promissory note given by and to a citizen of the state of Connecticut in Wyoming in 1778, payable in lawful money, means lawful money of Connecticut. The term "lawful money" is almost peculiar to the people of that state, and the import of the words is thoroughly ascertained there. Dorrance v. Stewart (Pac.) 1 Yeates, 349.

"Lawful money," in an indictment charging that the defendant did unlawfully demand and receive $2.45, of lawful money of the state of Tennessee, etc., does not include bank notes. Hence proof that the defendant received bank notes will not sustain the indictment. Garner v. State, 13 Tenn. (5 Yerg.) 160, 162.

"Lawful money," within the meaning of a contract to pay in lawful money, means such currency as shall be lawful at the time of its actual fulfillment. The contract is therefore made by the act of the parties to depend, as to the medium by which it may be discharged, upon the laws which shall subsist at the time of payment. O'Neil v. McKewn, 1 S. C. (1 Rich.) 147, 148.

The words "lawful money," in the legal tender acts, providing that the various issues of the treasury notes of the United States shall be lawful money, and a legal tender in payment of all debts, etc., except duties on imports, fix their legal character, and draw them within the terms of contracts calling for payment in lawful money. O'Neil v. McKewn, 1 S. C. (1 Rich.) 147, 148.

"Lawful money of the United States" means coin or treasury notes made a legal tender by act of Congress, and silver certificates or national bank notes are not included in the phrase. Perry v. State, 61 S. W. 400, 42 Tex. Cr. R. 540.

"Lawful money of the United States" includes only gold and silver coin, or that which by law is made its equivalent, so as to be exchangeable therefor at par and on demand, and does not include a currency note which, though nominally exchangeable for coin at its face value, is not redeemable on demand. Bronson v. Rodes, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 229, 247, 19 L. Ed. 141.

"Lawful money of the United States," as used in a judgment for lawful money of the United States, is equivalent to lawful money of Virginia, as used in an agreement for the payment of lawful money of Virginia. Lawful money of the United States is lawful money of Virginia, or any other state or territory. Cocke v. Kendall (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 1149, 1150.

"Lawful money of the United States," as used in an indictment charging the larceny of $75 of the "lawful money of the United States," cannot be construed to include the notes of national banks. Lawful money of the United States might consist of gold or silver coin or United States treasury notes and fractional currency. Hamilton v. State, 60 Ind. 193, 194, 28 Am. Rep. 653.

In an action on a contract made in South Carolina during the Civil War, calling for payment in dollars or lawful money, the term "dollars" must in the first instance be construed to refer to the established legal currency of the United States, and it is for defendant to show that the parties looked to Confederate currency as a means of payment. Neely v. McFadden, 2 S. C. (2 Rich.) 169, 173, 175.

Where a sheriff was only authorized to receive current gold and silver coin of the United States and certain county orders in payment of taxes, and, in a prosecution against him for embezzlement of money so received, it was proved that he collected as taxes while in office, and paid over to the county treasurer, certain sums, leaving a balance unaccounted for, and that he and his deputies received for taxes gold, silver, and treasury notes, national bank notes, silver certificates, checks, money orders, and county warrants, the evidence sufficiently supported an allegation in the indictment that the money converted by defendant was lawful money of the United States, though the particular coins converted were not identified; the jury being warranted in finding that defendant converted the checks, drafts, money orders, etc., into money before he embezzled the same. State v. Neilon, 73 Pac. 321, 322, 43 Or. 168.

LAWFUL ORDERS.

"Lawful order," as used in a statute defining contempt of court to be the disobedience or resistance of a lawful order of a court or judge, does not mean an order which is not erroneous, but an erroneous order or judgment, though unlawful and liable to be reversed on appeal, is obligatory until reversed, and disobedience of it is contempt. Ex parte Cohen, 5 Cal. 494, 495.

"Lawful orders and decrees," as used in Acts 1870, c. 359, § 1, which provides that the surrogate of the county of New York shall have power and jurisdiction to issue all lawful processes upon allegations duly verified, and to make and enter all lawful orders and decrees in proceedings in the surrogate's court of said county, and the objection of want of jurisdiction shall not be taken to such orders and decrees, except, etc., meant such orders and decrees as a surrogate's court was by law empowered to make, or, in other words, orders and decrees made in cases where the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter. Bearns v. Gould, 77 N. Y. 455, 458 (cited and approved in Harrison v. Clark, 87 N. Y. 577).

LAWFUL POSSESSION.

One is in lawful possession of property, so as to be able to rely on the 30-years non-possession and nonpayment of taxes, under Rev. St. 1839, § 6770, as a defense to an action to recover the property, where he entered, not a mere trespasser, but in good faith, claiming to be the owner, notwithstanding he has not a perfect title. Collins v. Pease, 47 S. W. 925, 146 Mo. 135.

The term "lawful possession" is not convertible with "innocent possession," in legal terminology. Intent does not enter into whether an act is unlawful or tortious, though it does as to whether it is innocent or criminal. A defendant in an action of conversion, who contends that his possession of the property is innocent, must set out such fact by a defense, as it cannot be proven under a general denial, which only raises the issue whether the possession was lawful. Milligan v. Brooklyn Warehouse & Storage Co., 68 N. Y. Supp. 744, 749, 34 Misc. Rep. 55.

LAWFUL PROCESS.

"Lawful process" in any action or proceeding manifestly refers to process emanating from court, or by the authority of a court, and cannot be understood to refer to such acts or notices in pais between private parties as derive no authority from a court, but simply serve to create a right of action. Healey v. Geo. F. Blake Mfg. Co., 62 N. E. 270, 271, 180 Mass. 270.

LAWFUL PROVOCATION.

"Lawful provocation" is synonymous with "legal, adequate, and reasonable provocation," and means an assault or personal violence. State v. Bulling, 15 S. W. 367, 371, 105 Mo. 204.

LAWFUL PURPOSE.

It is not unlawful for a citizen to keep in his possession liquors lawfully purchased and for a lawful purpose—and by lawful purpose is meant their personal use or family use, or for purposes of hospitality, social purposes, or medicinal use, or the like—and he may keep liquors in any quantity if he purchases them in a lawful manner; and he has a right, in law, to make a legal purchase outside of the state, and import liquors in the state for legal or lawful use, for personal use or medicinally. State v. Robison, 39 S. E. 247, 61 S. C. 106.

LAWFUL REASON.

See "Good and Lawful Reasons."

LAWFUL REPRESENTATIVES.

A will giving money in trust, the income payable to M. for life, and, on her death, to divide the principal among her children, "and to their lawful representatives forever," the issue of any child then dead to take his parent's share, uses "lawful representatives" in the sense of executors, and not to signify the persons who are substituted as takers of the gift. Clark v. Cammann, 43 N. Y. Supp. 575, 578, 14 App. Div. 127.

LAWFUL SILVER MONEY.

A provision in a mortgage for the payment of $5,000 in lawful silver money is to be construed as only requiring the payment of such a sum in any silver money which is lawful at the time of payment, and therefore such a contract cannot be construed to require a payment in silver dollars. Parrish v. Kohler (Pa.) 11 Phila. 346, 347.

LAWFUL SIZE.

In Pub. Acts 1897, No. 151, § 2, making it unlawful to possess or market fish under the prescribed size, excepting fish taken in gill nets of lawful size, gill nets having meshes of the size prescribed in the act are intended.

Osborn v. Charlevoix Circuit Judge, 72 N. W. 982, 983, 114 Mich. 655.

LAWFUL STRUCTURE.

"Lawful structure," as used in Act Cong. Feb. 27, 1845, declaring that a certain bridge already built over a river which divides two states shall be a lawful structure, etc., means that the bridge as built, with its abutments, piers, superstructures, draw, and height, should have the sanction of law, and be maintained and used in that state and condition until the law was altered. The Clinton Bridge, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 454, 462, 19 L. Ed. 969.

LAWFUL SUM IN MONEY.

The terms "lawful sum in money" and "legal tender" are not synonymous, but have different meanings. A tender, to be good in law, must be made in legal tender notes or coin of the United States. National bank notes and gold and silver certificates are lawful money, and so recognized in the commercial exchanges of the United States, but they are not legal tender. Martin v. Bott, 46 N. E. 151, 153, 17 Ind. App. 444.

LAWFUL TITLE

"Lawful title," as used in a bond requiring the obligor to give a lawful title to certain property to be conveyed by him, should be construed to mean a perfect title, with a general covenant of warranty. Clark v. Redmen (Ind.) 1 Blackf. 379, 380.

LAWFUL TRADE.

"Lawful trade," in a policy insuring a ship in any lawful trade, means the trade in which the ship is sent by the owners, so that the insurer is entitled to recover where he sends the ship on a lawful voyage, though, owing to the misconduct of the master taking on board certain commodities, which subjected the ship to seizure, it is lost. Havelock v. Hancill, 3 Term R. 277, 278.

LAWFULLY.

The word "lawfully" means in pursuance of or according to law. People v. Martin, 76 N. Y. Supp. 953, 955, 38 Misc. Rep. 67.

"Lawfully," as used in a pleading, without a statement of the special facts on which it is predicated, has, in general, no effect, for the term is not only indefinite, but affirms matters of law instead of fact. Hanson v. Langan, 9 N. Y. Supp. 625.

LAWFULLY ADMINISTERED OATH.

tions for perjury may be based upon false testimony given under oath in proceedings in which an oath may be lawfully administered, means an oath that is administered pursuant to, or is required or authorized by, some law. It is not enough that the officer administering the oath had general authority so to do, nor that his administering the particular oath was not unlawful in the sense of incurring a penalty by administering it. A mere gratuitous oath, which the law does not recognize as of any force, and to which it gives no more effect than if the statement were not sworn to, is not a lawfully administered oath, within the statute. An oath administered by a justice of the peace to a person making certain statements of fact in an application for a loan of money is not required or authorized by any statute, or necessary for the prosecution of crime or to further the ends of public justice, and is not a lawfully administered oath, so as to be made the basis of a prosecution for perjury. State v. McCarthy, 42 N. W. 599, 600, 41 Minn. 59.

LAWFULLY AND PEACEABLY.

In construing Gould's Dig. c. 72, § 3, providing "that when any person shall lawfully and peaceably hold over any lands," etc., "after the termination of the time for which they were demised or let to him," etc., "or shall lawfully and peaceably obtain possession, or shall hold the same unlawfully and by force, and after demand made in writing for possession thereof by the person having a right to such possession, his agent or attorney, and shall refuse or neglect to quit such possession, such person shall be deemed guilty of an unlawful detainer," the phrase "lawfully and peaceably obtain possession" held not intended to apply alone to cases where a defendant entered under a lease from the owner, or by his express consent, but also to cases where the entry is such as to negative the idea of forcible intrusion in the first instance, though not by the express consent. Keller v. Henry, 24 Ark. 575, 580.

LAWFULLY BEGOTTEN.

"Lawfully begotten," as used in a deed of trust describing the ultimate beneficiaries of the fee as lawfully begotten children or grandchildren of a certain person, does not mean children that had a legal status, that they may have inheritable blood from their father, or that they may be his heirs or his lawful issue. Unless they are lawfully begotten, they do not fill the essential requirements of the deed of trust. Appeal of Edwards, 108 Pa. 283, 289.

A. conveyed property to B. in trust for C. during his life, and then for his "lawfully begotten children." C. had an illegitimate son, who was legitimated by an act of the Legislature. Held, that the words "lawfully begotten children" should not be construed to include such illegitimate son, since the words were used to define a fact, and not to define a legal status so as to include all who held the status. Appeal of Edwards, 108 Pa. 283, 289.

The words, "lawfully begotten heir," as used in a will devising property to a person and his lawfully begotten heir, operate to create an estate tail, and are equivalent to "lawfully begotten heir of his body." Ewan v. Cox, 9 N. Y. Law (4 Halst.) 10 (cited and approved in Weart v. Cruser, 13 Atl. 36, 37, 49 N. J. Law [20 Vroom] 475).

"Lawfully begotten heirs of their bodies," as used in a will giving "the remaining two-thirds of my estate to my three daughters for life, and then to the lawfully begotten heirs of their bodies," should be construed to mean children. Loving v. Hunter, 16 Tenn. (8 Yerg.) 4, 29.

As used in a deed of trust which provided that in case the grantee should die, leaving lawfully begotten children to survive him, the trustee should hold the same for such children, etc., was employed strictly, and hence a legitimated child of a grantee did not take on the latter's decease. Appeal of Edwards, 108 Pa. 283, 289.

Where testator devised his lands to his wife for life, and provided that upon her death the property should be divided among "my lawfully begotten heirs," the words were not used in their technical sense, but were used in the sense of "children." Watson v. Williamson, 30 South. 281, 283, 129 Ala. 362.

LAWFULLY CONVEY.

"Lawfully convey," as used in a statute providing that a deed of quitclaim and release, of the form in common use, shall be sufficient to pass all the estate which the grantor could lawfully convey by deed or bargain and sale, limits the estate conveyed to such as the grantor has the legal right to convey, and therefore he cannot lawfully convey land which he has already conveyed to another; but he may release any real or fancied interest remaining in him, and convey his actual interest, whatever it may be, at the time of the conveyance. Therefore, when the person relies on a mere quit-claim of the interest which a party may have in the property he does so at his peril, and must see to it that there is an interest to convey. He is presumed to know what he is purchasing, and takes his own risk. Martin v. Brown, 4 Minn. 282, 292 (Gil. 201).

LAWFULLY DEMANDED.

When limitation has run against a right of action against a corporation for a tax and penalties, neither can be lawfully demanded within Tax Law, § 195, providing that on an application to the State Comptroller for the revision and readjustment of an account of taxes, if it appear that any such account included taxes or other charges which could not have been lawfully demanded, he shall resettle the same, and charge or credit, as the case may require, the difference resulting from such revision or settlement, etc. People v. Roberts, 51 N. E. 437, 438, 157 N. Y. 70.

LAWFULLY DISCHARGED.

"Lawfully discharged," as used in a bail bond conditioned that the party would remain in the custody of the keeper of the prison, and within the limits thereof, until he should be lawfully discharged, without committing any manner of escape, the term "lawfully discharged" would extend to, and be satisfied by, any discharge obtained under the legislative authority of the state. Mason v. Halle, 25 U. S. (12 Wheat.) 370, 377, 6 L. Ed. 660.

A bond for the liberty of the prison yard provided that the obligor should remain "a true prisoner until lawfully discharged," etc. Held, that the term "lawfully discharged" includes a discharge under the Rhode Island statutes for the relief of poor prisoners for debt, though obtained by fraud and perjury. Ammidon v. Smith, 14 U. S. (1 Wheat.) 447, 459, 4 L. Ed. 132.

LAWFULLY DIVIDED.

"Lawfully divided," as used in a will in which the testator, after giving his son, son-in-law, and grandson $1 each, declared, "It is my wish that all the property I may possess at my death be lawfully divided between my wife and my two youngest children," referred not to the mode of division, but to the estate of the devisees; that is, the property is to be divided between the wife and the two youngest children as if the testator had died intestate, without other heirs. Miller v. Miller, 62 Ky. (1 Duv.) 8, 10.

LAWFULLY IMPRISONED.

"Lawfully imprisoned," as used in Gen. St. c. 178, § 46, prescribing a punishment for every one who while lawfully imprisoned in any place of confinement established by law, other than the State Prison, breaks therefrom and escapes, indicates the intention to punish every violation of custody by those who are properly held in any place of confinement established by law, other than the State Prison. Breaking jail, and an escape therefrom, even by a prisoner confined therein on mesne process, could not be otherwise than an outrage to its discipline, and a resistance to the lawful authority by which be was detained. A person arrested on mesne process, admitted to bail, and afterwards surrendered by his bail to the keeper of a jail, is lawfully imprisoned. Commonwealth v. Barker, 133 Mass. 399, 400.

LAWFULLY POSSESSED.

Lawfully possessed, as used in Gen. St. 1865, c. 187, § 3, providing for an action of forcible entry and detainer by one lawfully possessed of the premises, who has been wrongfully dispossessed, does not involve an inquiry into the lawfulness of the possession as regards title, but only in regard to the mode of obtaining it, and is equivalent to "peaceably possessed." McCartney's Adm'x v. Alderson, 45 Mo. 35, 38.

LAWFULLY SUMMONED.

"Lawfully summoned," as used in Act Cong. July 8, 1838, § 8, relating to the allowance of fees to jurors and witnesses "lawfully summoned" to testify at a coroner's inquest, means that they are regularly served with a coroner's summons by a lawful officer. The jurors and witnesses are compelled, when thus summoned, to obey the writ. They have no right to consider whether the summons issued on a proper state of facts as they might appear to the coroner, nor the means of deciding it if they had the right. Levy Court v. Woodward, 69 U. S. (2 Wall.) 501, 510, 17 L. Ed. 851.

LAWLESS.

"Lawless" is defined by the Century Dictionary as "not subject or submissive to law; uncontrolled by law, whether natural, human, or divine." State of Arkansas v. Kansas & T. Coal Co. (U. S.) 96 Fed. 353, 362.

LAWS IN FORCE.

In the construction of statutes, the term "laws now in force," and words of similar import, shall mean the laws in force at the time the act containing the words shall take effect. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1720, c. 131, § 1, subd. 18.

LAWS OF THE SEVERAL STATES.

The expression "laws of the several states," as used in the thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 92; section 721, Rev. St.), providing that the laws of the several states, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States in cases where they apply, includes the decisions of the state courts construing the laws. The general rule as to when decisions of the state courts, under the above-quoted section, are binding on the federal courts, is well stated in Swift v. Tyson, 41 U. S. (16 Pet.) 1, 10 L. Ed. 865, where the court said "that the true interpretation of the thirty-fourth section limited its application to state laws strictly local; that is to say, to the positive statutes of the state, and the construction thereof adopted by the local tribunals, as the rights and titles to real estate, and other matters immovable and intraterritorial in their nature and character. It has never been supposed that the section did apply, or was designed to apply, to questions of a more general nature, not at all dependent on local statutes or local usages of a fixed or permanent operation—for example, to the construction of ordinary contracts or other written instruments; especially to questions of general commercial law, where the state tribunals are called upon to perform the like functions as ourselves." Hambly v. Bancroft (U. S.) 83 Fed. 444, 446.

LAWS OF THE TERRITORY.

In the organic act, providing that each of the district courts shall have and exercise the same jurisdiction in all cases arising under the Constitution of the United States "and the laws of said territory" as is vested in the Circuit and District Courts of the United States, etc., the quoted phrase means such laws as have an operative force in the territory at the time of the passage of the organic act. Nickels v. Griffin, 1 Wash. T. 374, 382.

The phrase "laws of the territory," in the organic act conferring jurisdiction upon district courts, means not only the regulations and customs having the force of law in this territory, but the laws which the territory of Washington, considered as a political power subordinate to the general government, has authority to administer, as emanating from itself. Phelps v. The City of Panama, 1 Wash. T. 518, 524.

LAWSUITS.

Where, to induce an agent to continue to act as such, the principal entered into an agreement to indemnify the agent against lawsuits, brought or to be brought, relating to the business of the agency, and an arbitration was then pending relating to such business, the agreement reached and included such arbitration. Packard v. Hill (N. Y.) 7 Cow. 434, 441.

An agreement by a principal with his agents to indemnify them for any sums of money which they or their agents would be liable to pay in consequence of any lawsuit or lawsuits which are or may be brought against them on account of the business of the agency includes and covers an arbitration then pending relating to such business. Hill v. Packard (N. Y.) 5 Wend. 375, 386.

LAWYER.

See, also, "Attorney at Law."
As laborer, see "Laborer."

One who earns a part of his living by legal work for others in his office, though he combines it with other business, and does not advertise as a lawyer, nor appear in court on the trial of cases, is a lawyer, within Code, § 3072, exempting the proper tools, instruments, or books of a debtor, if a lawyer. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Goode, 70 N. W. 113, 114, 101 Iowa, 160, 35 L. R. A. 690, 63 Am. St. Rep. 378.

LAY—LAID.

As construct and maintain.

A grant to a railroad company, in its charter, of the power of "laying, building, and making" a road, includes the power of maintaining and sustaining it, which has reference to keeping it in repair, supplying it with machinery, and such like acts, but does not extend to projects for extending its business by schemes and enterprises not contemplated and expressed in clear, unambiguous terms. Central R. Co. v. Collins, 40 Ga. 582, 624.

The laying of a sewer or drain, for which an assessment can be made on property owners, includes its location, grade, etc., and the easement taken for its construction. Boyden v. Village of Brattleboro, 27 Atl. 164, 165, 65 Vt. 504.

As delivered.

A contract for the sale of so many barrels of whisky "laid in L. direct from the distillery" means that the goods are to be delivered in L. within a reasonable time after the making of the contract. Ullman v. Babcock, 63 Tex. 68, 70.

As offered.

A record stating that the defendants identified a certain book of accounts as the account book kept by a certain person, and as being wholly in his handwriting, and "laid the same in evidence," means no more than that the book, identified as such person's account book, kept in his handwriting, was now before the court, ready for use, as the material source of such entries therein as should be subsequently offered in evidence. It meant no more, in effect, than is meant in everyday practice when a writing to be offered in evidence subsequently is identified and marked as an exhibit in advance of its being so offered. Peck v. Pierce, 28 Atl. 524, 527, 63 Conn. 310.

As risk by lottery ticket.

Money paid for lottery tickets is money laid, staked, or bet, within the meaning of Code 1873, § 4029, providing that all promises, agreements, notes, etc., when the whole or any part of the consideration thereof is for money or other valuable thing won or lost, "laid, staked, or bet," at or upon any game of any kind or in any wager, are absolutely void and of no effect. One of the definitions of the word "lay" is to risk, and money paid for lottery tickets is risked on the chances of success at the drawing. To stake money is to put it at hazard on the issue of competition or upon a future contingency, and money paid for lottery tickets is staked on a game of chance. Koster v. Seney, 68 N. W. 824, 825, 99 Iowa, 584.

As share of proceeds of voyage.

The term "lay" is sometimes used to designate the share of the proceeds of a voyage, which is to be the compensation for the services of a seaman on a whaling or similar voyage. "This lay or share does not, according to law, create any partnership in the profits of the voyage, as has been sometimes erroneously supposed, but it is in the nature of wages for seamen in the common merchant service, and is governed by the same rules." Coffin v. Jenkins (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 1188, 1190.

"Lay," as used in an agreement by the owner of a vessel with a mariner that the latter shall sail the vessel on a lay, means that the mariner is to take the command of her as master, to victual and to man her, and to pay half the port charges; the owner to keep the vessel in repair, and the freight and earnings to be equally divided between them. Under a contract of this kind, the vessel, during its continuance, is under the exclusive control of the master, as respects the voyage and employment. He alone has the right to determine what voyages he will undertake, what cargo he will carry, upon what terms, and to what port he will sail in search of freight. His share of the earnings of the vessel are his wages, and he receives no other compensation for his services as master. Thomas v. Osborn, 60 U. S. (19 How.) 22, 33, 15 L. Ed. 534.

LAID DOWN.

In the peculiar phraseology of the Society of Friends, a meeting is said to have been "set up" when it has been organized according to the usages of the society, and to have been "laid down" when it has formally dissolved. White Lick Quarterly Meeting of Friends by Hadley v. White Lick Quarterly Meeting of Friends by Mendenhall, 80 Ind. 136, 142.

LAID OFF.

In the case of United States v. Brooks, 51 U. S. (10 How.) 442, 13 L. Ed. 489, it was held that the expression "shall be laid off," used in relation to land, gave the reservees a fee-simple title to the land, as fully as any patent from the government could do. Meehan v. Jones (U. S.) 70 Fed. 453, 455.

LAID OPEN.

Rev. St. p. 133, § 47, providing that all petitions for reassessment of damages awarded by a committee appointed by the county court to lay out a highway shall be commenced "previous to the expiration of sixty days after such highway shall be laid open to be worked," refers to the time when work on the road actually begins, and not to the time when it is ordered to be open. Myers v. Town of Pownal, 16 Vt. 415, 416.

LAY DAYS.

See "Working Lay Days."

LAY OUT—LAID OUT.

See "Legally Laid Out"; "Regularly Laid Out."

In St. 1896, c. 516, authorizing a union station in Boston, providing that the board of street commissioners of the city shall lay out, and the city shall construct, suitable approaches thereto, the words "lay out" are not used in their technical sense of laying out a way, but in the more general sense of making it the duty of the street commissioners to prescribe any changes that might be necessary in the public streets to connect the private property of the railroad with the streets of Boston, including what would ordinarily be done by laying out a new way, or altering, relocating, or directing specific repairs upon an existing way. Peabody v. Boston & P. R. Co., 62 N. E. 1047, 1048, 181 Mass. 76.

The laying out of a highway over land by public authority is simply imposing a public easement upon the land. The public acquires only the right of passage, with the incidental right of facilitating that passage by constructing and keeping in repair a road within the lines of the location. The exercise of this right by the public does not ordinarily require the continual and exclusive occupation of the entire width of the location; hence the landowner retains such rights of possession as the public does not need. Wright v. Woodcock, 29 Atl. 953, 954, 86 Me. 113, 25 L. R. A. 499.

"Laid out," as used in St. 1874, c. 275, § 2, providing "that every highway or town-way hereafter laid out" shall be deemed to be laid out under the provisions of chapter 42 of the General Statutes, and the amendments thereof, unless the order laying out the same expressly declares the same to be laid out under the provisions of the law authorizing the assessment of betterments, should not be limited to an original laying out, in the strictest sense, but should include every order of the municipal authorities by which private property is taken or injured for the purpose of a public way. Fuller v. Mayor and Aldermen of Springfield, 123 Mass. 289, 291.

"Laying out" is, and has been from the earliest time, the appropriate expression for locating and establishing a new highway." Foster v. City of Boston Park Com'rs, 133 Mass. 321, 329.

The term "laying out," as applied to towns, is descriptive of legal steps for the creation of a town. Mattheisen & Hegeler Zinc Co. v. City of La Salle, 8 N. E. 81, 83, 117 Ill. 411.

In Rev. St. c. 19, §§ 103–106, prescribing a penalty for encroaching upon a highway which has been "laid out" and opened, the term "laid out" is sufficiently comprehensive to include any act or process by which the public obtains the right of way on lands, whether it be by act of the Legislature, by order of the board of county supervisors or town supervisors, by grant, by dedication, or otherwise. The most narrow signification that can reasonably be given to the term is to restrict it to highways laid out by order of the public authorities. State v. Babcock, 42 Wis. 138–148.

All necessary steps included.

The phrase "laying out," as used in the statutes relating to highways, includes not only the initiatory act of laying out the road by the selectmen, but also the acceptance of the survey by the town, and the recording thereof. The term is comprehensive, and includes all the steps necessary to constitute the way a highway for the public use. Town of Wolcott v. Pond, 19 Conn. 596, 601.

"Lay out," as used in a statute authorizing commissioners to lay out a certain highway, means the making of a survey thereof, and its adoption by the commissioners. Gaines v. Hudson Co. Avenue Com'rs, 37 N. J. Law (8 Vroom) 12, 14.

"To lay out a highway" means to locate the highway and to define its limits, which is accomplished by a survey and particular description of the highway. Hough v. City of Bridgeport, 18 Atl. 102, 104, 57 Conn. 290.

"Laid out," as used in Rev. St. 1881, providing that every public highway already laid out, and which should not be opened and used within a certain time, should cease to be a highway, means established; surveyed; declared a road. Decker v. Washburn, 35 N. E. 1111, 1112, 8 Ind. App. 673.

The phrase "laid out according to law," when applied to a public highway, has a well-known meaning, under the statutes, and means the doing of those things by the proper legal officers which are essential to create a public highway, and to authorize it to be worked and traveled—especially the surveying, marking the course or boundaries, and ordering it established as a highway. Chicago Anderson Pressed Brick Co. v. City of Chicago, 28 N. E. 756, 757, 138 Ill. 628.

Streets cannot be said to be "laid out and opened," within the meaning of a city charter giving the city power of taxation for municipal purposes to a distance of 240 feet back from the line of such streets as the corporate authorities had laid out and opened, until there has been a formal acceptance of them by the authorities of the town according to law, though they may have been, since an alleged dedication, used as streets by the owners of property, and may have been generally considered streets of the town. Valentine v. City of Hagerstown, 86 Md. 486, 38 A. 931 (cited in Sindall v. City of Baltimore, 49 Atl. 645, 647, 93 Md. 526).

"Laid out," as used in Rev. St. c. 19, § 103, providing a penalty for encroaching upon a highway which has been laid out and opened, means the making of an order therefor by the proper officers, together with the recording of the same as required by law. State v. Huck, 29 Wis. 202, 207.

"Laid out," as used in Rev. St. 1857, c. 18, § 13, providing that, when a way is laid out over lands, the county commissioners shall decide whether any tract or part thereof will thereby be enhanced in value, etc., does not imply that a location has been made by any written report. Mansur v. County Com'rs, 22 Atl. 358, 359. 83 Me. 514.

In St. 1871, c. 382, which provides that at any time within two years after any street or highway or other way is laid out, altered, widened, graded, or discontinued, an assessment may be made, etc., and also in section 5 of the same act, which provides that the owner of any real estate which may abut on any street which may be laid out, graded, etc., may, at any time before the estimated damages are made, give notice of his objection to the assessment, etc., "laid out" refers to an order to lay out. Hitchcock v. Board of Aldermen of Springfield, 121 Mass. 382, 385.

"Laid out," as used in reference to a highway, has a well-known meaning, under our statutes, and plainly includes the doing of those things by the proper local officers which are essential in creating a public highway, to authorize it to be worked and traveled, and especially the surveying, marking the course or boundaries, and ordering it to be established as a highway. The affirmative action of the public authorities is indispensable in such case." Chicago Anderson Pressed Brick Co. v. City of Chicago, 28 N. E. 756, 757, 138 Ill. 628.

As construct or improve.

"Lay out," as used in St. 1875, c. 185, § 3, authorizing a board of park commissioners to lay out, improve, govern, and regulate any public parks located within the city, is used in the same sense as when used in reference to highways, in which it is the appropriate expression for locating and establishing a new highway, and is not to be construed as meaning something analogous to "improve." Foster v. City of Boston Park Com'rs, 133 Mass. 321, 332.

There is a sense in which to "lay out and establish" a public park may be held to be an erection or construction. To construct a thing is to put together its several parts in their proper place and order; and to erect is to found and form, as well as to build or raise and set up. A park is made up in part of walks and roads, which are new constructions, and of ornamentation, with shrubbery and trees, which are set up in the places in which they are planted, and of booths and summerhouses which are erected or built. City Sewage Utilization Co. v. Davis (Pa.) 8 Phila. 625-627.

The terms "lay out the road" and "lay off the road," in the statute concerning roads, declaring that "all roads to be hereafter laid out shall be laid out by a jury of freeholders," and that "all roads laid off under the provisions of this act shall be deemed public roads, and shall be at least twenty feet wide," import that the jury shall not only fix the course of the road as passing particular points, but also designate it after the manner of a survey, by its lines—in other words, lay down the whole ground covered by the road, or specify its width. Smith v. Eason, 33 N. C. 94, 97.

Within the meaning of Act June 21, 1849, amending the charter of the city of Hartford, and providing that, whenever the common council of the city shall lay out a drain or common sewer in the city in whole or in part through or across the lands of individuals or corporations, they shall appraise and pay to the owners of such lands the damages thereto caused by taking the right of way, etc., and that notice shall be given to the owners of the laying out and of the damages allowed means only the designation by the common council of the locality of the sewer or drain, and its dimensions and mode of construction, and does not have the technical meaning which is attached to it in statutes relating to the laying out and construction of highways, where it embraces all that series of acts which are made necessary to the complete establishment of the highway. Cone v. City of Hartford, 28 Conn. 363, 365.

"Laying out," as used in Rev. St. c. 39, § 56, providing that a railroad corporation is liable to pay all damages occasioned by laying out and making and maintaining its road, means the filing of the location of the road as required by the statute, and not the making of the road, for the filing of the location of the road is equivalent to the laying out of highways and turnpike roads by the county commissioners. It was by that act that the corporation acquired a right of way over the land. They thereby took a title, and thus they took the land. Charlestown Branch R. v. Middlesex County Com'rs, 48 Mass. (7 Metc.) 78, 83.

As opening.

The words "laying out" and "opening," as used in the road laws in reference to the laying out or opening of roads, "are constantly used as equivalent expressions." In re Opening of Twenty-Eighth St., 102 Pa. 140, 146.

"Laying out," as the term is used in speaking of the laying out of a street or public highway, is sometimes used as synonymous with "laying open to common or public use." In re Magnolia Ave., 11 Atl. 405, 408, 117 Pa. 56.

In Laws 1874, c. 604, entitled "An act to provide for the surveying, laying out, and monumenting certain portions of the streets in the state and county of New York, and to provide means therefor," should be construed in a broad and liberal sense, and not restricted to a technical construction. The words "laying out," as so used in the title, include not merely the surveying and mapping, but also the opening of the streets, since the opening is absolutely essential before the completion of the work. In re Department of Public Parks, 86 N. Y. 437, 439.

"Lay out," as used in a statute authorizing the filing of a petition to the selectmen to lay out a street, etc., is equivalent to the word "open," as used in a petition to the selectmen, under the statutes, requesting them to open a street, and hence the petition is sufficient. Winwooski Lumber & Water Power Co. v. Town of Colchester, 57 Vt. 538, 541.

As surveyed or platted.

"Laid out," as used on the face of a map as laid out by a certain person, is equivalent to "as surveyed" by him, and embraces a reference to the monuments placed on the land by the surveyor. Flint v. Long, 41 Pac. 49, 50, 12 Wash. 342.

5 Wds. & P.—8

Gen. St. 1878, c. 68, § 1, limits the homestead exemption to a quantity of land, not exceeding 80 acres, not included in the "laid out or platted portion of any incorporated town, city, or village," or a quantity of land not exceeding in amount one lot, if within the "laid out or platted portion of any incorporated town, city or village" of not over 5,000 inhabitants, or one-half acre if in a town, city, or village of less than 5,000 inhabitants. Held, that the "laid out or platted portion of an incorporated town, city, or village," as used in the statute, refers only to that part which is already laid out and platted for city or urban purposes, and not to land divided into large out or farm lots for rural or agricultural purposes. In re Smith's Estate, 53 N. W. 711, 51 Minn. 316.

LAY UP—LAID UP.

In a contract whereby a person agreed to deliver a certain proportion of ice laid up, he at the time having ice houses at two places in which the purchase was made, "laid up" did not apply to ice procured at distant points, and which would cost several times the contract price. Kemp v. Knickerbocker Ice Co., 69 N. Y. 45, 46.

Ship.

"Laid up," when spoken of a vessel, means that she has reached a port of safety, with the intention of remaining there, and, as used in a policy of marine insurance insuring a vessel while laid up for the winter, includes a vessel while lying in the harbor, whose men are busy in fitting her for winter quarters at that point, and all intention of proceeding further on the voyage or leaving this port of safety had been abandoned. Clarkson v. Western Assur. Co., 37 N. Y. Supp. 53, 57, 92 Hun, 527.

The expression "lay up for overhauling at time charterers designate" was meant, in a contract of charter, to give the charterers the right to designate the time when the vessel should be off pay, so as to suit the exigencies of their business; and the charterers had a right to count on the overhauling at such time as they should designate, and upon a cessation of pay during this period. The Ceres (U. S.) 61 Fed. 701, 704.

"Laid up," as used in a policy of insurance on a ship for a year, in which the underwriter stipulated to return a part of the premium if sold or laid up, means a permanent laying up—similar to that which would take place if the ship had been sold; that is, such a laying up as would put a final end to the policy. Hunter v. Wright, 10 Barn. & C. 714.

LAYING AT A WHARF.

A vessel is "laying at a wharf," within the meaning of the act fixing the rate of wharfage on ships for each day that a vessel shall lay at any wharf, when floating in the dock of the wharf, though moored to a different wharf. Deweese v. Adger (S. C.) 2 McCord, 105.

LAYING STOCK.

The mechanic's lien law of 1885, giving a mechanic a lien from the time of "laying stock," meant the commencement of labor or placing materials on the premises. Dunwell v. Bidwell, 8 Minn. 34, 39 (Gil. 18); (citing Farmers' Bank v. Winslow, 3 Minn. 86 [Gil. 43], 74 Am. Dec. 740).

LEAD.

Nix. Dig. 188, § 66 (Rev. p. 250, § 132), provides that if any person shall steal or break, etc., with intent to steal any lead or iron bar, iron rail, etc., or any lock fixed to any building of another, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, includes the stealing of a lead water pipe fixed to a paper mill. The word "lead" was used as a noun, and not as an adjective qualifying the word "bar." State v. Stone, 30 N. J. Law (1 Vroom) 299, 300.

LEAD MINE.

Under the act of Congress authorizing the President to lease lead mines, he is authorized to execute a lease for smelting lead ores. Digging the ore and smelting it may be included in the same lease, or these operations may be the subject of distinct leases. In every case the lease is within the law, as it is literally a lease of a lead mine, requiring the lessee to carry on all the operations of mining, or one of its important branches or any of them, as shall be deemed best under all the circumstances of the case. United States v. Gratiot (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 12, 13.

LEAD.

In a grant conferring a right to "lead" manure, the term is to be construed according to the usual mode of leading; that is, by drawing in a cart. Leading implies drawing in a carriage. Brunton v. Hall, 1 Q. B. 792, 795.

LEADING.

In statutes relative to elections, the term "two leading political parties" shall apply to the political parties who cast the highest and next highest number of votes for Governor at the preceding annual election. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 105, c. 11, § 1.

A municipal ordinance providing that certain bonds should not be issued to a railroad company until the railroad should be completed to a point of junction with some other railroad leading to Milwaukee and Chicago, includes not only a railroad whose line reaches Milwaukee and Chicago, or terminates at those places, but a railroad connecting either directly, or by way of another railroad, whose line reaches Milwaukee and Chicago, and terminates at those places. State v. City of Hastings, 24 Minn. 78, 85.

LEADING QUESTION.

A "leading question" has been defined as one which may be answered "Yes" or "No." This is the most usual definition, although not one most exactly fixing the meaning of the term. The proper significance of the expression is a suggestive question—one which suggests or puts the desired answer in the mouth of the witness. A question addressed to a witness on examination is not necessarily leading because it may be answered "Yes" or "No." A leading question is one that points out the desired answer, and not merely calls for a simple affirmative or negative; and an interrogatory which merely asks a witness if he has any idea as to a fact which is in dispute between the parties, and directs him, if he has such knowledge, to state the extent thereof, is not objectionable on the ground of being a leading question. Coogler v. Rhodes, 21 South. 109, 111, 38 Fla. 240, 56 Am. St. Rep. 170; People v. Mather (N. Y.) 4 Wend. 229, 247, 21 Am. Dec. 122.

A leading question is one which suggests to the witness the answer which the party desires, or which is so put as to embody a material fact, and to admit of an answer by a simple negative or affirmative, though neither the one nor the other is directly suggested. Such questions are prohibited, because the witness is supposed to be, and often is, favorable to the party who calls him. Under certain peculiar circumstances the rule may be relaxed or altogether abandoned at the discretion of the presiding judge, and from the exercise of his discretion there is ordinarily no right of appeal. One of the circumstances under which a departure from the general rule is allowable is when it becomes important to contradict a witness who has been examined by the opposite party. Gunter v. Watson, 49 N. C. 435, 456.

"Ordinarily a leading question is one that by its terms suggests to the witness the answer he is expected to make, and leads him to make such answer." Harvey v. Osborn, 55 Ind. 535, 544.

A leading question, says Greenleaf on Evidence, is one which, embodying material facts, admits of an answer by a simple negative or affirmative. Volume 1, § 434. Best

Ev. § 641, says: "It is sometimes said that the test of a leading question is whether an answer to it by 'Yes' or 'No' would be conclusive on the matter in issue, but, although such questions undoubtedly come within the rule, it is by no means limited to them." An interrogatory which can be answered directly in the affirmative or negative enables a witness to answer in the language of the question, and places it in the power of counsel to give an undue effect to the testimony by putting words in the mouth of his witness. Such a question is leading. Long v. McCauley (Tex.) 3 S. W. 689, 692. See, also, Willis v. Qulmby, 31 N. H. 485, 488.

A leading question is usually defined as one which admits of the answer simply in the affirmative or negative, or which, embodying a material fact, suggests the desired answer. It may be gravely doubted whether or not the definition be accurate in either form. Probably there may be questions which admit of an answer either in the affirmative or negative which do not indicate to the witness the expected answer. On the other hand, to an intelligent witness almost any material question contains something in the way of suggestion as to the desired response. But where a question contains a series or group of facts, and admits of a complete answer by a bare affirmation or negation, it is clearly leading. It enables the witness to echo back the language of the examiner, and enables the examiner to lead even an honest witness in such manner as to give to the testimony a false color, and, it may be, to grossly distort it. San Antonio & A. P. Ry. Co. v. Hammon, 50 S. W. 123, 124, 92 Tex. 509.

A leading or suggestive question is defined by statute as one which suggests to the witness the answer which the examining party desires. Idaho Mercantile Co. v. Kallanquin (Idaho) 66 Pac. 933.

A leading question has been defined to be one which directly suggests the answer which is desired, or which embodies a material fact, and admits of an answer by a simple negative or affirmative, though neither the one nor the other be directly suggested. But if the examination of a witness be to direct his mind with the more expedition to what is material, and if the question propounded relate merely to introductory matter, it should not be excluded, although in form it be leading. Stringfellow v. State, 26 Miss. (4 Cushm.) 157, 159, 59 Am. Dec. 247.

A leading question has been defined to be one which directly suggests the answer expected—one which suggests to the witness the answer desired, or which, by embodying a material fact, admits of a conclusive answer by a simple negative or affirmative. In Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Sheppard, 85 Ga. 751, 12 S. E. 18, it was held that an interrogatory which assumed material facts in controversy was manifestly objectionable, as leading. The court says: "This sort of assumption is one of the most pernicious forms in which the vice of leading questions can make its appearance; its tendency being to induce the witness to adopt the theory of the facts propounded by the examiner, and shape his testimony in a way to lend support to that theory. Even an honest and well-meaning witness will sometimes be drawn by this device into coloring the letter, if not the spirit, of his evidence more highly than the exact truth, so far as his knowledge extends, will warrant." Franks v. Gress Lumber Co., 36 S. E. 314, 111 Ga. 87.

Questions are objectionable, as leading, not only when they directly suggest the answer which is desired, but also when they embody a material fact, and admit of an answer by a simple negative or affirmative, though neither the one nor the other is directly suggested. 2 Phil. Ev. 745. Mr. Greenleaf, after defining leading questions as those which suggest the answer desired, says: "Questions are also objectionable which, embodying a material fact, admit of an answer by a simple negative or affirmative." 1 Greenl. Ev. § 434. See, also, Rap. Wit. § 241. In Nichols v. Dowding, 1 Starkie, 81, Lord Ellenborough says: "If questions are asked to which the answer 'Yes' or 'No' would be conclusive, they would certainly be objectionable." International & G. N. R. Co. v. Dalwigh, 51 S. W. 500, 501, 92 Tex. 635.

A leading question is one which suggests to a witness the answer which he is to make. A witness may, however, be examined as to an introductory matter so as to lead his mind to the subject. Hence it is often difficult to decide whether a question propounded is objectionable in law. Turney v. State, 16 Miss. (8 Smedes & M.) 104, 117, 47 Am. Dec. 74.

A question which suggests to the witness the answer which the examining party desires is denominated a leading or suggestive question. Ann. Codes & Sts. Or. 1901, § 847; Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 2046.

LEAF TOBACCO.

The term "leaf tobacco," in the trade, is applied to any tobacco that is on the stem, or in its original form with the stem taken out. United States v. Schroeder (U. S.) 93 Fed. 448, 450, 35 C. C. A. 376.

LEAGUE.

See "Marine League"; "Mexican League"; "Square League."

A league of land, as used in Texas land grants, contains 4,428 acres. Hunter v. Morse's Heirs, 49 Tex. 219, 220.

The term "leagues," as used in a grant of four leagues of land in the province of Texas December 27, 1795, means Spanish leagues, and not American or English leagues. The old legal league, by the laws of Spain, and which was adopted in Mexico, consisted of 5,000 varas; and a vara, in Texas, is equivalent to $33\frac{1}{8}$ English inches; making the league equal to a little more than 2.63 miles, and the square league equal to 4,428.4 acres. United States v. Perot, 98 U. S. 428, 429, 25 L. Ed. 251.

LEAKAGE.

As peril of the sea, see "Peril of the Sea."

Stipulations in a bill of lading against liability for damage through dangers of the sea or leakage do not exempt the owner from liability for injury caused by sea water which enters through the deck by reason of its defective condition. The Nellie Floyd (U. S.) 116 Fed. 80-82.

A bill of lading stipulating that oil casks should be wet twice a week, and that the carrier should not be accountable for leakage, renders the carrier liable for loss of oil by leakage caused by the casks not being properly wet; the intent being that the wetting should prevent any leakage by shrinking of the casks. Hunnewell v. Taber (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 895, 896.

Leakage, as used in a clause in a policy of insurance which provided that the insurers should not be liable for leakage, unless occasioned by stranding or collision, exempts them from liability for all leakage, ordinary or extraordinary, from whatever cause, whether gradual or violent in its operation, except that specified as not within the exemption. Cory v. Boylston Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 107 Mass. 140, 144, 9 Am. Rep. 14.

"Leakage," as used in a bill of lading stating that the carriers were not accountable for leakage on a shipment of brandies in casks, would not exempt them from liability for the breaking of the casks by unskillful stowage, so that the whole wine was lost. The ordinary signification of the word "leakage" is a loss of a part, but not of the whole. Thomas v. The Morning Glory, 13 La. Ann. 269, 271, 71 Am. Dec. 509.

The term "leakage," in a bill of lading of a cask of wine, exempting the carrier from liability for leakage, does not free him from loss, other than that resulting from ordinary leakage, and the carrier is liable if the entire contents are so lost. Brauer v. The Almoner, 18 La. Ann. 268.

LEAP.

The expression "leap," in an action for injuries to a passenger, in an instruction that the passenger may not set his life or limbs on the hazard of a leap from a running train, denotes a higher effort and less consideration on the part of the traveler than merely attempting to board a car under way. In the former the jury might discover negligence; in the latter they might not, in view of the circumstances, discover any. Johnson v. West Chester & P. R. Co., 70 Pa. 357, 365.

LEARNED.

"Learned," as used in an allegation that defendant ceased to make certain payments under a contract when it learned that complainant had long before violated its covenants, etc., should be construed to mean when the defendant received information, and not as necessarily importing that degree of certainty which is implied in the assertion of a fact. It means on the receipt of creditable information. Seibert Cylinder Oil Cup Co. v. Manning (U. S.) 34 Fed. 538, 540.

In discussing testimony in which a witness stated that, from a certain conversation, he learned that three parties had entered into a partnership, the court says that the testimony was properly stricken out, as not purporting to be the witness' recollection of the conversation, but a conclusion from it. Though the use of the word "learned" might not of itself be decisive, the further language shows that the witness is not trying to give the language of the various parties, but is simply giving the results as he understood them. Shepard v. Pratt, 16 Kan. 209, 211.

LEARNED IN THE LAW.

The phrase "learned in the law," as used in Const. art. 5, §§ 10, 25, providing that no person shall be eligible to the office of judge unless he shall be "learned in the law," means that the candidate must be an attorney or a counselor at law. It clearly indicates an intention to prescribe some sort of an educational qualification, and should be given some practical effect; and therefore no one is eligible as a judge who is not, when elected, either admitted or entitled to be admitted, without examination, to practice as an attorney at law. In other words, the fact that the candidate is learned in the law must have been ascertained by a competent tribunal prior to the election. Jamieson v. Wiggin, 80 N. W. 137, 138, 12 S. D. 16, 46 L. R. A. 317, 76 Am. St. Rep. 585 (approved in Howard v. Burns, 85 N. W. 920, 921).

It is held that an agreement for arbitration, providing that the parties shall each select one arbitrator learned in the law, is not ambiguous or uncertain, and means simply an ordinary arbitration. State v. Ward, 56 Tenn. (9 Heisk.) 100, 110; Nance's Lessee v. Thompson, 33 Tenn. (1 Sneed) 321, 326.

The use of the phrase "learned in the law," in connection with an instruction as to probable cause, in an action for malicious prosecution, is held to be error. On this subject the court says: "Though with us it is presumed that one admitted to the practice is learned in the law, yet, as it is not a practical requirement of the rule under consideration, it would be taking a step too far to require a party to insure that his selection was of an attorney learned in the law, and the phrase 'reputable practicing attorney' should be substituted, since the advice of such an attorney will protect the prosecutor, whether in fact he is learned in the law or not." O'Neal v. McKinna, 116 Ala. 606, 620, 22 South. 905.

LEARNED PROFESSIONS.

"We speak of the professions of medicine, law, and divinity as learned professions, and also the profession of arms. So, also, the term has come to be applied to other occupations and callings, all of which require learning and special preparation in the acquirement of scientific knowledge and skill necessary to the proper understanding and successful management of such occupations. As an illustration, it is not unusual now to regard the occupation of a civil or mining engineer or an electrician as a professional occupation, because scientific learning and knowledge are essential to the proper understanding of such a calling; but we do not speak of or understand the business of a merchant or blacksmith or carpenter or tailor as falling properly within the designation of professional occupations, or of those who achieved success beyond their fellows of such calling as professional men." Commonwealth v. Fittler, 23 Atl. 568, 569, 147 Pa. 288, 15 L. R. A. 205.

Act Cong. March 3, 1903, c. 1012, § 4, 32 Stat. 1214 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1903, p. 173], provides for the deportation of aliens, and declares that the inhibition against the importation of aliens to perform labor or service of any kind, skilled or unskilled, shall not apply to persons belonging to any recognized learned profession. Held, that aliens imported under contract, who were expert accountants, were not members of a recognized learned profession, within the terms of the exception, and were therefore not entitled to entry. In re Ellis (U. S.) 124 Fed. 637, 638.

LEASE.

See "Coal Lease"; "Concurrent Lease"; "Gas Lease"; "Mining Lease"; "Oil Lease"; "Parol Lease"; "Running Lease"; "Under Lease"; "Within Lease."

Mineral lease, see "Mining Lease."

"To lease is to let; to farm out; to rent." Atlanta & C. Air Line Ry. Co. v. Harrison, 76 Ga. 757, 759.

A grant for use and possession, in consideration of something to be rendered, constitutes a lease of the thing to be possessed. O'Donnell v. Lusk (Pa.) 12 Montg. Co. Law Rep'r, 109, 110.

A lease is a contract for the possession and profits of lands and tenements, either for life or a certain term of years, or during the pleasure of the parties. Edwards v. Noel, 88 Mo. App. 434, 440.

A lease is a conveyance by the owner of an estate to another of a portion of his interest therein for a term less than his own, in consideration of a certain annual or stated rent or other recompense. Gray v. Lafayette County, 27 N. W. 311, 312, 65 Wis. 567.

A lease imports a thing let, and a subject-matter susceptible of grant, no less than capable parties, is indispensable to a demise. Sommer v. Bavarian Star Brewing Co., 28 N. Y. Supp. 571, 8 Misc. Rep. 268.

A lease is defined to be a contract for the possession and profits of lands and tenements on one side, and a recompense of rent or other income on the other. Sawyer v. Hansen, 24 Me. (11 Shep.) 542, 545; Becker v. Becker, 43 N. Y. Supp. 17, 22, 13 App. Div. 342; Dollittle v. Eddy (N. Y.) 7 Barb. 74, 78; Voorhees v. Presbyterian Church (N. Y.) 5 How. Prac. 58, 71. A "lease" is a species of contract for the possession and profits of lands and tenements either for life, or for a certain term of years, or during the pleasure of the parties. Paul v. Cragnaz, 59 Pac. 857, 859, 25 Nev. 293, 47 L. R. A. 540; Pelton v. Minah Con. Min. Co., 28 Pac. 310, 311, 11 Mont. 281; Heywood v. Fulmer, 32 N. E. 574, 575, 158 Ind. 658, 18 L. R. A. 491; Mack v. Patchin (N. Y.) 1 Sheld. 67, 72; Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co., 101 U. S. 71, 78, 25 L. Ed. 950; United States v. Gratiot, 39 U. S. (14 Pet.) 526, 538, 10 L. Ed. 573; Kunkle v. Philadelphia Rifle Club (Pa.) 10 Phila. 52, 53.

A lease is defined by Rev. Civ. Code La. art. 2669 (2639) to be a contract by which one party gives to the other the enjoyment of a thing at a fixed price. Viterbo v. Friedlander, 7 Sup. Ct. 962, 967, 120 U. S. 707, 30 L. Ed. 776.

When one grants to another an estate for years out of his own estate, with reversion to himself, it is usually termed a "lease." It may be confined to a particular interest in lands, such as mining or agriculture, in which event no other interest passes. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3114.

A lease is defined by the Code as "a synallagmatic contract, to which consent alone is sufficient, and by which one party gives to another the enjoyment of a thing at a fixed price." The contract embodies in itself reciprocal rights and obligations—the right of enjoyment and the obligation of paying the rent—which, so far as governed by the contract alone, coexist and adhere to each other. Hence it has been repeatedly decided that the sale of the unexpired term of a lease, without qualification, is a sale of the lease for such term, as an entirety, including its obligations as well as its rights, or, in the language of the court, that the “bid for the lease in such a case is a premium which the bidder is willing to give for the transfer of the lease to himself, with all its obligations, as well as all the rights there-to attached, from the moment of the adjudication.” Walker v. Doban, 2 South. 381, 382, 39 La. Ann. 743.

A lease is a contract for the possession and profits of land and tenements, on the one side, and a recompense of rent or other income on the other, or it is a conveyance to a person for life or years or at will, in consideration of the return of rent or other recompense. The person selling the land is called the “landlord,” and the party to whom the lease is made, the “tenant.” Jackson v. Harson (N. Y.) 7 Cow. 323, 326, 17 Am. Dec. 517; Branch v. Doane, 17 Conn. 402, 411.

A lease is a contract by which one person divests himself, and another takes the possession of, lands or chattels for a term, whether long or short. Wood, Landl. & Ten. § 203. A lease at the common law is a grant of assurance of a present or future interest for life or for years or at will in lands or other property of a demisable nature, a reversion being left in the party from whom the grant of assurance proceeds. Platt, Leas. 1. A lease is a species of contract for the possession of profits in lands and tenements either for life, or for a certain number of years, or during the pleasure of the parties. No particular form of expression or technical words are necessary to constitute a lease, but whatever expressions explain the intention of the parties to be that one shall divest himself of the possession of his property, and the other shall take it, for a certain space of time, are sufficient, and will amount to a lease for years as effectually as if the most proper and permanent form of words had been made use of for that purpose. Lacey v. Newcomb, 63 N. W. 704, 707, 95 Iowa, 287; Sawyer v. Hanson, 24 Me. (11 Shep.) 542, 545.

A lease is defined to be a species of contract for the possession and profits of lands and tenements either for life, or during the pleasure of the parties; a contract by which one person divests himself of, and another takes possession of, lands or chattels for a term, whether long or short; a conveyance of any lands or tenements made for life, for years, or at will, but always for a less time than the lessor has in the premises. Badger Lumber Co. v. Malone, 54 Pac. 692, 693, 8 Kan. App. 121.

Where a conveyance of an estate in land subordinate to that of grantor is made upon a valid consideration and for a definite term, the instrument making the conveyance is a lease. In consideration of $400 paid by a railroad company, a landowner granted it the right to construct and maintain for one year a Y on his land. The agreement provided that, if the company desired to permanently maintain the Y, it could at any time before the end of the year commence condemnation proceedings, and have the damages assessed as at the date of the agreement, and that the $400 should be deducted therefrom. The company left the track on the land three months beyond the year, using it occasionally for storing cars, and then removed it, with the consent of the landowner. The land was uninclosed timber land, of little value. Held, that the agreement was a lease, and that by holding over the company became bound to pay as rent for the second year the same rent as for the first year. New York, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Randall, 26 N. E. 122, 123, 102 Ind. 453.

A lease, when we mean thereby the instrument, is, in legal language, an indenture of lease or a deed, and therefore authors treat of leases under the common or general title of deeds. But in common parlance, where it is said “a man has a lease for property,” nothing more is meant than that he has a term or an estate for years in the premises, which may be by deed or a writing not under seal. The former is of itself a lease; the latter, only written evidence of one; and this distinction will be found in several of the cases where the question has been whether the instrument did or did not require a stamp. Mayberry v. Johnson, 15 N. J. Law (3 J. S. Green) 116, 121.

The term “lease” is used in Rev. St. § 4106, which required a lease of any estate or interest in other property to be signed by the lessor, in its legal sense of an instrument demising real property for a limited period upon a reserved rental, executed in conformity with the general law of the subject. Langmede v. Weaver, 60 N. E. 992, 995, 65 Ohio St. 17.

As more than annual rental.

The word “lease,” as used in Code, c. 58, § 37, authorizing the committee of an insane person, if necessary, to lease his property to the extent necessary for his support, does not refer to the annual rental which is included in the general powers of the committee, but to some act extending to and affecting the corpus of the property, such as mining for coal or other minerals, cutting timber, or doing other acts which if done without authority would be considered waste or destruction of the freehold. Johnson v. Chapman, 28 S. E. 744, 746, 43 W. Va. 639.

Assignment distinguished.

See "Assignment."

A lease is properly a conveyance of any land or tenement, made for life or years or at will, but always for a less time than the lessor hath in the premises, for, if it be for the whole interest, it is more properly an assignment than a lease. McKee v. Howe, 17 Colo. 538, 541, 31 Pac. 115, 116, (citing 1 Bl. Comm. 316).

A lease is defined to be a conveyance by way of a demise awarded for a less term than the party conveying has in the premises. Mr. Taylor says it is essential to the lease that some reversionary interest in the lease be left in the lessor, for, if by an instrument purporting to be a demise he parts with the whole term, it amounts to an assignment. Craig v. Summers, 49 N. W. 742, 743, 47 Minn. 189, 15 L. R. A. 236.

As bailment for use.

The word "lease" has by common use come to be applied to certain kinds of contracts, sometimes amounting to a conditional sale, and at other times to a bailment for use, under which goods are delivered by one person to another. We naturally infer from a record which speaks of goods leased—there being no other explanatory averment—that the bailee has the right to possession until the completion of the term specified in the contract, or until the happening of the contingency which by the terms of the contract entitles the bailor to take possession. Cadwallader v. Wagner (Pa.) 7 Kulp, 465, 466.

As chattel mortgage.

See "Chattel Mortgage."

Consolidation.

The term "lease," as used in connection with a transaction between one railroad and another, whether for a longer or a shorter period, implies the continued existence of the lessor, with all its powers and functions, and all the rights incident to its creation, and it would be a gross misapplication of terms to hold that a lease or contract for use by one railroad with another is a merger or consolidation of the two roads. State v. Montana R. Co., 53 Pac. 623, 631, 21 Mont. 221, 45 L. R. A. 271.

As conveyance.

A lease is a conveyance of real estate. State v. Morrison, 52 Pac. 228, 18 Wash. 664; Shimer v. Inhabitants of Town of Phillipsburg, 33 Atl. 852, 58 N. J. Law (28 Vroom) 506; Crouse v. Mitchell, 90 N. W. 32, 35, 130 Mich. 347, 97 Am. St. Rep. 479.

Contra, see In re Tuohy's Estate, 58 Pac. 722, 724, 23 Mont. 305; Clark v. Hyatt, 55 N. Y. Super. Ct. (23 Jones & S.) 98, 105.

A lease is a sale and conveyance of the property leased, which only differs from what is commonly called a "deed" in being limited to a term certain, and leaving a reversionary interest in the grantor. Wien v. Simpson (Pa.) 2 Phila. 158.

A lease is personal property. It bargains away a temporary possession, and does not dispose of any fee or title. A lease is held, therefore, not to be a conveyance of property within a statute prohibiting conveyances of realty by a married woman without the joinder of her husband as grantor. Perkins v. Morse, 2 Atl. 130, 131, 78 Me. 17, 57 Am. Rep. 780; Heal v. Niagara Oil Co., 50 N. E. 482, 150 Ind. 483.

A lease from a married woman is a grant or instrument, within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 1093, providing that no estate in the real property of a married woman passes by any grant purporting to be executed or acknowledged by her, unless the grant or instrument is acknowledged by her in a certain manner. Carlton v. Williams, 19 Pac. 185, 186, 77 Cal. 89, 11 Am. St. Rep. 243.

An instrument by which, for a consideration received, all at one time, the grantors leased certain land to the grantee, mentioning no time during which the estate is to continue, and reserving, "so long as this lease shall continue, the right to any logs or pipes in the same leased premises, and certain other rights connected therewith, to have and to hold the same to the grantee, his heirs and assigns, under the restrictions and reservations aforesaid, so long as grantor shall keep pipes in his land as aforesaid, and no longer," conveys a base fee. Jamaica Pond Aqueduct Corp. v. Chandler, 91 Mass. (9 Allen) 159, 168.

A lease is a contract or agreement for the possession and profits of lands and tenements. Strictly speaking, it is not a term applicable to chattels which are not attached to or issue out of realty. A lease is a conveyance or grant. The use of the word in an instrument by which the grantor leased to the grantee all pine timber growing on certain lands was held to render the agreement operative to convey growing timber, as growing timber is a part of the realty, and cannot be sold or conveyed to another except by an instrument in writing. Milliken v. Faulk, 20 South. 594, 595, 111 Ala. 658.

A lease is a contract for the possession and profits of land by the lessee, and recompense of rent or increase to the lessor, and is a grant of an estate in the land.

Stinson v. Hardy, 41 Pac. 116, 118, 27 Or. 694.

A lease is a conveyance by way of demise always for a less term than the party conveying has in the premises. It is essential to a lease that some reversionary interest be left in the lessor, for if, by an instrument purporting to be a demise, he parts with the whole term, it will amount to an assignment of the term. Craig v. Summers, 49 N. W. 742, 743, 47 Minn. 189, 15 L. R. A. 236.

As a deed.

See "Deed."

Demise distinguished.

The general signification of the word "demise" is that it is a conveyance in fee for life or for years. It denotes something more than a mere letting or a lease—as, for instance, a grant. It would seem that it means more to the lessee than a mere letting by the landlord, or the mere taking by the lessee, generally embraced in the mere terms "to lease" or "to let." These latter words, it would appear, can have relation only to the mere term. A "demise" embraces a fee, and it seems particularly designed for use to import to the agreement between a landlord and tenant implied covenants on the part of the lessor of good right and title to make the lease, and an implied covenant of quiet enjoyment. Mershon v. Williams, 44 Atl. 211, 214, 63 N. J. Law, 398.

As affected by designation.

A contract by the municipal authorities of a town that, if a party will erect a market house for the town, he shall, as compensation therefor, have the occupancy thereof for 12 years, with the exclusive right to keep the same as a town market, was not a lease, and was not made such by being referred to subsequently in writing by the parties as a lease. City of Brookhaven v. Bagget, 61 Miss. 383, 384.

The mere use of technical words or phrases which have a definite legal signification cannot be allowed to defeat the contrary intention of the parties, if that intention be manifest from the whole contract. Caldwell v. Fulton, 31 Pa. (7 Casey) 475, 478, 72 Am. Dec. 760; Funk v. Haldeman, 53 Pa. (3 P. F. Smith) 229. So that the words "demise," "lease," "mine," "let," "lessors," and "lessees," and like words specially appropriate to a contract between the owner and a tenant for years, have no bearing if the contract is in fact not a lease. Lehigh & Wilkesbarre Coal Co. v. Wright, 35 Atl. 919, 920, 177 Pa. 387. See, also, Dela-ware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Sanderson, 1 Atl. 394, 396, 109 Pa. 583, 58 Am. Rep. 743. The form of the instrument is not decisive of its character as a lease. Heywood v. Fulmer, 32 N. E. 574, 575, 158 Ind. 658, 18 L. R. A. 491.

No particular words are necessary to create a lease, and whatever is sufficient to explain the intent of the parties that one shall divest himself of the possession, and the other come into it, for a determinate time, amounts to a lease. Williams v. Miller, 9 Pac. 166, 168, 68 Cal. 290.

As grant.

See "Grant."

As both granting and receiving estate.

The word "leased" "may be used in two senses. It is said that a landlord leased his lands to his tenant, and with almost equal propriety it may be said that the tenant leased an estate from his landlord." Zink v. Grant, 25 Ohio St. 352, 354.

"Leasing," as used in Rev. St. Ill. 1874, c. 114, § 34, providing that all railroad companies incorporated under the laws of the state were empowered to make contracts and arrangements with each other, and with railroad corporations of other states, for leasing or running their roads, or any part thereof, includes making as well as taking leases thereof. St. Louis, V. & T. H. R. Co. v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co., 12 Sup. Ct. 953, 955, 145 U. S. 393, 36 L. Ed. 748.

"Leasing," as used in Rev. St. § 1038, subd. 3, providing that the leasing of the parsonages of local churches or districts shall not render them liable to taxation, in its approved and legal signification, refers more especially to an act of the lessor. A lease is a conveyance by the owner of an estate to another of a portion of his interest therein for a term less than his own, in consideration of a certain annual or stated rent or other recompense. It is hardly accurate to say that the act of leasing may be done by the lessee. It is not of the same meaning as "rented," for the word "rented" refers as well to the act of a lessee as to that of a lessor. The lessor rents land to the lessee. The lessee rents land of the lessor. Gray v. Lafayette County, 27 N. W. 311, 312, 65 Wis. 567.

Incorporeal hereditaments.

Anything corporeal or incorporeal lying in delivery or in grant may be the subject-matter of a lease, and therefore not only lands and houses, but commons, ways, fisheries, franchises, estovers, annuities, rent charges, and all other incorporeal hereditaments are included in the common-law rule. Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co., 101 U. S. 71, 78, 25 L. Ed. 950.

As incumbrance.

See "Incumbrance (On Title)."

License distinguished.

See, also, "License."

A mere license to occupy, use, or take the profits of land is in the nature of a lease. An executory contract for the purchase of land, giving to the purchaser a right to enter and possess until default in the payment of the purchase money, without any fixed period, and without any compensation being made for the use, is only a license, and not a lease. It does not have one essential quality of a lease, to wit, a stipulation for compensation to the owner. Dolittle v. Eddy (N. Y.) 7 Barb. 74, 78.

A written agreement by the owner of coal land, giving another the exclusive right to mine coal thereon for a term of years, is not a mere license, but a lease, which is assignable. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Peers, 37 N. E. 937, 938, 150 Ill. 344.

An instrument which conveys the exclusive right to enter upon lands, and to dig and mine phosphate, rocks, and other minerals, and to carry them away and sell for his own use, for a term of years, on certain royalty, is a lease, and not a license to mine. Malcomson v. Wappoo Mills (U. S.) 85 Fed. 907, 908.

A contract in writing for the use and possession of a tract of land, and the right to cut and remove a part of the timber growing thereon, is a lease, and not a license. Crane v. Patton, 21 S. W. 466, 57 Ark. 340.

Where the owner of land, for a valuable consideration, grants the land described to the other party to the contract for the purpose and with the exclusive right of drilling and operating for oil and gas for a certain number of years, the instrument is more than a mere license. It is a lease of the land for the purpose and period limited therein. Harris v. Ohio Oil Co., 48 N. E. 502, 506, 57 Ohio St. 118.

The owners of land granted to another the right to enter thereon to test and search for minerals and oil, and to mine and quarry thereon; the second party to have the right to erect buildings and machinery for work in mining, and to pay $25 per year, if minerals were not mined, and to pay a royalty on all ores shipped. The instrument was termed therein a "lease," and was to continue for 99 years. Held, that it was a lease, and not a revocable license. Young v. Ellis, 91 Va. 297, 21 S. E. 480.

The form of the instrument is not decisive of its character as a lease. So it is held that a writing which recites the receipt of a certain sum "in payment of sand bar * * * [describing same] for the year 1890," and further reciting, "This is for the exclusive right to all gravel and sand for the year above named, and excluding all other parties from said premises," is a lease, and not a license. Heywood v. Fulmer, 32 N. E. 574, 575, 158 Ind. 658, 18 L. R. A. 491.

A license, pure and simple, is a mere personal privilege, extending only to the person to whom it was given, and it cannot be granted over even when money has been paid for it. It is revocable at law at pleasure of the licensor. The death of either of the parties will terminate it; and, when it affects land, a conveyance of them will revoke it. A license to work a mine simply confers a right of property in the minerals, while they have been severed from the freehold, while a lease is an actual interest in the thing demised. East Jersey Iron Co. v. Wright, 32 N. J. Eq. (5 Stew.) 248, 253.

Mining license.

The term "leasehold interest," wherever used in the act relating to the selling of leasehold interests in lands on execution, shall be deemed to include mining licenses or mining ore or minerals. Tenancies at will shall not be subject to the provisions of the act. Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 9232.

Parcel contract.

By statute the term "lease" includes a verbal letting. People v. Chase, 46 N. E. 454, 455, 165 Ill. 527, 36 L. R. A. 105.

As personal property.

See "Personal Property."

Implied covenant for quiet enjoyment.

Every lease contains an implied covenant of quiet enjoyment. Ross v. Dysart, 33 Pa. (9 Casey) 452, 453.

The use of the word "lease" in a demise for a term of years implies a covenant for quiet enjoyment during the term. Maule v. Ashmead, 20 Pa. (8 Harris) 482, 484.

The use of the word "lease" in an instrument of lease imports a covenant for quiet enjoyment, as well as the word "grant" or "demise." An implied covenant arises not from the use of particular or fixed terms, such as "demise," but from the word "lease," or, otherwise expressed, from the use of words of demise in a lease. Hamilton v. Wright's Adm'r, 28 Mo. 199, 206.

Rent.

A lease necessarily implies the relation of landlord and tenant. The reception of rent is the fundamental idea connected with the lease, and the relation of landlord and tenant must be established in order that the landlord may receive the rent, may enforce covenants, may re-enter for conditions broken, and grant new terms on default by the tenant in the payment of the rent. Becker v. Becker, 43 N. Y. Supp. 17, 22, 13 App. Div. 342.

A lease for years is a contract between the lessee and the lessor by which the lessor contracts to grant the possession and enjoyment of land or other hereditaments of a demisable nature for a period of years certain, and in most cases the lessee agrees to render to the lessor a rent in money or other kind of payment at the end of stated periods of a year or more during the term. Rent is not essential to the contract, because, from favor or for valuable consideration given to the lessor at the time of the making of the lease, a lease beneficial in its nature to the lessee may be made without reserving any rent. State v. Page (S. C.) 1 Speers, 408, 428, 40 Am. Dec. 608. But the lessee must enter into possession, to acquire an estate in the land. Until entry by the lessee, the lessor remains in possession, and cannot be said to have deprived the lessee of that which he never had. Wilcox v. Bostick, 35 S. E. 496, 497, 57 S. C. 151.

A written statement to the effect that the person signing it has taken possession of certain land, which he is to hold for S., free of rent, "until such time as he may want it," is a lease. Allen v. Koepsel, 14 S. W. 151, 77 Tex. 505.

Sale distinguished.

See, also, "Sale."

An agreement in which A. leases a certain tract of land to B., and agrees to give B. the exclusive right to mine and sell all of the coal in the tract—B. agreeing to open the mines, build chutes, etc., and to pay a royalty of a certain amount per ton—is not a lease, but is a sale of the coal. Appeal of Duff (Pa.) 14 Atl. 364, 367.

Leases are generally for a term of years. If for a long term, as a hundred years, though of greater value than if for the life of the grantee, the estate is still inferior. The entire body of coal under a tract of land may be embraced in a lease, and the term be so long that in all probability the lessee will mine the whole of the coal. Nevertheless the term of years is but a chattel or interest in the land. The lease of a mine for a term of years or for life involves the possibility, if not the probability, of a reversion. But where by the provisions of a contract the possession of a certain lease of a mine was to continue until all the coal was mined, and the money to be paid, though called by various terms, was in reality a certain price per ton, and the grantee agreed to remove all the coal beneath the surface, and to take no less than a named quantity each year, there was an actual sale of the coal, rather than a lease, though the operative word of the grant was "lease." Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Sanderson, 1 Atl. 394, 396, 109 Pa. 553, 58 Am. Rep. 743.

An instrument relating to coal, the right to mine and take which is exclusively in the grantor, and for which the grantee agrees either to mine all the coal, or to pay for it if not mined, is in legal effect a grant of the coal as land. Under the decisions of the courts of Pennsylvania, for the purposes of these rules, the word "lease" is deemed an apt word of conveyance. Genet v. Delaware & H. Canal Co., 35 N. Y. Supp. 147, 154, 13 Misc. Rep. 409.

"Lease," as used in Act March 27, 1801, § 4, providing for the incorporation of religious societies, and authorizing their trustees to purchase and hold real and personal estate, and to demise, lease, and improve the same for the use of the congregation, has reference to a lease which is a contract for the possession and profits of lands and tenements, on the one side, and a recompense of rent and income, on the other, or a conveyance of lands to one for life or years or at will, in consideration of a rent or other recompense. The words of conveyance appropriate in a lease are "demise, lease, and farm let." These words are technical words, well understood, and are the most proper that can be used in making a lease. It means clearly a lease for years in consideration of rent, and does not include an absolute sale of a pew in a church. Voorhees v. Presbyterian Church of Amsterdam (N. Y.) 5 How. Prac. 58, 62.

A lease for years is a contract for the use of lands and tenements; and although it may be for a full consideration paid down, and reserve no rent to be paid in future, yet it contemplates a temporary use of the thing leased, whether it be a farm or a mine, and a return of the possession thereof to the owner or reversioner. French v. Brewer (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 774, 776.

Sharing contract.

Letting land upon shares for a single crop does not amount to a lease of the land, and the owner alone can bring trespass. Bradish v. Schenck (N. Y.) 8 Johns. 151.

The term "lease" correctly describes an agreement by a landowner with another by which the latter is to enter and dig for ore, build houses, etc., and to pay as compensation therefor 50 cents a ton for every ton of ore. Moore v. Miller, 8 Pa. (8 Barr) 272, 283.

A contract to operate a mine and make certain repairs for one year, in consideration of receiving 80 per cent. of the net returns from the ore, was construed to be a mining lease. Pelton v. Minah Con. Min. Co., 28 Pac. 310, 311, 11 Mont. 281.

An agreement whereby a party had the exclusive right to mine coal under certain land for 20 years, unless the coal sooner gave out, and to use in connection with the mines five acres of the surface of the land, to erect buildings thereon, and to build and operate railroads and flow water thereover, for a certain royalty per ton of the coal mined, not to fall below a fixed amount per year, payable as rent for all privileges granted, was a lease, creating the relation of landlord and tenant, within Code, § 2017, giving the landlord a lien for rent; the royalty being equivalent to rent. Lacey v. Newcomb, 63 N. W. 704, 707, 95 Iowa, 287.

A lease is defined as a contract for the possession and profits of land, on one side, and the recompense or rent or other income, on the other. Or it is a conveyance of lands and tenements to a person for life, for years, or at will, in consideration of a return of rent or other recompense. An agreement in writing by which one party leases to another, for a specified term, certain land, and the second party agrees to cultivate and plant the land at his own expense, and deliver one-sixth of the crops to the first party, is a lease, and not a contract for the services of the second party. Walls v. Preston, 25 Cal. 59, 60, 66.

LEASEHOLD.

Rev. St. U. S. § 2116, prohibits the sale or negotiation, without the authority of the United States, of any Indian land, and, in another clause, prohibits the making of a contract for the "title or purchase of any land." Held, that a leasehold interest for grazing purposes, merely, could not be considered as a title, within such subsequent clause, since, in common parlance, the word "title" means the full and absolute title to land. United States v. Hunter (U. S.) 21 Fed. 615, 617.

When the owner of property makes a lease to a tenant, he conveys the estate in the property known as a leasehold estate, and such estate is, in law, entirely separate and distinct from the estate that the landlord retains. Stubbings v. Village of Evanston, 26 N. E. 577, 136 Ill. 87, 11 L. R. A. 839, 29 Am. St. Rep. 300.

Within the condition of a policy providing that if the interest be a leasehold interest, or other interest not absolute, it shall be stated, the term "leasehold," ex vi termini, embraced a qualified interest, or other interest not absolute, although not so particularly described by the general term used, and must be understood as referring to some similar qualified interest as the leasehold. The language employed in the condition recognized the distinction between leasehold interests as distinguished from those that are absolute or unlimited. The term "not absolute" cannot mean a fee-simple interest in the property. Washington Fire Ins. Co. v. Kelly, 32 Md. 421, 438, 3 Am. Rep. 149.

The right to occupy land for the purpose of producing oil so long as the same is found in paying quantities is a leasehold estate.

Every estate which must expire at a period certain and prefixed is, in legal contemplation, an estate for years. It is not essential that the precise date of its termination should be predetermined. A lease of land, the words of which do not serve to fix its determination either by date, event, or subsequent circumstances, is an estate for life, and a freehold, as distinguished from the leasehold. The failure to find oil in paying quantities, whenever such failure occurs, is the event that marks the determination of the lease in question. Harley v. O'Donnell, 9 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 56, 57.

Leasehold interests are chattels real, and not mere chattels. So that a mortgage of a leasehold is a conveyance of a chattel real. State Trust Co. v. Casino Co., 46 N. Y. Supp. 492, 493, 19 App. Div. 344.

A leasehold interest from year to year is not real estate, within the meaning of a statute providing how all the real estate of a debtor may be sold under execution for the payment of a judgment against him, but is a chattel real, to be sold as personal property. Buhl v. Kenyon, 11 Mich. 249, 251, 83 Am. Dec. 738.

LEASING COMPANY.

"Leasing company," as used in Code, § 3369, authorizing the perfecting of service against a railroad company which has leased its line by sending a letter to the president of the leasing company, means "the company which has let, farmed out, or rented its property to another." Atlanta & C. Air Line Ry. Co. v. Harrison, 76 Ga. 757, 759.

LEATHER.

See "Patent Leather."

Where a note is payable in leather on a certain day, and the maker turns out leather unsealed, which by law is required to be sealed before it is offered for sale, or if he turns out leather which has been sealed as bad leather, it is not a payment as required by the note; the holder having a right to require that it shall be of merchantable quality. Elkins v. Parkhurst, 17 Vt. 105, 106.

Pieces of leather cut uniformly 28 inches wide, and from 32 to 36 inches in length, having on one side an embossed pattern in silver and other colors, and designed to be cut and used in making dress trimmings and other fancy articles, are dutiable, under Tariff Act 1894, par. 340, as leather, and not, under certain other paragraphs of the bill, as skins, as, in the absence of any evidence of commercial designation, it cannot be assumed that articles which have not only been tanned, dressed, and finished, but have also been changed from the distinctive shape which is suggestive of the skin of the animal from which they are taken, are to be classified as skins. United States v. Naday (U. S.) 98 Fed. 421, 422, 39 C. C. A. 124.

LEAVE.

See "Absence without Leave"; "Ore Leave."

See "Die Leaving Issue"; "Die Leaving No Descendants"; "Die without Leaving Issue"; "Die without Leaving Children."

Absque hoc with leave, see "With Leave."

As commit.

One of the definitions of the word "leave" is to confine, commit, or revert. Cent. Dict. And hence, as used in a will stating that the testator made no selection of an executor, but leaves it to the judge of probate, the judge of probate has power to appoint an executor. Brown v. Just, 77 N. W. 263, 264, 118 Mich. 678.

As deliver.

The statute which requires that a summons be served by delivering a copy to the defendant is shown to have been complied with by a return showing that the service was made by leaving a copy of the summons with him. The two forms of expression are equivalent, and the return shows the required service by delivering a copy of the summons to defendant. Buck v. Buck, 60 Ill. 105, 106.

A declaration alleged that plaintiff, who was defendant's tenant, agreed to erect an engine on the leased premises, and leave the same thereon at the expiration of the term, in consideration of defendant's promise to buy it. Held, that defendant might treat the word "leave" as not including the delivery of possession of the premises at the expiration of the term, and hence a plea alleging that the promise to buy the engine was made in consideration of plaintiff's promise to surrender possession, and that possession had not been surrendered, was not an argumentative denial, but a plea in confession and avoidance. Weedon v. Woodbridge, 13 Adol. & El. 462, 467, 13 Jur. 627, 629.

As depart or remove.

"Leave the state," as used in Code Prac. § 212, which authorizes bail to be required when a debtor is about to leave the state, even for a limited time, etc., is synonymous with "remove from the state," as used in section 214 of the Code, which requires the creditor to swear that he verily believes that the defendant is about to remove from the state. Florence v. Camp, 5 La. 280, 281.

Under Act 1852, concerning the arrest of persons in actions on contract (Laws 1852, No. 3, p. 4), in order to warrant the issue of a capias against a citizen of another of the United States it is not necessary that the affidavit filed by the plaintiff with the authority issuing the writ should set forth affiant's belief that such person is about to abscond or remove from this state, as it is sufficient if it alleges a belief that he is about to leave the state. "To leave the state" expresses exactly the common as well as the original legal idea of the open and public departure of a person whose residence is in some other state. When the Legislature used in the act of 1852 the word "abscond" or "remove" to express that same idea, we think the affidavit is not obnoxious to unfavorable criticism for using the very word that embraces the precise meaning of the Legislature without the aid of a judicial glossary. McLeran v. Shearer, 33 Vt. 230, 232.

Ky. St. § 2133, providing that, if a wife voluntarily leave her husband and live in adultery, she shall forfeit all interest in his estate, does not necessarily mean an actual departure from the husband's abode, or contemplate a change in the location of the habitat, but a wife living in adultery in the husband's home during his enforced absence is to be regarded as having left her husband, within the meaning of the statute. McQuinn v. McQuinn, 61 S. W. 358, 359, 110 Ky. 321.

"Left a will," as used in a petition alleging that "said deceased, at the time of his death, left a will," is equivalent to saying that the will was in existence at that time, so that the petition is sufficient. Harris v. Harris, 39 Pac. 148, 149, 150, 10 Wash. 555.

As getting off a train.

A life policy providing that there should be no liability for deaths from injuries received while "entering, attempting to enter, leaving, or attempting to leave" a public conveyance, means the act of getting on or getting off the train, or attempting to do so, and in passing from one part of the conveyance to another. Sawtelle v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 555, 556.

As give.

The words "leave" and "give," especially when used in a will, without qualifying or restraining words, are interchangeable terms, and mean one and the same thing. Carr v. Effinger, 73 Va. 197, 203.

A will declaring that "I leave all my property in the hands of my wife to manage," etc., and "give her power to sell other land if necessary to pay debts," etc., should not be construed to mean that the testator gave, devised, and bequeathed unto his wife all his property or trust estate, but that upon the testator's death his estate vested in his heirs, subject to the power of the wife to manage it for the benefit of heirs and the children. Allen v. McFarland, 37 N. E. 1006, 1008, 150 Ill. 455.

"Leave," as used in a will providing, "I leave to my beloved wife," etc., means "give." Campbell v. Beaumont, 91 N. Y. 464, 467.

As giving power of disposal.

"Leave," as used in a will whereby testator devised his freehold estate to his wife during her natural life, "and also at her disposal afterwards to leave it to whom she pleases," gives such wife only the power to leave it by will, and therefore a disposition of it by feoffment in her lifetime was void. Thorley v. Thorley, 10 East, 438, 445.

A will giving the testator's wife an estate for life, and providing that it shall be at her disposal afterwards, to leave to whomsoever she pleases, should be construed to mean to dispose of it "by a testamentary disposition." Wilks v. Burns, 60 Md. 64, 73.

In construing a will in which testator devised and bequeathed the use of his real estate during life, and his personal estate absolutely, to his wife, stating his full confidence that she would leave the surplus to be divided at her decease justly among testator's children, it was said that the words "leave to be divided" give a clear right of disposal by will. Such is Doe v. Thorley, 10 East, 483, in which the words were "also at her disposal afterwards, to leave it to whom she pleased." The question there was on the construction of a power. Here it is on the existence of it. But the question would have been an immaterial one, had there been no power to be construed. In one aspect, that case is not to be reconciled to the anonymous case in 3 Leon. 71, and to one or two others; but in those, also, the existence of a power from a limitation for the life of the first taker, followed by the words, "after his death," or "then to be at his disposal," was taken for granted, the question having regard not to that, but to the instrument of execution. Appeal of McKonkey, 13 Pa. (1 Harris) 253, 258.

As have.

As used in a will giving a residuary estate to trustees to pay the dividends to A. for life, and, in case he should leave a child or children, in trust for such child or children, with a devise over to third parties, the word "leave" was not to be construed as "have"; and A. having had one child, who died in the father's lifetime, leaving a widow and child surviving him, the devise did not go to the widow and child, but to those claiming under the gift over. Bythsea v. Bythsea, 27 Eng. Law & Eq. 402, 405.

The word "leave," in a will providing that testator gives, devises, and bequeaths his whole estate to the children whom his brother may leave, should be construed to mean "have." Du Bois v. Ray, 35 N. Y. 162, 165.

Testator's will declared: "In case I have no child or children living at the time of my death, or no child born after my death, or in case such child or children should die without lawful issue, and thus I should have no lineal descendants, I give, devise and bequeath my whole estate to the children whom my brother R. and sister K. may leave, or the child or children of any who may die before me, to be divided equally and in equal parts among such children per capita." Held, that the words "may leave" should be construed to mean "may have." Du Bois v. Ray, 35 N. Y. 162, 165.

As leave of court.

"Leave," as used in a criminal recognition that the defendant should not depart without leave, means leave of the court, and does not mean that the defendant will not escape from the custody of the sheriff. Jackson v. State, 34 Pac. 744, 745, 52 Kan. 249.

As owning.

"Leaving," as used in a petition for the sale of real estate of a decedent, stating that deceased died at a certain time, leaving as his estate certain real property, etc., should be construed as synonymous with the word "owning." McNitt v. Turner, 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 352, 363, 21 L. Ed. 341.

Permanency indicated.

"Leaving the meeting house," as used in a deed of a church pew, conditioned that, on the grantee leaving the meeting house, he should give the treasurer of the society an opportunity to purchase the pew at a certain price, otherwise it should be forfeited, does not mean the mere temporary or occasional failure to resort to the meeting house as a place of public worship, but it means the ceasing without any apparent reason or explanation, any withdrawal or for a long time ceasing to worship, and manifesting no intention of returning, and habitually worshipping with and apparently attaching himself to another religious society in the same city. Crocker v. Old South Soc. in Boston, 106 Mass. 489, 497; French v. Old South Soc. in Boston, Id. 479, 487.

As permission, not a direction.

"Leave," as used in an order giving a party leave to file an amended pleading, is never held to be an order or direction to the party that he must file such pleading. Ex parte Williams, 48 Pac. 499, 500, 116 Cal. 512.

Personal service implied.

The phrase "left at his house," in the certificate of a notary of the giving of notice of an indorser, which states that the notice was left at his house, is sufficient to show a personal service of the notice by leaving it at the indorser's house. Adams v. Wright, 14 Wis. 408-414.

An ordinance authorizing the commissioner of highways to pave a street after 20 days' notice has been "left or placed on the premises" of an owner of abutting property who is unknown or cannot be found is not satisfied by concealing such notice under a stone on the premises. City of Philadelphia v. Edwards, 78 Pa. (28 P. F. Smith) 62, 64.

Power to use implied.

"Left," as used in a will giving testator's wife all his real and personal property, to hold and possess during the term of her natural life, for her own exclusive use and benefit, and providing that after her death the property and estate mentioned, and each or any part of the same then left by her, shall be divided among testator's children, implies a power to use some part of the principal or capital, if it should be found necessary, for the support of the widow and the maintenance and education of the children, so long as provision for such purpose should be reasonably necessary. In re Oertle, 24 N. W. 924, 925, 34 Minn. 173, 57 Am. Rep. 48.

"Left by her," as used in a will bequeathing all of testator's personal property to his wife for her own use and benefit during her natural life, and directing that his executors shall, immediately after her death, proceed to sell, collect, and settle up the personal property that may be left by her, and to divide the same among his children, should be construed as showing an intent on the part of the testator to use the corpus of the estate, as well as the income thereof, for her own personal use and benefit, and not to confine her estate to a mere life estate. In re Williamson, 9 N. Y. Supp. 476, 477, 1 Con. Sur. 139.

"Leave," as used in a notice to a tenant to leave the premises, is synonymous with the word "quit," as used in Comp. Laws 1879, c. 55, § 7, requiring the giving in such cases of notice to quit. Douglass v. Anderson, 4 Pac. 257, 32 Kan. 350.

A contract between A., one of the directors of a corporation, and B., who was in the employ of the corporation, the contract stipulating that B. was to have a certain number of shares, and containing the following agreement: "It is agreed that if, between January 1, 1864, and January 1, 1871, said B. should die or leave the company, pro rata shares for the then expired term shall be considered as earned and due," etc., means if B. should resign, or voluntarily quit, or give up his employment, and does not refer to his expulsion by the act of the company without his consent and against his remonstrance. Price v. Minot, 107 Mass. 49, 60.

As set sail.

"Leave," as used in a charter party providing that a ship should "sail and proceed from Amsterdam with all convenient speed to Liverpool, to leave Amsterdam not later than all March," should not be construed to mean "should set sail and proceed from Amsterdam on such a time, but that she should quit Amsterdam before the end of March and proceed to Liverpool with all convenient dispatch," and hence the charter was fulfilled, though after leaving Amsterdam she stopped at a certain point to take in the remainder of her ballast. Van Bagen v. Baines, 25 Eng. Law & Eq. 530, 533, 9 Exch. 523, 530.

As submit.

An agreement made at sea between a disabled vessel and a freighting steamer providing that the latter should receive a certain compensation for towage services, but further agreeing to "leave it to the court to prove said agreement," means to submit the question as to the amount of compensation to the judgment or review of the court. The Leipsic (U. S.) 5 Fed. 108, 112.

Where a vessel was injured at sea and was towed to port by another vessel, and the captains made a written agreement at sea providing that £3,000 should be paid for the services, but inserted a clause, "to be left to the court to prove said agreement," such clause must be construed to mean that the parties intended to submit the question as to the amount of compensation to the judgment or review of the court. The Leipsic (U. S.) 5 Fed. 108, 112.

As suffer to remain.

St. 1774, providing that no Indian, negro, or mulatto slave shall be brought or imported into Connecticut by sea or land to be disposed of, sold, or "left within the state," means suffered to remain in the state, and does not mean abandoning, deserting, or departing from such slave. A slave may be considered as left in the state, though the owner does not intend to reside there permanently himself, or to suffer such slave permanently to remain there. So long as he is a traveler, passing through the state, the owner cannot be said to have left a slave there; but when such owner and his family are residing in the state for years, and when he has suffered his slave to remain there for almost two years, he cannot claim the privilege of a traveler, even though he intended at some future time to return with his family to his former residence. Jackson v. Bulloch, 12 Conn. 38, 45.

An insurance policy on the household furniture contained in a frame building, providing that the premises were not to be "left unoccupied" any portion of the year, will not be construed as implying an abandonment or willful vacation of the premises, leaving them uncared for. The phrase "shall not be left unoccupied any portion of the year" is equivalent to saying "shall not be suffered to remain unoccupied during any part of the year." Sonneborn v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co. 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 220, 224, 43 Am. Rep. 365.

An instruction that the city was responsible and liable for damages to any individual who suffered any special damages caused by the streets being left in an impassable condition, where by the use of ordinary prudence a person could not foresee and avoid the injury which occasioned the damage, implies that the street had been in a passable condition, but had been rendered impassable by some alteration, and so left without due precautions. The instruction refers, not to streets in their natural condition as they were dedicated, but to those actually in use and which were left in an impassable condition, so that ordinary prudence and attention could not foresee and avoid the danger. City of Milwaukee v. Davis, 6 Wis. 377, 389.

Partnership.

A party, upon forming a co-partnership with another, agreed to leave at the end of the term the place where the business was carried on. Held, that the word "leave" should be construed to exclude any claim of an interest in the good will of the business by the retiring partner. VanDyke v. Jackson (N. Y.) 1 Ed. D. Smith, 419, 422.

In will, as relating to time of death

Where a leasehold estate is given to a person and the heirs of his body, with limitation over if he dies, and the testator uses the words "and leaves no such heirs," the settled construction is that it means at his death. Cooke v. DeVandes, 9 Ves. 196, 204.

"Leaving," as used in a will devising property to testator's daughter, but, in case the daughter should die "leaving" no heirs, the property should pass to another, "is a participle of the present tense," and relates to the time of the dying of the daughter. Per Lord Chancellor Hardwicke in Read v. Snell, 2 Atk. 642, 646.

A will providing that, on the death of either of "my said daughters I bequeath to such child or children as my said daughters so dying shall have or leave," etc., the remainder in the lands in which the daughters were given a life estate, should be construed to mean that on the death of each of his daughters the remainder should go to the children she might have or leave living and their heirs and assigns; that is to say, to the living children and to the heirs or assigns of those who might have died, as tenants in common. The clause, therefore, should read (as applied to the singular number) "to such child as my daughter so dying shall have or leave living at her decease, and to the heirs and assigns of such child." Griswold v. Onondaga County Sav. Bank, 93 N. Y. 301, 305.

A will providing that certain bequests are given to a daughter only during her natural life, and then to descend to her child or children, but, "if she shall leave no child," then to be equally divided among the testator's grandchildren, means not if she should die leaving no issue, looking toward an indefinite failure of issue, but, as the term naturally imports, leaving no issue; i. e., leaving no child to take the estate in remainder after the devise to the mother for life. Wight v. Baur, 61 Mass. (7 Cush.) 105, 107.

The words "if he leave any lawful issue," when not restricted by other words, are uniformly held to import a definite failure of issue, when found in a devise of real estate, though in a gift of personalty the word "leaving" is held to mean a failure at the death of the first legatee. The addition to the phrase of the words "after him" does not alter this construction. Whitford v. Armstrong, 9 R. I. 394, 395.

LEAVE OF COURT.

In explanation of the statement that a defendant by leave of court may plead several pleas, it is said that this leave is never asked in fact, but every additional plea is stated upon the record to have been put in by leave of the court first had and obtained. This is an indulgence granted to the pleader, and he ought never to put in a second or other plea, either in form or substance, that he does not believe the court would have permitted him to file, if it had been previously presented to the court and its permission asked. Copperthwait v. Dummer, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 258, 260.

LEDGE.

A continuous bed of mineralized rock lying within any other well-defined boundaries on the earth's surface and under it would constitute a "lode," and the term is used in the acts of Congress as applicable to any zone or bed of mineralized rock lying within boundaries clearly separating it from the neighboring rocks. It is a class of deposits of mineral matter coming from the same source, impressed with the same forms, and appearing to have been created by the same process. In general, it may be said that a lode or vein is a body of mineral, or mineral body of rock, within defined boundaries in the general mass of the mountain. The thinness or thickness of the matter in particular places does not affect its being a vein or lode, nor does the fact that it is occasionally found in the general course of this vein or shoot in pockets deeper down into the earth or higher up affect its character as a "vein, lode, or ledge." Stevens v. Williams (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 40, 42; Synnot v. Shaughnessy, 7 Pac. 82, 84, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 122.

See, also, "Leave."

Within the statute which provides that, whenever the widow or minor children of a deceased person shall be left in necessitous circumstances, they shall be entitled to a certain sum, the word "left" has been repeatedly held to mean that at the time of the death of the husband the wife must in point of fact and of truth be deprived by that death of a means of livelihood; that his death must have caused some sudden change in her condition and means of living. Richard v. Lazard, 32 South. 559, 562, 108 La. 540.

In construing a clause in a will providing that the period during which testator's trustees and their heirs and successors shall have the power and are required to lease certain property shall be as long as testator's children, or any children or descendants of them or any of them, left by them or any of them at the death of them or any of them, shall live, the court says that the word "left" could not be construed as indicating the intention of testator to appoint his own children and children or descendants of children living at the time of testator's own decease, but that the persons designated as left are the children or descendants of any of his children, and the time of being left is so plainly expressed that no doubt can well arise or be entertained, viz., at the death of any of his said children. Barnum v. Barnum, 26 Md. 119, 170, 90 Am. Dec. 83.

By a devise of a life estate, with the remainder of "what is left" to a certain person, testator should be held to have intended to include the entire property which should be in the hands of the life tenant at her death, whether it has been diminished by losses or increased by profits, or whether it consisted of personal property or had been invested in real estate. Bramell v. Adams, 47 S. W. 931, 933, 146 Mo. 70.

LEFT OPEN.

A finding that a defendant willfully "left a gate open" at various times plainly implies that the gate was shut when the defendant came to it, and is equivalent to removing the gate, which is prohibited by Gen. St. c. 24, § 7, providing a penalty against removing gates or bars across pent roads. The gate, when shut, was a barrier restraining the cattle in the pasture from the crops in the field. When opened and "left open" by the defendant, it was as effectually removed as such barrier as though it had been taken from the hinges and carried away or thrown on the ground. French v. Holt, 53 Vt. 364, 367.

LEFT OUTSIDE.

"Left outside of levee," as used in Const. § 238, excluding compensation for damages to land because of its being left outside a levee, presents the idea of defenselessness as against the ravages of the river. The land cannot be regarded as left outside a levee, unless it is left unprotected by the levee; so, where a new levee is so constructed inside the old one as to obstruct the drainage of the land left between the two levees and cause it to be overflowed by rain water, which had been therefore carried off entirely by artificial channels, a recovery was not constitutionally precluded. Duncan v. Board of Levee Com'rs, 20 South. 838, 839, 74 Miss. 125.

A legacy is a gift of personal estate by will. Evans v. Price, 8 N. E. 854, 857, 118 Ill. 593.

A legacy is a gift or bequest by testament. In re Thompson (N. Y.) 5 Dem. Sur. 393, 396; In re Karr (N. Y.) 2 How. Prac. (N. S.) 405, 409.

A legacy is a testamentary disposition of personal property. Nye v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W., 36 N. E. 429, 436, 9 Ind. App. 131.

A legacy is a bequest of goods and chattels by will or testament. Probate Court v. Matthews, 6 Vt. 269, 274.

The use of the terms "devise" and "devisee," "legacy" and "legatee," with technical exactness throughout an entire chapter of the statute relative to wills and distribution, is held to show an intention of the Legislature to employ those terms in their strictly technical sense as defined at common law. In construing this chapter, the court says that where clear, direct, and explicit terms are used by the Legislature, which have had a definite meaning since the beginning of common law terminology, there can be no room for discussion as to their meaning. In re Ross' Estate, 73 Pac. 976, 979, 140 Cal. 282.

A legacy is a gift or bequest of personal property. It includes any gift of personal property by will, as well those made in lieu of dower as those which are gratuitous. Orton v. Orton (N. Y.) 3 Abb. Dec. 411, 414.

The word "legacy," as it is usually understood and in its legal import, belongs especially to a gift of personalty. Browne v. Cogswell, 87 Mass. (5 Allen) 556, 557.

The term "legacy," when used in a will, will be restricted in its application to personal property, unless it clearly appears from the will itself that the testator used it in a different sense. In re Karr (N. Y.) 2 How. Prac. (N. S.) 405, 409.

Annuities.

The term "legacies" prima facie comprehends annuities. Tichenor v. Tichenor, 2 Atl. 778, 779, 41 N. J. Eq. (14 Stew.) 39.

The terms "legacy" and "annuity" are often used interchangeably. Thus a devise of real estate to a city, on condition that the city pay to the devisor's widow annually $3,000, creates a legacy, an annuity, in her favor. Budd v. Budd (U. S.) 59 Fed. 735, 740.

Lord Eldon, in Gibson v. Bott, 7 Ves. 96, drew the distinction between an annuity and a legacy for life, which has been cited in every thoroughly considered case since. If an annuity is given, the first payment is payable at the end of the year from the death; but if a legacy for life is given, with the remainder over, no interest is due until the end of two years. It is only the interest of the legacy, and until the legacy is payable there is no fund to produce interest. Bartlett v. Slater, 22 Atl. 678, 679, 53 Conn. 102, 55 Am. Rep. 73.

Bequest synonymous.

In the construction of statutes the words "bequest" and "legacy" shall be held to mean the same thing, and to embrace and include either real or personal estate, or both. Ky. St. 1903, § 467.

As a chattel.

See "Chattel."

Devise distinguished.

Every bequest of personal property is a legacy. The word "devise" is especially appropriate to a gift of lands, and the word "legacy" to a gift of chattels. In re Karr (N. Y.) 2 How. Prac. (N. S.) 405, 409.

Gift causa mortis distinguished.

See "Gift Causa Mortis."

Proceeds of compromise.

Where sums of money are received by claimants under a deceased person's will, under a compromise contract made by them with the executor of the will, sanctioned by a court having jurisdiction of the will and of the estate devised, the sums of money so received do not fall within the category of legacies or distributive shares in intestates' estates, which are subjected to an internal revenue tax by the United States. Page v. Rives, 1 Hughes, 305, Fed. Cas. No. 10,666.

Payment of debt.

An ordinary popular meaning of legacy in its legal signification is a gift or gratuity, not the payment of a debt or a provision to pay a debt. Where the meaning is uncertain, it is reasonable to infer that the popular and ordinary meaning is intended, unless there is something that requires a different construction. Hence it is held that the giving in a will to testator's wife money expressly stated to be in conformity to a marriage settlement does not make her a legatee, within a provision of the will giving the residuary estate to the legatees before mentioned in proportion to their legacies. In re Pentz's Estate, 49 Atl. 361, 364, 200 Pa. 2.

"Legacy" naturally implies bounty or benevolence. Lockyer v. Simpson, Mos. 300; Clark v. Sewell, 3 Atk. 98. A bequest in satisfaction of a debt has been held to be within the definition of a legacy. Orton v. Orton (N. Y.) 3 Abb. Dec. 411. So far as a legacy is applied to pay a debt, it is no legacy, but a payment. A gift and bequest to a creditor of "any and all benefit, so far as his interest may appear and be proved," is not a legacy, within Laws 1887, c. 713, entitled "An act to tax gifts, legacies, and collateral inheritances." In re Rogers, 10 N. Y. Supp. 22, 2 Con. Sur. 198.

As pecuniary legacy.

Where a will gave a chromo lithograph to one cousin and a hat stand to another, such gifts would not be considered legacies, within the meaning of the subsequent codicil, whereby each cousin not remembered by a legacy in the will and codicils was given $2,500; the term "legacy" being construed to mean pecuniary legacy. White v. Massachusetts Inst. of Technology, 50 N. E. 512, 514, 171 Mass. 84.

As principal and income.

A testator by his will gave the sum of $1,000 to his grandson, and to his brother the sum of $15,000, in trust to invest the same at his discretion, and to pay the income thereof to the testator's daughter A. for life, "the two preceding legacies to be raised by my executors as soon after the settlement of my estate as they shall think expedient," and gave to his wife during life, for her use and benefit, the income and profit of all his real and personal estate, and at the death of his wife one-third of the residue of his estate to each of his two daughters, and the remaining third to the children of his daughter A. and the survivor of them, and directed that, in estimating this third, "the $15,000 given in trust for my daughter A. shall be taken as a portion thereof, but it is not to be paid over to her children till the capital shall fall in at her death." Held, that the word "legacies" included the principal sum of $15,000, and not merely the income thereof, and that on the death of A., though in the lifetime of the testator's widow, A.'s children were entitled to that sum. Griswold v. Heard, 68 Mass. (2 Gray) 322, 324.

Provision in lieu of dower.

Every bequest of personal property is a legacy, including as well those made in lieu of dower and in satisfaction of an indebtedness as those which are wholly gratuitous. The circumstance whether gratuitous or not does not enter into consideration in the definition. It is the synonym of the word "bequest." The word "devise" is especially appropriated to a gift of lands, and "legacy" to a gift of chattels; and when it is said that a legacy is a gift of chattels, the word is not limited in its meaning to a gratuity, but has an extended signification, the primary one given by Worcester in his Dictionary—"a thing given, either as a gratuity or recompense." So, where the testator gave to his wife certain property in lieu of dower, and made certain other bequests, adding that, if his property should be insufficient, the legacies should be paid pro rata, and, if there should be an excess, such excess should be divided among the legatees in proportion to the sum given, the bequest made to the wife was a legacy, and she was entitled to her pro rata share of the excess of the property. Orton v. Orton, *42 N. Y. (3 Keyes) 486, 488.

Personalty or realty.

By statute in Kentucky the word "legacy" includes either real or personal estate. Hurst v. Davidson, 76 S. W. 37, 38, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 555.

"Legacies," as used in a codicil of a will, reciting that the testator, being desirous of altering his will with respect to certain legacies, and giving to testator's son all of such legacies in trust, includes devises of realty. Although the term "legacy" is properly applied to personal property only, yet sometimes by force of the context it applies to realty as well. Bacon v. Bacon, 55 Vt. 243, 247.

"Legacies given," as used in Act April 13, 1843, subjecting all "legacies given and lands devised" to any person to attachment and levy, the terms "legacies given" and "lands devised" are artistic phrases meaning different things, and neither includes the other, so that an interest in goods and chattels is different from an interest in the lands. Appeal of Roth, 94 Pa. 186, 191.

"Legacy," in its technical sense, means a testamentary disposition of personalty, and is not accurately applied to a testamentary disposition of land. In re Fetrow's Estate, 58 Pa. (8 P. F. Smith) 424, 427.

The word "legacy" is properly applicable to bequests of personal property, but as used in wills it may be extended to embrace other species of property not technically within its import, in order to effectuate the intention of the testator. Williams v. McComb, 38 N. C. 450, 455.

"Legacy," as used in wills, may be applied to real estate, if this construction is necessary in order to effectuate the intention of the testator. Lasher v. Lasher (N. Y.) 13 Barb. 106, 110.

A gift of personalty in a will is called a "legacy," and a gift of land is called a "devise." The primary signification of the word "legacy" is a gift of personalty, and this word is never construed to include a gift of land in a will, unless there is something in the context which shows that the testator did use it in this latter sense. Hence it is held that in a statutory provision that, if any child should die in the lifetime of the father or mother having issue, any legacy given in the last will of such father or mother shall go to such issue, the word "legacy" should be construed in its technical sense, and not to include a devise of land. Pratt v. McGhee, 17 S. C. 428, 429.

The word "legacy" is more commonly applied to money or other personal property than to real estate, but the word in a popular sense applies to both real and personal property. The word "legacy," as used in testator's will, which gave all his property, real and personal, to his wife, to sell and dispose of as she should see fit, or to retain during her natural life for her own use, subject after her decease to the following legacies, followed by certain legacies of the income from stock and a life estate in a certain lot, with a devise over in fee, was used to include both personal and real property.

It would be more correct to use the word "legacy" only in relation to personal property, but most testators are unacquainted with that circumstance, and apply the word indiscriminately to both real and personal property, and it was so used in a will wherein testator disposed of both real estate and personalty, and provided that, in the case of death of any of his children without lawful issue before they could get possession of their respective legacies, the legacy bequeathed to such children should be divided between the survivors of them. Homes v. Mitchell, 6 N. C. 228, 230, 5 Am. Dec. 527.

Gift of residue distinguished.

In common parlance, as well as in any more precise use of language, a legacy is distinguishable from a gift of the residue or share in a residue. White v. Ditson, 4 N. E. 606, 612, 140 Mass. 351, 54 Am. Rep. 473; Hard v. Davison, 6 N. Y. Supp. 69, 72, 53 Hun, 112.

LEGACY TO PIOUS USES.

"Legacies to pious uses" are those which are designed to some work of piety or object of charity, and have their motive independent of the consideration which the merit of the legatees might procure to them. In this motive consists the distinction between these and ordinary legacies. Williams v. Western Star Lodge, 38 La. Ann. 620, 629 (citing 4 Domat, lib. 9, § 6, par. 2).

LEGACY UNDER A UNIVERSAL TITLE.

A "legacy under a universal title" is that by which a testator bequeaths a certain proportion of the effects of which the law permits him to dispose, as a half, a third, or all his movables, or all his immovables, or a fixed proportion of all his immovables, or of all his movables. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 1612.

LEGAL

See, also, "Lawful."

When legal proceedings of any sort are spoken of, the descriptive word "legal" is not usually understood to affirm their validity; for it is used indiscriminately, whether the proceedings be valid or void. So it is held that, where a deed was upon condition that no liquor should be sold upon a certain lot before the town in which the lot was located should be legally incorporated, there was no breach of the condition by sales made after the town was incorporated, although the corporation was subsequently dissolved, because embracing agricultural lands not a part of the town. Jones v. McLain, 41 S. W. 714, 715, 16 Tex. Civ. App. 305.

2 Rev. St. 1852, p. 464, § 71, provided that in actions of replevin before justices the complaint should state that the property sought to be replevied had not been taken by virtue of any execution or other writ against plaintiff. In an action of replevin before a justice, the complaint stated that the property had not been taken on any legal tax or execution, or other legal writ. Held, that the complaint was not obnoxious to a motion in arrest, because of the use of the word "legal." Hence it might be doubted whether the word "legal" added to or diminished from the substantial effect of the complaint. An execution or writ could hardly be designated as such, unless it were a legal execution or writ. McPhelomy v. Solomon, 15 Ind. 189, 190.

Lawful distinguished.

The word "legal," when used as an adjective qualifying "provocation," is synonymous with "lawful, adequate, and reasonable." State v. Bulling, 15 S. W. 367, 371, 105 Mo. 204.

In a statute requiring the sheriff to take all legal means to prevent injury from riots, etc., it is held that there is a clear distinction between the words "legal" and "lawful," and that the word "legal" imports a much more limited range of means than is implied by the word "lawful," and imposes a much less onerous duty upon the officer named. When the law requires an officer to take all legal means to effect an object, it intends that he shall take all such means as he may officially use, and he is not chargeable with neglect of duty if he adopts the means prescribed by the law for such occasions, though he omit other plain physical and moral means. These may be lawful, because not forbidden; but they are not legal, because not prescribed by law. Curtis v. Alleghany County (Pa.) 1 Phila. 237, 238.

LEGAL AGE.

The phrase "legal age to consent to marriage" means the age of consent to marriage at common law, to wit, 14 years in case of males and 12 years in case of females; and therefore Gen. Laws, c. 195, § 9, requiring a petition for divorce to be signed by the petitioner, if of legal age to consent to marriage, simply means age of consent at common law. Capwell v. Capwell, 41 Atl. 1005, 21 R. I. 101.

"Legal age," as used in a will devising the residue of testator's estate to executors in trust for the education and maintenance of two minor children, and directing that as and when they become of "legal age" their share shall be turned over to them, means, in the absence of a statute providing otherwise, the age of 21 years. It means full, and not partial, legal age. By her marriage a devisee did not become of legal age, so as to be entitled to receive her portion of the estate; she not being at the time 21 years old. Montoya de Antonio v. Miller, 34 Pac. 40, 41, 7 N. M. 289, 21 L. R. A. 699.

LEGAL ARREST.

A legal arrest is to be distinguished from a military arrest or seizure. Ex parte Bollman, 8 U. S. (4 Cranch) 75, 78, 2 L. Ed. 554.

To constitute a legal arrest the officer must lay his hand on the defendant or otherwise take possession of his person. He must make him his prisoner in an unequivocal form. Lawson v. Buzines (Del.) 3 Har. 416, 418.

LEGAL ASSETS.

"Moneys arising from the sale of personal property are called 'legal assets' in the hands of an executor or administrator, out of which the creditors of the estate are paid according to the dignity of their demands." Backhouse v. Patten, 30 U. S. (5 Pet.) 160, 167, 8 L. Ed. 82.

Legal assets are such as constitute a fund for the payment of debts according to their legal priority. Helman v. Fisher, 11 Mo. App. 275, 280.

"Legal assets" of an estate are such as constitute the funds for the payment of debts according to their legal priority, as distinguished from "equitable assets," which are such as can be reached only by a court of equity. Rutledge's Adm'rs v. Hazlehurst (S. C.) 1 McCord, Eq. 466, 469.

Legal assets are subject to preferences among creditors, while equitable assets are distributable equally. In re Nelson Place, 7 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 217, 219.

In Virginia the moneys arising from the sale of personal property are called "legal assets" in the hands of an executor or administrator, and those which arise from the sale of real property are denominated "equitable assets." Backhouse v. Patten, 30 U. S. (5 Pet.) 160, 167, 8 L. Ed. 82.

"Legal assets" are such as are owned by a legal title by the testator. The words are used to distinguish such claims from equitable assets, which are mere rights to enforce equitable claims to property, the title to which is in another. Thus an equity of redemption is but an equitable asset, while a leasehold may be a legal asset. Deg v. Deg, 2 P. Wms. 412, 416.

The interest which a creditor has in the land of his debtor, fraudulently conveyed, is a legal, nonequitable asset. Pulliam v. Taylor, 50 Miss. 551, 555. Consequently the provision of Comp. Laws, § 4628, that, in case of a levy upon an equitable interest of a judgment debtor, the judgment creditor shall within one year institute proceedings to ascertain and determine the interest of the judgment debtor, and to settle the right of the parties in interest therein, does not require that a judgment creditor, having become a purchaser at an execution sale, bring an action to set aside a prior fraudulent deed of his debtor within one year from the time of the execution sale. Orendorf v. Budlong (U. S.) 12 Fed. 24, 26.

A "legal asset" is an asset subject to levy by execution on a common-law judgment. Where creditors obtain judgments and make levies, and then bring suits to set aside fraudulent conveyances, which are void as to them all, their priorities in the property conveyed are in the order of their levies, without regard to the order in which they filed suits to set aside the conveyances; for the assets are legal assets. Kinmouth v. White, 48 Atl. 952, 953, 61 N. J. Eq. 358.

LEGAL ATTAINMENTS.

Act 1848, § 4, providing that in suits thereunder, in which arbitrators should be appointed by the Governor, two of the persons to be appointed shall be "men of legal attainments," does not mean judges, licensed lawyers, justices of the peace, or men of any particular class; for it requires no particular degree of legal attainment and almost every man in the country possesses some. State v. McGinley, 4 Ind. 7, 11.

LEGAL CAPACITY.

A demurrer to a complaint, assigning as cause that plaintiff has no legal capacity to sue, has reference to some legal disability of plaintiff, such as infancy, idiocy, or coverture, and not to a fact that the complaint fails to show a right of action in the plaintiff; and in an action by the guardian of an insane person to set aside and annul the marriage of his ward to the defendant, a demurrer on the ground that plaintiff has no legal capacity to sue does not raise the question of his right to maintain such action. Pence v. Aughe, 101 Ind. 317, 319; Dewey v. State, 91 Ind. 173, 182.

LEGAL CLAIM.

"A legal claim is one which the party asserting it may enforce by action or by some proceeding at law or in equity." Cowan v. City of New York (N. Y.) 8 Hun, 632, 633.

The term "legal claim," in Laws 1894, c. 317, § 5, providing that whenever the state's title to land granted under its authority fails, and a legal claim for compensation therefor is preferred, the land commissioners shall direct the repayment of the original purchase money, means a claim which is good or valid in law, such a claim as would afford a remedy to a grantee in a deed from a private person. People v. Woodruff, 68 N. Y. Supp. 100, 103, 57 App. Div. 342.

LEGAL COMMITMENT.

"Legal commitment" means any act of committing of the person of a party which is justifiable by the law of the land. People v. Nevins (N. Y.) 1 Hill, 154, 171.

LEGAL COMPENSATION.

Legal compensation for land taken by eminent domain refers solely to the injury done to the property taken, and not to any collateral or consequential damages resulting to the owner by trespass. Loss of trade, destruction of credit, and failure of business prospects are collateral or consequential damages for which compensation cannot be awarded. Watson v. Sutherland, 72 U. S. (5 Wall.) 74, 78, 18 L. Ed. 580.

LEGAL CONCLUSION.

See "Conclusion of Law."

LEGAL CONSIDERATION.

A legal consideration is defined to be some act which is a benefit to the person contracting, or an injury or the foregoing of some advantage by the other party to the contract. Sampson v. Swift, 11 Vt. 315, 316, 317.

A legal consideration does not necessarily mean a pecuniary gain, and it is not essential to the validity of a contract that a benefit or gain of such a nature move to the person assuming an obligation. It is sufficient if any advantage or benefit result to him, or any detriment or injury to the other party, by his failure to keep his agreement. Albert Lea College v. Brown, 93 N. W. 672, 675, 88 Minn. 524, 60 L. R. A. 870.

LEGAL COSTS.

"Legal costs," as used in Pub. St. c. 112, § 100, relating to railroads, and providing that on the application for a jury to assess damages for land taken the prevailing party shall recover "legal costs," mean such costs as are usually recovered in civil actions, and include the travel and attendance of witnesses and the fees of the officer for summoning them, in addition to such costs as he may have incurred for the sheriff and jurors. Chiles v. New Haven & N. Co., 135 Mass. 570, 572.

"Legal costs," in Gen. St. c. 15, art. 6, § 1, providing for payment out of the state treasury of legal costs in a suit in which the state is a party, means only such costs as the law requires the state to pay. Davis v. Norman, 42 S. W. 108, 101 Ky. 599.

"Legal costs" in a suit clearly include charges for travel and attendance and other items which inure to the benefit of the attorney, as well as clerks', officers', and attorneys' fees. James v. Bligh, 93 Mass. (11 Allen) 4, 5.

The phrase "legal costs," in St. 1794, c. 65, § 3, providing that trustees, appearing and denying that they have any effects of their principal, shall on their discharge be allowed their legal costs, means costs to be taxed according to the fee bill; and they cannot be allowed anything for counsel fees after preparing their answers. Crocker v. Baker, 35 Mass. (18 Pick.) 407, 414.

LEGAL CRUELTY.

See "Cruelty."

LEGAL DAMAGES.

Legal damages are such losses or detriments as the law compensates in consequence of a wrong committed. Stuhr v. Curran, 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 181, 201, 48 Am. Rep. 353.

LEGAL DAY.

A "judicial day" is distinguished from a "legal day" in this: The former means a day in which the court is in session, while a legal day is one in which legal and judicial business can be transacted, as distinguished from "dies non." Heffner v. Heffner, 20 South. 281, 282, 48 La. Ann. 1088.

LEGAL DEBT.

Testator directed the trustees of a fund created by his will to pay over to each of his children a certain sum, but provided that "any legal debt due from any of the children should be first deducted from the share of such child." Held, that the phrase "legal debt" meant a debt which could be enforced in a court of law, and hence a married daughter was entitled to receive the whole sum so directed to be paid without deduction, although she had signed notes with her husband for moneys furnished him by her father, which the latter held at the time of the execution of the will and at his death. Rogers v. Daniell, 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 343, 348.

Under a will conveying land in trust, which land was covered with a mortgage, with a further provision that another parcel of land should be sold and the proceeds used to pay "her legal debts," there can be no question that the mortgage is embraced in the literal meaning of the words. Guild v. Walter, 65 N. E. 68, 182 Mass. 225.

LEGAL DEMAND.

A "legal demand" means a demand properly made, as to form, time, and place, by a person lawfully authorized, and may be made before or after judgment in the states in which property is attached and by an agent of the promisee duly authorized. The admission of a legal demand includes an admission that the demand was properly made at a suitable time and place, etc. Foss v. Norris, 70 Me. 117, 118.

LEGAL DEPOSITARY.

"Legal depositary," as used in Const. art. 11, § 16, providing that all moneys of any municipal corporation coming into the hands of any officer thereof shall immediately be deposited with the treasurer or "other legal depositary" to the credit of such corporation, should be construed as designating the custodian of the public money, who is a public officer, and usually designated "treasurer," and does not mean a private individual or corporation. Yarnell v. City of Los Angeles, 25 Pac. 767, 768, 87 Cal. 603.

LEGAL DISABILITY.

"Legal disability is defined to be a want of legal capacity to do a thing." Bouv. Law Dict. "The disability may relate to the power to contract or bring suit. It may arise out of a want of sufficient understanding, as idiocy, lunacy, infancy, or want of freedom of will, as in the case of married women and persons under duress, or out of the policy of the law, as alienage, when the alien is an enemy, or from outlawry, attainder, præmunire, and the like. The disability is something pertaining to the person of the party; a personal incapacity, and not to the cause of action or his relation to it. There must be a present right of action in the person, but some want of capacity to sue." Meeks v. Vassault (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 1314, 1317.

"Legal disability," as used in Rev. St. c. 138, § 13, which prevented the statutes of limitations on actions for the recovery of real property from running in cases of infancy, insanity, imprisonment, and coverture until the removal of disability, should not be construed as meaning only an incapacity of action under the law or an incapacity to do a legal act, and applies to persons under the control and protection of other persons. Hence a statute giving a wife the absolute control of her separate estate, the same as though she were unmarried, does not remove the disability of coverture; for it removes only one of the grounds of disability, the grounds of which are, as stated by Chancellor Kent (2 Comm. [11th Ed.] 137), that "the disability of the wife to contract so as to bind herself arises not from want of discretion, but because she has entered into an indissoluble connection by which she is placed under the power and protection of her husband, and because she has not the administration of property." She still remains under the control and protection of her husband, and he can lawfully control her domicile and her employment, leaving her in these particulars as she was at common law under a degree of duress. Wiesner v. Zaum, 39 Wis. 188, 206.

In Lord de la Warre's Case, 6 Coke, 1a, it was resolved by the justices that there was a difference between disability personal and temporary, with relation to the descent of estates, and a disability absolute and perpetual; as where one is attainted of treason and felony, that is an absolute and perpetual disability, by corruption of blood, for any of his posterity to claim any inheritance in fee simple, either as heir to him or to any ancestor above him, but when one is disabled by Parliament, without any attainder, to claim the dignity for his life, it is a personal disability for his life only, and his heir, after his death, may claim as heir to him or to any ancestor above him. This latter personal disability bears a close analogy to that imposed on persons whose property was confiscated during the War of the Rebellion by Confiscation Act July 17, 1862, and after the death of the person disabled his heirs took by descent the fee, and did not derive their title from the United States, or by virtue of the confiscation act. Avegno v. Schmidt, 5 Sup. Ct. 487, 490, 113 U. S. 293, 28 L. Ed. 976.

In construing Rev. St. 1881, § 1285, enacting that the phrase "under legal disability" shall include persons under the age of 21 years, or of unsound mind, or imprisoned in the state's prison, or out of the United States, it is held that, in view of the fact that the most notable respects with which the disability of coverture was felt at common law had been removed by statute, it could not be held that coverture was a legal disability, at least in ordinary cases. Rosa v. Prather, 2 N. E. 575, 577, 103 Ind. 191.

By Rev. St. 1894, § 1309, the Legislature defined the phrase "under legal disabilities" as including infants, persons of unsound mind, or those imprisoned in the state prison or out of the United States; but habitual drunkards are not included within the provision. Makepeace v. Bronnenberg, 45 N. E. 336, 337, 146 Ind. 243.

Civ. Code Prac. § 19, provides that, if a person entitled to bring an action be at the time the cause of action accrued under any legal disability, such person shall be entitled to bring such action within one year after such disability shall be removed (section 1, subd. 27), if the act relating to the construction of statutes provides that the phrase "under legal disability" includes persons imprisoned. The effect of these statutes is to prevent the running of limitations against the right of action of one who is imprisoned during the time of his imprisonment, but does not deprive him of the right to bring an action during the time of his imprisonment to restore him to his just rights and to set aside his conviction and sentence, provided, of course, that some friend would commence and conduct the proceeding for him. State v. Calhoun, 32 Pac. 38, 40, 50 Kan. 523, 18 L. R. A. 838, 34 Am. St. Rep. 141.

Under a provision that the statute of limitations begins to run as to persons under legal disability when the right of action accrues, it is held that the phrase "under legal disability" includes infancy. King v. Carmichael, 35 N. E. 509, 512, 136 Ind. 20, 43 Am. St. Rep. 303.

2 Gav. & H. St. p. 161, § 215, providing that a person "under legal disability" when a cause of action accrues may bring his action within two years after the disability is removed, refers to married women and persons under 21, or of unsound mind, or in prison, or out of the United States. Bauman v. Grubbs, 26 Ind. 419, 421.

The phrase "under legal disability" includes persons within the age of minority, or of unsound mind, or imprisoned. Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 7342, subd. 27.

The phrase "under legal disability" includes married women, persons within the age of minority, or of unsound mind or imprisoned. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 4160.

The phrase "under legal disabilities" includes persons within the age of 21 years, or of unsound mind, or imprisoned in the state prison, or out of the United States. Horner's Rev. St. Ind. 1901, § 1285.

LEGAL DISBURSEMENTS.

Legal disbursement of the awards under Act Cong. March 3, 1891, relating to the French spoliation claims, for which the courts that granted administration were to require adequate security, means disbursements according to the law of the tribunal; and it was the duty of the orphans' court to ascertain the parties entitled to the distribution for the purpose of such legal disbursement. In re Clement's Estate, 28 Atl. 932, 933, 160 Pa. 391.

LEGAL DISCRETION.

See, also, "Discretion."

"A legal discretion is a discretion to be exercised within the limits which the law fixes." Norton v. Kearney, 10 Wis. 443, 450.

LEGAL DUTY.

"Legal duty" is an obligation arising from contract of the parties or the operation of law. Civ. Code, §§ 1920, 1921; Riddell v. Peck-Williamson Heating & Ventilating Co., 69 Pac. 241, 243, 27 Mont. 44.

In his treatise on Negligence Dr. Wharton has defined a "legal duty" to be "that which the law requires to be done or forborne to a determinate person or to the public at large, and is correlative to a right vested in such determinate person or the public." The obligation involved is not a moral obligation, but is the obligation imposed on every member of society by law so to conduct himself and use his property as not to injure others. Smith v. Clarke Hardware Co., 28 S. E. 73, 74, 100 Ga. 163, 39 L. R. A. 607; Cleveland, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Ballentine (U. S.) 84 Fed. 935, 937, 28 C. C. A. 572; Goodlander Mill Co. v. Standard Oil Co. (U. S.) 63 Fed. 400, 402, 11 C. C. A. 253, 27 L. R. A. 583; Emry v. Roanoke Navigation & Water-Power Co., 16 S. E. 18, 111 N. C. 94, 17 L. R. A. 699; Western Maryland R. Co. v. Kehoe, 35 Atl. 90, 94, 83 Md. 434; Bragdon v. Perkins-Campbell Co. (U. S.) 87 Fed. 109, 110, 30 C. C. A. 567.

"The duty itself arises out of various relationships of life, and varies in obligation under different circumstances. In one case the duty is high and imperative; in another it is of imperfect obligation. Thus it may be dependent on a mere license to another upon land or the bare obligation to avoid inflicting a willful injury upon a trespasser, while upon the other hand it may be a duty to care for the safety of a specially invited guest or of a passenger for hire." Emry v. Roanoke Navigation & Water Power Co., 16 S. E. 18, 111 N. C. 94, 17 L. R. A. 699.

The "legal duty" the breach of which is negligence, has reference to and is measured by some correlative right of another with which it is coextensive. This breach can consist either in the failure to do that which ought to be done, or in doing that which ought not to be done. Heaven v. Pender, 11 Q. B. Div. 506. But the duty on the one side is only the correlative of the right on the other side, and hence the duty to act or to refrain from acting cannot be extended beyond the right to have the act done or refrained from. Beyond the limits or scope, therefore, of a particular right, as that right is defined, there is no corresponding legal duty due; and, if there be no duty due, there can be no breach, and consequently no negligence. Western Maryland R. Co. v. Kehoe, 35 Atl. 90, 94, 83 Md. 434 (citing Kahl v. Love, 37 N. J. Law [8 Vroom] 5).

LEGAL ESTATE.

In law the "legal estate" is the whole estate, and the holder of the legal title is the sole owner. But this title may be held for the beneficial interest of another, which interest has come to be called an equitable estate. It is not, however, strictly speaking, an interest in the land itself, but a right which can be enforced in equity. In re Qualifications of Electors, 35 Atl. 213, 19 R. I. 387.

Formerly every estate was "legal" in the proper acceptation of that term, and in the contemplation of law there was and could be but one estate, which might properly be denominated the "legal estate." But the introduction of uses and the subsequent origination of trusts, where one party held the title, but upon some trust or confidence for another, early led the courts of chancery to take cognizance of the rights of the beneficiary, and thus there grew up a double ownership of lands thus situated; the interests which were cognizable only in a court of equity taking the name of "equitable estates," to distinguish them from legal estates. Tested by this rule, a purchaser of land under an executory contract acquires no legal estate in the premises, and therefore, in an action on a note given in payment for the real estate, such purchaser is not obliged to prove a tender of a deed conveying to the vendor any possible right the purchaser might have in the premises as a condition precedent to his right to rescind the contract. Sayre v. Mohnney, 47 Pac. 197, 198, 30 Or. 238.

An estate by curtesy consummate is a vested legal estate for life. While an equitable estate will merge into a legal estate, all other requisites being present, it is an axiom of law that a legal estate never merges into an equitable one. Bassett v. O'Brien, 51 S. W. 107, 108, 149 Mo. 381.

LEGAL ESTOPPEL.

Estoppel in pais distinguished, see "Estoppel in Pais."

LEGAL EVIDENCE.

Legal evidence is admissible evidence; if not legal, it is not admissible. Accordingly, under Gen. St. p. 440, § 34, providing that when any suit has been heard and determined by any justice of the peace, who thereafter neglected to make up a record of the same, his files and minutes thereof shall be admissible as evidence in all actions brought on such judgment, after his decease or removal from the state, such minutes are "legal evidence," though they show that judgment was entered May 31st on a writ returnable May 29th; no adjournment appearing between the two dates. In such a case the court would presume a legal adjournment on the earlier date. West v. Hayes, 51 Conn. 533, 543.

"Legal evidence" is not confined to the human voice or oral testimony, but includes every tangible object capable of making a truthful statement; such evidence being roughly classified as "documentary evidence." In oral evidence the witness is the man who speaks; in documentary evidence the witness is the thing that speaks. In either case the witness must be competent—that is, must be deemed competent to make a truthful statement—and in either case the competency of the witness must be proved before the evidence is admitted; the difference being that in oral evidence the competency is proved by a legal presumption, and in documentary evidence the competency must be proved by actual testimony, and the further difference that in oral evidence the credit of the witness is tested by his own cross-examination, while in documentary evidence the credit of the witness is tested by the cross-examination of those who must be called to prove its competency. Curtis v. Bradley, 31 Atl. 591, 594, 65 Conn. 99, 28 L. R. A. 143, 48 Am. St. Rep. 177.

Legal evidence is not such as merely raises a suspicion, and leaves the matter in question to conjecture. It is such as, in some just and reasonable view of it, taking all the facts, whether they be many or few, will warrant a verdict of guilty. Lewis v. Clyde S. S. Co., 44 S. E. 666, 669, 132 N. C. 904 (citing State v. Powell, 94 N. C. 965, 968).

LEGAL EXCUSE.

It is a "legal and just excuse," within the meaning of How. Ann. St. § 3224, providing a penalty against railroad companies for failing to stop at stations to let off passengers, except for a legal and just excuse, that it was after dark, the snow was deep and drifting, and that the engineer and conductor knew a freight train was close behind and the only place near the station where the passenger train could stop without danger of being stalled by the snow was on a bridge and elevated track. Reed v. Duluth, S. S. & A. R. Co., 59 N. W. 144, 100 Mich. 507.

The legal excuse mentioned in Act 1869, § 3, providing for a penalty against a railroad refusing to furnish a statement for taxation without legal excuse, is to be considered only in criminal prosecutions under such law, and not before the board of equalization in determining the assessment. State v. Board of Equalization of Washoe County, 7 Nev. 83, 97.

LEGAL FEES.

The phrase "legal fees," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 1866, authorizing the taxation of legal fees paid stenographers per diem or for copies as disbursements, embraces such fees as are fixed by law, and does not authorize the taxation of disbursements not authorized by law, such as disbursements paid to private stenographers attending the trial of an action in the place of the official stenographer by consent. Montana Ore Purchasing Co. v. Boston & M. Consol. Copper & Silver Min. Co., 70 Pac. 1114, 1127, 27 Mont. 288.

LEGAL FENCE.

See "Lawful Fence."

A legal fence, as used in the chapter relating to estrays, is a strong, substantial inclosure, ordinarily sufficient to turn animals; said inclosure to be not less than four feet in height, and to be constructed of posts and planks, posts, and wire, rails, poles, pickets, stones, adobe, or any other substantial material, or of one or more of the materials specified. Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 152.

A gate that would tumble down when used for the purpose for which it was built is not such a one as would constitute a part of a legal and sufficient fence. Estes v. Atlantic & St. L. R. Co., 63 Me. 308, 310.

A fence made of barbed wire, protected by an upper rail or board of wood, may be a legal and sufficient fence, under Rev. St. c. 51, §§ 36, 37, requiring a railroad company to fence its tracks by such a fence, and that, properly built and kept in repair, it may be a full discharge of the obligation resting on a railroad company. The meaning of a fence is something to protect and restrain, and not to destroy. To be legal it must be a compliance with the law, but not necessarily a violation of the fundamental principle that each should use his own with due regard to the rights of others; and, as the statute does not specifically prescribe how the materials shall be put together, it is clear that, considering the object to be attained, while the fence must be so built as to be a reasonable restraint against all domestic animals of ordinary docility, it is not to be made unnecessarily dangerous to that class of animals, or permitted to become so by neglect; and where a colt is injured by becoming entangled in a barbed wire railroad fence, which had become dilapidated by the company's negligence and was likely to cause injury to a colt without misconduct on his part, the company was liable, though the fence was sufficient to prevent the escape of animals. Gould v. Bangor & P. R. Co., 82 Me. 122, 19 Atl. 84, 85.

LEGAL FIREBREAK.

A legal firebreak shall consist of a strip of land 200 feet wide, plowed on either side and burned out inside the plowing. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1668.

LEGAL FRAUD.

See, also, "Fraud in Law."

"Legal fraud" is synonymous with "constructive fraud," and is such as is implied by law from the nature of the transaction itself. The question of the existence or nonexistence of an actual purpose to defraud does not enter as an essential factor in determining the question, but the law regards the transaction as fraudulent per se. Newell v. Wagness, 44 N. W. 1014, 1016, 1 N. D. 62.

The phrase "legal fraud" has sometimes been interpreted as meaning fraud by construction, and as indicating that something less than actual fraud may sustain an action for deceit; but to sustain an action for deceit intentional fraud must be shown, as fraud without damage or damage without fraud gives no cause of action, but when these two concur an action lies. Kountze v. Kennedy, 41 N. E. 414, 147 N. Y. 124, 29 L. R. A. 360, 49 Am. St. Rep. 651.

LEGAL HEIRS.

Where a testator bequeaths his residuary estate in trust to be expended so far as necessary for the support of the wife, with remainder over to legal heirs, two of testator's children otherwise omitted from the will were not entitled to the portion which would have come to them if the father had died intestate; the word "legal heirs" referring to the children who had been named as beneficiaries in the will. Smith v. Sheehan, 39 Atl. 332, 333, 67 N. H. 344.

The phrase "legal heirs," in the by-laws of a beneficial association organized to provide a fund for the benefit of the members' widows and orphans, and providing that the fund due by the association on a member's death shall be payable to his legal heirs, was construed to mean his widow and children. Janda v. Bohemian Roman Catholic First Cent. Union, 75 N. Y. Supp. 654, 71 App. Div. 150.

Code 1873, § 2455, provides that, if the intestate leave no issue, one half of his estate shall go to his parents and the other half to his wife. Such section is the only instance where the rights given to a widow under the statute partake of the nature of heirship. A decedent at his death held a policy of life insurance payable to "his legal heirs." He left surviving him a widow and one child. Held, that the words "his legal heirs" do not include the widow, and hence the whole amount of the policy should go to the child. "The distinction between the word 'widow' and the word 'heir' is marked in common parlance. No one having children speaks of his wife, in contemplation of her survivorship, as his heir; but it is believed, and it is universal, that she is referred to as 'widow' and the children as 'heirs.' While technically, and in the single instance stated in the statute, a widow may become a legal heir of her deceased husband, our conclusion is that, whether used in their technical or general sense, the words 'legal heirs' were not intended, and should not be construed in this case, to include the widow." Phillips v. Carpenter, 44 N. W. 898, 899, 79 Iowa, 600.

Where a will bequeathed property to a woman for life, remainder to her "legal heirs," and authorized the sale of the property for reinvestment in other lands, if the deeds therefor were taken in the name of such woman and her legal heirs, with the same provisions contained in the will, the words "legal heirs" were equivalent to children or their descendants, and the estate did not vest in her and her heirs, so as to convert the life estate into a fee. Waller v. Martin, 61 S. W. 73, 74, 106 Tenn. 341, 82 Am. St. Rep. 882.

The term "legal heirs," though generally a term of description, has a well-defined meaning, and, whether applied to real estate or personalty, it includes only next of kin or relatives by blood, and excludes the widow. Kaiser v. Kaiser (N. Y.) 3 How. Prac. (N. S.) 104, 105.

The term "heirs," or "legal heirs," or other equivalent words used to designate the beneficiaries in any life insurance policy or certificate of membership in any mutual aid or benevolent association, where no contrary intention is expressed in such instrument, shall be construed to include the surviving husband or wife of the insured. Code Iowa 1897, § 3313.

In a will devising certain property to the "legal heirs" of my brother J.'s children, the words are used in the popular sense, as indicating the people entitled to inherit if his brother were dead. Healy v. Healy, 39 Atl. 793, 794, 70 Conn. 467.

"Legal heirs," as used in a will directing a sum of money to be equally divided among all my children "or their legal heirs," should be construed to have been used, not to individuate grandchildren, but to supply a legal succession on the death of any one, and to mean simply legal representatives. Mull's Ex'rs v. Mull's Adm'r, 81 Pa. (31 P. F Smith) 393, 394 (cited in Appeal of Reed, 11 Atl. 787, 788, 118 Pa. 215, 4 Am. St. Rep. 588).

LEGAL HOLIDAYS.

See, also, "Holiday."

"Legal holidays," as used in a statute declaring that certain days shall be legal holidays, on which all the public offices of the state may be closed, and shall be treated and considered as Sunday or the Christian Sabbath for all purposes regarding the presenting for payment or the acceptance, and of protesting for and giving notice of the dishonor of bills of exchange, bank checks, and promissory notes, does not imply that those days are assimilated to Sunday or the Christian Sabbath. In relation to civil matters, such as the presentation of negotiable paper for acceptance or payment, protests, and the like, to the extent that holidays had been assimilated to Sunday by statute, they must be enforced, but no further. They are not to be held the same as the Sabbath, or as not a day for judicial or legal proceedings, as the Sabbath is denominated. Courts are not required to suspend their proceedings on those days, except at their own discretion. Dunlap v. State, 9 Tex. App. 179, 186, 35 Am. Rep. 736.

"Legal holidays," as used in Act 1879, providing that all saloons, restaurants, bars in taverns or elsewhere, and all other places where malt, spirituous, or intoxicating liquors are sold, shall be closed on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, election days, or legal holidays, should be construed to include Christmas. The term "legal holidays" is used in order to distinguish them from such other as particular sects and classes might voluntarily observe as holidays, and to import to them under the name of "holidays," or "legal holidays," a somewhat special character. The 26th of December is one of that category. Reithmiller v. People, 6 N. W. 667, 668, 44 Mich. 280.

Christmas is not a legal holiday, so as to render a sale under execution made on that day void. Hadley v. Musselman, 3 N. E. 122, 124, 104 Ind. 459.

Const. art. 6, § 5, providing that the superior courts shall always be open, "legal holidays excepted," merely prohibits the Legislature from establishing terms of court, and does not prohibit the transaction of business in court on legal holidays. People v. Soto, 4 Pac. 664, 665, 65 Cal. 621.

A legal holiday is not a judicial day, and, although an act might be performed by the prothonotary on such day, he is not bound to perform it. Appeal of Lutz, 23 Wkly. Notes Cas. 515, 518, 123 Pa. 273, 16 Atl. 858.

The words "legal holiday" shall include the 22d day of February, the 19th day of April, the 30th day of May, the 4th day of July, the first Monday of September, Thanksgiving Day, and Christmas Day, or the day following when any of the four days first mentioned or Christmas Day occurs on Sunday. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 88, c. 8, § 5, subd. 9.

The provision in a statute that a legal holiday shall be as Sunday applies only to commercial paper and its maturity and protest, and not to judicial acts or to worldly employment in general. Paine v. Vesco, 1 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 562, 567.

LEGAL IMPEDIMENT.

"Legal impediment," as used in Comp. Laws, § 4729, making it criminal for any person to undertake to join others in marriage, knowing that he is not lawfully authorized so to do, or knowing of any legal impediment to the proposed marriage, includes everything which would prevent a valid marriage. Bonker v. People, 37 Mich. 4, 7.

LEGAL INSANITY.

"Legal insanity is a disorder of the intellect," and is distinguished from "moral insanity," which is "a disorder of the feelings and propensities." The existence of insane illusions is the legal test of insanity. In re Forman's Will, 54 Barb. 274, 291.

LEGAL INTEREST.

Under a statute declaring that no person having a direct legal interest in the result of any civil action or proceeding, when the adverse party is the representative of a deceased person, shall be permitted to testify to any transaction or conversation had between the deceased person and the witness, etc., it is held that the test of interest is whether the witness will gain or lose by the direct legal operation and effect of the judgment or final order rendered in the proceeding in which the testimony is offered. Tecumseh Nat. Bank v. McGee, 85 N. W. 949, 953, 61 Neb. 709.

The simplest and most generally accepted test in determining whether one is a proper party complainant to a bill for an injunction is whether he possesses a legal or equitable interest in the subject-matter of the controversy. High, Inj. par. 756. Giving to the terms "legal or equitable interest" a fairly liberal construction, this test is a reasonably safe guide. Town of Burlington v. Schwarzman, 52 Conn. 181, 52 Am. Rep. 571. The legal interest which qualifies a complainant, other than the state itself, to sue in such a case, is a pecuniary interest in preventing the defendant from doing an act, where the injury flows from its quality and character, as a breach of some legal or equitable duty. New Orleans, M. & T. R. Co. v. Ellerman, 105 U. S. 166, 26 L. Ed. 1015. A railroad company, not having an exclusive franchise, has no such interest in the construction of a street railway between towns on its lines that it can enjoin the construction, merely because the street railway is acting ultra vires in building the proposed line. New England R. Co. v. Central Ry. & Electric Co., 36 Atl. 1061, 1063, 69 Conn. 47.

Legal interest is the rate fixed by law, which attaches to contracts where the parties have not agreed upon a rate. Fowler v. Smith, 2 Cal. 568, 570.

The words "legal interest," as used in an answer in an action in which the defense was usury, one of the allegations being that at the time of the loan the note given therefor was made payable at the city of N. with the express purpose of exacting from the borrower the amount of exchange in addition to the legal rate of interest, mean the highest rate of interest which the law allows the parties to contract for, although they may be sometimes used in the sense of the rate of interest fixed by law on debts or obligations, in the absence of contract with reference thereto; but their true sense in any instance must be determined from the subject-matter and the connection in which they are used. Towslee v. Durkee, 12 Wis. 480, 485.

Legal interest is the rate of interest fixed by law when the contract is silent on the subject of interest. American Mut. Bldg. & Sav. Ass'n v. Harn (Tex.) 62 S. W. 74, 75.

"Legal rate of interest," as used in 1 Comp. Laws, § 2185, providing that it shall not be lawful for any banking association under the general banking law to take or receive more than the "legal rate of interest" in advance on its loans and discounts, does not mean 7 per cent., which is the rate fixed by law where the contract is silent on the rate, but authorizes the taking of 10 per cent., which may be agreed on. Cameron v. Merchants' & Manufacturers' Bank, 37 Mich. 240, 242.

"Legal interest," as used in St. 1865, p. 471, providing that certain county warrants shall bear legal interest from the date thereof, means interest at the rate per cent. prescribed by law on the date of the passage of the act. Beals v. Amador County Sup'rs, 35 Cal. 624, 633.

"Legal interest," for which judgment is authorized to be entered in favor of the plaintiff under Act Feb. 28, 1893, authorizing an action on Indian war bonds issued by the state, and providing for interest on judgments, is only such interest as is authorized by law. If the plaintiff is not legally entitled to interest upon his claim, either by reason of its nature or the immunity of the state from an obligation to pay interest, this statute does not authorize a recovery. Molineux v. State, 42 Pac. 34, 109 Cal. 378, 50 Am. St. Rep. 49.

"Legal interest" is that interest which is allowed by law when the parties to a contract have not agreed upon any particular rate of interest. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3098.

LEGAL IRREGULARITY.

"Legal irregularity," within the meaning of Laws N. Y. 1858, c. 338, which authorizes a party aggrieved by any fraud or irregularity in proceedings relative to assessment for local improvements in the city of New York to apply to a justice of the Supreme Court to vacate the assessment, means any omission of or irregularity in one or more of the statutory steps required in laying the assessment. In re Hay (N. Y.) 14 Abb. Prac. 53, 56.

LEGAL JURY.

See "Jury."

LEGAL MALICE.

See "Malice."

LEGAL MEANS.

"Legal means," as used in Act 1841, making it the duty of the sheriff, on the receipt of notice of a mob or riot endangering property, to take all legal means to protect the property so attacked or threatened to be attacked, means all means which the sheriff may officially use. "The sheriff is required to take all 'legal means' to prevent the injury, and there is a clear differential distinction between the word 'legal' and 'lawful,' and the former is used in the law with reference to this distinction. It imports a much more limited range of means than is employed by the word 'lawful,' and imposes a much less onerous duty on the officers named. When the law requires an officer to take all 'legal means' to effect an object, it intends that he shall take all such means as he may officially use, and he is not chargeable with neglect of duty if he adopts the means prescribed by the law for such occasions, though he may omit other plain physical and moral means. These may be lawful, because not forbidden, but they are not 'legal means,' because not prescribed by law as means to be used by him in his office." McCandless v. Allegheny Bessemer Steel Co., 25 Atl. 579, 585, 152 Pa. 139.

LEGAL MEMORY.

"Legal memory, or time out of mind," was in England, under the statute of limitation of 32 Hen. VIII, 60 years. In Massachusetts the time of legal memory is analogous to the time prescribed for bringing a writ of right. In New York previous to 1830 it was 25 years, and subsequent to that time it was 20 years. Miller v. Garlock (N. Y.) 8 Barb. 153, 154.

LEGAL MERCHANDISE.

Other legal merchandise, see "Other."

LEGAL MORTGAGE.

"Legal mortgage" is that which is created by operation of law. Civ. Code 1900, La. art. 3287.

The law alone in certain cases gives to the creditor a mortgage on the property of his debtor, without it being requisite that the parties should stipulate it. This is called "legal mortgage." It is called "tacit mortgage," because it is established by the law without the aid of any agreement. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3311.

LEGAL NEGLIGENCE.

In cases where the common experience of mankind and the common judgment of prudent persons have recognized that to do or omit to do certain acts is prolific of danger, the doing or omission of them is "negligence per se," or "legal negligence." The omission of a duty enjoined by law for the protection and safety of the public by a common carrier, or the doing of an act by such a carrier which by the common experience and consensus of prudent persons would create danger to passengers, is legal negligence. It is legal negligence for a passenger to ride in a fast-going passenger coach with his arm protruding out of the window and beyond the line of the body of the car. Carrico v. West Virginia Cent. & P. Ry. Co., 14 S. E. 12, 35 W. Va. 389.

Legal negligence is the failure to exercise the degree of care that a prudent and careful man would under like circumstances. Drake v. Wild, 39 Atl. 248, 251, 70 Vt. 52.

Legal negligence is the omission of such care as persons of ordinary prudence exercise and deem adequate to the circumstances of the case. Johnson v. Chicago & N. W. Ry., 5 N. W. 886, 888, 49 Wis. 529.

LEGAL NOTICE.

Legal notice means something more than bare knowledge of the given facts. It is knowledge brought home to a party in a prescribed form. When its terms are so unambiguous that the meaning cannot without negligence or inattention be misunderstood, the notice is sufficient. Defects in form, by which a party is not misled to his injury, do not render a notice invalid; but a notice giving wrong information, or silent as to material information which the statute requires, cannot be regarded as legal notice. Sanborn v. Piper, 10 Atl. 680, 681, 64 N. H. 335.

Rev. St. §§ 4275, 4276, prescribing a certain fee for the publication of legal notices, defines the term "legal notice" as "embracing every summons, order, citation, notice of sale, or other notice, and every other advertisement of any description required to be published by law, or in pursuance of any law, or of any order of any court." Under this definition the general election notice, or notice for the information of voters, required to be published by Laws 1891, c. 379, is a legal notice. Bohan v. Ozaukee County, 60 N. W. 702, 703, 88 Wis. 498.

Legal notice is said to be the information of some act done or the interpellation by which some act is required to be done. It also signifies simple knowledge. People's Bank v. Etting (Pa.) 17 Phila. 233, 235.

LEGAL OFFICER.

A person actually obtaining office with the legal indicia of title is a legal officer until ousted. Hallgren v. Campbell, 46 N. W. 331, 382, 82 Mich. 255, 9 L. R. A. 408, 21 Am. St. Rep. 557.

LEGAL OWNER.

Under the laws of South Carolina a mortgagee of lands was not the "legal owner," within the terms of Act Cong. March 2, 1891, c. 496, 26 Stat. 822, providing for the refunding of the direct tax to the legal owner of land. Glover v. United States, 17 Sup. Ct. 95, 96, 164 U. S. 294, 41 L. Ed. 440.

LEGAL PLAINTIFF.

A legal plaintiff is he in whom the legal title or right of action is vested. Under Act Cong. Aug. 13, 1894, c. 280, 28 Stat. 278 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2523], requiring contractors for the construction of public buildings to give bonds for the early payment of those furnishing labor or materials, and authorizing any person who has supplied labor or materials for the prosecution of such work to bring an action on the bond in the name of the United States, such action may be brought in the name of the United States for the use of the laborer or materialman, but in such action the United States is not a legal plaintiff. United States v. Henderlong (U. S.) 102 Fed. 2, 4.

LEGAL PRESUMPTION.

Legal presumptions ought to be logical inferences from the natural and usual conduct of men under the circumstances. Gunster v. Scranton Illuminating Heat & Power Co., 37 Atl. 550, 552, 181 Pa. 327, 59 Am. St. Rep. 650.

Legal presumptions are founded upon the experience and observation of distinguished jurists as to what is usually found to be the fact resulting from any given circumstances, and, the result being thus ascertained, whenever such circumstances occur, they are prima facie evidence of the fact presumed. Where a will duly executed, and in the custody of the testator for five years afterwards and within ten months previous to his decease, could not be found after his death, there was a legal presumption that the testator had destroyed it animo revocandi. Betts v. Jackson (N. Y.) 6 Wend. 173, 182.

Legal presumption is that which is attached by a special law to certain acts or certain facts. Such are: (1) Acts which the law declares null, as presumed to have been made to evade its provisions, from their very quality. (2) Cases in which the law declares that the ownership or discharge results from certain determinate circumstances. (3) The authority which the law attributes to the thing adjudged. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2285.

LEGAL PROCEEDINGS.

The words "legal proceedings," as used in a stipulation in an insurance contract that legal proceedings to recover thereon must be brought within six months from the date of the death of insured, mean proceedings in a court to enforce the claim; and the filing of proofs, employment of counsel, drafting of papers, or other preparations for enforcing the claim are not legal proceedings within the meaning of the policy. There is nothing uncertain or ambiguous in the clause. Ex parte preparations before commencing a suit hardly meet the requirement that legal proceedings shall be begun within the time limited. Legal proceedings, within the purview of this stipulation, must mean such proceedings to enforce the claim as the law sanctions or authorizes. Griem v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 75 N. W. 67, 99 Wis. 530.

The words "legal proceedings," as used in Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 67, 30 Stat. 564, 565 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3449], declaring that levies, judgments, or other liens obtained through legal proceedings against a person who is insolvent at any time within four months prior to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy against him shall be void, have no strictly technical meaning and are used in a general sense. In their necessary meaning they signify a suit or a proceeding at law or in equity, but in a wider sense they embrace every proceeding brought by law for acquiring a right or enforcing a remedy. The foreclosure of a mortgage by advertisement under a statute is a legal proceeding. The mechanic's lien law of New York provides a statutory remedy for the collection of individual debts, which consists of two legal steps—one for acquiring the lien, and the other for foreclosing it. The two steps are indispensable to each other, and the entire proceeding, considered as a whole, is a legal proceeding. In re Emslie (U. S.) 98 Fed. 716, 720.

The phrase "legal proceeding," as used in Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 67, 30 Stat. 564, 565 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3449], is any proceeding in a court of justice by which a party pursues a remedy which the law affords him. The term embraces any of the formal steps or measures employed in the prosecution or defense of a suit. It refers to the use of a judicial process; the phraseology of the statute being "levies, judgments, attachments, or other liens obtained through legal proceedings." The filing of a notice of a mechanic's lien has no necessary relation to the initiation or the prosecution of a suit. It is essential in order to maintain an action to foreclose the lien, but it is no more a preliminary step in the suit than is the protesting of a note in a suit against the indorser. In re Emslie (U. S.) 102 Fed. 291, 293, 42 C. C. A. 350.

A note secured by a deed of trust provided that 10 per cent. should be added as attorney's fees, if legal proceedings were instituted for its collection. The maker was afterwards adjudged to be of unsound mind, and a guardian was appointed for him. After maturity of the note the payee placed it in the hands of an attorney, who properly proved it up and presented it for payment to the guardian. Held, that this constituted legal proceedings within the meaning of the law. Morrill v. Hoyt, 83 Tex. 59, 18 S. W. 424, 29 Am. St. Rep. 630.

Where a bill alleges that a certain person had accused defendant of crime and was threatening legal proceedings to recover damages, and besought plaintiff for his services to save the expense and punishment incident thereto, and agreed to pay him therefor, the words "legal proceedings," in connection with the context, fairly import criminal, as well as civil, proceedings; and, if a part of the consideration for the contract which the orator asked to have enforced was the suppression of criminal prosecution, equity will not aid the orator in enforcing it. Mack v. Campeau, 38 Atl. 149, 151, 69 Vt. 558, 69 Am. St. Rep. 948.

The words "legal proceedings," used in Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 3, subd. 3, 30 Stat. 546 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3422], providing that an act of bankruptcy by a person shall consist of his having "suffered or permitted, while insolvent, any creditor to obtain a preference through legal proceedings, and not having, at least five days before a sale or final disposition of any property affected by such preference, vacated or discharged such preference," have reference to any proceedings in a court of justice, interlocutory or final, by which the property of the debtor is seized and diverted from his general creditors. In re Rome Planing Mill Co. (U. S.) 96 Fed. 812, 815.

LEGAL PROCESS.

An order of a state court appointing a receiver of the property of a debtor is legal process, within the meaning of section 39 of the bankruptcy act of 1867. In re Bininger (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 412, 416.

At common law the owner of a chattel could not maintain an action for replevin for the possession of goods taken from him by legal process. The Code modified this rule, and authorized the maintenance of the action of replevin for personal property seized by legal process, when it was exempt from seizure by such process. The term "legal process" contemplates a process issued in virtue of and pursuant to law. If a warrant for the seizure of liquors should be issued by a magistrate of his own volition, not by authority of any law, it could not be contended that a seizure made in pursuance thereof would be lawful, or that the possession thus acquired would be by virtue of legal process. Nor can property seized under an unconstitutional law any more be said to be seized under legal process than if the process issued without law. Hence the fact that the liquors for which replevin was instituted were seized under a warrant issued under an unconstitutional statute is no defense to the action. Cooley v. Davis, 34 Iowa, 128, 130.

A foreclosure of a mortgage by advertisement is not a legal process or a judicial decree. The proceedings in this kind of a foreclosure are carried on wholly outside of court and without the aid of its process or decree; and neither the giving of a mortgage nor the sale of the premises on foreclosure, prior to the expiration of the time for redemption, effect any change in title or possession of the property. Loy v. Home Ins. Co., 24 Minn. 315, 319, 31 Am. Rep. 346.

"Legal process," as used in an insurance policy, which provided that, if any change should take place in the possession of the property by legal process, the policy should be void, meant "valid legal process." Runkle v. Citizens' Ins. Co. (U. S.) 6 Fed. 143, 146.

The words "legal process" mean all the proceedings in an action or proceeding. They would necessarily embrace the decree, which ordinarily includes the proceedings. As used in a policy of fire insurance, conditioned that if the property shall be sold or transferred, or any change take place in the title or possession, whether by legal process, judicial decree, or voluntary transfer or conveyance, then and in every such case the policy shall be void, the phrase means what is known as a "writ," and as attachment or execution on writs are usually employed to effect a change of title to property, they are, or are among, the processes contemplated by the policy. Perry v. Lorillard Fire Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 6 Lans. 201, 204.

Process, whether by writ or by warrant, is legal whenever it is not defective in the frame of it and is issued in the ordinary course of justice from a court or magistrate having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, though there have been error or irregularity in the proceedings previous to the issuance of the process. Commonwealth v. Brower, 7 Pa. Dist. R. 254, 255.

LEGAL PROPORTION.

"Legal proportion," as used in a will giving to testator's son's wife, in case of the son's death, the use of the son's legal proportion of testator's estate, means such an aliquot portion of the estate as would equal the son's share in it under the statute of distributions in case of intestacy. Security Co. of Hartford v. Cone, 81 Atl. 7, 11, 64 Conn. 579.

LEGAL PROVOCATION.

"Legal provocation" is synonymous with "lawful, adequate, and reasonable provocation," and means an assault or personal violence. State v. Bulling, 15 S. W. 367, 371, 105 Mo. 204.

On a trial for murder, the judge, charging in reference to homicide effected by a deadly weapon, so defined voluntary manslaughter as to require that sudden heat and passion should not only exist, but be excited by "sufficient legal provocation," or "be justly excited by legal provocation." In his charge "deliberation" and "sufficient legal provocation" are respectively made to characterize murder and manslaughter, and, using the terms in a strict technical sense, this is correct; but "deliberation" must be understood to mean not slowness and composure, as distinguished from suddenness and excitement, but freedom from the temporary frenzy excited by sufficient legal provocation, as distinguished from that frenzy which the law allows to moderate its rigor in pity for human frailty. A voluntary act, which is without sufficient legal provocation, is deliberate, no matter how sudden or how furious it may be. Legal provocation is supposed not to be a proper technical expression, as every sufficient provocation must be something illegal. Judge Gaston, in the case of State v. Will, says: "Some causes of passionate excitement are termed 'legal provocations,' while others have been declared not to be legal provocations. This must not be understood to mean that a man has a legal right to be provoked, but only that the law regards certain offensive acts as provocations, while it refuses to consider others as such. The latter, though provocations in common parlance, are not provocations in a legal sense, and therefore not comprehended in the legal phrase 'legal provocations.'" State v. Smith (S. C.) 10 Rich. Law, 341, 346, 347.

LEGAL PUNISHMENTS.

Legal punishments are defined by the statute as follows: "Fines, hard labor for the county, imprisonment in the county jail, imprisonment in the penitentiary (which includes hard labor for the state), and death by hanging." Code 1886, § 4492; State v. Judge, 87 Ala. 46, 47, 6 South. 328, 329.

LEGAL RATE OF INTEREST.

The term "legal rate of interest" means the statutory rate which obtains in the absence of contract. McDonnell v. De Soto Sav. & Bldg. Ass'n, 75 S. W. 438, 444, 175 Mo. 250, 97 Am. St. Rep. 592.

Where a statute provides for 6 per cent. interest, but that the rate may be made 8 per cent. by contract, the former is generally termed the "legal rate," and the latter the "contract rate." Arbuthnot v. Brookfield Loan & Building Ass'n, 72 S. W. 132, 134, 98 Mo. App. 332.

Under Civ. Code, § 2876, a legal rate of interest is fixed at 7 per cent, where no rate is named, but in no event is the interest to exceed 8 per cent. As used in such section, "legal" is not synonymous with "lawful." Three per cent. is lawful, but not the legal rate; 8 per cent. is lawful, when specified in writing; 7 per cent. is both legal and lawful. Green v. Equitable Mortg. Co., 33 S. E. 869, 870, 107 Ga. 536.

LEGAL REASON.

"Legal reason," as used in Pen. Code, § 378, authorizing the court to withhold sentence when a legal reason exists why it should not be inflicted, but without defining what is a legal reason, leaves the question as to what constitutes such legal reason to be determined by the principles of the common law. Aaron v. State, 40 Ala. 307, 312.

LEGAL RELEVANCY.

Chamberlayne's Best on Evidence (Am. Notes) p. 251, after quoting Mr. Justice Stephen's definition of "relevancy," lays down the rule that legal relevancy, which is essential to admissible evidence, requires a higher standard of evidentiary force. It includes logical relevancy, and for reasons of practical convenience demands a close connection between the fact to be proved and the fact offered to prove it. All evidence must be logically relevant; that is, absolutely essential. The fact, however, that it is logically relevant, does not insure admissibility. It must also be legally relevant. A fact which, in connection with other facts, renders probable the existence of a fact in issue, may still be rejected, if in the opinion of the judge and under the circumstances of the case it is considered essentially misleading or too remote. Hoag v. Wright, 54 N. Y. Supp. 658, 662, 34 App. Div. 260.

LEGAL REMEDY.

A legal remedy, such as will bar relief by mandamus, is a remedy at law, as distinguished from a remedy in equity; and the mere existence of an equitable remedy is not of itself a conclusive objection to the exercise of the jurisdiction, although it may and should influence the court in the exercise of its discretion in the particular case. The principle involved is that whenever a legal right exists the party is entitled to a legal remedy, and when there is no other legal remedy mandamus will lie. State v. Sneed, 58 S. W. 1070, 1075, 105 Tenn. 711.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVE.

The terms "representatives," "legal representatives," and "personal representatives" of deceased persons were used interchangeably, and primarily meant those artificial representatives, the executors and administrators, who by law represented the deceased, in distinction from the heirs, who were the natural representatives; but as, under statutes of distribution, executors and administrators are no longer the sole representatives of the deceased as to personal property, these words have lost much of their original distinctive force, and are now used to describe either executors and administrators, children or descendants, and next of kin or distributees, and, when not applied to those who represent deceased persons, they may mean trustees in insolvency and receivers. Staples v. Lewis, 41 Atl. 815, 71 Conn. 288.

In a just sense, heirs or descendants are often legal representatives of the deceased person. In the commonly accepted sense, the term may mean the administrator or executor, heirs, next of kin, or descendants. Warnecke v. Lembca, 71 Ill. 91, 12 Am. Rep. 85. In legal parlance, the executor or administrator is most commonly called the "legal representative." In regard to things real, the heir is also the legal representative, and so is a devisee who takes by purchase. Heirs may be the legal representatives, or they may not. Grand Gulf R.

& Banking Co. v. Bryan, 16 Miss. (8 Smedes & M.) 234. But, even where the death of the party to be represented is in contemplation, the context may change the usual meaning of the words in the given case. Merchants' St. Nat. Bank v. Abernathy, 32 Mo. App. 211. It may mean heirs, assignees, or receivers. Davis v. Davis, 26 Cal. 23, 85 Am. Dec. 157; Phelps v. Smith, 15 Ill. (5 Peck) 572, 574; Barbour v. National Exch. Bank, 12 N. E. 5, 45 Ohio St. 133; Hammond v. Mason & Hamlin Organ Co., 92 U. S. 724, 23 L. Ed. 767. The words with which the term is associated show its meaning. When used with reference to land, it ordinarily means those to whom the land descends. When used in a deed providing that in the event of the grantor's death the property shall descend to the legal representatives of a certain person, the term "legal representatives" means all heirs at law, and cannot be construed to mean the executor or administrator. Ewing v. Jones, 29 N. E. 1057, 1058, 130 Ind. 247, 15 L. R. A. 75.

A legal representative, or personal representative, in the common-law sense, means the administrator or executor; but this is not the only definition. It may be heirs, next of kin, or descendants, or sometimes an assignee or grantee. The sense in which the term is to be understood depends somewhat on the intention of the parties using it, and is to be gathered, not always from the instrument itself, but as well from the surrounding circumstances. Warnecke v. Lembca, 71 Ill. 91, 95, 12 Am. Rep. 85.

In Rev. St. § 6024, providing that service of a scire facias may be had on the legal representative of a deceased defendant, the term "legal representative" has a two-fold meaning. In proceedings affecting land, it means the heir or devisee; as to personalty, the administrator or executor is meant. Stewart v. Gibson, 71 Mo. App. 232, 235.

The term "legal representatives," as used in an act of Congress authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the legal representatives of a certain person a certain sum of money, ordinarily means executors or administrators; but it is a broad expression, which may refer to heirs or to others who represent rights by succession to a conveyance. See Lodge v. Weld, 139 Mass. 499, 504, 2 N. E. 95. The power of sale in a common form of mortgage in this commonwealth is to the legatee and his representatives, which certainly gives the authority to assignees of the mortgage, as well as to executors or administrators. Thayer v. Pressey, 56 N. E. 5, 7, 175 Mass. 225.

As administrators or executors.

The term "legal representative" is not of uniform interpretation. It may mean those who succeed to the inheritance of an estate, or it may mean those upon whom the law devolves the legal capacity of an administrator or executor. The ordinary meaning of the words "representative," "legal representative," and "personal representative" is that they refer to the person constituted representative by the proper court; and the burden is upon those attempting to maintain a different construction to show a different meaning. In the absence of anything appearing in the context, these words found in a statute or written instrument must be held to mean the administrator or executor. The heir is not technically a representative of the deceased, unless made so by express appointment or reasonable intendment. He succeeds to property and legal rights by inheritance, and takes the estate because of the death of the owner; but the administrator or executor represents the original owner in the settlement of his estate. Under the term "legal representative" in the Japanese indemnity fund act of 1883 (22 Stat. 421), it is held that the administrator of a seaman entitled to a distributive share of the fund may maintain an action to recover it. Thompson v. United States (U. S.) 20 Ct. Cl. 276, 278.

The ordinary meaning of the words "legal representatives" is executors and administrators; and they will be given this meaning when there is nothing in the instrument in which they are used to indicate an intention to use them in any other sense. Cox v. Curwen, 118 Mass. 198, 200; Lodge v. Weld, 2 N. E. 95, 96, 139 Mass. 499; Golden Star Fraternity v. Martin, 35 Atl. 908, 910, 50 N. J. Law, 207; Weaver v. Roth, 105 Pa. 408, 412; Griffin v. Bower, 21 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 188, 190; Johnson v. Van Epps, 110 Ill. 551, 560; Matthews v. American Cent. Ins. Co., 48 N. E. 751, 752, 154 N. Y. 449, 39 L. R. A. 433, 61 Am. St. Rep. 627; Geoffroy v. Gilbert, 38 N. Y. Supp. 643, 646, 5 App. Div. 98; Reilly v. Phillips, 57 N. W. 780, 781, 4 S. D. 604; Brent v. Washington's Adm'r (Va.) 18 Grat. 526, 533.

"Legal representatives," in a policy of insurance, ordinarily means executors or administrators, when not in any way qualified by the context; but it may be shown to be next of kin, or successors, or assigns. Pittel v. Fidelity Mut. Life Ass'n (U. S.) 86 Fed. 255, 256, 30 C. C. A. 21.

"Legal representatives," in a life insurance policy payable to the legal representatives of the insured, is to be construed in its ordinary meaning, as meaning his executors or administrators, and not his heirs or next of kin, unless the circumstances show that it was for their benefit. Griswold v. Sawyer, 8 N. Y. Supp. 517, 518, 56 Hun. 12; Firemen's Fund Ins. Co. v. Sims, 42 S. E. 269, 270, 115 Ga. 939; People v. Phelps, 78 Ill. 147, 149; People v. Petrie, 61 N. E. 499, 503, 191 Ill. 497, 85 Am. St. Rep. 268; Preston v.

Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co., 51 Atl. 838, 839, 95 Md. 101; Armstrong v. Mutual Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 11 Fed. 573, 575.

The words "legal representative" are alike descriptive of an executor or administrator, and hence it is held that the address or notice of default of a negotiable instrument to the legal representatives of a deceased indorser was proper; the person sending the notice being unnotified as to whether the person to be notified was an executor or an administrator. Pillow v. Hardeman, 22 Tenn. (3 Humph.) 538, 541, 39 Am. Dec. 195.

Testator bequeathed one-half of his residuary estate to his daughter M. for life, to go at her decease to her children and the legal representatives of any of them who may then have deceased, and their heirs. The other half he bequeathed to his daughter J. for life, to go at her death to her children and the descendants of any deceased child, but, in case J. left no descendants, then such portion to go to the children of M. and the legal representatives of any one of them then deceased, and their heirs subject only to a life estate in one-third thereof to J.'s husband if he survived her. Held, that the term "legal representatives," as applied to the succession of M.'s life estate, meant executors and administrators. Johnson v. Edmond, 37 Atl. 503, 505, 65 Conn. 492.

The expression "legal representatives," as used in the statute of 1788 authorizing a remedy by motion by a surety against the legal representatives of a deceased co-surety, may mean, if taken in its more general signification as synonymous with "lawful," either the lawful representatives of the real estate, or the lawful representatives of the personal estate, of the deceased; but since the undertaking between sureties to make contribution is an implied assumpsit, which properly applies to and devolves upon the executor or administrator, but does not devolve upon the heir, it seems more proper to render this expression in the statute according to the subject-matter, and to refer the phrase to the executors and administrators, who lawfully represent and are bound by the implied assumpsit of the deceased, than to the heirs. Lansdale's Adm'r v. Cox, 23 Ky. (7 T. B. Mon.) 401, 405.

"Legal representative," as used in a clause of a will providing that, if a son of testator shall die before, he shall receive his proportion of the principal of the trust estate, then so much of the trust estate shall belong to "the legal representative of such deceased and their heirs," means executors and administrators, and not the next of kin. Tarrant v. Backus, 28 Atl. 46, 48, 63 Conn. 277.

A bequest of personal estate to the "representatives," or "legal representatives," or "personal representatives" of any one, means prima facie executors or administrators, and in a will by a wife, giving to the legal representatives of her deceased husband all the property received by her under his will, the term "legal representatives" refers to the executors, and not his heirs. Halsey v. Paterson, 37 N. J. Eq. (10 Stew.) 445, 448.

It is held in a number of cases that the words "legal representatives" are synonymous in their ordinary use with executor or administrator; but it is also ruled that the ordinary sense of the words may be controlled by a different intention appearing on the whole instrument. The words are alike descriptive of an executor or administrator, and would be appropriate to a case where a party directing a notice of protest where the indorser was deceased might be uninformed as to whether the person to be notified was an executor or administrator. Pillow v. Hardeman, 22 Tenn. (3 Humph.) 538, 540, 541, 39 Am. Rep. 195.

Where a testator gave a legacy to his son in trust for his wife, income payable to her for life, with power of appointment by will in her as to the principal, and provided that, if it was not so disposed of, it should be equally divided among testator's children or their legal representatives, it was held that the words "legal representatives" were used in their primary sense as meaning executors and administrators, as words of limitation, and not in their sense of next of kin, as words of substitution. Norwood v. Mills' Ex'r, 3 Ohio Dec. 356, 1 Ohio N. P. 314.

A power to sell and convey contained in a mortgage stated that in the event of the mortgagee's death his legal representatives or assigns were authorized to make the sale, and that if the sale was made his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns were authorized to make a deed. Held, that the mortgagee's administrator was within the meaning of the words "legal representatives," and was empowered to make the sale as well as the deed. Stevens v. Shannahan, 160 Ill. 330, 343, 344, 43 N. E. 350.

Assignee or grantee.

An assignee or grantee is a legal representative of the assignor or grantor in regard to the things assigned or granted. Grand Gulf R. & Banking Co. v. Bryan, 16 Miss. (8 Smedes & M.) 234, 276.

The term "legal representative" primarily means one's executors or administrators. This meaning is well-nigh universal, when applied in connection with the decease of some one. It is not necessarily so when not so applied. But it is held that, even in cases where the death of the party to be represented is in contemplation, the context of the instrument may change the usual meaning of the words in the given case. In a mortgage providing that the mortgagee or his legal representatives may take possession of the property in certain instances, it is held that the phrase "legal representatives" will include those who may represent the mortgagee by assignment, as well as those who will represent him after his death. Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Abernathy, 32 Mo. App. 211.

In a contract concerning the use of a patented invention, and binding the parties and their "legal representatives" to the covenants and agreements of the contract, the term "legal representatives" includes not only administrators and executors of the parties, but their successors and assignees in business and interest. Hammond v. Mason & Hamlin Organ Co., 92 U. S. 724, 726, 23 L. Ed. 767.

The assignee of a note and deed of trust securing the same is not authorized to appoint a new trustee by a provision in the deed empowering the cestuis que trust or their legal representatives to make such appointment; the court holding that the assignee of a note is not the legal representative of the payee, so as to be entitled to substitute the trustee. "An assignee," says the court, "claims in his own right, and not in a representative character." Fuller v. Davis, 63 Miss. 78, 80.

The term "legal representative," used in the act of Congress of March, 1803, relative to pre-emption claims under the act, does not mean children or heirs only, but embraces also assignees and grantees, who in regard to the thing assigned or granted are the legal representatives of the assignor or grantor. With reference to the phrase "legal representatives" the court observes that in legal parlance the executor or administrator is most commonly called the "legal representative," but in regard to things real the heir is also the legal representative, and so is a devisee. Grand Gulf R. & Banking Co. v. Bryan, 16 Miss. (8 Smedes & M.) 234, 275.

"Legal representatives," as used in the formula in the Land Office that the patent certificate, and even the patent, should issue to the original grantee or his legal representatives, means representatives of the original grantee in the land by contract, such as assignees or grantees, as well as by operation of law. Hogan v. Page, 69 U. S. (2 Wall.) 605, 607, 17 L. Ed. 854.

A grantee is a legal representative of the grantor, within Code Civ. Proc. § 473, providing that the court may relieve a party or his legal representative from a judgment taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect. Malone v. Big Flat Gravel Min. Co., 28 Pac. 1063, 93 Cal. 384.

"Legal representatives," as used in a grant by Congress of the pre-emption right to land to a certain person and his legal representatives, means the grantee of such person, as well as his heir, who succeeds to the property. Delaunay v. Burnett, 9 Ill. (4 Gilman) 454, 496; Phelps v. Smith, 15 Ill. (5 Peck) 572, 574; Duncan v. Walker (Pa.) (2 Dall.) 205, 1 L. Ed. 350.

The term "legal representatives" is not necessarily restricted to the personal representative of one deceased, but is sufficiently broad to cover all persons who with respect to the property stand in his place and represent his interests, whether transferred to them by his act or by operation of law. Hence it is held that the phrase "legal representatives," in a life insurance policy made payable to the insured or his legal representatives, included the assigns of the insured, as well as executors and administrators. Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 6 Sup. Ct. 877, 879, 117 U. S. 591, 29 L. Ed. 997.

In the act of Congress providing that, where an officer, sailor, or soldier shall have fallen or died in the service, his heirs or "legal representatives" shall be entitled to and receive the same quantity of land as would have been due to such officer, etc., had he been living, it is not likely that the expression "legal representatives" was meant to apply to devisees of deceased officers and soldiers, for whom the bounty was intended if they had lived, because at the time this law was passed there could not be a deviser of those lands under the general law. It is more probable that they were intended to provide for the class of persons who may have purchased the right of the officer or soldier to such bounty as the legislation might grant to them. Stevenson v. Sullivan, 18 U. S. (5 Wheat.) 207, 256, 257, 5 L. Ed. 70.

Under the statutory remedy for confirmation of title given to purchasers and "the heirs and legal representatives" of purchasers of lands at judicial and tax sales (Gould's Dig. c. 170, § 1), the purchaser from one buying at an auditor's sale of land sold for taxes is the legal representative of the original purchaser, and it is not necessary that he obtain the legal title to the land from such original purchaser before proceeding for confirmation of the tax title. Scott v. Watkins, 22 Ark. 556, 558.

Where a trust authorized the trustee or his legal representative to execute the trust by sale, etc., it will be held to mean that the assignee or grantee of the trustee, having the legal title that was in the trustee, shall execute the power, and not a mere stranger, having no title, such as the administrator of the trustee. Warnecke v. Lembca, 71 Ill. 91, 95, 12 Am. Rep. 85.

Assignee in bankruptcy.

An assignee in bankruptcy is the legal representative of the borrower, within the meaning of the thirtieth section of the national banking act, providing that, in case a usurious rate of interest has been paid a national bank, the person or persons paying the same, or their legal representatives, may recover back twice the amount of interest thus paid. Wright v. First Nat. Bank (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 673; Crocker v. First Nat. Bank (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 827, 828; Markson v. First Nat. Bank (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 768; National Bank v. Trimble, 40 Ohio St. 629; Monongahela Nat. Bank v. Overholt, 96 Pa. 327, 329.

The words "legal representatives," as used in Act Cong. June 3, 1864, providing for the recovery of twice the amount of usurious interest from a national bank by the legal representatives of the person paying such interest, must be construed strictly, and does not include the assignee in bankruptcy of such person. Barnett v. Muncie Nat. Bank (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 880, 881 (affirmed 98 U. S. 555, 25 L. Ed. 212); Barnits v. First Nat. Bank (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 901, 902.

"Legal representative," in a life policy, does not include a trustee in bankruptcy. Firemen's Fund Ins. Co. v. Sims, 42 S. E. 269, 270, 115 Ga. 939.

Assignee for benefit of creditors.

In Pennsylvania the term "legal representatives" means executors and administrators, in the absence of anything showing that the words are used in a different sense; and an assignee for benefit of creditors cannot maintain an action in such state in his own name against a national bank to recover the penalty for usurious interest paid such bank by the assignor, under Rev. St. U. S. § 5198 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3493], authorizing such action by the party paying the illegal interest or his "legal representatives." Osborn v. First Nat. Bank, 34 Atl. 858, 859, 175 Pa. 494 (distinguishing Monongahela Nat. Bank v. Overholt, 96 Pa. 327).

The term "legal representative" ordinarily means executors and administrators, though it may be used in a different sense, and shown by the connection in which it was used to have a different meaning. In Osborn v. First Nat. Bank, 175 Pa. 494, 34 Atl. 858, it was held that the term, in the absence of anything to show that it was used in a different sense, means executors and administrators, and the right of an assignee for the benefit of creditors to recover the penalty, authorized by Rev. St. U. S. § 5198 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3493], of twice the amount of illegal interest paid, was denied, though it has been held by some courts that an assignee in bankruptcy is a "legal representative," within the meaning of the statute authorizing such recovery. Pardoe v. Iowa State Nat. Bank, 76 N. W. 800, 802, 106 Iowa, 345.

Assignees under a deed of trust for the benefit of creditors are "personal representatives," within Rev. St. U. S. § 5198 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3493], providing that, in case a greater rate of interest has been paid to a national bank than is allowed by the laws of the state in which the bank is located, the person by whom it has been paid or his legal representative may recover twice the amount of interest thus paid. Henderson Nat. Bank v. Alves, 15 S. W. 132, 133, 91 Ky. 142.

An assignee for the benefit of creditors, under the Kentucky Statutes, who, in order to get possession of collaterals, pays to a national bank a note of his assignor, which includes usurious interest, may maintain an action to recover it back under Rev. St. 5198 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3493]; being the assignor's "legal representative" in the meaning of that section. Louisville Trust Co. v. Kentucky Nat. Bank (U. S.) 87 Fed. 143, 147.

Children.

If an inference can be drawn from a will that a testator used the words "personal or legal representatives" to designate individuals answering the description, though not in the strict legal sense of the terms, those persons will be entitled in preference to executors and administrators. 1 Rop. Leg. 128; Williams' Ex'rs (6th Am. Ed.) 1217-1225. A devise to A. & B. or their legal representatives has been construed to mean children taking by substitution. Albert v. Albert, 12 Atl. 11, 16, 68 Md. 352 (citing Abbott v. Jenkins [Pa.] 10 Serg. & R. 296; Appeal of Stook, 20 Pa. 349).

Descendants.

A clause in a life insurance policy, providing for the payment to the wife of the insured or her legal representative, means not her administrator, but some one appointed by her to receive the fund. "Legal representative" in its broadest sense means one who was lawfully representing another in any matter whatever; and where the wife was not living when the policy matured, and her children were also dead, the money due thereon was not part of her estate, but the fund passed down the line of descent to her grandchildren. In re Conrad's Estate, 56 N. W. 535, 536, 89 Iowa, 396, 48 Am. St. Rep. 396.

The term "legal representatives" has been used to designate an administrator or executor, devisees and legatees, children, brothers and sisters, and almost all degrees of relationship. The term "legal representatives" in Rev. St. 4159, providing that upon the death of a person seised of property it shall descend to his children and their legal representatives, and in section 4162, providing that, if there are no children or their legal representatives living, then such estate, real and personal, shall pass and descend one-half to the brothers and sisters of such intestate or their legal representatives, etc., means lineal descendants of those of different degrees of relationship mentioned in section 4159. Under section 4162, the legal representatives are the lineal descendants of such brothers and sisters, and not the collateral relatives, such as uncles or aunts. Thomas v. Lett, 6 Ohio Dec. 429, 431, 4 Ohio N. P. 393.

The words "legal representatives," as used in a will providing that, if a beneficiary dies before the will takes effect, his or her share shall revert to his or her legal representatives, means issue or lineal descendants, under which a child, and not the husband, takes the deceased wife's estate. In re Hess' Estate, 10 O. C. D. 823, 824.

Distributees.

The term "legal representatives," used in an insurance policy to designate the beneficiary thereof, cannot be held to mean the executor or administrator of the insured, so as to give them a beneficial interest in the policy, but must be considered to designate those who under the laws succeeded to the personal estate of the insured, which, under Milliken & V. Code, §§ 3135, 3335, are the widow and next of kin of the insured. Rose v. Wortham, 32 S. W. 458, 459, 95 Tenn. (11 Pickle) 305, 30 L. R. A. 609.

The term "legal representative," as used to designate those to whom a trust fund shall be paid upon the death of cestui que trust, is broad enough to include both the administrator and those who are entitled to the distribution of the estate. Bouv. Law Dict. The meaning of the term depends upon the manner of its use. Casey v. Lockwood, 52 Atl. 803, 804, 24 R. I. 72.

By the phrase "legal representatives," in a will providing that, if any of testator's children should be deceased at the time fixed for distribution of a certain property, their shares should go to their legal representatives, is held to mean those who would take under the statute of distribution. Farnham v. Farnham, 2 Atl. 325, 334, 53 Conn. 261.

Devisees and legatees.

"Legal representatives," as used in Rev. St. art. 2248, prohibiting parties from testifying in actions by or against the heirs or legal representatives of the decedent, does not include devisees and legatees. Newton v. Newton, 14 S. W. 157, 158, 77 Tex. 508.

"Legal representatives," as used in a devise of the remainder of an estate, to be divided at the decease of testator's sisters among his then "heirs at law or their legal representatives," means the heirs or devisees of such heirs as were mentioned in the will. Appeal of Stook, 20 Pa. 549, 553.

Guardian.

Act Feb. 28, 1874, touching the taxation of wild lands and a sale of such lands for nonpayment of taxes, was operative upon the lands of minors who were represented by guardian both at the time the taxes accrued and when the sale was made; such guardian, although not clothed with the legal title, being embraced within the term "legal representative," as contained in the twenty-first section of said act. McLain v. Bedgood, 15 S. E. 670, 89 Ga. 793.

Heirs or next of kin.

"Legal representative," as used in the Ohio act prescribing the duties of county auditors, and providing that such certificates (meaning tax certificates) shall be assignable in law and vest in the assignee, or his legal representative, the right and title of the original purchaser, means the heir, to whom the realty descends. Rice's Lessee v. White, 8 Ohio (8 Ham.) 21C.

By the words "legal representatives," in Pre-emption Act Pa. Dec. 21, 1784, is to be understood heirs or alienees. Duncan v. Walker (Pa.) 2 Dall. 205, 1 L. Ed. 350.

The expression "legal representatives" is equivocal, and may refer either to heirs, executors, or administrators, according to the subject-matter. In a statute relating to lands it is considered as referring to heirs. Duncan's Lessee v. Walker (Pa.) 1 Yeates, 213, 220.

A will provided that after the decease of the tenant for life of the whole estate the property should be equally divided between the testator's two children "or their legal representatives." Held, that the words "legal representatives" were used in the sense of heirs, and that the children took a remainder in fee, vesting upon the death of the testator. Chasy v. Gowdry, 9 Atl. 580, 581, 43 N. J. Eq. (16 Stew.) 95.

A deed provided that the estate should be held by the grantor's mother during his life. After his death it was to go to his lawful issue, if he had any, and in default of such issue to be equally divided among his surviving brothers or their legal representatives. Held, that the words "legal representatives" were evidently used as the equivalent of "heirs," and upon the death of the grantor without issue the estate should be divided among his brothers then living and the heirs of those who were then dead. Ringwalt v. Ringwalt (Pa.) 42 Leg. Int. 80, 81.

In a will providing that, on the death of a beneficiary of a trust created by the will, the property thereby placed in trust shall descend to the legal representatives of the said beneficiary, provided, however, that an adopted son of the testator shall under no circumstances whatever inherit or be entitled to any part or parcel thereof, the words with which the term "legal representatives" is associated shows its meaning. With the word "descend," it cannot with propriety be construed to mean an executor or administrator, since land goes by descent to heirs or descendants. The exclusion of the adopted son from inheritance shows that the author of the trust intended to vest the remainder in those who succeeded by inheritance or descent. The subject-matter is land, and where the term "legal representatives" is used with reference to land it ordinarily means those to whom the land descends. The whole scope and tender of the instrument indicates that the term was used as a synonym of "descendants" or "heirs." Ewing v. Jones, 15 L. R. A. 75, 79, 130 Ind. 247, 29 N. E. 1057.

Where a testator gave money and realty to trustees, to be distributed on the death of N.'s children among their heirs at law—that is to say, as the children of N. decease a proportion of the fund is to be distributed "among the children or legal representatives of each child so dying"—the words "legal representatives" did not refer to the executor or administrator of a child so dying, and must therefore have reference to those who would succeed to their property, either real or personal. Olney v. Lovering, 45 N. E. 766, 16 Mass. 446.

The words "legal representatives," in a life insurance policy, are construed as meaning heirs or next of kin, and not executors or administrators; the court saying: "It is always permissible to construe these words in that way, especially in wills and policies of life insurance, wherever it is apparent from the context or subject-matter that they were used in that sense. They will be construed in that way more readily in policies of life insurance than in almost any other kind of instrument, for the reason that such insurance is very commonly intended as a provision for the family of the insured." Schultz v. Citizens' Mut Life Ins. Co., 61 N. W. 331, 332, 59 Minn. 309.

A will gave to testator's wife during widowhood the net rents and profits of his real estate and the net income of his personality, and provided that on her death or remarriage the property should be divided among his two sons and the two daughters for life, and to their issue absolutely, and, if any of them should die without issue, to the surviving sister or brother. In consideration of the children withdrawing their opposition to the will, the widow contracted to pay during her widowhood one-eighth of the net income to each of them and to the legal representatives of those dying. Held that, by analogy with the provisions of the will and the statute of distribution of New York, the term "legal representatives," as used in the contract, meant "next of kin," and that, one of the daughters having died without issue, her share is not payable to her executor. Greenwood v. Holbrook, 18 N. E. 711, 713, 111 N. Y. 465.

A testator gave certain property to his child, and then provided, "and in case any of my children shall die after me, and after having attained the age of 21 years, then the share, portion, or interest of the child so dying shall go to the heirs, devisees, or legal representatives of the child so dying." Held, that the words "heirs, devisees, or legal representatives" were words of purchase, and not of limitation, and that those persons who answered to the description of heirs, devisees, or legal representatives of the deceased child of the testator, having a regard to the nature and character of the property, were the persons entitled to take under the will. If the property transmitted were personal estate, and the child left no will, the persons who would take under the term "legal representatives" would be those who by the statute of distribution are known as the "next of kin," rather than the executors and administrators of the deceased child. Drake v. Pell (N. Y.) 3 Edw. Ch. 251, 270.

The term "legal representatives," as used in a codicil to a will giving a portion of the residuary estate in real property to trustees, to pay the income and profits to one for life and on her death to convey the trust fund to her legal representatives, means, not the executors or administrators of the person entitled to the income and profits for life, but those who would take for their own benefit as her next of kin. Greene v. Huntington, 46 Atl. 883, 885, 73 Conn. 106.

"Legal representatives" is construed by the Supreme Court of Texas, in Allen v. Stovall, 63 S. W. 863, 866, 94 Tex. 618, to be synonymous with "heirs."

The term "legal representatives," in a will leaving property to testator's children, with a proviso that, if any of the children die before testator, the estate shall be divided among the survivors or their legal representatives, was construed to mean lawful heirs, and to authorize the legal heirs of a deceased to take the share of their deceased parent. Rivenett v. Bourquin, 18 N. W. 537, 538, 53 Mich. 10.

The words "legal representatives," in a will directing that on the termination of a trust created thereby the corpus of the estate should be divided into three equal parts, and that the parts should go to the heirs or "legal representatives" of testator's three children, was construed to be used in the same meaning as the word "heirs" was used, and that each word was intended to describe the persons who were to take the corpus of the estate at the time of the distribution. They were held to be used in their natural and proper sense, as including all those persons who at that time should be capable of inheriting from either of testator's children, or of taking the property of either of such children under the statute of distributions. Blakeman v. Sears, 51 Atl. 517, 518, 74 Conn. 516.

Heirs of a deceased partner are "legal representatives," within the meaning of St. 1823, c. 140, giving courts of equity jurisdiction in disputes between copartners and their legal representatives, where the requisite measures have been pursued to render such heirs liable to respond to the demand of the surviving partner, although heirs generally are not to be so considered. Johnson v. Ames, 28 Mass. (11 Pick.) 173, 180.

Indorser of bill.

The indorser of a bill of exchange is not the "legal representative" of the one for whose benefit the bill was discounted, and consequently is not entitled to be subrogated to his rights, arising under Act Cong. June 3, 1864, providing for the recovery of twice the amount of usurious interest from a national bank, from the payment of usurious interest on such bill. Barnett v. Muncie Nat. Bank (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 890, 881 (affirmed 98 U. S. 555, 25 L. Ed. 212).

Judgment creditor.

The term "legal representatives," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 5198 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3493], giving to the person paying usurious interest, or his legal representatives, the right of action against a national bank for collecting usurious interest, does not embrace a judgment creditor of the person paying such interest. Barrett v. Shelbyville Nat. Bank, 3 S. W. 117, 118, 85 Tenn. 426.

Named beneficiaries.

The term "legal representatives," in a clause of a life insurance policy providing that, where the deceased has no legal representatives, the money shall become the property of the association, means those who are legal representatives in the contemplation of the charter and by-laws of the association, namely, the people who are there enumerated—the widows, orphans, heir, or legatee. Masonic Mut. Relief Ass'n v. McAuley (D. C.) 2 Mackey, 70, 80.

Privy in representation.

The words "legal representative," when used with reference to the right of a legal representative to set aside a decree wholly in personam against a deceased person, means executor or administrator or devisee in a will, who has the power and authority under the law to legally represent the estate of a deceased person. It is true that heirs, trustees, and grantees of real property, assignees of contracts or patents, or receivers or assignees in bankruptcy, may in certain cases be considered as the legal representatives of the property involved. The general rule is that no person can revive a suit abated by the death of a party unless he is in privity with the deceased, but it is not sufficient that he may in a legal sense be a privy in estate. He must be a privy in representation. Lord Coke, in 1 Inst. 271, says: "There are four sorts of privies: Privies in estate, as debtor and donee, lessor and lessee; privies in blood, as heir and ancestor; privies in representation, as executors and administrators; and privies in tenure, as lord and tenant—which are all reducible to two heads, privies in law and privies in deed. Now the right to revive is not applicable to all these different sorts of privies, but by the authorities is expressly confined to persons who are in privity by representation, such as heirs in relation to the real estate, and executors and administrators in relation to the personality." Ralston v. Sharon (U. S.) 51 Fed. 702, 714.

Purchaser at execution sale.

The term "legal representatives," within the meaning of Act March 29, 1813, providing for the relief of sundry landholders in the county of York and their legal representatives, does not mean the representatives of the personal estate of the landholder, but his representatives on the land itself. Therefore, where the land was sold under a judgment against the landholder, the sheriff's vendee, and not the administrator of the deceased landholder, was entitled to the money directed to be paid by the act to the landholder or his legal representatives. Commonwealth v. Bryan (Pa.) 6 Serg. & R. 81, 83.

The purchaser at a sale of mortgaged property under decree of the court is the legal representative of the proprietor, who is chargeable with a tax on the property, and may redeem on payment of taxes under City Charter 1820, § 10, providing that if within such time the proprietor of any property which shall have been sold for taxes, or his legal representative, shall repay to such purchaser the moneys paid for the taxes, etc., he shall be reinstated in his original right and title as if no such sale had been made. Oneale v. Caldwell (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 695, 696.

Receiver.

A receiver of an insolvent corporation is a "legal representative," within the meaning of Rev. St. U. S. § 5198, providing for the recovery by "the person by whom it has been paid, or his legal representatives," in twice the amount, of illegal interest paid a national bank. Barbour v. National Exch. Bank, 12 N. E. 5, 45 Ohio St. 133.

Spouse.

The term "legal representatives," in an insurance policy payable to legal representatives or assigns, may be construed to mean testator's wife in her personal capacity, when the policy is bequeathed to his wife. The language of the policy is not required to be technically construed, as passing the proceeds of the policy to the wife as executrix. In Griswold v. Sawyer, 26 N. E. 464, 125 N. Y. 411, the court held that while the strict technical meaning of the words "legal representatives" is administrators or executors, and they must be so construed in the absence of anything showing a different intent, as they are not always used in this sense, it is the province of construction in any case to ascertain the sense in which they were used, and that for that purpose the subject-matter and surrounding circumstances, as well as the language used, may be considered. Leonard v. Harney, 71 N. Y. Supp. 546, 549, 63 App. Div. 294.

Where an insured directed that the amount of his policy should be paid to his legal representatives, the words "legal representatives" should be construed to include the widow, and should not be held to have been used in their technical legal sense, since the insured, not being a lawyer, could not be supposed to have used the words in their strict technical legal sense, but it would be more reasonably supposed that he used them in a general sense, in which they are frequently used and generally understood by laymen. Griswold v. Sawyer, 26 N. E. 464, 465, 125 N. Y. 411 (cited and approved Lyons v. Yerex, 58 N. W. 1112, 1113, 100 Mich. 214, 43 Am. St. Rep. 452).

"Legal representatives," within the meaning of Gen. St. c. 207, § 12, providing that actions pending at the death of either party, in which the right of action does not survive, may be prosecuted, at the election of the surviving party or of the legal representatives of the deceased party, as actions may be prosecuted the cause of which survives, a husband who had joined with his wife in bringing a suit for personal injury to her on her death is not her legal representative, by reason of the marital relation, so as to authorize him to prosecute the action. Saltmarsh v. Town of Candia, 51 N. H. 71, 76.

Primarily the words "legal representatives" signify the executors or administrators of a deceased person. They, however, have been construed to refer to blood relations as heirs or next of kin, and are held to mean that class of persons where the circumstances indicate such intention, and where a father took out a life policy payable to his daughter four years old or her legal representatives, and she married and died before her father, her husband is not entitled to the proceeds of the policy. Geoffroy v. Gilbert, 36 N. Y. Supp. 884, 885, 15 Misc. Rep. 60.

The term "legal representatives," in a devise of real estate in trust for testator's niece during life, with power of appointment by will of the principal, or in default of a will to her legal representatives, did not include the husband of the devisee. In re Lesieur's Estate, 54 Atl. 579, 580, 205 Pa. 119.

Successors in title.

Under a statute (Gen. St. 1873, p. 582, § 329) providing that no person having a direct legal interest in the result of any civil case or proceeding shall be a competent witness therein when the adverse party is an executor, administrator, or legal representative of a deceased person, it is held that the word "representative" applies to any person or party who has succeeded to the rights of the deceased, whether by purchase, descent, or by operation of law. In discussing this question the court says: "It is said that in legal parlance the executor or administrator is most commonly called the 'legal representative.' In regard to things real the heir is also the legal representative, as is the devisee; and the assignee or grantee is also a legal representative of the assignor or grantor in regard to things assigned or granted." Wamsley v. Crook, 3 Neb. 344, 350.

"Legal representative," as used in a trust deed authorizing the trustee or his legal representative to execute the trust by sale, etc., means that the assignee or grantee of the trustee, having the legal title that was in the trustee, shall execute the power, and not a mere stranger having no legal title, such as the administrator of the trustee. The "legal representative," or "personal representative," in the commonly accepted sense, means the administrator or executor; but this is not the only definition or use of the word, as in this case it means assignee or grantee. Warnecke v. Lembca, 71 Ill. 91, 93, 12 Am. Rep. 85.

The phrase "legal representative," as used in a clause of a deed of bargain and sale, providing that, if the grantor should survive the grantee, he should have the right at any time within 18 months after the death of the grantee to purchase back again all right, title, and interest in the farm at a valuation to be then made by two disinterested persons, one of whom should be selected by the legal representatives of the grantee, means those who succeed the grantee in the title of the land, rather than a personal representative of deceased grantee, within whose functions dealings in real estate do not fall. And where the land was devised in trust by the grantee, the ones to select the two disinterested persons to fix the value of the farm were the trustee and cestui que trust. Woodruff v. Woodruff, 16 Atl. 4, 5, 44 N. J. Eq. (17 Stew.) 349, 1 L. R. A. 380.

The term "legal representative," as used in the law of Congress entitled "An act authorizing the laying off of a town on Bean river, in the state of Illinois, and for other purposes," is designed to describe a party in interest who has succeeded to the right of the deceased party, who had received the permit or made the requisite improvement, and by virtue of which the land is authorized to be entered. The administrator of such deceased party is not entitled to take the benefit of the law by virtue of his appointment. Whoever succeeded to the right of the settler by operation of law or by grant is his legal representative. Morehouse v. Phelps, 18 Ill. (8 Peck) 472.

"Legal representatives," as used in a covenant to warrant and defend the title of another in a town lot against the claims of all persons, except those of A. and his legal representatives, includes the person succeeding to the claims A. then had, whether as heir, devisee, grantee, or assignee, and not to executors or administrators, who could take no interest in the land, or to any claim which A. might subsequently acquire. Though the term "legal representatives," in its strict and literal acceptance, means executors and administrators, it is frequently used in a different sense, and the question of intention is to be considered in its construction. Bowman v. Long, 89 Ill. 19, 21.

A legal representative, in the most extensive acceptance of those words, is one who legally and lawfully represents another in any matter or thing, of whatever nature or character it may be. In a recorder's certificate, issued to a person or his legal representatives, it is held that the phrase "legal representatives" includes all those claiming by purchase or descent under the person to whom the certificate was originally granted. Wear v. Bryant, 5 Mo. 147, 164.

The phrase "legal representative" is often used in statutes in a broad sense, so as to include all persons, natural or artificial, who by operation of law stand in the place of and represent the interests of another. It is in this broad sense that the phrase is used in the Minnesota standard form of insurance policies. A receiver appointed by the court for an insolvent corporation is its "legal representative," within the meaning of this phrase. Alford v. Consolidated Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 93 N. W. 517, 518, 88 Minn. 478.

An insurance policy provided that it should be void in case of any fraud or false swearing by the insured, either before or after the loss, touching any matter relating to the insurance, and that the word "insured," as used in the policy, should be held to include the legal representative of the insured. Held, that the term "legal representative" referred to one who succeeds to the legal rights of the insured by reason of his death or the transfer of the property, and not a mere agent of the insured. Metzger v. Manchester Fire Assur. Co. (Mich.) 63 N. W. 650, 651.

Parties who have acquired the entire interest of deceased in the subject-matter of the action are his "legal representatives," within the meaning of that phrase as used in the provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 7473, relating to default judgments. Plummer v. Brown, 1 Pac. 703, 64 Cal. 429.

Surviving partner.

The term "legal representative" is one having a well-defined legal meaning, its primary meaning being executors or administrators; and when used in a contract it must be presumed to have been so used, and not to apply to a surviving partner. This primary meaning would, of course, yield to a context which clearly showed that a different meaning was intended. Sullivan v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 30 South. 528, 534, 128 Ala. 77.

A surviving partner succeeds by operation of law to all the rights and liabilities of the firm, and is entitled to represent the firm. If by law he represents the firm, he is its legal representative. The term "legal representative" has been held to apply to all persons who, with respect to another's property, stand in his place and represent his interest, whether transferred to them by his act or by operation of the law. Lasater v. First Nat. Bank (Tex.) 72 S. W. 1054, 1055 (citing Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 6 Sup. Ct. 877, 29 L. Ed. 997).

LEGAL RESIDENCE.

The words "legal settlement" are synonymous with "legal residence." Town of Louriston v. Swift County Com'rs, 93 N. W. 1052, 1053, 89 Minn. 91.

"Legal residence" is synonymous with "domicile," and is defined to be a residence at a particular place, accompanied with positive or presumptive proof of an intention to remain there for an unlimited time. It means more than "residence"; there being a distinction between actual and legal residence. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Ives, 3 N. Y. Supp. 895.

The phrase "legal residence," as to poor persons, in a statute with reference to caring for the poor, implies both the act and intent on the part of the pauper, in order to create a liability on the part of the county, town, or municipal corporation whose duty it is to care for the poor. Town of Albion v. Village of Maple Lake, 74 N. W. 282, 283, 71 Minn. 503.

Legal residence is the place of a man's fixed habitation, where his political rights are to be exercised, and where he is liable to taxation. "Legal residence," "inhabitaney," and "domicile" mean the same thing. Crawford v. Wilson (N. Y.) 4 Barb. 504, 522.

While the legal residence of a person rests largely in his intent, it is equally true that what constitutes a legal residence is, generally speaking, dependent upon the facts of each particular case, and consequently it often happens that facts which constitute a legal residence in one locality for one purpose do not necessarily establish such a residence for another purpose. To illustrate, a person may be a legal voter in the borough of Brooklyn, and yet be a taxable resident of the borough of Manhattan, where he spends most of his time and transacts his principal business. But, wherever that residence may be, it is well settled that for the purposes of taxation for personal property it will be deemed to continue until a change is affirmatively and satisfactorily shown to have taken place. Paddock v. Lewis, 69 N. Y. Supp. 1, 3, 59 App. Div. 430.

A distinction is recognized between legal and actual residence. A person may be a legal resident of one place and an actual resident of another, as when he goes from the place of his legal residence, to reside temporarily at the other place, intending to return. Hinds v. Hinds, 1 Iowa (1 Clarke) 39; Love v. Cherry, 24 Iowa, 205; Bradley v. Frazer, 54 Iowa, 289, 6 N. W. 293. Legal residence, as distinguished from mere temporary actual residence, is the residence contemplated by the Code relating to the bringing of actions aided by attachment. Ludlow v. Szold, 57 N. W. 676, 678, 90 Iowa, 175.

As contradistinguished from a person's "legal residence," he may have an "actual residence" in another state or country. He may abide in one country without surrendering his legal residence in another, if he so intends. His legal residence may be merely ideal, but his actual residence must be substantial. He may not actually abide at his legal residence at all, but his actual residence must be his abiding place. Though one may have a legal residence in one state, yet if his actual residence is in another state, the latter fact is sufficient to authorize an attachment against his property in the first state upon the ground of nonresidency. And in an action for divorce the mere fact of a plaintiff's legal residence being within the state, his actual residence being out of the state, would not be sufficient to defeat a motion to compel him to execute a nonresident's bond for costs. Furthermore, a mere legal residence in the state, with an actual residence out of the state, does not satisfy Civ. Code, § 423, requiring that a plaintiff for a divorce must have "a residence in the state" for one year before the commencement of the action. Tipton v. Tipton, 8 S. W. 440, 441, 87 Ky. 243.

LEGAL RIGHT.

In the statute defining forgery as the false making or material altering, with intent to defraud, of any writing which, if genuine, might apparently be of legal efficacy, or the foundation of a legal right or liability, the words "legal right" evidently mean a right that may be enforced in a civil action. Colson v. Commonwealth, 61 S. W. 46, 47, 110 Ky. 233.

LEGAL SCHOOL AGE.

"Legal school age," as used in St. 1881, c. 172, providing for the incorporation of a new town out of a portion of the territory of an old one, and declaring in section 6 that the annual excess, if any, of maintaining the public schools, shall be ascertained by the commissioners appointed for that purpose on the basis of the average number of scholars in the public schools of legal school age for a certain year, means the age of 21 years; for it is provided by statute that all children within the commonwealth may attend the public schools in the place in which they have their legal residence. Hence all residents of the commonwealth under the age of 21 years, as soon as they have sufficient capacity, are entitled to attend the public schools, and are scholars of legal school age, and it is not confined to scholars between the ages of 8 and 14 years. Inhabitants of Needham v. Inhabitants of Wellesley, 31 N. E. 732, 139 Mass. 372.

LEGAL SERVICE.

A return by a constable that he had "served the summons on the defendant by offering to read the same to him, but he would not stay to hear it," shows a legal service. Slaght v. Robbins, 13 N. J. Law (1 J. S. Green) 340, 341.

A "legal service of summons" is one which is made in case the defendant resides out of a state by affixing a copy on the building on which the mechanic's lien is claimed, and sending a copy by mail direct to him at the post office nearest his residence, or, in case his residence is not known to the plaintiff, then by affixing a copy to such building and publishing it for four weeks in a newspaper circulating in the county. Revision N. J. p. 668; Heidritter v. Elizabeth Oilcloth Co., 5 Sup. Ct. 135, 136, 112 U. S. 294, 28 L. Ed. 729.

When a party refuses to accept a copy of summons, which is offered him in a civil manner, after being informed what the paper is, there is no other way to make service but to deposit the process in some appropriate place in the presence of the party, if visible, or where it would be most likely to come to his possession. If then the party to be served does not get the copy of the summons, it will be entirely owing to his own fault. "If a defendant declines to receive from the officer a paper presented by him for service, he may deposit it in the presence of the party." Mr. Justice Field, in Norton v. Meader (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 420, 426. And if a party refuse to accept papers after being distinctly informed what they are, he should be held to the consequences of his own perverseness; and then if they should be laid down for him and before him, such offer, information, refusal to accept, and leaving of the papers for him and in his presence should be deemed legal service. Borden v. Borden, 23 N. W. 573, 574, 63 Wis. 374; Davidson v. Baker (N. Y.) 24 How. Prac. 39, 41, 42.

"Legal service" is defined by the New Jersey mechanic's lien law as service by sending a copy by mail directed to a nonresident defendant at the post office nearest his residence, or, in case his residence is not known, then by the publishing of the summons in some newspaper of the state. Smith v. Colloty, 55 Atl. 805, 807, 69 N. J. Law, 365.

LEGAL SETTLEMENT.

"Legal settlement thereon," as used in Sp. Laws 1849, c. 264, § 1, which provides that the territory described therein, "together with all persons having a legal settlement thereon," are hereby incorporated into a separate town by the name of Yarmouth," etc., embraces all those persons who had previously acquired a legal settlement on the territory composing the town, who by the application of other laws would have had a right to support from the town thus incorporated in case of falling into distress and becoming necessitous, providing the town had previously had an independent existence. Inhabitants of Yarmouth v. Inhabitants of North Yarmouth, 44 Me. 352, 360.

The words "legal settlement" are synonymous with "legal residence." Town of Louriston v. Swift County Com'rs, 93 N. W. 1052, 1053, 89 Minn. 91.

"Legal settlement," as used in St. 1839, which annexes a part of the town of Dearborn, with the "inhabitants having a legal settlement" on the territory set off, to the town of Belgrade, includes such inhabitants as were entitled to support and relief from Dearborn in case of their falling into distress, whether residing on the territory at the time of the annexation or removed therefrom without having acquired a settlement in another town. Inhabitants of Belgrade v. Inhabitants of Dearborn, 21 Me. 334, 337.

A person shall not be deemed to have a legal settlement in any county or town until he has resided therein one year, and shall not be deemed to have such settlement in either if he has migrated into this state within three years, unless at the time of so migrating he was able to maintain himself. Code Va. 1887, § 876.

Rev. Pol. Code 1903, §§ 2810, 2812, charge the care of an insane person to a county where he has acquired a "legal settlement," without defining what shall constitute such settlement. Held, that it must be deemed to have been used with the same meaning as in section 2764, relating to "poor and indigent persons," and providing that they acquire a legal settlement, charging a county with their support, by a residence therein for 90 days, which they lose by acquiring a new one, or by willful absence from the county for 90 days; it not appearing that a legal settlement was otherwise defined by any statute. Moody County v. Minnehaha County (S. D.) 96 N. W. 698.

LEGAL STRIKE.

A dispatch that "there is a legal strike in force upon the T. Railroad," etc., sent by an official of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, should be construed to mean one consented to by the grand chief, since his consent is necessary under the rules of the order. The term "legal strike" means a strike declared in pursuance to the rules of the order. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. Ry. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. (U. S.) 54 Fed. 730, 733, 10 L. R. A. 387.

LEGAL SUBDIVISION.

Act Cong. Sept. 28, 1850, granting certain swamp and overflowed lands to a state, and providing that in making out a list and plat of the lands all legal subdivisions shall be included in the said list and plat, refers to the smallest subdivision under the congressional system of surveying. Robinson v. Forrest, 29 Cal. 317, 324.

LEGAL SUBROGATION.

Legal subrogation is a right to be subrogated to the position of a creditor, when the right arises from the mere fact of payment by one who is compelled to pay the debt to protect his own rights, or by one who stands in the attitude of a surety for the debtor. Gore v. Brian (N. J.) 35 Atl. 897, 898; Home Sav. Bank v. Bierstadt, 48 N. E. 161, 162, 168 Ill. 618, 61 Am. St. Rep. 146.

The right to subrogation, which springs out of the mere fact of the payment of a debt, is termed "legal subrogation," and exists only in favor of the surety for the payment of a debt, or one who is compelled to pay the debt, to protect his own rights. It differs from "conventional subrogation," which arises when a third person, under an obligation or necessity to pay the debt of another, pays it under an agreement with either the debtor or the creditor that the person paying shall be subrogated to the liens by which the debt is secured. Seeley v. Bacon (N. J.) 34 Atl. 139, 140.

A legal subrogation arises when by operation of law a third person becomes equitably entitled to stand in the place of the creditor. This mode of subrogation as effectually divests the creditor of his title to the debt or security, and vests it in the third person, as does conventional subrogation. Connecticut Mutual Ins. Co. v. Cornwall, 25 N. Y. Supp. 348, 350.

The right of subrogation which springs from the mere fact of the payment of a debt is what is termed "legal subrogation"; but in addition to this principle of legal subrogation there exists another principle, which is termed "conventional subrogation," which results from an equitable right springing from an express agreement with the debtor by which one advances money to pay a claim for the security of which there exists a lien, by which agreement he is to have an equal lien to that paid off. Gordon v. Stewart (Neb.) 96 N. W. 624, 628.

LEGAL SUCCESSION.

"Legal succession" is that which the law has established in favor of the nearest relation of the deceased. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 877.

LEGAL SURPRISE.

See "Surprise."

LEGAL TENDER.

The terms "lawful sum in money" and "legal tender" are not synonymous, but have different meanings. A tender, to be good in law, must be made in legal tender notes or coin of the United States. National bank notes and gold and silver certificates are lawful money, and so recognized in the commercial exchanges of the United States; but they are not legal tender. Martin v. Bott, 46 N. E. 151, 153, 17 Ind. App. 444.

LEGAL TENDER NOTE.

A legal tender note is a contract on the part of the government to pay its nominal value in coin. O'Neill v. McKewn, 1 S. C. (1 Rich.) 147, 148.

"Legal tender notes," as used in an indictment charging larceny of United States legal tender notes, means genuine and current treasury notes. State v. Beebe, 17 Minn. 241, 249 (Gil. 218, 226).

LEGAL TITLE.

Under a statute providing that the widow of any decedent should be entitled to dower in the land of which her husband had during coverture the legal title, etc., the words "legal title" mean a title by which the husband had such a seisin of the land as, previous to the statute, would have entitled his widow to dower. Nottingham v. Calvert, 1 Ind. (1 Cart.) 527, 528.

LEGAL TRANSFER.

"Legal transfer," as used in Act June 20, 1820, providing that the male or female children of slaves shall obtain a legal settlement in the city, borough, township, or precinct in which such servant shall first serve with his or her master or mistress for the space of seven years, and if, afterwards, such servant shall duly serve in any other place for such space of seven years, such servant shall obtain a legal settlement in the city where such service was last performed, either with his or her first master or mistress, or with any other master or mistress by virtue of a legal transfer of such servant, does not imply more than an agreement for sale on a consideration. Cadwallader v. Durham, 46 N. J. Law (17 Vroom) 53, 56.

LEGAL VOTER.

All legal voters, see "All."

A legal voter is one duly qualified. In re White's Contested Election, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 363, 376.

Laws 1886, c. 411, authorizes the legal voters of a certain school district to levy a tax for schoolhouse purposes, and declares that a majority of the legal voters of said district may determine the amount of money so to be levied and collected, etc. Held, that the term "legal voters," as so used, was not synonymous with "qualified electors" of the district, but meant a qualified elector who does in fact vote, and therefore the statute only required a majority of those present at the meeting who were legal voters and in fact voted on the question. Sanford v. Prentice, 28 Wis. 358, 362.

LEGAL VOTES.

"Legal votes," as used in Code 1892, §§ 1619, 1620, relating to special elections to determine whether or not liquor shall be sold in a county, in the absence of any specific provision as to qualifications of electors thereat, means those votes which would be legal at an election contemplated by the Constitution and laws. Bew v. State, 13 South. 863, 869, 71 Miss. 1.

LEGAL WARRANT.

"Legal warrant," as used in Cr. Code. § 283, providing that persons may be arrested for certain offenses and detained until a legal warrant can be obtained, has a similar meaning to "process" in section 285, giving power to police and probate judges to issue process. White v. State, 44 N. W. 443, 445, 28 Neb. 341.

LEGALITY.

The prohibition of 2 Rev. St. p. 563, § 42, forbidding an inquiry by court or officer in the administration of the writ of habeas corpus, into the legality of any previous judgment of any competent tribunal by virtue of which a prisoner is confined, merely prohibits the review of the decision of a court of competent jurisdiction, and does not mean that the prisoner cannot be discharged if the record shows that the court could not have had jurisdiction under any circumstances or upon any state of facts to have pronounced such judgment. People v. Liscomb, 60 N. Y. 559, 568, 569, 19 Am. Rep. 211; People v. Stout, 30 N. Y. Supp. 898, 902, 81 Hun. 336.

"Legality of which is brought in question," as used in Act N. J. March 13, 1866, providing that where the property of an insolvent corporation in the hands of a receiver is incumbered with mortgages or other liens, the legality of which is brought in question, the court of chancery may order the receiver to sell the same clear of all incumbrances, includes all litigation between incumbrancers respecting the validity, extent, or priority of their liens. Randolph v. Larned, 27 N. J. Eq. (12 C. E. Green) 557, 560.

LEGALITY AND JUSTICE.

The words "legality and justice," in Rev. St. p. 563, § 42, forbidding inquiry upon return to a writ of habeas corpus into the legality and justice of any process, judgment, decree, or execution, were not intended to include questions of jurisdiction or power. People v. Liscomb, 60 N. Y. 559, 604, 19 Am. Rep. 211.

LEGALIZE.

"Legalize," as used in St. 1863, c. 33, entitled "An act to legalize the doings of cities and towns in aid of the war," and providing that acts and doings of cities and towns in paying and agreeing to pay bounties to soldiers are hereby ratified, confirmed, and made valid, has reference to past acts in paying or agreeing to pay bounties, and does not authorize such acts in the future. Barker v. Inhabitants of Chesterfield, 102 Mass. 127, 128.

LEGALIZED NUISANCES.

The power of a municipality to erect and maintain hospitals and pesthouses may be exerted exactly as it could have been availed of by the state. Acts done under such authority, which without it would in themselves be public nuisances, furnish no ground for civil or criminal proceedings. They are what have been sometimes described as "legalized nuisances," since they are strictly necessary and probable results of legislative authorization. They rest for their sanction ultimately upon the paramount power of the Legislature, and the importance of the public benefit and convenience involved in their continuance, as affecting the greatest good to the greatest number. City of Baltimore v. Fairfield Imp. Co., 39 Atl. 1081, 1083, 87 Md. 352.

LEGALLY.

"Legally," as used in the rule that every negro, equally with every white person accused of crime, is entitled to at least one legally conducted trial, does not mean "punctiliously accurate in point of law, but free from all material error." Fletcher v. State, 17 S. E. 100, 101, 90 Ga. 468.

"Legally" is not synonymous with the word "duly," and the one is not the equivalent for the other. Where a statute required one to be "legally" summoned, an allegation that he had been "duly" summoned did not show a compliance. State v. Clancy, 56 Vt. 698, 700.

"Legally," as used in a lease wherein it was provided that, in case the grant or sale of the leased premises to the landlord should be rescinded by the state during the term, the lessees should pay for that portion of the term only up to the time they are to be legally dispossessed, carried the idea that the parties stipulated for an event which should be accompanied with legal proceedings, or such proceedings as are resorted to to obtain legal possession of demised premises. Mattison v. Munroe (N. Y.) 21 Hun, 74, 82.

LEGALLY AUTHENTICATED.

The words "properly and legally authenticated," in a statute requiring certain instruments to be so authenticated in order to render them admissible in evidence, are properly to be construed as if the expression were "so properly and legally authenticated as to entitle them to be admitted in evidence"; that is, "so properly and legally authenticated that they would be entitled to be admitted in evidence." This authentication in regard to original papers may be made by oral proof as to the verity and identity of the original and that they would be given their alleged effect in the courts of the country where they were used. In re Fowler (U. S.) 4 Fed. 303, 310.

LEGALLY AUTHORIZED.

"Legally authorized," as used in the statute of frauds, requiring a writing signed by one to be charged, or some one legally authorized by him, as a requisite to the valid execution of a contract for the sale of lands, means authority conferred by parol or otherwise, and it is not necessary that the authority should be under seal. Hampton v. Martin, 29 Tenn. 495, 498.

"Legally authorized and assigned," as used in the certificate to an acknowledgment which recited that the persons signing the above acknowledgment were at the time of affixing their signatures thereto two of the justices of the peace for the county aforesaid legally authorized and assigned, is to be construed as equivalent in meaning to the phrase "duly confirmed and sworn." Hall v. Gittings' Lessee (Md.) 2 Har. & J. 380, 390.

LEGALLY CONFINED IN JAIL.

A person is "legally confined in jail," or "legally detained in custody," when he has been committed or arrested upon a legal warrant, or arrested in any of the modes pointed out in the Code of Criminal Procedure. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 241.

LEGALLY CONSTITUTED MARKET.

A de facto market, not shown to be a legally established market, was not a "legally constituted market," within Hawkers' Act, 50 Geo. III, c. 41. Benjamins v. Anderson, 5 C. B. 299, 305.

A sale by public auction at a horse repository outside of the city of London was held, in Lee v. Bayes, 18 C. B. 599, 603, not a sale in a regularly constituted market.

LEGALLY DUE.

An offer to pay a debt legally due applies to a debt the remedy for which is barred by limitations. Having made an offer to do equity, the court will not permit the promisor to set up limitations as an excuse for his refusal to perform equity. Barke v. Early, 33 N. W. 677, 680, 72 Iowa, 273.

LEGALLY ESTABLISHED.

"Legally established," as used in a complaint in a suit to restrain the destruction of a highway, alleging that the highway was duly and legally established, meant a lawfully established highway, whether by dedication and public acceptance, or by establishment and under statutes and ordinances. The phrase was not limited to highways established pursuant to statutes and ordinances. City of Hartford v. New York & N. E. R. Co. (Conn.) 22 Atl. 26, 27.

LEGALLY IRRESPONSIBLE.

By the phrase "legally irresponsible" is meant that the person referred to is not financially solvent. Greer Machinery Co. v. Stains (Tenn.) 59 S. W. 692, 699.

LEGALLY LAID OUT.

"Legally laid out roads," as used in Rev. St. § 1227, providing penalties for neglecting to erect guideboards at the intersection of certain main traveled and legally laid out roads, mean only such roads as have been laid out according to the statute providing for the laying out of highways, and do not embrace highways which have become such by mere use or dedication. The term "laid out" is qualified by a word which by common usage signifies affirmative action according or in conformity to law, and the whole phrase "legally laid out" clearly implies a legal procedure, and when the word "legally" is used in connection with highways it is commonly understood to mean a highway laid out according to the specific requirements of law, in contradistinction from highways which have become such by prescription or dedication. The phrase "laid out" is the participle of the active verb "to lay," meaning to establish, and implies a nominative, or action. It implies that some one is active in laying out the highway, and "legally laid out" signifies that this is done by those authorized by law and in the manner fixed or required by law. State v. Siegel, 11 N. W. 435, 436, 54 Wis. 86.

LEGALLY MADE.

"Legally made," as used in Rev. St. c. 24, § 111, authorizing city councils, prior to the levy of taxes, to ascertain the total amount of appropriations for corporate purposes legally made and to be collected from the tax levy of that fiscal year, should be construed to mean legally made at the time the council is required to ascertain the total amount thereof. People v. Peoria, D. & E. R. Co., 6 N. E. 459, 461, 116 Ill. 410.

LEGALLY REQUIRED.

"Legally required," as used in a bond reciting that the sheriff by virtue of an execution had levied on certain articles, which the defendant, being desirous of shipping, in lieu thereof should deliver to the sheriff similar articles, when legally required under the execution, does not mean by regular process of law—that is to say, by the regular succeeding process of the law—but a legal demand made upon the principal and surety in the bond for the return of the goods by any regular legal process. Stocker v. Dech, 31 Atl. 555, 556, 167 Pa. 212.

LEGALLY SATISFIED.

Unless the court hears the parties on the issue as to prejudice or not, it cannot know whether the denial which involves a denial of jurisdiction is true or false. If it does not know whether the denial is true or false, it cannot know whether it has jurisdiction, and this is not the condition of being "legally satisfied," which the Supreme Court declares the law requires before it permits the court to take jurisdiction of an action removed for prejudice. Montgomery County v. Cochran (U. S.) 116 Fed. 985, 990.

LEGATEE.

See "Principal Legatee"; "Residuary Legatee"; "Sole Legatee."

The person to whom a legacy is given is styled the "legatee." Probate Court v. Matthews, 6 Vt. 269, 274; In re Pentz's Estate, 49 Atl. 361, 364, 200 Pa. 2.

A legatee is a person to whom chattels are bequeathed by will. Rogers v. Farrar, 22 Ky. (6 T. B. Mon.) 421, 424; Nye v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W., 36 N. E. 429, 436, 9 Ind. App. 131.

A legatee is a person who takes personality under a will. In re Ferguson, 84 N. Y. Supp. 1102, 1103, 41 Misc. Rep. 465.

The words "legatee" or "devisee" indicate a person or persons to be designated in the will either by name or by some other individualizing description. Grant v. Mosely (Tenn.) 52 S. W. 508, 510.

The term "legatees," in a will providing that on the happening of a certain event the share of a beneficiary shall be divided among certain legatees, is not a word of art, nor does it require any technical construction; but it is a designation of persons, not by name, but by the characters in which the testator has placed them by his will. Irwin v. Dunwoody (Pa.) 17 Serg. & R. 61, 63.

The use of the terms "devise" and "devisee," "legacy" and "legatee," with technical exactness throughout an entire chapter of the statute relative to wills and distribution, is held to show an intention of the Legislature to employ those terms in their strictly technical sense as defined at common law. In construing this chapter, the court says that where clear, direct, and explicit terms are used by the Legislature, which have had a definite meaning since the beginning of common-law terminology, there can be no room for discussion as to their meaning. In re Ross' Estate, 73 Pac. 976, 979, 140 Cal. 282.

The words "legatee" or "devisee," in Shannon's Code, § 3928, providing that "whenever a devisee or legatee dies before the testator, * * * leaving issue who survives the testator, said issue shall take the estate devised or bequeathed, as the devisee or legatee would have done had he survived the testator, unless a different disposition thereof is made or required by the will," indicate "a person or persons to be designated in the will, either by name or by some other individualizing description. * * * When a will designates a devisee or legatee by name, or by what is equivalent thereto, it of course indicates clearly that the testator, when he executed the will, understood that that person should have the benefit of the legacy or devise mentioned therein. From this the transition in thought to those who in blood represent the legatee or devisee is easy." Grant v. Mosely (Tenn.) 52 S. W. 508, 510.

As absolute owner.

A "legatee," within the meaning of the inheritance tax law, is he to whom a legacy is payable once and for all, payment of which discharged all obligations as to that sum of money, and he may the next moment squander it, destroy it, do with it as he will, without fear of legal criticism. Direct legatees have the legal title and own the legacy, to do with as they will. The money is theirs as against all mankind. Not so with trustees. They take, it is true, the bare legal title, but for the sole benefit of others; nor can they hold such title beyond a specified time. Their legal designation is not "legatees," but rather "custodians." Thus an inheritance tax on a money legacy cannot be deducted from the principal of the legacy given in trust for one person for life, with remainder to another, as neither of these persons succeeds to, or has more than a legal right in, the fund, and from such right no such deduction can be made. In re Hoyt, 76 N. Y. Supp. 504, 507, 37 Misc. Rep. 720.

Beneficiary of testamentary trust.

Testator, after giving six legacies, bequeathed $8,000 to his executor, to be held in trust for the use and benefit of his sister during her life, and to be divided between her two daughters at her death, and then directed that the residue of his estate should be divided among the legatees mentioned in the will, share and share alike. Held, that the cestuis que trust of the trust in the hands of the executor were to be regarded as legatees, within the meaning of the residuary clause, and entitled to share equally with the other legatees. In re Logan, 30 N. E. 485, 486, 131 N. Y. 456.

Devisee.

"Legatee" is defined to be a person to whom personalty is bequeathed, but it sometimes is used so as to embrace a donee of realty by devise. Tucker v. Tucker, 40 N. C. 82, 84.

The term "legatee" is somewhat indiscriminately used to describe one who takes personalty or realty under the provisions of a will. Corley v. McElmeel, 43 N. E. 628, 630, 149 N. Y. 228.

"Legatees," as used in a will bequeathing testator's residuary estate to the legatees mentioned in the will, need not be construed in its technical legal sense of one who takes personalty under a will, but may be regarded as referring to devisees. Weeks v. Cornwell, 10 N. E. 431, 435, 436, 104 N. Y. 325.

"Legatees," as used in a will which, after making certain devises and bequests, provided that the estate should be finally closed in accordance with the terms of the will, and certain persons should have an equal portion with the other legatees, should be construed in the popular sense as meaning various devisees, and not as used in the technical legal sense. Lallerstedt v. Jennings, 23 Ga. 571, 574.

"Legatees," as used in a will bequeathing the residue of all the testator's estate to the above-named pecuniary and specific legatees, cannot be construed to include devisees. Havens v. Havens (N. Y.) 1 Sandf. Ch. 324, 335.

The word "legatees" means, in legal acceptance, donees of personal or movable estate, or it may mean donees of real estate, whenever a testator plainly uses the word in that sense. Micheau v. Crawford, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 90, 111.

A testator, after providing for the payment of his debts and funeral expenses, "gave, devised, and bequeathed" all the remainder of his estate, real and personal, in the following manner: First, he "gives" to his wife his homestead and also a sum of money. Second, he gives to his brother J. C. M., in trust for himself, his brothers and sisters, and their heirs, one-third part of his "estate" after the debts are paid, which "amount" he desired his executor to "pay" to the said J. C. M. for the purposes stated. He then "gave and bequeathed" certain sums of money to four different persons, and then directed that any sum left and remaining should be divided among his legatees in the same ratio that he had already given them. Held, that the word "legatees," as used in the will, should be construed to have been used in its broader and more popular sense, as including all the devisees and legatees named in the will, the testator being an unprofessional person, and hence that persons technically devisees, and not legatees, were entitled to a share in the surplus. Appeal of Chandler, 34 Wis. 505, 512.

In the construction of statutes, the words "legatee" and "devisee" shall be held to convey the same idea. Ky. St. 1903, § 467.

As legal representative.

See "Legal Representative."

As pecuniary legatees.

The will of a lawyer, drawn by another lawyer, gave N., testator's brother-in-law, a pair of rifles, and to other persons certain articles of personal property and sums of money varying from $100 to $100,000, and provided "that all the foregoing legacies be paid and delivered to the persons named as speedily as practicable, and without deduction of any kind; it being my wish that all taxes, dues, and charges of every kind shall be paid by my executors, and that no charge be made against any of my said legatees by reason of any money passing from me to them at any time prior to my death. Held, that a debt of N., evidenced by a promissory note payable in five years, for $5,000 loaned him by testator six years before the will was drawn, was forgiven and canceled by such will, the word "legatees" therein not having the significance of pecuniary legatees. Neville v. Dulaney's Ex'rs, 17 S. E. 475, 476, 89 Va. 842.

As remaindermen.

A testator gave all his real and personal estate to his wife during her life or widowhood, with remainder to his four children, and named his wife and a son as executors. By a codicil to the will the testator gave power to his wife to sell and dispose of his real estate, or any part thereof, at public or private sale, as she "shall deem most expedient and for the best interest of all my said legatees in my said will named." Held, that by the expression "legatees" the testator intended to designate his four children, whom he had named in the body of the will as those to whom he devised and bequeathed the residue and remainder of his estate after the death of his wife. The term did not include the widow, since in the execution of this power of sale she had no interest. It was to be executed, not for her own benefit or advantage, but for the best interest of those entitled to the estate after her death. Russell v. Russell, 36 N. Y. 581, 583, 93 Am. Dec. 540.

LEGHORN CITRON.

Leghorn citron, preserved by being cut in halves, boiled and soaked in salt water, freshened, and covered with syrup and boiled down, and fresh sugar placed thereon, is taxable as fruits preserved in sugar, under Tariff Act 1883, par. 302. United States v. Nordlinger, 121 Fed. 690, 691, 58 C. C. A. 438.

LEGISLATION.

See "Appropriate Legislation"; "Class Legislation"; "Local Legislation"; "Tax Legislation."

Special legislation, see "Special Law."

Wharton, in his lexicon, defines "legislation" as follows: "The act of giving or enacting laws; the power to make laws." State v. Hyde, 22 N. E. 644, 646, 121 Ind. 20.

"Legislation" is the exercise of sovereign power, and under some forms of government the power of the Legislature is supreme and uncontrollable, knowing no limits. Rison v. Farr, 24 Ark. 161, 166, 87 Am. Dec. 52.

LEGISLATIVE.

"Legislative," as the word is used in speaking of the legislative department of the government, means the organ or organs of the government which make the law. In re Railroad Com'rs, 50 N. W. 276, 277, 15 Neb. 679 (citing Webster's Dict.).

The word "legislative" is defined by Worcester as follows: "That which makes or enacts laws; lawmaking; legislative power; or of pertaining to legislation, or to a Legislature, as legislative proceedings." "Legislative" is defined by Zell as follows: "Making, giving, or enacting laws; relating or pertaining to the passing of laws." Webster defines "legislative" as follows: "Giving or enacting laws as a legislative body; pertaining to the enacting of laws; suitable to laws, as the legislative style; done by enacting, as a legislative act." Appointing to office is not legislative. State v. Hyde, 22 N. E. 644, 646, 121 Ind. 20; City of Evansville v. State, 21 N. E. 267, 272, 118 Ind. 426, 4 L. R. A. 93.

LEGISLATIVE ACT.

A legislative act is an act of the legislative department of the government, by which the law to be applied in future cases under particular states of fact, is established in the form of a statute, ordinance, resolution, or other written form. Smith v. Strother, 8 Pac. 852, 854, 68 Cal. 194.

Making a grant of a franchise is in its own nature not a "legislative act," so as to be beyond the power of a court of equity to prohibit by injunction. People v. Sturtevant, 9 N. Y. (5 Seld.) 263, 273.

The passage of a resolution by a borough council awarding a contract for lighting streets is not a legislative, but a ministerial, act of a business character, and therefore the resolution is not invalid because it has not been recorded in the ordinance books or advertised as required in the case of the passage of an ordinance. Seltzinger v. Borough of Tamaqua, 41 Atl. 454, 455, 187 Pa. 539.

An act of the Legislature of Rhode Island confirming the sale of land situated in Rhode Island by an executrix in New Hampshire is not a judicial act, but a legislative one. Wilkinson v. Leland, 27 U. S. (2 Pet.) 627, 660, 7 L. Ed. 542.

"Legislative action," within the meaning of a statute which requires that the legislative action of councils of certain cities should be approved by the mayor, would not include a resolution of a council approving and accepting a bid for certain property which had been authorized to be sold by an ordinance, which ordinance had been approved in the regular form by the mayor; hence this resolution did not need the approval of the mayor. Straub v. City of Pittsburg, 22 Atl. 93, 94, 138 Pa. 356.

Judgment distinguished.

See "Judgment."

Judicial act distinguished.

That which distinguishes a judicial from a legislative act is that the one is a determination of what the existing law is in relation to some existing thing already done or happened, while the other is a predetermination of what the law shall be, for the regulation of future cases falling under the provisions. The legislative power extends only to the making of laws. To construe and apply the law is the peculiar province of judicial power. To do this, therefore, to compare the claims of the parties with the law of the land before established, is in its nature a judicial act. Cooley, Const. Lim. 110, 111; Philomath College v. Wyatt, 37 Pac. 1022, 1024, 27 Or. 390, 26 L. R. A. 68; Mabry v. Baxter, 58 Tenn. (11 Heisk.) 682, 690; City of Zanesville v. Zanesville Telephone & Telegraph Co., 59 N. E. 109, 110, 63 Ohio St. 442; Board of Com'rs of Yellowstone County v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 25 Pac. 1058, 1060, 10 Mont. 414. The act of an ecclesiastical body in adopting the report of a committee appointed to determine the validity of a constitutional amendment and to submit it to the vote of its members, the amendment being adopted by the adoption of the report, is a legislative, and not a judicial, act. Philo- math College v. Wyatt, 37 Pac. 1022, 1024, 27 Or. 390, 26 L. R. A. 68.

The distinction between a judicial and a legislative act consists in this: that one determines what the law is and what the rights of the parties are with reference to transactions already had, while the other prescribes what the law shall be in future cases arising under it. Whenever an act undertakes to determine a question of right or obligation, or of property, as the foundation upon which it proceeds, such act is to that extent a judicial one, and not the proper exercise of legislative functions. Union Pacific R. Co. v. United States, 99 U. S. 700, 761, 25 L. Ed. 496; Smith v. Strother, 8 Pac. 852, 854, 68 Cal. 194; Tanner v. Nelson, 70 Pac. 984, 986, 25 Utah, 226.

The distinction between a judicial and legislative act is that the former determines what the law is, and what the rights of the parties are, with reference to transactions already had, while the latter prescribes what the law shall be in future cases arising under it. Accordingly the action of the board of education in adopting a series of readers for the public schools in lieu of a series previously in use is an exercise of legislative, and not of judicial, power, and therefore cannot be reviewed on certiorari. People v. Board of Education of Oakland, 54 Cal. 375, 376.

LEGISLATIVE AUTHORITY.

"Legislative authority," as used in Const. art. 4, § 1, declaring that the legislative authority of the state shall be vested in the General Assembly, means the power to make laws, or alter and repeal them. The Constitution only vested in the General Assembly the right to make laws, and did not surrender the right of local self-government in towns and cities, and the right of choosing their own local officers and rulers, or to delegate such power to the General Assembly. State v. Denny, 21 N. E. 274, 278, 118 Ind. 449, 4 L. R. A. 65.

LEGISLATIVE BODY.

The term "legislative body," in relation to the privilege of a newspaper in the publication of the proceedings of a legislative body, in the law of libel, has not been extended to cover a city council. Buckstaff v. Hicks, 68 N. W. 403, 404, 94 Wis. 34, 59 Am. St. Rep. 886.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

The first department of a free government is the "legislative department," which has for its object the making of the laws. It is independent of the other two departments, the executive and judiciary. In the language of the court: "Each department is confined to its own functions, and can neither encroach upon or be made subordinate to those of another without violating the fundamental principle of a republican form of government." In re Davies, 61 N. E. 118, 121, 168 N. Y. 89, 56 L. R. A. 855.

LEGISLATIVE GRANT.

It is held that a grant legislative in its nature does not lose the character of a legislative grant because the authority to make it is conferred upon a subordinate body to which the Legislature had delegated a portion of its powers. Citizens' St. Ry. Co. v. City Ry. Co. (U. S.) 56 Fed. 746, 750.

LEGISLATIVE INTENTION.

The word "intention," when used in reference to the intention of the Legislature in making a law, is susceptible of at least two meanings. It may refer either to that which the Legislature in fact intended to do, or to that intention, as found from the words employed, to make it manifest. Lee Bros. Furniture Co. v. Cram, 28 Atl. 540, 541, 63 Conn. 433.

By "legislative intent," as that term is used with relation to the interpretation of statutes, is meant the intent as gathered from the act itself, and sometimes, viewed in the light of the knowledge of the court, in common with the public at large, of well-known conditions which may seem to have led up to the act under construction. But such consideration of extraneous facts is not resorted to to defeat the act, but to aid in its interpretation. People v. Sturges, 50 N. Y. Supp. 5, 7, 27 App. Div. 387.

LEGISLATIVE JOURNAL.

See "Journal."

LEGISLATIVE OFFICE.

Legislative offices are understood as relating to the enactment of laws. State v. Womack, 29 Pac. 939, 941, 4 Wash. 19.

LEGISLATIVE OFFICER.

"Legislative officer," as used in How. St. §§ 9241, 9242, authorizing the punishment for bribery of "executive, legislative, or judicial officers," applies just as well to local as to state functionaries, the character of whose duties falls within the meaning of the term. "Under our system of local self-government, there is no public corporation that has not an organic connection with the state, or which does not require guarding to promote the interest of the entire body politic. The statute authorized the punishment of municipal officers, as well as state officers." Prosecuting Attorney v. Judge of the Recorder's Court, 26 N. W. 694, 696, 59 Mich. 529.

Every member of either house of the Legislative Assembly, and every member of any common council, board of aldermen, trustees, or other municipal, legislative, or deliberative body, by whatever name known or called, from the time of his election or appointment, shall be held and deemed to be a legislative officer, within the meaning of certain provisions in the Penal Code punishing the bribing, etc., of officers. Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 1881.

Legislative officers are those whose duties relate merely to the enactment of laws. Braithwaite v. Cameron, 38 Pac. 1084, 1087, 3 Okl. 630.

LEGISLATIVE PERMISSION.

Where a common council is empowered to construct sewers and maintain them, so as to discharge into a certain stream, it is a "legislative permission," and not a direction; and a legislative permission neither implies a right to appropriate property without compensation nor confers a license to commit a nuisance. Sammons v. City of Gloversville, 67 N. E. 622, 624, 175 N. Y. 346.

LEGISLATIVE POWER.

Executive power distinguished, see "Executive Power."

Judicial power distinguished, see "Judicial Power."

Legislative power is "that one of the three great departments into which the powers of government are distributed (legislative, executive, and judicial) which is concerned with enacting or establishing, and incidentally with repealing, laws." It is the power to enact, amend, or repeal laws. City of Evansville v. State, 21 N. E. 267, 272, 118 Ind. 426, 4 L. R. A. 93 (citing Abb. Law Dict.).

Legislative power over a subject, though delegated to a subordinate agency, must, in the nature of things, be dominating, and if it be regularly exercised the result must be as conclusive as if accomplished by direct legislative enactment. If it be subject to any other power, it is not legislative power. Forsyth v. City of Hammond (U. S.) 71 Fed. 443, 451, 18 C. C. A. 175.

Legislative power is a power to enact laws or to declare what the law shall be. It is the power to enact new rules for the regulation of future conduct, rights, and controversies. The board of health, in abating a nuisance, does not exercise such powers, where the Legislature has conferred upon the city council the creation of a board of health, and has authorized the council to invest the board with such duties as may be necessary to avoid the danger of infectious diseases. Waters v. Townsend, 47 S. W. 1054, 1055, 85 Ark 613.

Legislative power extends only to the making of the laws, and in its exercise is limited and restrained by the state and federal Constitutions. That is not legislation, nor a valid exercise of the legislative power, which adjudicates in a particular case and prescribes a rule contrary to the general law. Sanders v. Cabaniss, 43 Ala. 173, 180. See, also, Ogden v. Blackledge, 6 U. S. (2 Cranch) 272, 277, 2 L. Ed. 276; State v. Fry, 4 Mo. 120, 189.

The term "legislative power" does not include the power given the inspector of factories in Laws 1897, p. 222, requiring fire escapes to be constructed on certain buildings and giving the inspector of factories a discretion as to the number, location, material, and construction of such escapes, and therefore, the statute is not unconstitutional as a delegation of legislative power. Arms v. Ayer, 61 N. E. 851, 855, 192 Ill. 601, 58 L. R. A. 277, 85 Am. St. Rep. 357.

Legislative power is the authority under the Constitution to make laws and to alter and repeal them; and it does not include the power to appoint to office other than such officers as are necessary to enable the legislative body to properly discharge its duties. State v. Denny, 21 N. E. 252, 254, 118 Ind. 382 (citing Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 90).

"Legislative power," as used in Const. art. 1, § 1, declaring that the legislative power of the state shall be vested in a Senate and Assembly, cannot be construed as including the right to attack private property. It does not reach the life, liberty, or property of a citizen who is not charged with a transgression of the laws and when the sacrifice is not demanded by a just regard for the public welfare. Taylor v. Porter (N. Y.) 4 Hill, 140, 144.

Legislative power is the power residing in the states to regulate the relative rights and duties of all persons and corporations within its jurisdiction, so as to provide for the public convenience and the public good. It is called "police power," or "governmental power." This governmental power applies not only to the enactment of regulations relating to the health, morals, and safety of the public, but also to whatever promotes the public peace, comfort, and convenience. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co. v. Ohio, 19 Sup. Ct. 465, 470, 173 U. S. 285, 43 L. Ed. 702.

The expression "the legislative power of this state," in a constitutional provision that the legislative power of this state shall be vested in the Senate and House of Representatives, means all of the power of the people which may be properly exercised in the formation of laws against which there is no inhibition expressed or implied in the fundamental law. Brown v. City of Galveston (Tex.) 75 S. W. 488, 495.

The term "legislative power," as used in the constitutional provision that the legislative power of the state shall be vested in the Legislature, includes the power to authorize municipal aid to railroad corporations. Leavenworth County Com'rs v. Miller, 7 Kan. 479, 501, 12 Am. Rep. 425.

The words "legislative power," in connection with Const. art. 2, § 1, conferring the legislative power upon the General Assembly, mean such legislative power as might be necessary or appropriate to the declared purpose of the people in framing their Constitution and conferring their powers upon the various departments constituted for the sole purpose of carrying into effect their declared purpose. McCullough v. Brown, 41 S. C. 220, 237, 19 S. E. 458, 473, 23 L. R. A. 410.

The words "legislative power" mean the power or authority under the Constitution or frame of government to make, alter, and repeal laws. O'Neil v. American Fire Ins. Co., 166 Pa. 72, 76, 30 Atl. 943, 26 L. R. A. 715, 45 Am. St. Rep. 650.

It is one thing to determine that the nature of a claim is such as to make it proper to satisfy it by taxation, and another to adjudge how much is justly due upon it. The one is the exercise of legislative power; the other, of judicial. State v. Hampton, 13 Nev. 439, 442.

The term "legislative power" includes the power to authorize municipal aid to railroad corporations. At the time the Constitution was framed the term "legislative power" had a definite and precise signification with reference to this question, established by legislative, executive, and judicial construction, practice, and usage, and the general understanding of the people throughout the United States, which general understanding and signification was that said term included the power to authorize municipal aid to railroad corporations; and therefore, in the absence of anything to the contrary, it must be presumed that the people of this state, when they framed their Constitution, used said term with the signification generally given to it, and therefore that they intended to give the Legislature the power to pass acts authorizing municipal aid to railroad companies. Leavenworth County Com'rs v. Miller, 7 Kan. 479, 501, 12 Am. Rep. 425.

LEGISLATURE.

See "House of Legislature."
Branch of Legislature, see "Branch."

The term "Legislature" is synonymous with General Assembly. State v. Gear, 5 Ohio Dec. 569.

A "legislature" is the body of persons in the state clothed with authority to make laws. State v. Hyde, 22 N. E. 644, 646, 121 Ind. 20.

The lawmaking power is frequently termed in common parlance the "Legislature," and once, if not more, such term is used in the Constitution to designate that body. State Treasurer v. Weeks, 4 Vt. 215, 222.

"Legislature," as used in Const. art. 11, § 8, relating to the adoption of city charters, and providing that the charter shall be submitted to the Legislature for its approval or rejection as a whole, without power of alteration or amendment, and, if approved by a majority vote of the members of each house, it shall become the charter of such city, does not include the Governor, as he is not in fact a part of the Legislature. Brooks v. Fischer, 21 Pac. 652, 653, 79 Cal. 173, 4 L. R. A. 429.

LEGITIMACY.

"Legitimacy, as the word imports, requires that the child be born in a manner approved by law." Davenport v. Caldwell, 10 S. C. (10 Rich.) 317, 337.

"Legitimacy is a status or social condition, and capacity to inherit is only one of its incidents. A legitimate child has from the moment of its birth until the day of its legal majority a common-law right to support from the father. It is entitled to bear his name, even though never acquired by common reputation. It may inherit, not merely from the father, but from remoter ancestors and collateral kindred. All these several adjuncts or incidents make up the status or condition which is called 'legitimacy'; but legislation may modify one or more of the incidents, without disturbing the rest, but when directed on the status it operates upon all of them alike." Pratt v. Pratt, 5 Mo. App. 539, 541.

LEGITIMATE.

"To legitimate is to make lawful, to legalize, and, in the case of an illegitimate, the plain and unambiguous meaning is to render legitimate. To communicate the rights of a legitimate child to one who is illegitimate is to invest with the rights of a lawful heir." Webster; McKamie v. Baskerville, 7 S. W. 194, 86 Tenn. (2 Pickle) 459.

LEGITIMATE CHILD.

"A legitimate child is he that is born in lawful wedlock or within a competent time afterwards." Wilson v. Babb, 18 S. C. 59, 69.

A legitimate child is one born in lawful wedlock, or born before the marriage of its parents, who afterwards marry, and which receives the recognition of its father; and one of such children is just as legitimate before the law as the other. Gates v. Seibert, 57 S. W. 1065, 1068, 157 Mo. 254, 80 Am. St. Rep. 625.

As defined by Blackstone, "a legitimate child is one that is born in lawful wedlock." 1 Cooley, Bl. Comm. p. 446. And Lord Coke says, "By the common law, if the issue be born within a month or a day after marriage between parties of lawful age, the child is legitimate." A child begotten before, but born after, marriage, is legitimate, though the marriage was void, because the husband had a wife living at the time of the marriage, within Ky. St. § 2098, providing that "the issue of an illegal or void marriage shall be legitimate." Swinney v. Klippert (Ky.) 50 S. W. 841, 842.

A legitimate child is he that is born in lawful wedlock or within competent time afterwards. 1 Bl. Comm. 367. In the civil law the rule is, "Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant." But in England and in this country the nuptials must be precedent to the birth, and while a post-nuptial birth is not conclusive on the question of legitimacy, yet it raises a presumption which will stand until overthrown by sufficient and competent testimony. At one time nothing short of proof of impossibility of access on the part of the husband was regarded as sufficient to destroy this presumption, but such is not the law now. It now stands as any other question of fact, resting on the testimony for and against it. Wilson v. Babb, 18 S. C. 59, 69.

LEGITIMATE CAUSE.

The term "legitimate cause," as used in the Louisiana Code, prohibiting onerous contracts, but permitting donations en paiement, where there exists a legitimate cause, means a debt. Succession of Miller v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co., 34 South. 723, 725, 110 La. 652.

LEGITIMATE HEIRS.

"Legitimate heirs," as used in a will devising property to a beneficiary, but providing that, if the beneficiary leaves no legitimate heirs, it shall pass to a third person, means children born in lawful wedlock, or children generally, and not heirs generally, collateral as well as lineal, or issue in indefinite succession. Lytle v. Beveridge, 58 N. Y. 592, 605.

A devise to testator's son for life, and if he leave no legitimate heirs, then to testator's son D., means by "legitimate heirs" the children of the first son or their descendants, not his heirs generally. Prindle v. Beveridge (N. Y.) 7 Lana. 225, 231.

LEGITIMATE PURPOSE.

"Legitimate" means lawful, and a "legitimate purpose" is a lawful purpose, and is so used in an instruction that a sale was valid, if made for any legitimate purpose, and not with intent to hinder or delay creditors. Estes v. Fry, 22 Mo. App. 80, 89.

LEGITIMATION.

"Legitimation," properly considered, refers to persons where the blood relation exists, and is not synonymous with "adoption," which properly refers to persons who are strangers in blood. Blythe v. Ayres, 31 Pac. 915, 916, 96 Cal. 532, 19 L. R. A. 40.

Adoption, properly considered, refers to persons who are strangers in blood; legitimation, to persons where the blood relation exists. Blythe v. Ayres, 31 Pac. 915, 916, 96 Cal. 532, 19 L. R. A. 40.

LEGITIME.

That portion of his property which the testator cannot dispose of to the prejudice of his children, and which consequently accrues to them at his death, is called the "legitime." Cox v. Von Ahlefeldt, 23 South. 959, 961, 50 La. Ann. 1266.

By "legitime" is meant the amount which the forced heir is entitled to collect for the succession. When she gets that amount, she cannot legally complain. She can insist on nothing more. Miller v. Miller, 29 South. 802, 805, 105 La. 257.

LEMON.

The words "lemon peel, preserved," in Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, par. 267, 30 Stat. 172 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1626], providing a duty on such peel, includes lemons cut in two, and thrown into casks of brine, the pulp of which, when it has reached this country, has left half the lemon, and the fruit has been destroyed; and it is not entitled to come in free of duty under paragraph 559 of the free list, as fruits in brine. Hills Bros. Co. v. United States (U. S.) 113 Fed. 857.

LEND.

See, also, "Loan."

"To lend is the parting with a thing of value to another for a time fixed or indefinite, yet to have some time in ending, to be used or enjoyed by that other; the thing itself, or the equivalent of it, to be given back at the time fixed, or when lawfully asked for, with or without compensation for the use, as may be agreed on." Kent v. Quicksilver Min. Co., 78 N. Y. 159, 177.

As give.

"Lend," as used in wills, is ordinarily equivalent to "give"; but when it is applied to property given to one person, and in the same clause the word "give" is used with reference to property bequeathed to another person, stress may be put on the difference between the two in the construction of the item, in order to ascertain the intention of the testator. Hudgens v. Wilkins, 77 Ga. 555, 558.

The word "lend" in a will, which declares that "I lend the whole of my estate to my wife during her natural life or widowhood, but if she choose to marry then the whole of my estate to be taken out of her hands by my executors and equally divided," etc., was construed not to have been used in the sense of the word "give." Burch v. Burch, 19 Ga. 174, 185.

It has been determined in Bryan v. Duncan, 11 Ga. 67, and in Hinson v. Pickett (S. C.) 1 Hill, Eq. 35, that the word "lend" in a will may sometimes be construed to be equivalent to "give," if the testator evinces a clear intention to part with the entire dominion over the bequest. In the latter case Judge O'Neill says: "The term 'lend' when used in a bequest is generally equivalent to 'give.' In some special cases it has an appropriate meaning, as in Baker v. Baker & Red, decided by this court in December, 1831; but in such cases there is something which shows that the testator did not intend a legal estate to pass to the legatee." When the testator parts with the entire dominion in the property, it is absurd to say that an estate which can never revert can be a loan, which implies that the use of the thing is parted with for a limited time or for a special purpose, and the right of property remains in the lender. Booth v. Terrell, 16 Ga. 20, 23.

In construing a clause in a will providing that "I hereby lend to my granddaughter [certain slaves] during her natural life, and at her decease I give the slaves to [a certain designated beneficiary]," it was said that the testator used the word "lend" to express the interest that his granddaughter should take in the property, and the word "give" to carry the property from her to the other beneficiaries. It certainly was not that the word "lend" should have its appropriate signification, for a loan is a grant of a thing to another for a limited time, to be specifically returned to its owner. It implies that the dominion of the thing remains on the lender. Here the testator parts with his entire interest in this property. "The interest given, and intended to be given, then, not being a loan, but a gift, it must be construed to mean the same as if testator had said, 'I give,' instead of 'I lend.' This word was before the Court of Appeals of Virginia for construction in the case of Deane v. Hansford (Va.) 9 Leigh, 253, 256, in the following clause: 'I lend to Thos. Deane and the heirs of his body.' Here, the court says, 'there is no sound distinction between such a loan and words imputing the gift,' and that authority is conclusive upon us in this case." Pournell v. Harris, 29 Ga. 736, 742.

The word "lend" was said to have been used as the equivalent of "give" in a clause in a will which provides that "I lend to my niece for her life one negro girl," and at the death of the niece to other beneficiaries, as the testator evinced a clear intention to part with the entire dominion over the property bequeathed. Bryan v. Duncan, 11 Ga. 67, 75.

"Lend," as used in a bequest of personal property, providing that "I lend to my daughter four negroes during her natural life, and then to the heirs of her body," will be construed to mean "give." The term "lend," when used in a bequest, is generally equivalent to "give." Hinson v. Pickett (S. C.) 1 Hill, Eq. 35, 38.

Life estate conveyed.

A will provided that "the remaining two-thirds of my estate I lend unto my three daughters, S., M., and J., to them during their natural lives, and then to the lawfully begotten heirs of their body." Held, that the words "lend unto my three daughters," as so used and in view of the context, should be construed as giving them a life estate, with a remainder over to their children; the word "then" fixing the time of the remainders vesting to the death of the first taker. Loving v. Hunter, 16 Tenn. (8 Yerg.) 4, 29.

"Lend," as used in the following devise: "I 'lend' unto my grandson O. three negroes," etc. "Now, in case that the said O. should live to arrive at manhood and beget heirs lawfully, the above property to him and his heirs, forever; if not, I give and bequeath the above-mentioned property unto my son J., to him and his heirs, forever"—is construed to convey a life estate in the property to the grandson. Felton v. Billups, 21 N. C. 584, 586.

"Lend," as used in a will by which testator provides that he lends to his daughter during her natural life certain realty, to go to others at her death, is equivalent to "give, bequeath, or devise," and creates an estate for life. Holt v. Pickett, 20 South. 432, 433, 111 Ala. 362 (citing Woodley v. Findlay, 9 Ala. 716; Ewing v. Standefer, 18 Ala. 400).

As permission to take.

Sess. Acts 1855-56, p. 17, makes it a misdemeanor to sell, give or lend a deadly weapon to a minor. Defendant, having in his drawer a pistol belonging to another, and being asked by a minor to lend it to him, replied: "It is not mine, but belongs to a man. I have nothing to do with it. You can take it, if you choose. It was left here by C., who will return in four or five days, and it should be here when he returns and calls for it." Held, that such act constituted a lending within the meaning of the statute. Coleman v. State, 32 Ala. 581, 582.

LEND AN ACCEPTANCE.

Where defendant asked plaintiff to "lend him his acceptance," the intention of the parties to the contract must be taken to be that the defendant should be considered as the real acceptor of the bill and take up the bill when it became due. "Lending an acceptance" is a well-known phrase, and is always understood in that sense. Reynolds v. Doyle, 1 Man. & G. 753, 756.

LENGTH.

The use of the word "length" in a description in a patent of timber of a length equal to the thickness of a grindstone, contained in the invention, is only for the purpose of showing that the dimensions of a block in one direction are to be equal to the thickness of the grindstone, for the purpose of utilizing the whole grinding surface. Miller v. Androscoggin Pulp Co. (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 301, 303.

Of railroad.

Act March 1, 1881 (16 Del. Laws, p. 526), providing that, whenever a certain railroad should become a part of a main-track line, they should pay, as a state tax, a sum bearing the same proportion to a certain sum that the length of their line did to the length of a certain other railroad, cannot be construed to include branch lines in determining the proportion. The length does not include branches or lateral additions that might be made or become the property of a railroad. Herbert v. Baltimore & P. R. Co. (Del.) 13 Atl. 902, 903, 8 Houst. 120.

Laws 1882, c. 353, § 13, providing that the salaries and expenses of the board of railroad commissioners should be borne by the several railroad companies according to their means, to be apportioned by the comptroller and state assessors, who shall assess on each of said corporations its just proportion of such expenses, one-half in proportion to its net income for the year next preceding that in which the assessment is made, and one-half in proportion to the length of the main track or tracks of the road, means.

where there are two or more parallel tracks between two terminal points, the distance between those points, and not the number of miles of rail. People v. Chapin, 12 N. E. 595, 106 N. Y. 265.

LEPROSY.

Leprosy is a disease of a nature which will cause the persons to be affected by it to be shunned and avoided, and therefore a publication charging one with having leprosy is libelous, even though the progress of science has revealed that leprosy is not an infectious or contagious disease. Simpson v. Press Pub. Co., 87 N. Y. Supp. 401, 402, 83 Misc. Rep. 228.

The term "leprosy," as used in the Codes of 1808 and 1825, which make leprosy one of the redhibitory defects of slaves, does not apply to mere cutaneous diseases which do not materially affect the value of the slave, but "elephantiasis," common in Africa and in Louisiana before the suppression of the slave trade, is meant. Walker v. Ferriere, 6 La. Ann. 278.

LES EXCES.

"Les exces" are said by Poullier to be acts of violence which exceed all measure and may put the life of the spouse in danger. Butler v. Butler (Pa.) 1 Para. Eq. Cas. 329, 343.

LES SEVICES.

"Les seviles" are acts of cruelty which do not put the life in danger. Butler v. Butler (Pa.) 1 Para. Eq. Cas. 329, 343.

LESION.

Lesion is the injury suffered by one who does not receive a full equivalent for what he gives in a commutative contract. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 1860; Linkswiler v. Hoffman, 34 South. 34, 36, 109 La. 948; Smart v. Bibbins, 34 South. 49, 109 La. 986.

LESS.

See "Not Less Than."

A policy of fire insurance on a building, providing that, when an insurance is general, it shall only be binding when the assured has an unincumbered title in fee simple, and that when he has a less estate therein the same shall be void, means an estate of less duration than a fee, as an estate in fee tail, for life, or years, or at will, and does not relate to the fact that the insured has mortgaged the property. Swift

v. Vermont Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 18 Vt. 305, 313.

In a condition of an insurance policy that "any interest in the property insured not absolute, or that is less than a perfect title must be represented to the company and expressed in the policy," the word "less" should be construed as referring to the quantity of the interest or estate, which is measured by its duration. The word "less" is a term denoting quantity. An estate or interest less than a perfect title may therefore mean one that is limited in its extent and duration, as an estate for life, for years, or at will; less than an estate in fee simple, or than of one of unlimited duration. Woody v. Old Dominion Ins. Co. (Va.) 31 Grat. 362, 375, 31 Am. Rep. 732.

As deducting or taking from.

Where a defendant, indebted on certain notes, claimed credits in addition to those indorsed on the notes, a special verdict finding him indebted "to the face of the notes, with interest, less the credits," is not indefinite, but means that the credits allowed are those indorsed on the notes. Roberts v. Roberts, 30 S. E. 347, 348, 122 N. C. 782.

An order directing an administrator to sell his intestate's real estate, and describing the land as an entire tract, "less or except the widow's dower," which is specifically described, means the widow's dower estate, and not the fee of the land so described as her dower. "Less (minus) means literally taking from; taking a smaller number quantity, or interest from a larger; the process of subtracting or withdrawing." Atin v. Willis, 8 South. 94, 90 Ala. 421.

LESSEE.

He to whom a lease is made is called the "lessee," or tenant. Viterbo v. Friedlander, 7 Sup. Ct. 962, 967, 120 U. S. 707, 30 L. Ed. 776.

The mere use of technical words and phrases which have a definite legal significance cannot be allowed to defeat the contrary intention of the parties, if that intention be manifest from the whole contract. Caldwell v. Fulton, 31 Pa. (7 Casey) 478, 72 Am. Dec. 760; Funk v. Haldeman, 53 Pa. (3 P. F. Smith) 229. So that the terms "demise," "lease," "lessors," "lessees," and like words, specially appropriate to a contract between the owner and tenant for years, have no bearing, if the contract is in fact not a lease. Lehigh & Wilkes-Barre Coal Co. v. Wright, 35 Atl. 919, 920, 177 Pa. 387.

The terms "lessee," "owner," or "operators" of passenger terminals, and the person or company operating the same, in Laws 1899, c. 4700, § 6, relating to the power of railroad commissioners to compel admission into certain passenger terminals of railroad companies desired or required by the commissioners to enter, and to fixing reasonable rates, etc., for the uses and privileges conferred, cannot be limited to corporations only, but also includes associations and individuals. State v. Jacksonville Terminal Co., 27 South. 225, 237, 41 Fla. 377.

The term "lessee," in a pleading, is held to be insufficient to constitute a description of the interest of the pleader in certain premises, within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 2235, providing that the petition in a summary proceeding for land must describe the interest of the petitioner; the term being held to be mere descriptive personæ. Loft v. Kaziz, 84 N. Y. Supp. 228, 229.

The terms "owner," "owners," "lessee," "agent," or "operator," as used in the act relating to mines and mining, shall include the immediate proprietor, lessee, or occupier of any coal mine, or any person having on behalf of any owner or owners, or lessee as aforesaid, the care and management of any coal mine or any part thereof. Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 4141.

As agent of owner.

See "Agent."

As owner or proprietor.

See "Owner"; "Proprietor."

LESSOR.

As owner, see "Owner."

He who grants a lease is called the "owner," or "lessor." Viterbo v. Friedlander, 7 Sup. Ct. 962, 967, 120 U. S. 707, 30 L. Ed. 776.

LET.

See "Agree to Let."

As allow or permit.

"To let," as used in an agreement whereby E. agreed to let T. have all the timber on certain land, means to allow, to permit; that is, that E. will permit T. to have the timber upon the said land. Eiberts v. Thompson, 4 Atl. 194, 196, 113 Pa. 19.

As a command or order.

"Let," as used in the expressions "Let an inventory be taken," "Let a family meeting be held as prayed for," "Let a writ of seizure and sale issue," etc., is equivalent to "it is hereby ordered," so that in the latter instance the expression is tantamount to saying, "It is hereby ordered that a writ of seizure and sale issue." Ingram v. Larousini, 23 South. 498, 501, 50 La. Ann. 69.

Covenants implied.

The words "demise or let," or their equivalent in a lease, imply a covenant for title and for quiet enjoyment; but no other covenant on the part of the lessor is implied therein. Wilkinson v. Clauson, 12 N. W. 147, 148, 29 Minn. 91.

As demise, grant, or lease.

"Let," as used in a lease by which the owner lets the premises, etc., is synonymous with "demise." Hemphill v. Eckfeldt (Pa.) 5 Whart. 274, 278.

"Let and lease," as used in a deed purporting to "let and lease" certain premises, are merely words of grant, and do not imply a covenant. Lovering v. Lovering, 13 N. H. 513, 518.

The word "let," or any equivalent words which constitute a lease, implies a covenant in a lease under seal, or in a lease not under seal, a contract, for title to the estate merely, and does not imply a contract for any particular state of the property at the time of the making of the lease, or that it shall continue fit for the purpose for which it was leased. Foster v. Peyser, 63 Mass. (9 Cush.) 242, 246, 57 Am. Dec. 43.

An instrument in writing, whereby the grantee of land granted agreed to "let" the grantor have the use of the house that he lived in on the farm that the grantee had bought of him for the certain term, and until the grantor should pay the money on a certain mortgage which the grantee held against him, denotes the leasing of the premises, creating the relation of landlord and tenant between the parties. Hunt v. Comstock (N. Y.) 15 Wend. 665, 667.

The words "let and hired," in a charter party which provides that the owners of the vessel let and hired the vessel for a certain gross sum to carry certain freight, does not give the charterer a special ownership in the vessel, when the owner of the vessel employs, pays, and supports the master and crew, retains the control of the navigation of the vessel by means of the master, and is answerable for his conduct, and therefore the owner has a lien on the cargo for the freight. Palmer v. Gracie (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 1033, 1036.

The word "let," in a covenant that the lessee would not "sublet or assign over" the demised premises, is synonymous with the word "demise," and is a covenant against subletting. Jackson v. Silvernail (N. Y.) 15 Johns. 278, 280 (citing Gregson v. Harrison, 2 Term R. 425).

In an action of ejectment for the breach of a condition by a lessee, the words "let and underlet" in a lease will be construed to mean a demise and underletting, and not an assignment of the whole interest of the lessee. Lynde v. Hough (N. Y.) 27 Barb. 415, 420.

Where the word "let" is employed in a deed, it is not used to designate the quantity of estate intended to be conveyed, but merely for the purpose of passing title to an estate described by other words introduced for that purpose. Krider v. Lafferty (Pa.) 1 Whart. 303, 315, 316, 317.

Demise distinguished.

"Demise" denotes something more than a mere letting or a lease, as, for instance, a grant. It would seem that it means more to the lessee than a mere letting by the landlord, or the mere taking by the lessee, generally embraced in the mere terms "to lease" or "to let." These latter words, it would appear, can have relation only to the mere term. Mershon v. Williams, 44 Atl. 211, 214, 63 N. J. Law, 398.

As exchange.

In construing a complaint in an action in justice court to recover for breach of warranty of a horse, in which plaintiff alleged that he "let the said Caleb have a certain bay horse, in consideration of which the said Caleb let the plaintiff have a certain sorrel horse, which the said Caleb warranted to be a sound and good working horse, whereas he was unfit for all manner of business, to the damage," etc., the court said: "In common parlance, 'let,' as used here, means 'exchange,' and so the court will understand it." And the objection made on appeal that the word "let" imports a bailment, and, if so, that the unsoundness of the horse was immaterial and not prejudicial to the plaintiff, was not sustained. King v. Fuller (N. Y.) 3 Caines, 152, 153.

As give.

The word "let," in a written direction to "let A. have whatever he wants for his support," ordinarily means to grant possession, to give, to furnish, etc. Grant v. Dabney, 19 Kan. 388, 389, 27 Am. Rep. 125.

The word "let," as employed in a lease, may be considered a translation of "tradidi," which is from "trado," signifying "to deliver, give, or yield up; surrender." Krider v. Lafferty (Pa.) 1 Whart. 303, 315, 316.

As hire or lend.

"Let," as used in a complaint for the negligent killing of a horse, stating that plaintiff let defendant have the use of his mare, and that she died by reason of defendant's negligence, is equivalent to an allegation of a hiring of the mare for a reward, under the rule that pleadings must be considered most strongly against the pleader; one of the ordinary significations of "let" being to lease or grant the use and possession of the thing for compensation. Cartledge v.

Sloan, 26 South. 918, 919, 124 Ala. 596 (citing Bouvier).

The terms "letting" and "hiring" are used to designate the lending of property other than money for a compensation. Kenney v. Hynds, 49 Pac. 403, 404, 7 Wyo. 22.

LETTING.

According to Webst. Dict. "letting" is an Americanism used to signify the act of putting out portions of work to be performed by contract, as on a railroad or canal, and it has in our country that acceptation. The letting or putting out of the contract is a different thing from the invitation to make proposals for it. The letting is posterior to the invitation for proposals. It is made after the proposals have been received in pursuance to the invitation, and after they have been considered, and is the act of awarding the contract to the proposer. The distinction between the advertisement for proposals and the letting of a contract is precisely the distinction between the advertisement of a sale and a sale. Eppes v. Mississippi, G. & T. R. Co., 35 Ala. 33, 55.

Of ship.

When a ship is let to another for a period of time, and the owner during that time has nothing to do with the appointment of her officers and crew, or with the working or management of her, that is called a "demise or letting of the ship," and the charterer becomes responsible for her navigation. Bramble v. Culmer (U. S.) 78 Fed. 497, 501, 24 C. C. A. 182.

LETTING LAND ON SHARES.

See "On Shares."

LETHAL WEAPON.

The term "lethal weapons" means deadly weapons. "Guns, swords, pistols, knives, and the like are lethal weapons as a matter of law, when used within striking distance of the party assaulted. All others are lethal or not according to their capability of producing death or great bodily harm in the manner in which they are used, and of this the jury must be the judges." The question whether a gun drawn on another was a lethal weapon, held to be dependent on the question whether or not it was loaded. State v. Godfrey, 20 Pac. 625, 628, 17 Or. 300, 11 Am. St. Rep. 830.

LETTER.

See "Post Letter."

A letter is defined as a written or printed message. United States v. Britton (U. S.) 17 Fed. 731, 732.

A letter is a written or printed message or communication in the form of epistolary correspondence. As used in the legislation of Congress, regulating the rates charged for postage, it is a technical word; a superior word; a word to represent a class of mail matter that is in every business sense of so high a grade that all else becomes inferior in classification and in enumeration to it. It stands first in postal concerns, and nothing is even equal to it. Historically and in public knowledge and wisdom this is so, and no word is ever substituted for "letters" to express what is commonly known as "letters" in relation to the postal service. The omission of the term from a statute enumerating the various items of mail which are excluded from the mails by reason of obscenity shows an intention that the statute should not apply to letters. United States v. Huggett (U. S.) 40 Fed. 636, 640.

The term "letter," in the statute making it a criminal offense to send or convey an insulting, etc., letter or communication, was construed to properly include a writing inclosed in an envelope and transmitted by mail. It is said that such writing might properly be called either a "letter" or a "communication." Larison v. State, 9 Atl. 700, 701, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 256, 60 Am. Rep. 606.

A letter, to come within the provision of sections 5467-5469 of the Revised Statutes [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 3691, 3692], must get into the mail in some of the ordinary ways prescribed by the postal authorities, and become fairly and reasonably a part of the mail matter under the control of the postal department. United States v. Rapp (U. S.) 30 Fed. 818, 821.

"A letter is a written or printed message. There can be no message to that which is not in existence." United States v. Denicke (U. S.) 35 Fed. 407, 409.

Circular.

"Letter," as used in Act Cong. March 3, 1825, § 28, providing for the punishment of any person who shall frank any letter other than those written by himself or by his order on the business of his office, cannot be construed to include printed circulars. The definition of "letters" as correspondence wholly or partly in writing necessarily excludes from the definition printed circulars, whether in the form of letters or otherwise. In re Dewees (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 571, 572.

The term "letter," as used in Rev. St. § 3894, providing that no letter or circular concerning lotteries shall be carried in the mail, may designate a circular, as well as a letter. The statute does not recognize the distinction between the two things; that by a circular is intended a written or printed communication general and not personal in its character, and that by a letter is intended a communication personal and individual in character and not general. The same paper may be both a letter and a circular. No doubt there may be many circulars that are not letters, but a circular which is in the form of a letter may be well described as a letter and a circular, and there is no reason for excluding such a circular from the operation of the statute. United States v. Noelke (U. S.) 1 Fed. 426, 429.

In Act Cong. prohibiting any person from sending a "letter or circular" concerning a lottery, the two terms are employed synonymously as to the person mailing the thing referred to. A letter is indited to a particular person. A circular is intended for a number of persons. Whoever was in the mind of Congress as mailing the circular was in its mind as mailing the letter—that is, lottery dealers; and it did not, therefore, apply to letters by any other persons. United States v. Mason (U. S.) 22 Fed. 707.

A sealed circular is, for all purposes affecting the postal offices, a letter. United States v. Dauphin (U. S.) 20 Fed. 625, 629.

Decoy letter.

The term "letter," in 4 Stat. 107, making it criminal to open a letter and steal money therefrom, includes a decoy letter prepared and mailed by an officer of the government for the purpose of entrapping the prisoner. United States v. Cottingham (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 673.

"Letter," as used in Rev. St. §§ 5467, 5469 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 3691, 3692], making the stealing of a letter from the mail or post office a penal offense, includes a decoy letter addressed to a fictitious personage, known to be such and not designed to be delivered, but only intended to lead to the detection of persons suspected of having stolen letters. Goode v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 136, 138, 159 U. S. 663, 40 L. Ed. 297 (citing United States v. Foye [U. S.] 25 Fed. Cas. 1198, 1199; United States v. Wight [U. S.] 38 Fed. 106; United States v. Dorsey [U. S.] 40 Fed. 752; United States v. Bethea [U. S.] 44 Fed. 802).

Rev. St. § 3891 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2657], relating to the abstraction or embezzlement by a post office employé of any "letter intended to be conveyed by mail," imported a letter which had a sender and a receiver, a place from which it started and a destination to which it could be conveyed, and the term would not include a decoy letter placed in the mails for the purpose of detecting offenders. United States v. Denicke (U. S.) 35 Fed. 407, 408.

Marked words in magazine.

The marking and dotting of words and letters in a copy of a magazine, when sent to a person, makes the communication as much a letter from the person so marking as though he had written the same thing in his own hand; and it is as competent to call any one to make the decipherment as much as it would be to read a letter so illegibly written as to be difficult to make out. State v. Wetherell, 40 Atl. 728, 70 Vt. 274.

Parcel.

A letter is a message in writing. A packet is two or more letters under one cover. Merely covering a parcel of gloves, silk hose, or other merchandise with paper, and directing it to a person to whom it is sent, would not make such parcel a letter; nor is there any difference between such a parcel and one containing bank notes. The term "letter" or "packet," in St. 11th Cong. c. 54, § 18, prohibiting any person carrying the mail from receiving or carrying any letter or packet, does not include a parcel or bundle of merchandise. Dwight v. Brewster, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 50, 56, 11 Am. Dec. 133; Chouteau v. Steamboat St. Anthony, 11 Mo. 226, 230.

Printed lottery ticket.

In Rev. St. § 3894, forbidding any one from knowingly depositing in the mail any letter or circular concerning lotteries, gift concerns, etc., "letter" does not include a printed lottery ticket. United States v. Clark (U. S.) 22 Fed. 708, 709.

Private letter.

The word "letter" has a meaning in itself distinct from the word "writing," and, as used in Rev. St. § 3893, declaring every obscene book, paper, letter, writing, or other publication of an indecent character to be nonmailable matter, includes an indecent private letter in a sealed envelope. United States v. Ling (U. S.) 61 Fed. 1001, 1002; United States v. Andrews (U. S.) 58 Fed. 861, 863 (affirmed Andrews v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 798, 799, 162 U. S. 420, 40 L. Ed. 1023).

A private sealed letter is held not to be within the prohibition of Rev. St. § 3839, as amended September 26, 1888, prohibiting the mailing of any obscene book, pamphlet, picture, paper, writing, print, letter, or other publication; it being held that the words of enumeration are limited in character by the concluding words "or other publication." United States v. Wilson (U. S.) 58 Fed. 768, 769; United States v. Warner (U. S.) 59 Fed. 355, 356.

Unsealed matter.

"Letters," as used in Act Cong. March 3, 1845, forbidding transportation by railroads, boats, etc., of letters, packages, and other mailable matter on such trains, boats, etc., as carry United States mail, except such as may have relation to some part of the cargo or some article at the same time conveyed, includes an unsealed order sent on a steamboat, directing tobacco to be sent by the return boat. United States v. Bromley, 53 U. S. (12 How.) 88, 97, 13 L. Ed. 905.

The word "letter," as used in the federal statutes relating to nonmailable matter, refers only to the contents of sealed matter. Middleby v. Miller (U. S.) 118 Fed. 261, 263, 55 C. C. A. 355.

As a writing.

See "Write—Writing."

LETTER BOX.

The provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 797, that service on an attorney during his absence may be made by depositing the paper, in a sealed wrapper directed to him, in his letter box, is complied with by dropping it through a slit or opening for letters in the then closed door of an attorney's office, in a receptacle attached to such door on the inside for receiving letters during the attorney's absence. Duval v. Busch (N. Y.) 21 Abb. N. C. 214, 216.

LETTER OF ATTORNEY.

A mandate, procuration, or letter of attorney is an act by which one person gives power to another to transact for him, and in his name, one or several affairs. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2985.

A false writing stating that one is authorized to collect for a certain newspaper is within the statute making it forgery to falsely make a letter of attorney or other power to receive money. Leslie v. State, 69 Pac. 2, 3, 10 Wyo. 10.

A paper purporting to authorize the bearer to solicit subscribers for a local organization is not a letter of attorney, within a statute making such an instrument a subject of forgery. A letter or power of attorney is commonly understood to be a formal document authorizing some act, which shall have a binding effect upon the person making such power of attorney. It is usually under seal, and, while the want of a seal might not invalidate all powers of attorney, it would not follow that every paper conferring authority upon another is a letter of attorney. People v. Smith, 70 N. W. 466, 112 Mich. 192, 67 Am. St. Rep. 392.

LETTER OF RECOMMENDATION.

A distinction is to be made between what is known in terms as a "clearance card" and a "letter of recommendation"; the former being merely a letter, be it good, bad, or indifferent, given to an employé at the time of his discharge or end of service, showing the cause of such discharge or voluntary quittance, the length of time of service, his capacity, and such other facts as would give to those concerned information of his former employment. A letter of recommendation, on the contrary, is, as the term implies, a letter commending the former services of the holder, and speaking of him in such terms as would tend to bring such services to the favorable notice of those to whom he might apply for employment. Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Jenkins, 51 N. E. 811, 812, 174 Ill. 398, 62 L. R. A. 922, 66 Am. St. Rep. 296; McDonald v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 58 N. E. 463, 466, 187 Ill. 529.

A letter of recommendation is a letter commending the former services of the holder, and speaking of him in such terms as would tend to bring such services to the favorable notice of those to whom he might apply for employment. McDonald v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 58 N. E. 463, 466, 187 Ill. 529.

LETTERPRESS COPY.

Letterpress copies are impressions of letters or written matter which are obtained by placing a letter written on ordinary paper, or other written matter, between the leaves of a book filled with tissue paper; the pages upon which the copy is desired being usually dampened somewhat for that purpose, after which such book is subjected to great pressure by means of a hand or other press. The impressions thus made are the letterpress copies. Lawrence v. Merritt, 8 Sup. Ct. 1099, 1100, 127 U. S. 113, 32 L. Ed. 91.

LETTERPRESS ESTABLISHMENTS.

The term "letterpress establishments," as used in all laws relative to the employment of labor, shall mean any premises in which the process of letterpress printing is carried on. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 916. c. 106. § 8.

LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION.

The expression "letters of administration" includes letters of temporary administration. Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 2514, subd. 5.

Letters of administration are granted by a court having probate jurisdiction to show that the authority incident to the office or duty of an executor or administrator has been devolved upon the person therein named. Such letters are, as a general rule, evidence only of their own existence, and are not evidence that the party therein assumed to have departed this life is in fact dead. Mutual Benefit Life Ins. Co. v. Tisdale, 91 U. S. 238, 243, 23 L. Ed. 314.

LETTERS OF CREDIT.

See "General Letter of Credit"; "Special Letter of Credit."

As negotiable instrument, see "Negotiable Instrument."

A letter of credit is a written instrument, addressed by one person to another, requesting the latter to give credit to the person in whose favor it is drawn. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 3710; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4664; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2008; Code Cal. 1903, § 2858.

A letter of credit is either general or special. When the request for credit in a letter is addressed to specify the persons by name or description, the letter is special. All other letters of credit are general. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2861.

A letter of credit, like a loan of money, is in itself indifferent in character. It may be maritime or nonmaritime, according to the objects of the loan, the intent of the parties, and the circumstances attending it. Freights of The Kate (U. S.) 63 Fed. 707, 720.

An indorsement upon a blank piece of paper, with intent to give the person credit, is in effect a letter of credit, so that, if a promissory note be afterwards written on the paper, the indorser cannot object that the note was written after the indorsement. Violet v. Patton, 9 U. S. (5 Cranch) 142, 150, 3 L. Ed. 61.

Letters of credit have been divided into two classes, general and special. They are general when addressed to any or all persons, without naming any one in particular. They are special when addressed to a particular individual or firm. A general letter of credit is addressed to, and invites people generally to advance money, give credit, or sell property in reliance on it; and when this is done the contract is complete, and the acceptor becomes a party to it, and may enforce it for his own benefit. Evansville Nat. Bank v. Kaufmann, 93 N. Y. 273, 276, 45 Am. Rep. 204; Birckhead v. Brown (N. Y.) 5 Hill, 634, 641 (cited in Union Bank v. Coster's Ex'rs, 3 N. Y. Super. Ct. [1 Sandf.] 566).

A letter of credit is a paper well understood in the business and commercial world. If addressed to a particular person, who advances goods and money upon it in accordance with its tenor, then the letter becomes an available promise in favor of the person making the advance. Pollock v. Helm, 34 Miss. 1, 5, 28 Am. Rep. 342.

A letter of credit, as defined by McCulloch's Commercial Dictionary, is "A letter written by one merchant or correspondent to another, requesting him to credit the bearer with a sum of money," or, to take a fuller definition, it is "an open or sealed letter from one merchant in one place directed to another in another place, requesting him that, if the person therein named or the bearer of the letter shall have occasion to buy commodities or to want moneys, he will procure the same, or pass his promise, bill, or other engagement for it, on the writer of the letter undertaking that he will provide him the money for the goods, or repay him by exchange, or give him such satisfaction as he shall require." Mechanics' Bank v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 13 N. Y. 599, 630 (reversing 11 N. Y. Super. Ct. [4 Duer] 480, in which the same definition is given).

A letter of credit may be defined to be a letter of request, whereby one person requests some other person to advance money or give credit to a third person, and promises that he will repay or guaranty the same to the person making the advancement. It is called a "general letter of credit" when it is addressed to all persons in general, requesting such advances to a third, and a "special letter of credit" when it is addressed to a particular person by name. La Frague v. Harrison, 9 Pac. 259, 261, 70 Cal. 380, 59 Am. Rep. 416; Johannessen v. Munroe, 32 N. Y. Supp. 863, 864, 84 Hun, 594.

LETTERS OF MARQUE AND REPRISAL.

Letters of marque and reprisal are a commission to attack the subjects of a foreign state on the high seas beyond the limits of the state, seize their property, and put it in sequestration. It is a hostile act of aggression. Gibbons v. Livingston, 6 N. J. Law (1 Halst.) 236, 255.

Letters of marque are a naval commission issued by a government, either actual or purported, authorizing its vessels to attack and seize the vessels of another power or government with which the government issuing such letters is at war. Unless the government issuing the letters has been recognized as a belligerent by some sovereign power, such letters or commission are void, and vessels sailing thereunder and threatening neutral commerce may be lawfully suppressed by seizure as pirates. United States v. The Ambrose Light (U. S.) 25 Fed. 408.

LETTERS PATENT.

"Letters patent are not to be regarded as monopolies created by an exclusive authority at the expense or to the prejudice of all of a community except the persons therein named as patentees, but as public franchises granted to the inventors of new and useful improvements for the purpose of securing to them, as such inventors, for the limited term therein mentioned, the exclusive right and liberty to make and use, and vend to others to be used, their own inventions, as tending to promote the progress of science and the useful arts, and as matter of compensation to the inventors for their labor, toil, and expense in making the inventions and reducing the same to practice for the public benefit, as contemplated by the Constitution and sanctioned by the laws of Congress." Seymour v. Osborne, 78 U. S. (11 Wall.) 516, 533, 20 L. Ed. 33.

It is the policy of the law in this country, and had been enacted by Congress under powers given to it by the Constitution, that if a man finds out something new and useful—a machine, or preparation, or process, or what not, something new and useful—and publishes it to the world through the intermediation of the Patent Office, he shall in exchange for it, and as a compensation for doing so, receive a patent; that is, he receives a grant of a monopoly of manufacturing and selling and using that particular invention for a certain period of time—17 years. The man who holds a patent monopoly has earned the right to the monopoly, because he need not have invented the novelty unless he chose, and this monopoly is secured to the individual by a document which is issued by the government, and is called "letters patent"; a written document—that is, a printed document—accompanied generally with diagrams. And in that document it is stated specifically what the invention is, and what it seeks to accomplish, and how it is constructed, and how it works. International Tooth Crown Co. v. Hanks Dental Ass'n (U. S.) 111 Fed. 918, 918.

By granting letters patent for an invention, the government makes no transfer to the patentee of a right preferred, or estate theretofore vested in itself. The essential right is in the inventor before he obtains the patent. By making one grant therefor the government does not lose its power to make another. The letters constitute, under the law, simply prima facie evidence of the patentee's rights to the invention described as being his own discovery. But whether or not he was in fact the first inventor is left an open question between the patentee and other persons, whether they have patents for the same invention or not. Western Electric Co. v. Sperry Electric Co. (U. S.) 59 Fed. 295, 296, 8 C. C. A. 129.

The difference between letters patent and copyright may be illustrated by reference to the case of medicines. Certain mixtures are found to be of great value in the healing art. If the discoverer writes and publishes a book on the subject, as regular physicians generally do, he gains no exclusive right to the manufacture and sale of the medicine; he gives that to the public. If he desires to acquire such exclusive right, he must obtain a patent for the mixture as a new art, manufacture, or composition of matter. He may copyright his book, if he pleases, but that only secures to him the exclusive right of printing and publishing his book. So of all other inventions or discoveries. And the court held that the publication of a work on bookkeeping, and the copyright of such work, did not give an exclusive right to the methods of bookkeeping therein explained and described. Baker v. Selden, 101 U. S. 99, 102, 103, 25 L. Ed. 841.

LETTERS ROGATORY.

Code Civ. Proc. § 913, providing for letters rogatory, gives no information as to the nature of such letters; and it must be assumed that the Legislature, in this provision, had in mind the nature of the letters rogatory, as ordinarily understood in legal literature. Weeks, in his Law of Depositions (section 128), says: "Letters rogatory are derived from the civil law, and the practice under them is regulated by the civil law. They are largely made use of in courts of admiralty. They are issued by the court of one country to the court or judge of another country. There is a broad distinction between the execution of a commission and the procurement of testimony by the instrumentality of letters rogatory. In the former case the rules of procedure are established by the court issuing the commission, and are entirely under its control. In the latter, methods of procedure must, from the nature of the case, be altogether under the control of the foreign tribunal, which is appealed to for assistance in the administration of justice. We cannot execute our own laws in a foreign country, nor can we prescribe conditions for the performance of a request which is based entirely upon the comity of nations, and which, if granted, is altogether ex gratia. We cannot dictate the methods to be pursued by a court whose assistance we invoke. The rules and practice of the foreign court must be the law of procedure in such cases. Letters rogatory were unknown to the common law. They came to us from the civil law, through the admiralty courts; and the civilians seem to agree that, in all that concerns the form of procedure in such cases, the judge ought to observe the laws of his own country." Union Square Bank v. Reichmann, 41 N. Y. Supp. 602, 605, 9 App. Div. 596.

LEVARI FACIAS.

Levari facias is a species of execution, and is defined to be a writ of execution directed to the sheriff for levying a sum of money upon a man's lands, tenements, goods, and chattels. Pentland v. Kelly (Pa.) 6 Watts & S. 483, 484.

LEVEE.

The word "levee" is defined in Anderson's Law Dictionary as an embankment intended to prevent inundation. It has also been defined as an artificial mound of earth, intended exclusively as a protection from overflow. Royse v. Evansville & T. H. R. Co., 67 N. E. 446, 447, 160 Ind. 592.

The word "levee" "comes to us from the French, and, in its primary sense, signifies a rising. But its signification has been much enlarged. Among other things, it is used to denote an embankment on the margin of the river to prevent inundation, particularly on the lower Mississippi, and, when this embankment is used as a landing place or quay, as at New Orleans, the 'levee' and the 'landing' become convertible terms. From this metropolis, from the South and Southwest, this use of the word passed up the river, and its tributary, the Ohio, to St. Louis, Cincinnati, Wheeling, and Pittsburgh, where the open bank or slope of the river was used as a landing place for the use of water craft, and the transfer of freight and passengers to and from them." Coffin v. City of Portland (U. S.) 27 Fed. 412, 415.

"Levee" has a well-understood meaning in the West and South. It is a place, on a river or other navigable water, for lading or unloading goods, or for the reception and delivery of passengers. It is either the bank or the wharf, to or from which persons or things may go from or to some vessel in the contiguous waters. City of St. Paul v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 68 N. W. 458, 460, 63 Minn. 330, 34 L. R. A. 184 (citing State v. Randall [S. C.] 1 Strob. 110, 111, 47 Am. Dec. 548; State v. Graham [S. C.] 15 Rich. Law, 310).

The word "levee," as applied to portions of the public highways bordering on navigable streams and sloughs in the interior cities and towns in the state of California, has the same meaning as "landing." City of Nappa v. Howland, 25 Pac. 247, 248, 87 Cal. 84.

Embankment distinguished.

"Embankment," as used in an ordinance requiring the erection of an embankment, is not synonymous with the term "levee," as used in the statute authorizing mandamus where any corporation bound to construct a levee shall fail so to do. An embankment is an artificial bank or mound of earth. It may be used either exclusively as a roadway or as a railroad bed, or exclusively as a protection from overflow, or as both, while the levee is an artificial mound of earth, intended exclusively as a protection against an overflow. Every levee is therefore an embankment, but every embankment is not a levee; and it would not be a violent presumption to hold that, in referring to a levee, the reconstruction of which without delay would prevent a great disaster from an overflow, the lawmaker did not contemplate the same hasty necessity as in the case of the reconstruction of an embankment used as a roadway, which would involve only a question of use or convenience. State ex rel. City of New Orleans v. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co., 7 South. 226, 228, 42 La. Ann. 138.

Embankments, locks, and dams are not levees, but they may enter into and form part of a comprehensive system of levees. Dehon v. Lafourche Basin Levee Board, 34 South. 770, 775, 110 La. 767.

Street distinguished.

The word "levee," as used in the West and South, means a landing place for vessels, and for the delivery of merchandise to and from such vessels, and, as incident to that, for the temporary storage of the merchandise. Hence a levee is different from a street, which is designed exclusively for the purposes of travel and intercommunication. City of St. Paul v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 65 N. W. 649, 651, 63 Minn. 330, 34 L. R. A. 184.

LEEVE DISTRICTS.

Levee districts are neither public nor private corporations. They are special organizations to perform certain work which the policy of the state requires or promises to be done, and to which the state had given a certain degree of discretion in making the improvements contemplated. They are described by Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations (sections 24, 26), and he calls them quasi corporations. Perhaps it would have been more accurate to say that they are not corporations at all, but have been so classed, because many of the presumptions and rules which apply to corporations have been made applicable to them. People v. Reclamation Dist. No. 551, 117 Cal. 114, 48 Pac. 1016. It follows from this that Act March 31, 1891 (St. 1895, p. 235), providing a new form of government for a certain levee district, is not in violation of Const. art. 11, § 6, art. 12, § 1, declaring that neither municipal nor private corporations are created by special laws. People v. Levee Dist. No. 6 of Sutter County (Cal.) 63 Pac. 342, 343.

LEVEL

In ordinary language the word "level" does not invariably mean horizontally or a horizontal line. In a lease of coal mines to get the whole of the veins of coal lying under certain closes, not deeper than below the level of the bottom of the mine, the word is not necessarily to be taken in the meaning of "horizontal," but the local meaning of the word may be ascertained. Clayton v. Gregson, 4 Nev. & M. 602, 604.

LEVIABLE INTEREST.

A person settling upon land under a pre-emption gets no title till he has complied with the conditions of the law. If he fails to comply, he has no right. Till the time arrives when he signifies his acceptance, he is not seised, either in law or equity, with any interest or title in the land. Till he fulfills the prescribed conditions of the law, the title remains in the government. He may abandon the pre-empted lands at any time, and has no leviabie interest in them, nor any interest that can be sold under execution. Bray v. Ragsdale, 53 Mo. 170, 172.

LEVIS CULPA.

The term "levis culpa" is the term used in the civil law to designate ordinary fault or neglect. Brand v. Schenectady & T. R. Co. (N. Y.) 8 Barb. 368, 378.

LEVISSIMA CULPA.

"Levissima culpa" is the term used in the civil law to indicate slight fault or neglect. Brand v. Schenectady & T. R. Co. (N. Y.) 8 Barb. 368, 378.

LEVY.

The word "levy," in law, has a technical meaning, which is to collect money. Collins v. Terrall, 10 Miss. (2 Smedes & M.) 383, 386; Lloyd v. Wyckonn, 11 N. J. Law (6 Halst.) 218, 225, 227.

LEVY (Of Taxes).

The word "levy" has different meanings, according to the object to which it is applied. As applied to taxes, it sometimes means to raise and exact by authority of government, or to determine by vote the amount of tax to be raised. It is in this sense that town, city, and school districts levy taxes. In other cases it is used with reference to the mere ministerial or executive act of entering them on the taxbooks and collecting them. State v. Lakeside Land Co., 73 N. W. 970, 973, 71 Minn. 283.

In Rev. St. §§ 1210a, 1210b, relating to tax levy, the word "levy" has no limited or technical meaning, and, as there used, means only a computation and extension of the tax according to the assessment. Bradley v. Lincoln Co., 18 N. W. 732, 734, 60 Wis. 71.

Webster's Dictionary gives as one of the definitions of "levy": "To raise or collect by assessment; to exact by authority, as to levy taxes, tolls, tributes, or contributions." In Morton v. Comptroller General, 4 S. C. (4 Rich.) 430, the court says: "The duty enjoined on the Legislature is to levy a tax

When the aggregate value of the property is ascertained at the time the tax levy is ordered, the Legislature frequently makes the division, and directs the levy to be made according to the resulting rate which is thus established by law, instead of merely fixing the amount to be levied, and leaving the rate to be ascertained by computation after the aggregate valuation of property subject to taxation is ascertained and known. There are two distinct stages in this process, the result of one of which is to fix an indebtedness on the collective body of taxpayers, and the other on the individual taxpayer. So the word 'levy' is indifferently employed as commonly used to express either one of these processes separately, or both collectively. A tax is said to be levied when the amount or rate to be imposed is fixed by law, for what is wanting to complete such levy is supplied by the standing tax laws, and consists in a course of administrative action. The word 'levy' is frequently used in more than one sense, and its meaning in a particular instance is determined by resort to the context. It is sometimes used for the purpose of conferring all the powers incident to the creation and collection of a tax, as when corporate authorities are vested with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes, while again it is only intended to confer administrative power in the collection of the tax, without reference to its creation." Southern Ry. Co. v. Kay, 39 S. E. 785, 786, 62 S. C. 28.

"Levying a tax" usually means the fixing of the rate at which property is to be taxed, and this is generally shown by the Legislature either mediately or immediately; that is to say, by the Legislature for the purpose of state taxation, and by the local governing bodies, such as boards of supervisors, for the local taxation, to which bodies the power of levying taxes is conferred by the Legislature. Emeric v. Alvarado, 2 Pac. 418, 469, 64 Cal. 529.

As all necessary proceedings.

The phrase "levy an assessment," in the tax legislation of 1882, means the doing of whatever things are required to be done in order to authorize the collector to procure the taxes. Hohenstatt v. City of Bridgeton, 40 Atl. 649, 62 N. J. Law, 169.

"Levy," as used in a statement that the board of police did legally levy a county, special, and poor tax, imports the ascertainment of the amount necessary to be raised for the county taxes, and a performance of such acts by the board of police as would authorize the tax collector to proceed to collect the taxes. It must be taken that they fixed the amount to be raised, and took such other steps as were necessary to authorize the tax collector to make collections, because otherwise there could not have been a legal levy of the amount of taxes. Moore v. Foote, 32 Miss. 469, 479.

Assess distinguished.

"Levied," as used in a lease providing that the lessee should pay all taxes whatsoever to be levied during the term, including the tax for the year in which the lease was made, is not synonymous with "assessed." To assess a tax is to declare a tax to be payable. To levy it is to raise or collect it. There is a wide difference between taxes assessed and taxes levied, and no tax can be levied until the assessor's return is made and acted upon by the county court, and the books placed in the hands of the collector. Bouvier says: "Assessment is the making out of a list of property, and fixing its valuation or appraisement. It is also applied to making out a list of persons, embracing their occupations, chiefly with the view of assessing the said persons and their property." Jacob's Law Dictionary, under the title of "Levy," says: "The term is used in the law for to collect or exact, as to levy money," etc. Valle v. Fargo, 1 Mo. App. 344, 347.

"Levy" and "assessment" have very different meanings. The levy of taxes is a legislative function, and declares the subjects and rate of taxation. Assessment is quasi judicial, and consists in making out a list of the taxpayer's taxable property, and fixing its valuation or appraisement. The distinction is the difference between prescribing a rule of action, and administering that rule to persons and subjects that fall within its provisions. Perry County v. Selma, M. & M. R. Co., 58 Ala. 546, 559.

"Levied or assessed," as used in Act Dec. 18, 1865 (Laws Or. p. 767, § 90, subd. 4), providing that the validity of a tax deed can be attacked on the ground that no part of the tax was "levied or assessed" upon the property sold, are convertible terms, but, strictly speaking, taxes are "levied," not "assessed." Under the law of the state, the assessment, which consists of the listing and valuation of the property, is made by the assessor, and upon this valuation the taxes are imposed or levied by the county court, and extended on the roll by its clerk. The assessment of land is made by entry in the appropriate column in the assessment roll, the name of the owner, and a description of the property, with its valuation, which, in case of a lot or block situated in any city, village, or town, a plat of which is recorded, may consist of the number of such lot and block, with the name of the village or town in which the same is situated; and where this is done the tax is levied or assessed upon the property. Kelly v. Herrall (U. S.) 20 Fed. 364, 369.

As collection.

The word "levy," when employed in relation to a public tax, has reference rather to the collection than the assessment of it. One of the law definitions of the word "levy" given by Webster is the taking or seizure of property on execution to satisfy judgments, or on warrants for the collection of taxes; a collection by execution. Rhoads v. Given (Del.) 5 Houst. 183, 186.

The word "levied" is not to be used in the sense of "collect." Scudder v. Baker, 33 N. J. Law (4 Vroom) 423, 427.

As determine to levy.

Act June 17, 1893, § 1, provides: "That whenever the corporate authorities of any city, town or village have heretofore levied or shall hereafter levy any special assessment pursuant to law, it shall be lawful for such corporate authority at any time prior to the commencement of the collection thereof, to provide by ordinance that said assessments be divided into installments," etc. Held, that a fair construction of the language, "whenever the corporate authorities of any city, town, or village have heretofore levied or shall hereafter levy any special assessment," was intended by the Legislature to mean merely that, whenever the corporate authorities have heretofore determined or shall hereafter determine to levy any special assessment, then they may provide by ordinance for a division of the assessments into installments. Walker v. People, 48 N. E. 1010, 1011, 170 Ill. 410

As a formal approval.

Acts 25th Gen. Assem. c. 62, § 1, provides that real estate on which liquor is sold shall be assessed a tax of $600 per annum, which shall be a perpetual lien on all property used in the business. Section 3 provides for the return of the property for taxation by three citizens where the assessor fails to act. Section 9 provides for the levy of a tax by the board of supervisors at its annual meeting in September. Defendant's property subject to this tax was returned by three citizens for taxation. Defendant applied to the board of supervisors to rebate the tax, which was refused, and the tax was approved and certified to the county auditor. Pending the application for rebate, defendant mortgaged the property for a pre-existing debt. Held, that the word "levy," as used in the act, meant scarcely anything more than a formal approval, the levy being made by law, and not by the board of supervisors, and consequently the lien of the tax attached prior to the determination of the board of supervisors, and was superior to the lien of the mortgage. Ferry v. Deenen (Iowa) 82 N. W. 424, 425.

5 Wds. & P.—12

As impose.

"Levy" is defined in the Standard Dictionary as the seizing or taking of property by virtue of a judicial writ, to impose or assess a tax on property, and collect it under authority of law. This definition carries with it the popular understanding of the word, and is appropriately used when speaking of taxation, and was so used in Const. art. 12, § 4, providing that the Legislature shall not levy taxes for any county, town, or municipal purpose. State v. Camp Sing, 44 Pac. 516, 519, 18 Mont. 128, 32 L. R. A. 635, 56 Am. St. Rep. 551.

In an alternative writ of mandamus, requiring corporate authorities "to assess, levy, and cause to be collected a special tax," etc., "levy" does not apply to the valuation of taxable property for taxing purposes, but means to lay a tax on the taxable property as the same is already valued for ordinary taxing purposes, no matter whether such taxation tableau is made up by the state or city authority. United States v. Port of Mobile (U. S.) 12 Fed. 768, 770.

The word "levying," as used in the statute authorizing the parishes of the state to increase the rate of taxation for the purpose of taking and constructing public buildings and works of public improvements after the same shall have been voted at a special election, and providing that, where the election results favorably to the tax, the parish or municipal authorities "shall immediately pass an ordinance levying such tax, and for such time as may be specified in the petition," is thus obviously, though incorrectly, used in the sense of imposing. Clifton v. Hobgood, 31 South. 46, 49, 106 La. 535.

Under a statute (Rev. St. 1899, § 1592) declaring that the board of aldermen shall have power by ordinance to levy and collect a special tax for the purpose of grading, etc., it is held that the word "levy" means to charge upon the person or the property which must respond to the tax a sum of money already ascertained; and an ordinance specifying that certain street improvements should be paid for by special tax bills is not such a levy. City of Westport v. Mastin, 62 Mo. App. 647, 655.

LEVY (Of Writs).

See "Equitable Levy."

Levy as proceeding, see "Proceeding."

The legal definition of the word "levy" is to have the property within the power and control of the officer. Carey v. German American Ins. Co., 54 N. W. 18, 20, 84 Wis. 80, 20 L. R. A. 267, 36 Am. St. Rep. 907 (quoting Bouv. Law Dict.).

Levy of execution "is an appropriation by the sheriff of the land designed to be levled on, indicated by some act, such as advertisement or handbills." Evans v. Wilder, 7 Mo. 359, 364.

A levy is where an officer seizes and possesses himself of chattels under a writ in such manner as to enable him to maintain trespass or replevin against a wrongful taker thereof. Carey v. German-American Ins. Co., 54 N. W. 18, 20, 84 Wis. 80, 20 L. R. A. 267, 36 Am. St. Rep. 907.

To levy means to do the acts by which an officer sets apart and appropriates for the purpose of satisfying the command of a writ of execution a part or the whole of a defendant's property. Burkett v. Clark, 64 N. W. 1113-1115, 46 Neb. 466.

"Levy," in its original sense, means an actual making the money out of the property, and in its secondary sense it means seizing the property preliminary to making the money out of it. Nelson v. Van Gazelle Valve Mfg. Co., 17 Atl. 943, 945, 45 N. J. Eq. (18 Stew.) 594.

In the absence of statutes defining its requisites in respect to money demands, "levy," means the act of appropriating or singling out the property of a debtor by the officer legally in charge of the writ against him, for its satisfaction, and it is ordinarily done by making an indorsement to that effect upon the writ. McMillan v. Gaylor (Tenn.) 35 S. W. 453, 454.

Seizure under attachment.

The term "levy" is as appropriately used in speaking of an attachment as of an execution. A levy is defined by Bouvier to be a seizure, and it is no less a seizure when made under an attachment than when made under an execution. Union Nat. Bank v. Byram, 22 N. E. 842, 844, 131 Ill. 92.

The levy of a writ of attachment consists in the seizure, actual or constructive, of the property attached; and it is essential to the lien created by the attachment of personal property—at least, as against the subsequent purchaser—that the property should be removed and held in the custody of the law. Smith v. Packard (U. S.) 98 Fed. 793, 798, 39 C. C. A. 294.

Constructive seizure.

The idea of the term "levy" includes a constructive as well as an actual taking into possession of property under execution process. Dover Glassworks Co. v. American Fire Ins. Co. (Del.) 29 Atl. 1039, 1043, 1 Marv. 32, 65 Am. St. Rep. 264.

The act of an officer, with an execution in his hands, going into a store and exhibiting the execution to one of the defendants, with the goods in plain view, and then declaring that he levied upon such goods, and making a memorandum thereof and of the goods levied on in the presence of such defendant, and folding the same in the execution, and, upon promise and acknowledgment of defendant to permit the goods to remain as they were, leaving them in the store and in such defendant's charge, amounts to an actual levy, which was not abandoned by so leaving the goods with the defendant. Bond v. Willett, *40 N. Y. (1 Keyes) 377, 386.

Where the officer made a pencil memorandum of the levy of an attachment on the debtor's land on a separate paper, and folded it with the writ, and afterwards indorsed the levy on the writ, the levy was valid, and dated from the time of the pencil memorandum, though the wording of the description of the land indorsed on the writ differed from that of the memorandum; either description being sufficient to identify the land. McMillan v. Gaylor (Tenn.) 35 S. W. 453, 454.

The expression "to levy on goods and chattels" means to do the act or acts by which a sheriff sets apart and appropriates, for the purpose of satisfying the command of his writ, a part or the whole of the defendant's goods and chattels. Actual touch of the goods is not necessary. It is enough if the officer at the time of levying have them in his presence or under his peaceable control. Nor is the removal of the goods necessary to the perfection of the levy, although the goods remaining in the possession of the defendant may be deemed fraudulent as against subsequent executions. Lloyd v. Wyckoff, 11 N. J. Law (6 Halst.) 218, 225, 227.

No particular formality is legally necessary to constitute a levy, so that a levy on stocks, a list of which the sheriff has in his possession, is valid, if he announces his levy thereon to the debtor, who confesses his ownership thereof, and then incloses the list with the writ, to be afterwards attached thereto. In re Braden's Estate, 30 Atl. 746, 747, 165 Pa. 184.

The action of an officer in entering certain shares of stock upon his inventory and making a return thereof with an execution, does not constitute a levy on the stock. Princeton Bank v. Crozer, 22 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 383, 386, 53 Am. Dec. 254.

As a conveyance.

A levy is a statutory conveyance to which the same rules of construction are to be applied as to a deed of conveyance, and there is no difference in their application or effect whether applied to an exception, a reservation, or a grant. So a levy reserving an estate less than a fee of a part of the premises set off is void, in relation to the particular tract from which the reservation is made. Jewett v. Whitney, 43 Me. 242, 251.

A levy on land, followed by a set-off, occupies the place and serves the purpose of a conveyance. Standing alone, it is not even an inchoate transfer of title, except as against the judgment debtor and those identified in position with him. It is true that, under a levy duly perfected, the title of the creditor relates back to the first step of the process; but this legal fiction is never permitted to work injustice to a bona fide purchaser, in whom any rights may have meantime become vested. Schroeder v. Tomlinson, 39 Atl. 484, 486, 70 Conn. 348.

Taking of land.

The term "levy," when employed to denote the acts by which an officer manifests the intent to appropriate land to the satisfaction of an execution, and when not defined by statute, has considerable elasticity of meaning. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 691, in levying an execution on land subject to the judgment lien it is not necessary that the sheriff file a copy of the writ with the recorder of the county, a description of the property levied on, or a notice that it is levied on, as in the case of lands attached. Lehnhardt v. Jennings, 51 Pac. 195, 196, 119 Cal. 192.

Personalty only.

A provision in a fire insurance policy that the levy of an execution on property insured shall terminate the risk is applicable only to personal property; there being, in practice, no levy of an execution on real estate. Hammel v. Queens Ins. Co., 11 N. W. 349, 350, 54 Wis. 72, 41 Am. Rep. 1.

A policy of insurance on a building provided that the commencement of foreclosure proceedings or the levy of an execution shall be deemed an alienation of the property. Held, that the words "levy of an execution" should be construed to refer only to a levy on personal property, as a levy on real estate is unnecessary, and is now unknown to the law. Hence the filing of a mechanic's lien, and the obtaining of a judgment enforcing the same, do not avoid the policy. Colt v. Phoenix Fire Ins. Co., 54 N. Y. 595, 597.

In holding that a condition in a fire policy on real property that it shall become void if the property be levied on or attached, or change takes place in title or possession, was not applicable to real estate, but was confined exclusively to personal property, the court say that they are unable to find any similar case containing the word "attached," but find several cases using the words "levied on," or "taken into possession or custody;" and it was held that these words were meant to have special, if not exclusive, reference to personal property, the policies containing the clause being adapted to insurance of both real and personal property, and as, when personal property is levied upon, there is usually an actual seizure of it by the officer in whose custody it remains until the sale, the phrase was designed to guard against any supposed increase of risk resulting from a change of possession, and therefore that it has no application to a technical levy of execution on real estate. We do not think that the word "attached" adds anything to the meaning of the phrase, or serves any purpose except to clear up a doubt which might possibly arise of its application to the case of an attachment of personal property on a writ; the word "levy" being more commonly used to designate the seizure of property on execution than on a writ of attachment. Tefft v. Providence Washington Ins. Co., 32 Atl. 914, 19 R. I. 185, 61 Am. St. Rep. 761.

Seizure required.

The term "levy," in legal parlance, signifies taking possession. Burchell v. Green, 27 N. Y. Supp. 82, 83, 6 Misc. Rep. 236.

The word "levy" itself implies seizure in the ordinary way by entry. Textor v. Shipley, 38 Atl. 932, 933, 86 Md. 424.

The word "levy," as used in the chapter relating to executions, shall be construed to mean the actual seizure of property by the officer charged with the execution of the writ. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 3174.

To constitute a levy on personal property, the officer must assume dominion over it. He must not only have a view of the property, but he must assert his title to it so as to render himself chargeable as a trespasser, but for the protection of process. Crass v. Memphis & C. R. Co., 11 South. 480, 481, 96 Ala. 447.

Where a sheriff returned on a writ of attachment, "Levied this attachment on the following named slaves," etc., it was held that by the word "levied" must be understood a legal levy, including a seizure of property. Baldwin v. Conger, 17 Miss. (9 Smedes & M.) 516, 520.

To "levy" means to seize property, subject it to the satisfaction of an execution; to levy on goods and chattels; to take into custody or seize specific property in satisfaction of a writ; and, when an officer levies on property under an execution, it is a seizure of the property, a taking possession of the same, and it is then under the dominion of such officer. Carr v. Huffman, 41 Pac. 982, 984, 1 Kan. App. 713.

The word "levy," as defined by our statutes, means actual seizure; that is, the officer must take actual possession of the goods. A sheriff with an execution against a carriage dealer, by merely going into the carriage shop when no one was present, and moving one buggy a few feet, and then going away without saying anything to any one, and thereafter indorsing on the execution a levy on several carriages, does not make a levy. Douglas v. Orr, 58 Mo. 573, 574.

The return of a levy indorsed on an execution is prima facie evidence in the proceeding of which it forms a part. "Levy," in its legal acceptation, means the act of appropriating—a singling out—certain property of the debtor for the satisfaction of an execution, and it is done by making an indorsement to that effect upon the execution. In regard to land, it may be made in the office, although it may be ten miles distant, and the officer has never seen it. In regard to personal property, it is necessary for the officer to go to it, so as to have it in his power to take it into his actual possession if he chooses. Hence it is held that the term "levy" does not, ex vi termini, mean a seizing or taking actual possession by laying hands on the property. Bland v. Whitfield, 46 N. C. 122, 125.

A "levy" means this, and never more,—the taking possession of property by the officer. When there is possession, absolute or constructive, there is a levy, and in any collateral proceeding it is enough that there was such possession. "Here the only possession which could be taken of the property was in fact taken under the order of sale. Now although such taking of possession was unauthorized, yet the officer could do nothing more if he had been authorized; and, having taken such possession and being in such possession, he made all the levy that was necessary to uphold his sale. He could have taken no further possession if a general execution had been placed in his hands. Hence we think that all the levy that was indispensable was in fact made." Pracht v. Pister, 1 Pac. 638, 639, 30 Kan. 568.

An officer cannot make a levy on the goods in a store by merely walking into the store with an execution in his possession, and subsequently making a memorandum of the levy, which he annexed to and placed within the execution. In order to constitute a valid levy, as to third persons, the goods must not only be within the view of the officer, but must be subjected to his control. He must take actual possession, which, although the goods are present, can only be done by manual acts, or by an oral assertion that a levy is intended, and which is acquiesced in by those who are present and interested in the question. A levy cannot rest on a mere undivulged intention to seize property. Something more is required. There must be possessory acts to indicate a levy, or it must be word of mouth, so that what is thus done by the officer, if not justified by the process in his hands, will make him a trespasser. Camp v. Chamberlain (N. Y.) 5 Denio, 198, 202, 203.

When an execution is issued for money, and comes into the hands of an officer, the levy of it—the satisfaction of it—is made by seizing the property of the defendant. To be sure, the conversion of the thing seized into money is made before the execution is, in common parlance, said to be satisfied. But a levy is prima facie a satisfaction. Valle v. Fargo, 1 Mo. App. 344, 347.

The word "levy," in our legal nomenclature, imports an actual seizure, by manual caption, of goods and chattels, accompanied by an inventory of the same, and, in the case of land, a description thereof, and no more. It is true that the word, in its broadest sense, may include the whole process of making the money mentioned in the writ by seizure of goods, making a description of lands, advertising them for sale, selling them, and collecting the money. This abundantly appears by a perusal of the various judicial deliverances upon the subject of proceedings under execution, as found in the reported cases collected in Stew. Dig. pp. 531, 532, 534. Birbeck Investment, Savings & Loan Co. v. Gardner, 37 Atl. 767, 768, 55 N. J. Eq. 632.

Service distinguished.

"The 'service of an execution' and the 'levy of an execution' are often referred to as convertible terms; but in strictly legal parlance the service of an execution may be said to be the communication of its contents to the execution defendant, accompanied by or followed with a demand for its satisfaction, and, in its natural order, precedes the levy of an execution." Laub v. Ulmer, 60 N. E. 1009, 1010, 27 Ind. App. 107.

LEVY AND COLLECT.

A statutory authority to levy and collect special taxation assessments on real estate to pay the cost of street improvements is held not to carry with it or include the power to sell the real estate upon which such tax or assessment is imposed, in case of nonpayment. Ransom v. Irey, 60 N. W. 601, 605, 42 Neb. 186.

LEVY AND SALE.

When used with reference to judicial proceedings in civil matters, the words "levy and sale" are equivalent to the word "execution." Each expression means the subjecting of property to the satisfaction of the judgment. An exemption of land granted to an Indian tribe from levy and sale is held to render the land exempt from execution for satisfaction of any judgment. Mianja County Com'rs v. Wan-zop-pe-che, 3 Kan. 364, 365.

"Levy, sale, and forfeiture," as used in a provision in an Indian treaty exempting Indian lands from levy, sale, and forfeiture,

"is not, in the absence of expressions so to limit it, to be confined to levy and sale under ordinary judicial proceedings only, but is to be extended to levy and sale by county officers also for nonpayment of taxes." The Kansas Indians, 72 U. S. (5 Wall.) 737, 760, 18 L. Ed. 667.

LEVYING WAR.

To levy war is to make war. Lloyd v. Wyckoff, 11 N. J. Law (6 Halst.) 218, 225, 227.

Any assemblage of men for the purpose of revolutionizing by force the government established by the United States in any of its territories, although as a step to or the means of executing some greater projects, amounts to levying war. Ex parte Bollman, 8 U. S. (4 Cranch) 75, 76, 2 L. Ed. 554.

To constitute levying war against the people in this state, an actual act of war must be committed. To conspire to levy war is not enough. Cook's Pen. Code (N. Y.) § 39; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 6322.

As any combination to resist law.

"Levying war," as used in the provision of the federal Constitution, declaring the act of levying war against the United States by a citizen thereof a crime, etc., includes not only the act of making war for the purpose of entirely overturning the government, but also any combination forcibly to oppose the execution of any public law of the United States, if accompanied or followed by an act of forcible opposition to such law, in pursuance of such combination. The words include the act of a conspiracy to forcibly resist an execution of a draft for soldiers. Druecker v. Salomon, 21 Wis. 621, 626, 94 Am. Dec. 571.

"Levying war," as used in the provision in the United States Constitution, defining treason against the United States as only consisting in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies and giving them aid and comfort, is construed to mean "a general assemblage of persons in force to overthrow the government or to coerce its conduct." "The words embrace not only those acts by which war is brought into existence, but also those acts by which war is prosecuted. They levy war who carry on war. The offense is completed whether the force be directed to the entire overthrow of the government throughout the country, or to only certain portions of the country, or to defeat the execution and compel the repeal of one of its public laws." United States v. Greathouse (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 18, 25.

A levying of war, without having recourse to rules of construction or artificial reasoning, would seem to be nothing short of the employment, or at least of the embodying of a military force, armed and arrayed in a war-like manner, for the purpose of forcibly subverting the government, dismembering the Union, or destroying the legislative functions of Congress. These troops should be so armed and so directed as to leave no doubt that the United States or their government were the immediate object of the attack. The act of resisting the embargo law by taking away from the United States officers and soldiers a raft of timber which had been seized by the collector, though done by a considerable force and by the firing of guns, and thereby intimidating the collector and troops, does not constitute a levying of war or the offense of treason. United States v. Hoxie (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 397, 398.

Treason against the United States is defined by the Constitution itself. Congress has no power to enlarge, restrain, construe, or define the offense. The construction is intrusted to the court alone. By this instrument it is declared that "treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." What constitutes levying war against the government is a question which has been the subject of much discussion whenever an indictment has been tried under this article of the Constitution. The levying of war is not necessarily to be judged of alone by the number or array of troops, but there must be a conspiracy to resist by force, and an actual resistance by force of arms, or intimidation by numbers. The conspiracy and insurrection connected with it must be to effect something of a public nature, to overthrow the government, or to nullify some law of the United States, and totally to hinder its execution or compel its repeal. A conspiracy to resist by force the execution of a law in particular instances only—a conspiracy for a personal or private, as distinguished from a public and national, purpose—is not treason, however great the violence or force or numbers of the conspirators may be. So where a number of citizens in a free state collected together to prevent the enforcement of the fugitive slave law, and the return of an escaped slave to his master in a slave state, the question whether such individuals were levying war against the United States was submitted to the jury, who found for the defendants. United States v. Hanway (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 105, 108.

Enlistment.

To constitute a "levying of war," within the meaning of those words as used in the federal Constitution, making the levying of war against the government an act of treason, there must be an assemblage of persons for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable purpose. The words do not include the mere enlistment of men to serve against the government. Ex parte Bollman, 8 U. S. (4 Cranch) 75, 126, 2 L. Ed. 554.

LEWD.

See "Gross Lewdness"; "Open and Gross Lewdness."

"Lewd" has been decided to mean having a tendency to excite lustful thoughts, in the law defining what kind of matter is non-mailable. Rev. St. § 3893, as amended by the act of July 12, 1876. Congress, in using the terms "obscene," "indecent," "lewd," and "lascivious," had in mind the common meaning of those terms, and meant by the use of these common and plain words that nothing should circulate in the mails which would disseminate immorality in any form to the people. United States v. Britton (U. S.) 17 Fed. 731, 733.

The word "lewd," in the federal statute prohibiting the mailing of lewd books, etc., means having a tendency to excite lustful thoughts. United States v. Bennett (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cts. 1093, 1104; United States v. Slenker (U. S.) 32 Fed. 691, 694.

"Lewd" means dissolute, lustful, filthy; and this is its meaning in a statute making it an offense for persons to lewdly and lasciviously cohabit. State v. Lawrence, 27 N. W. 126, 129, 19 Neb. 307.

A statement that a woman is a lewd woman is not actionable, as charging unchastity, since "lewd" means lustful, libidinous, but does not import criminal indulgence. Snow v. Witcher, 31 N. C. 346, 348.

"Lewd," as used in Rev. St. § 3893, making it a criminal offense to place in the mails any obscene, lewd, or lascivious publication, signifies that form of immorality which has relation to sexual impurity, and has the same meaning as is given at common law in prosecutions for obscene libel. Swearingen v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 562, 563, 161 U. S. 446, 40 L. Ed. 765; United States v. Clarke (U. S.) 38 Fed. 500, 501.

"Lewd" is defined to mean "given to the unlawful indulgence of lust; eager for sexual indulgence." The word is used in such sense in Rev. St. § 3893, which prohibits the transmission in the mails of obscene, lewd, or lascivious books, pamphlets, etc. United States v. Bebout (U. S.) 28 Fed. 522, 524.

25 Stat. 496, forbidding the sending of an obscene or lewd pamphlet, writing, etc., through the mails, means one describing dissolute or unchaste acts, scenes, or incidents, or one, the reading whereof, by reason of its contents, is calculated to excite lustful and sensual desires in those whose minds are open to such influences. United States v. Clarke (U. S.) 38 Fed. 732, 733.

The question what constitutes obscene, lewd, lascivious, or indecent publications is largely a question for the conscience and opinion of the jury; but, before a publication can be regarded as lewd, it must be calculated, with the ordinary reader, to deprave his morals or lead to impure purposes. Dunlop v. United States, 17 Sup. Ct. 375, 380, 165 U. S. 486, 41 L. Ed. 799.

The words "obscene, lewd, and lascivious," in Rev. St. § 3893 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2658], making it criminal to transmit any obscene, lewd, or lascivious book, etc., through the mail, do not apply to letters inclosed in envelopes directed to a debtor, on which the words "dead beats" are printed in such a manner as to attract attention. The purpose of the act was to prevent the mails from being used to circulate matter to corrupt the morals of the people. The history of this legislation clearly shows that Congress determined to exclude from the mails impure and immodest writings, and that rough and coarse language are not within the terms of the act. Ex parte Doran (U. S.) 32 Fed. 76, 77.

The words "lewd, obscene, lascivious, or of an indecent character," in the federal statute prohibiting the sending of such matter through the mail, do not necessarily mean that the separate words are of such a character, but the character of the letter is to be determined by treating it as a whole. United States v. Hanover (U. S.) 17 Fed. 444.

The words "obscene, lewd, or lascivious," in Rev. St. § 3893 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2658], prohibiting the sending through the mail of any obscene, lewd, or lascivious book, pamphlet, picture, paper, letter, writing, print, or other publication of an indecent character, are not descriptive of language of merely an insulting character, but are limited to the use of words or pictures appealing to the animal passion, stimulating it, corrupting and debauching the mind and heart. United States v. Durant (U. S.) 46 Fed. 753.

Imputation of crime.

Rev. St. § 3893 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2658], prohibiting the transmission of an "obscene, lewd, or lascivious" print, writing, etc., through the mails, etc., does not include a letter imputing to the person addressed an atrocious crime, though exceedingly coarse and vulgar, where it has no tendency to excite libidinous thoughts or impure desires, or to deprave and corrupt the morals of those whose minds are open to such influences. The words imply something tending to suggest libidinous thoughts or excite impure desires. United States v. Wightman (U. S.) 29 Fed. 636.

LEWD HOUSE.

"Lewd house," as used in a statute forbidding the keeping of a lewd house for the practice of fornication or adultery, imports a house given to the unlawful indulgence of lust, including fornication or adultery. "A lewd house may be said to be a house in which fornication or adultery is practiced." Hence a charge of keeping a lewd house is sufficient, under the statute. Clifton v. State, 53 Ga. 241, 244.

LEWDLY.

That a man and woman did lewdly and lasciviously associate is shown by an indictment for adultery which alleges that they did unlawfully associate, bed, and cohabit together, and did commit adultery. State v. Stubbs, 13 S. E. 90, 108 N. C. 774; Luster v. State, 2 South. 690, 691, 23 Fla. 339; Pinson v. State, 28 Fla. 735, 9 South. 706, 707; Thomas v. State, 39 Fla. 437, 22 South. 725, 726; Penton v. State, 28 South. 774, 775, 42 Fla. 560.

LEWDNESS.

The term "lewdness," in Bl. Comm. c. 4, p. 64, does not mean illicit intercourse, but gross indecency, as if one expose himself naked in the streets. Brooks v. State, 10 Tenn. (2 Yerg.) 482, 483 (citing Jac. Law Dict.).

"Lewdness" is defined in 2 Abbott, Law Dict., as being equivalent to "licentiousness." The word "licentiousness" is so used in an act entitled to protect females from licentiousness. Holton v. State, 9 South. 716, 717, 23 Fla. 303.

Lewdness is that form of immorality which has relation to sexual impurity. United States v. Males (U. S.) 51 Fed. 41, 42.

"Lewdness" is unlawful indulgence of the animal desires. State v. Toombs, 45 N. W. 300, 301, 79 Iowa, 741.

Lewdness is the offense of living and cohabiting together as man and wife, openly, publicly, and notoriously, without being lawfully married. The idea of notoriety is a necessary ingredient of the offense, and must appear in its description in an indictment. State v. Moore, 31 Tenn. (1 Swan) 136, 137.

"Lewd and lascivious cohabitation," as used in Gen. St. c. 165, § 6, prohibiting lewd and lascivious cohabitation, does not include cohabitation under an honest, though mistaken, belief that the parties cohabiting are lawfully married, if the cohabitation is not under such circumstances as to create a common scandal or tend to corrupt the public morals. The words import an evil intention. Commonwealth v. Munson, 127 Mass. 459, 470, 34 Am. Rep. 411.

The word "lewdness" at common law meant open and public indecency, but as used in Gen. St. c. 165, § 6, imposing a punishment for open and gross lewdness and lascivious behavior, it is used in a broader sense, and means the irregular indulgence of lust, whether public or private. Commonwealth v. Wardell, 128 Mass. 52, 54, 35 Am. Rep. 357; Commonwealth v. Lambert, 94 Mass. (12 Allen) 177, 178.

Rev. St. c. 90, § 8, making gross lewdness and lascivious behavior punishable by imprisonment, etc., includes an indecent exposure of the person of a man to a woman, with a view to excite unchaste desires on her part, and to induce her to yield. The crime does not depend upon the number of persons to whom a man thus exposes himself—whether one or many. State v. Millard, 18 Vt. 574, 577, 46 Am. Dec. 170.

By Code 1873, § 4012, the offense designated as lewdness is described, among other things, as follows: "If any man or woman, married or unmarried, is guilty of open and gross lewdness, and designedly makes any open and indecent or obscene exposure of his or her person or the person of another, such person shall be punished," etc. State v. Banguess, 76 N. W. 508, 509, 106 Iowa, 107.

LEX LOCI CONTRACTUS.

The phrase "lex loci contractus" is used, in a double sense, to mean sometimes the law of the place where a contract is entered into; sometimes, that of the place of its performance. And when it is employed to describe the law of the seat of the obligation, it is on that account confusing. The law we are in search of, which is to decide upon the nature, interpretation, and validity of the engagement in question, is that which the parties have either expressly or presumptively incorporated into their contract, as constituting its obligation. It has never been better described than it was incidentally by Chief Justice Marshall in Wayman v. Southard, 23 U. S. (10 Wheat.) 1, 48, 6 L. Ed. 253, where he defined it as a principle of universal law—"the principle that in every forum a contract is governed by the law with a view to which it was made." The same idea had been expressed by Lord Mansfield in Robinson v. Bland, 2 Burrows, 1077. "The law of the place," he said, "can never be the rule where the transaction is entered into with an express view to the law of another country, as the rule by which it is to be governed." And in Lloyd v. Guibert, L. R. 1 Q. B. 120, in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, it was said that "It is necessary to consider by what general law the parties intended that the transaction should be governed, or, rather, by what general law it is just to presume that they have submitted themselves in the matter." Pritchard v. Norton, 1 Sup. Ct. 102, 111, 106 U. S. 124, 27 L. Ed. 104. The following propositions may be formulated from the above: First, it is a principle of universal justice that in every forum a contract is governed by the law with a view to which it was made, and therefore the mere place should not govern the transaction when it appears that it is entered into with direct reference to the law of another country; second, that it is necessary to consider by what general law the parties intended that the transaction should be governed, or, rather, by what general law it is just to presume that they have submitted themselves in the matter; third, that it is to be remembered that in obligations it is the will of the contracting parties, and not the law, which fixes the place of fulfillment, whether that place be fixed by express words or by tacit implication as the place to the jurisdiction of which the contracting parties elected to submit themselves. Gibson v. Connecticut Fire Ins. Co. (U. S.) 77 Fed. 561, 565.

LIABLE.

See "Secondarily Liable."

Webster distinguishes the shades of meaning between the word "liable" and its synonym "subject." He says: "'Liable' denotes something external which may befall us; 'subject' refers to evils which arise chiefly from internal necessity, and are likely to do so. Hence the former applies more to what is accidental; the latter, to things from which we often or inevitably suffer." An event is liable if its occurrence is within the range of possibility, but the law does not hold a master bound to guard against such an event, and, where the only proof that a certain event was liable to occur was that it did occur, the only thing the evidence tends to show is that it was an event within the range of possibility, and the master was not liable for the injuries. Beasley v. Linehan Transfer Co., 50 S. W. 87, 89, 148 Mo. 413.

The clause in a marine policy that the insurers are not liable for seizure by the Portuguese for illicit trade meant the same as if it had stated, "Insurers do not take the risk of illicit trade with the Portuguese." Church v. Hubbert, 6 U. S. (2 Cranch) 187 236, 237, 2 L. Ed. 249.

"Liable," as contained in an instruction in an action by a servant against his master for injuries received from the fall of timber, which was being raised by a rope which slipped off, stating that it was negligence if the rope was so fastened that it was liable to slip off, meant exposed to the casualty or contingency, more or less probable, of slipping off the log; and the instruction was erroneous, as warranting the inference that if the rope was so tied that by any accident, due to any cause, however unexpected, it might slip off, the defendant was negligent. Williams v. Southern Ry. Co., 26 S. E. 32, 119 N. C. 746.

The word "liable" refers to a future possible or probable happening which may not actually occur. The word means exposed to a certain contingency or casualty, more or less probable. As used in fire policies providing a certain amount of interest on freight cars, the property of other roads for which the assured are or may be liable while on the line of their road does not signify a perfected or fixed liability, but, rather, a condition out of which a legal liability may arise. Home Ins. Co. v. Peoria & P. U. Ry. Co., 52 N. E. 862, 863, 178 Ill. 64.

Under a statute providing that, if creditors of an intestate fail to give in a statement of their debts within a certain time, the executor or administrator shall not be liable to make good the same, the words "shall not be liable" mean that the executor or administrator shall not be personally liable, and not that he shall not be officially liable if he has assets still remaining in his hands. Yerby v. Matthews, 26 Ga. 549, 551.

"Liable," as used in Gen. St. c. 189, § 1, providing that all persons who are qualified to vote on any proposition to impose a tax or for the expenditure of money in any town shall be liable to serve as jurors, etc., should be construed as tantamount to "qualified"; the section defining the qualifications of a juror, as well as the liability to serve. State v. Davis, 12 R. I. 492, 493, 34 Am. Rep. 704.

The statute declaring that "all free white male persons who are twenty-one years of age, and not over sixty, shall be liable to serve as jurors," necessarily implies that no one under 21 or over 60 shall be so liable. The word "qualified" is neither expressed nor implied in the act. The word both expressed and implied is "liable," which has a very different meaning from "qualified." Its meaning is "bound" or "obliged." The fact that a person over 60 years of age is not liable to serve as a juror does not mean that he is disqualified, but means that he is not required to serve if he claims his exemption. Booth v. Commonwealth (Va.) 16 Grat. 519, 525.

LIABLE TO DETERIORATE FROM KEEPING.

The words "liable to deteriorate from keeping," employed in Civ. Code, § 5463, for the purpose of designating a class of personal property which may, under its provisions, be brought to speedy sale, do not apply to articles which, because of their enduring nature, are unlikely, merely by reason of the lapse of a brief space of time, to undergo changes in form or otherwise, causing depreciation in value, but to articles which are for such a reason subject to such changes. An ordinary cotton press does not fall within the class described by such words. Jolley v. Har-deman, 36 S. E. 952, 953, 111 Ga. 749.

LIABLE TO DISTRESS.

Within the statutes of Pennsylvania providing that the goods and chattels being in or upon any lands which are demised for life or years, taken by fraud and execution, and liable to the distress of the landlord, shall be liable for payment of money due for rent at the time of taking such goods and execution, the words "liable to the distress of the landlord" are merely descriptive of the goods or chattels with respect to the lien or preference of the landlord's interests, and do not import that the distress must be made as a condition for the existence of such lien or preference. In re Mitchell (U. S.) 116 Fed. 87, 98.

LIABLE TO DRAFT.

"Liable to draft," as used in Act Aug. 25, 1864, § 3, allowing a bounty to any person liable to draft in any ward, who shall furnish a substitute, etc., refers to the whole process of drafting into service, and not merely the drawing of the name from the wheel, and hence after a person's name is drawn he is still "liable to draft" within the act. Gregg Tp. v. Jamison 55 Pa (F. P. E. Smith) 468, 473.

LIABLE TO ENTRY

The words "other tract liable to entry," in Rev. St. U. S. § 2372 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1451], providing for the transfer to the tracts intended of the entry of public land, erroneous because of the mistake in the numbers or distributions of the tract on the part of the person entering, if the tract intended to be entered is unsold, but, if sold, to any tract liable to entry, and providing that the statute shall not affect the rights of third persons, refers to the time of the transfer, and not to the time of making the application. And therefore a transfer is authorized if the tract intended was unsold at the date of the transfer. Manuel v. Fabyanski, 46 N. W. 208, 209, 44 Minn. 71.

LIABLE TO EXECUTION.

"Execution" is process authorizing the seizure and appropriation of the property of a defendant in satisfaction of a judgment against him. The manner of converting the property into money after it is seized, and the steps to be taken, are prescribed by statute, and depend upon the nature and the character of the property, whether it be real or personal, or choses in action. Whenever property may be seized upon by the writ, and, by proper proceedings prescribed by law, converted into money which is applied upon the judgment, it is "liable to execution." If by means of the writ the property is appropriated to the satisfaction of the judgment, it may be said to be "liable to execution." Lambert v. Powers, 36 Iowa, 18, 20.

LIABILITY.

See "Contingent Debt or Liability"; "Outstanding Liabilities"; "Pecuniary Liability"; "Present Liabilities"; "Rights or Liabilities."
All liabilities, see "All."

"Liability," as defined in Abb. Law Dict. 38, means "amenability or responsibility to law; the condition of one who is subject to a charge or duty which may be judicially enforced." Wood v. Currey, 57 Cal. 208, 209.

"Liability," as a legal term, signifies that condition of affairs which gives rise to an obligation to do a particular thing to be enforced by action; as we say an executor is liable for the debts of his testator, or a principal is liable for the acts of his agent. Haywood v. Shreve, 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 94, 104.

"Liability is responsibility; the state of one who is bound in law and justice to do something which may be enforced by action. This liability may arise from contracts, either express or implied, or in consequence of torts committed." Bouv. Law Dict. The term is broader than the term "debt." McElfresh v. Kirkendall, 36 Iowa, 224, 226; Lattin v. Gillette, 30 Pac. 545, 546, 95 Cal. 317, 29 Am. St. Rep. 115; Benge's Adm'r v. Bowling, 51 S. W. 151, 106 Ky. 575.

The word "liability," in Code Civ. Proc. § 339, limiting the time in which an action upon a contract, obligation, or liability not founded upon an instrument in writing may be brought, is the most comprehensive of the several terms used in the section, and includes both of the others, inasmuch as it is the condition in which an individual is placed after a breach of his contract or a violation of any obligation resting upon him. Lattin v. Gillette, 30 Pac. 545, 546, 95 Cal. 317, 29 Am. St. Rep. 115.

Giving the words "obligations and liabilities" their full force and effect in Gen. St. 1889, par. 1268, providing that any two or more railroad companies may consolidate and form one company, subject to all the obligations and liabilities to the state which belonged to or rested upon either of the companies making such consolidation, "obligations" may be construed as embracing all pecuniary duties in the way of being answerable for debts, demands, etc. "Liabilities" may mean the burdens imposed by the Constitution and the statutes; that is, the responsibility or bounden duty to the state under the Constitution and statutes. If obligations to the state only were intended by both terms, it would not have been necessary to have added the words "liabilities to the state," because "liabilities" is defined as the state of being liable, as the liability of an insurer, liability to the law, responsibility, accountability, bounden duty. To hold that "obligations and liabilities" was limited to the state only would be to say that the Legislature was guilty of a repetition of the same meaning in different words. Berry v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co., 34 Pac. 805, 808, 52 Kan. 759, 39 Am. St. Rep. 371.

"Liability" is defined by Black's Law Dictionary to be "the state of being bound or obliged in law or justice to do, pay, or make good something; legal responsibility." Webster defines it to be "the state of being bound or obliged in law or justice; responsibility." Bouvier defines it to be "responsibility; the state of one who is bound in law and justice to do something which may be enforced by action." Benge's Adm'r v. Bowling, 51 S. W. 151, 106 Ky. 575.

"Liability" has been defined as "responsibility; the duty of one who is bound in law and justice to do something which may be enforced by action." This liability may arise from contracts, express or implied, or in consequence of torts committed. Piller v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 52 Cal. 42, 44.

"Liabilities" are the antithesis of "assets," and a prohibition in the statute against the creation of any "liability" by a municipal corporation in excess of a certain sum does not imply that liabilities may be incurred up to the amount of the assets. Lovejoy v. Inhabitants of Foxcroft, 40 Atl. 141, 147, 91 Me. 367.

Alimony.

In Linton v. Linton, 15 Q. B. Div. 239, 245; Id., 54 Law J. Q. B. 529, 530; Id., 33 Wkly. Rep. 714, 715; Id., 2 Morrell, Bankr. Cas. 179; Id., 49 J. P. 597—it was held that future payments of alimony were not capable of being valued, and were not a debt or "liability" within the meaning of the bankruptcy act, and so could not be proven in the bankruptcy of the husband. Lynde v. Lynde, 52 Atl. 694, 702, 64 N. J. Eq. 736, 58 L. R. A. 471, 97 Am. St. Rep. 692. See, also, In re Hawkins [1894] 1 Q. B. 25, 27; Id., 10 Reports, 29, 31; Id., 69 Law T. (N. Rep. 46; Id., 4 Manson, Bankr. Cas. 207.

The bankruptcy act of 1898 (Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 544 [U. S. Comp. St.

1901, p. 3418]) provides that the debts of a bankrupt which may be proved and allowed against his estate are a fixed liability, as evidenced by judgment or an instrument in writing, absolutely owing at the time of filing the petition against him, whether then payable or not, with any interest thereon which may have been recovered. As used in this act, the word "debt" differs from the same word as used in the bankruptcy acts which have preceded it, in that it has not the limited or restricted meaning which has been given to it in text-books. The act itself defines the word, and carries it beyond a certain sum of money due by certain and express agreement, and declares that for the purpose of the act it shall include any fixed liability evidenced by judgment. "Liability" is a term of broader significance than "debt." "Liability" is responsibility. In Joslin v. New Jersey Car-Spring Co., 36 N. J. Law (7 Vroom) 141, "liability" is defined to be a state of being bound or obliged in law or justice. It signifies that condition of affairs which gives rise to an obligation to do a certain particular thing, to be enforced by action. Haywood v. Shreve, 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 94. Under such definition a claim of a bankrupt's divorced wife for unpaid monthly installments of the alimony awarded her is a provable debt. In re Van Orden (U. S.) 96 Fed. 86, 88.

Bond.

A bond is not an "indebtedness" or "liability." It is only the evidence or representative of an indebtedness. So that the issuance of a bond to fund an existing debt is not to incur an indebtedness or liability. City of Los Angeles v. Teed, 44 Pac. 580, 582, 112 Cal. 319.

Bonds issued by a corporation previous to a transfer of stock by a stockholder in the corporation, though not due and payable at that time, constitute a "liability" within McClain's Code, § 1629, providing that a transfer of stock shall not exempt the person making it from any liability of the corporation created prior thereto. The word "liability" is ordinarily applied to a condition, and is defined to mean the condition of being responsible for a possible or actual loss, expense, or burden; that for which one is responsible or liable. Standard Dict. p. 1024. There is no reason for restricting the word as used in the statute under consideration to liabilities which had become due or payable at or before the transfer. The word "liability" has a much more extensive signification than the term "debt." White v. Greene (Iowa) 70 N. W. 182, 184.

A bond is not an "indebtedness" or "liability." It is only an evidence or representation of the indebtedness. Reynolds v. Lyon County, 96 N. W. 1096, 1098, 121 Iowa, 733.

Contingent future liability.

"Liabilities," as used in Rev. St. § 5211 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3498], requiring the liabilities of a national bank to be stated in the reports to the Comptroller of the Currency, includes contingent as well as absolute liabilities, and hence an unmatured note, payment of which at maturity is guaranteed by the bank, should be included in the list of liabilities. Cochran v. United States, 15 Sup. Ct. 628, 629, 157 U. S. 286, 39 L. Ed. 704.

The second definition of the word "liability" in Black's Law Dictionary is "exposed or subject to a given contingency, risk, or casualty, which is more or less probable." In Rapalje's Law Dictionary it is said that "liability" is the condition of being actually or potentially subject to an obligation; is used either generally, as including every kind of obligation, or in the more special sense to denote inchoate, future, unascertained, or imperfect obligations, as opposed to "debts," the essence of which is that they are ascertained and certain. In Cochran v. United States, 157 U. S. 286, 15 Sup. Ct. 628, 39 L. Ed. 704, the court said: "We know of no definition of the word 'liability,' either given in the dictionaries or as used in the common speech of men, which restricts it to such as are absolute, or excludes the idea of contingency. In fact, it is more frequently used in the latter sense than in the former, as when we speak of the liability of an insurer or of a common carrier, or the liability to accidents or to errors; and in Webster's Dictionary the word 'liable' is said to refer to a possible or probable happening, which may not actually occur." State v. Sheets, 72 Pac. 334, 335, 26 Utah, 105.

The charter of a municipal corporation provided that the common council shall have no power to contract debts, incur liabilities, or make expenditures in any one year which shall exceed the revenues for the same year, unless first authorized so to do by a majority vote of the taxpayers. A contract entered into without submitting the question to the taxpayers, provided for a supply of water for a term of years at a cost per year which would not exceed the authorized levy for past years, but the aggregate of which would exceed any such percentage as could be allowed in any one year. Held, that the whole contract obligation to the full extent of the rental for the entire period of years covered was a "liability" within the meaning of the charter, so that the contract was void. Niles Waterworks v. City of Niles, 59 Mich. 311, 314, 26 N. W. 525.

Where a bond provides for indemnity against liability for damage or expense, a right of action on the bond accrues when the party becomes legally liable for damage, and he need not wait until he has actually paid the demand against him. Jones v. Childs, 8 Nev. 121, 125.

Contract responsibility.

The word "liability," as used in 2 Balinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 4800, making three years the limitation of time for commencing an action on a contract or liability, express or implied, is restricted in its meaning, so that it stands only for a liability founded on a contract or arising out of a breach of a contract, and does not include a liability created by the statute. Aldrich v. McClaine (U. S.) 98 Fed. 378, 379.

Covenant.

Insolvent Act, § 53, provides that the discharge shall release the debtor from all debts and "liabilities" which would or might have been proved against his estate. Held, that the word "liabilities" includes a contract of hiring for a definite period, even as to money which became due thereon after the filing of the petition in insolvency and after the discharge. A personal covenant creates a "liability" within the meaning of the act. Mooney v. Detrick, 26 Pac. 280, 281, 85 Cal. 549.

A covenant of warranty in a deed creates a "liability" as of the date of the deed, and not as of the date of eviction; and therefore, as against that liability, the grantor cannot claim a homestead in land, purchased after the deed was executed, under a statute providing that the homestead exemption should not apply to sales under execution, attachment, or judgment, if the debt or liability existed prior to the purchase of the land. Benge's Adm'r v. Bowling, 51 S. W. 151, 106 Ky. 575.

Debt.

The term "debt" is not synonymous with the term "liability," but is included within the meaning of the latter term. McElfresh v. Kirkendall, 36 Iowa, 224, 226.

The term "liabilities," as used in a deed securing all the debts and liabilities of certain firms and individuals composing them, was synonymous with "debts." Witz v. Mullin's Personal Representative, 20 S. E. 783, 784, 90 Va. 805.

"Liabilities," as used in a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, which, after making preferences for certain creditors, directed the assignee to pay and discharge in full, if the residue of the proceeds were sufficient, all the debts and "liabilities" now due or to grow due from the assignor, is synonymous with "debts due and to grow due," which refers only to debts then existing, including those payable in the future, and consequently does not include a claim for subsequently accrued rent of premises rented by the assignor previous to his assignment. The liabilities were those which in the extent of them, as of the time of the assignment, could be ascertained for the purpose of the execution of the trust; those debts which were existing at the time the assignment was made, and then due or to grow due. This fairly imports fixed, definite, and liquidated liabilities. Those liabilities are "debts." In re Havenor, 23 N. Y. Supp. 1092, 1093, 70 Hun, 56.

"Liabilities," as used in Code 1873, § 1072, providing a penalty for the act of a corporation in paying dividends without leaving sufficient funds to meet its liabilities, should be construed to mean existing indebtedness at the time a dividend is declared, the payment of which could be enforced. Miller v. Bradish, 28 N. W. 594, 595, 69 Iowa, 278.

In an assignment for benefit of creditors, providing for payment of assignor's debts and liabilities, now due or to grow due, the term "liabilities" should be construed as synonymous with "debts," and not to apply to a contingent liability arising from the fact that thereafter the lessor, in a lease made to the assignor prior to the assignment, took possession of the premises and relet them under provisions of the lease that if they became vacant he might relet them and apply the avails in reduction of the rent, since such liability arose subsequently to the assignment, and such debts were not within the meaning of the word "liabilities." In re Hevenor, 39 N. E. 393, 394, 144 N. Y. 271.

The bankruptcy act of 1898 (Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 544 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3413]) provides that debts of a bankrupt may be proved and allowed against his estate which are (1) a fixed liability as evidenced by judgment or an instrument in writing absolutely owing at the time of filing the petition against him, whether then payable or not, with any interest thereon which may have been recovered. As used in this act, the word "debt" differs from the same word as used in the bankruptcy acts which have preceded it, in that it has not the limited or restricted meaning which has been given to it in text-books. The act itself defines the word, and carries it beyond a certain sum of money due by certain and express agreement, and declares that for the purpose of the act it shall include any fixed liability evidenced by judgment. "Liability" is a term of broader significance than "debt." Liability is responsibility. In Joslin v. New Jersey Car-Spring Co., 36 N. J. Law (7 Vroom) 141, "liability" is defined to be a state of being bound or obliged in law or justice. It signifies that condition of affairs which gives rise to an obligation to do a particular thing, to be enforced by action. Haywood v. Shreve, 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 94, 104; In re Van Orden (U. S.) 96 Fed. 86, 88.

Disputed obligation.

"Liability" is defined to be a state of being bound or obliged in law or justice, and a promise to pay all liabilities of an employé includes a disputed claim for the salary of a foreman of the factory, and the term "liability" cannot be confined to include only such arrearages of wages as were admitted, and not those which were disputed. Joslin v. New Jersey Car-Spring Co., 36 N. J. Law (7 Vroom) 141, 145.

As any expense.

"Liability," as used in a bond given by a person to a certain town, in which it is agreed that the person should save the town harmless from all damages, costs, and charges that shall accrue or happen to said town for or on account of liability to be called upon to support and provide for poor persons, does not mean a legal liability to a recovery of damages, but is used in its popular sense; that is, the bond is so construed as to save the town from the expenses of suits brought against it relative to the support of poor persons, whether the suits are successful or not. Inhabitants of Saco v. Osgood, 5 Me. (5 Greenl.) 237, 238.

Partner's individual debts.

In a bond executed on the dissolution of a partnership, whereby the retiring member agreed to pay his proportion of the "partnership liabilities," that term does not cover the individual debts of the retiring partner. McCormack v. Sweeney, 35 N. E. 45, 47, 7 Ind. App. 671.

Judgment.

In Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 1, providing that an action on an obligation or liability not founded on an instrument in writing must be commenced within two years etc., the word "liability" includes the procuring of a levy of an execution to be issued on a satisfied judgment. Wood v. Curry, 57 Cal. 208, 209.

As all obligations.

The term "liabilities of ours," in a pledge of collaterals for the payment of certain notes "or any other unsecured liability or liabilities of ours," includes any liabilities existing in favor of the pledgee. Wilson v. Carothers (Ky.) 43 S. W. 684.

"Liability," as used in the act of 1874 relating to limited partnerships, which provides that no association organized thereunder shall incur a liability exceeding $500 in amount, unless, etc., expresses in the broadest and most comprehensive manner any form of obligation, certainly all such as are measured by money values. Pittsburg Melting Co. v. Reese, 12 Atl. 362, 365, 118 Pa. 355.

The word "liability" is a very broad one, and the words "liability existing at the time of such transfer," as used in St. 1890, § 549, relating to a double liability on corporation stockholders, means the same thing as "all contracts and liabilities of a corporation." So, under the Iowa statute providing that transfers of shares in corporations should not exempt a stockholder from any corporate liability created prior thereto, it was held in White v. Green, 105 Iowa, 176, 181, 74 N. W. 928, 929, that the word "liability" was much more comprehensive than "debts." The court said: "The liabilities contemplated by the statute are not merely obligations which are due and payable when the transfer is made. 'Liability,' in a legal sense, is the state or condition of one who is under obligation to do at once, or at some future time, something which may be enforced by action. It may exist without the right of immediate enforcement." Hyatt v. Anderson's Trustee, 74 S. W. 1094, 1096, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 132.

Outstanding stock.

The term "liabilities," as used in the definition of "insolvency" as that condition when the assets are not sufficient to pay the liabilities, when used with reference to a corporation, does not include par value of the outstanding capital stock. Shaw v. Gilbert, 86 N. W. 188, 192, 111 Wis. 165 (citing Hamilton v. Menominee Falls Quarry Co., 106 Wis. 352, 81 N. W. 876).

Penalty.

"Liability," as used in Const. art. 4, § 100, providing that no obligation or liability of any person held or owned by the state shall be remitted or released by the Legislature, nor shall such liability or obligation be extinguished except by payment thereof into the proper treasury, means a pecuniary or commercial liability, being used in the same sense as "obligation," and does not include a liability on a penalty for violation of a law. Adams v. Fragiaco, 15 South. 798, 800, 71 Miss. 417.

A "liability" created by the statute is in the nature of a punishment for a violation of its provisions, and is therefore a penalty for wrong done. Rogers v. Bonnett, 37 Pac. 1078, 1080, 2 Okl. 553 (citing Bouv. Law Dict. p. 318).

As private rights.

"Liability or contract," as used in 64 Ohio Laws, p. 285, providing that a certain canal company on certain conditions might abandon a portion of its canal, but that such abandonment should not be construed to release the company from any "liability or contract" incurred or entered into, nor defeat the rights of any person or persons, company or corporations, should be construed to mean only private rights, and not such duties as are owing to the public. Pennsylvania & O. Canal Co. v. Portage County Com'rs, 27 Ohio St. 14, 21.

As punishment.

"Penalty," "liability," and "forfeiture" are synonymous with "punishment" in connection with crimes of the highest grade. Featherstone v. People, 62 N. E. 684, 687, 194 Ill. 325 (citing United States v. Reisinger, 128 U. S. 398, 9 Sup. Ct. 99, 32 L. Ed. 480).

"Penalty, forfeiture, or liability," as used in Rev. St. § 13 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 6], relating to punishments of a crime, and providing that the repeal of any statute shall not have the effect to release or extinguish any "penalty, forfeiture, or liability" under the statute unless the repealing act shall so expressly provide, and such statute shall be treated as still remaining in force for the purpose of sustaining any proper action or prosecution for the enforcement of such "penalty, forfeiture, or liability," include all forms of punishment for crime. The words are intended to cover every form of punishment to which a man subjects himself by violating the common laws of the country. United States v. Ulrici (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 328, 329.

Tax.

Under Laws 1893, p. 50, § 1, providing that an action for "liability created by statute," other than a penalty or forfeiture, shall be commenced within two years, a tax is included. Board of Com'rs of Custer County v. Story, 69 Pac. 56, 57, 26 Mont. 517.

Where a conditional sale of the properties of a corporation, made on March 23d, provided that all its "liabilities" should be liquidated or provided for by the company, a lien for taxes fixed by statute as of February 1st was included within the term "liabilities," though the amount was not ascertained by the authorities until the following September. Vicksburg Waterworks Co. v. Vicksburg Water Supply Co., 31 South. 535, 80 Miss. 68.

Liability for torts.

The word "liability" has always been held to apply to responsibility for torts as well as for breach of contracts. Miller & Lux v. Kern County Land Co., 66 Pac. 856, 857, 134 Cal. 586.

"Liability," as used in Laws 1869, p. 2383, chartering a city, which provides that no action against the city on a contract, obligation, or liability, express or implied, shall be commenced except within one year after the cause of action shall have accrued, only includes such claims, accounts, or demands as are required to be presented for audit. It does not include liability for torts, such as personal injuries. McGaffin v. City of Cohoes, 74 N. Y. 387, 388, 30 Am. Rep. 307.

The word "liability," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 339, providing that an action on contract, obligation, or liability not founded on an instrument in writing must be brought within two years, includes responsibility for torts, and is applicable to all actions at law not specifically mentioned in other general statutes. Lowe v. Ozmun, 70 Pac. 87, 137 Cal. 257.

"Liability, express or implied," as used in Cohoes City Charter (Laws 1869, c. 912, tit. 13, § 5), declaring that no action against the city on a contract or liability, express or implied, shall be commenced except in one year after the cause of action shall have accrued, means obligation or liability arising from contract only, and hence does not apply to an action for damages by reason of a defective sidewalk. McGaffin v. City of Cohoes, 74 N. Y. 387, 391, 30 Am. Rep. 307.

Temporarily unenforceable obligation.

"Liability" is the state or condition of one who is under obligation to do at once, or at some future time, something which may be enforced by action. It may exist without the right of immediate enforcement. White v. Green, 74 N. W. 928, 929, 105 Iowa, 176 (citing Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Clarke, 29 Pa. [5 Casey] 146).

LIABILITY CREATED BY LAW.

The Code of Civil Procedure provides that actions against stockholders of a corporation to enforce a "liability created by law" must be brought within three years after the liability was created. Held, that the words "liability created by law" include a stockholder's liability for the debts of the corporation. Green v. Beckman, 59 Cal. 545, 547; Moore v. Boyd, 74 Cal. 167, 15 Pac. 670, 671 (cited in Hunt v. Ward, 34 Pac. 335, 336, 99 Cal. 612, 37 Am. St. Rep. 87).

"Liability created by statute," as used in Act 1852 (Swan & C. Rev. St. p. 948), providing that an action on "a liability created by statute" shall be barred within six years, means a liability which would not exist but for the statute. Hawkins v. Iron Valley Furnace Co., 40 Ohio St. 507, 514.

Proceedings to enforce the collection of taxes against real estate are an action upon "a liability created by statute," within Gen. St. 1878, c. 66, § 12, relating to limitation of actions. Pine County v. Lambert, 57 Minn. 203, 58 N. W. 990.

LIBEL

See "Actionable Per Se"; "Criminal Libel."

In its most general and comprehensive sense, any publication injurious to the reputation of another is a "libel." Commonwealth v. McClure (Pa.) 3 Kulp, 464, 468.

A malicious publication tending to expose a person to ridicule, contempt, hatred, or degradation of character is "libelous." Byrnes v. Matthews, 12 N. Y. St. Rep. 74, 79.

A "libel" is any malicious printed slander which tends to expose a man to ridicule, contempt, or hatred. McCorkle v. Binns (Pa.) 5 Bin. 340, 348, 6 Am. Dec. 420; Struthers v. Peacock (Pa.) 11 Phila. 287, 288; Commonwealth v. McClure (Pa.) 3 Kulp, 464, 468; Cooper v. Stone (N. Y.) 24 Wend. 434 (cited in Geisler v. Brown, 6 Neb. 254, 259); Solver-san v. Peterson, 25 N. W. 14, 15, 64 Wis. 198, 54 Am. Rep. 607; Palmer v. City of Concord, 48 N. H. 211, 214, 215, 97 Am. Dec. 605; Giles v. John B. Clarke Co., 36 Atl. 876, 877, 69 N. H. 92; Keemle v. Sass, 12 Mo. 499, 504.

A "libel" is a censorious or ridiculing writing, picture, or sign, made with a mischievous and malicious intent towards government, magistrates, or individuals. Steele v. Southwick (N. Y.) 9 Johns. 214, 215 (citing People v. Crowell [N. Y.] 3 Johns. Cas. 337, 354; Moore v. Francis, 3 N. Y. Supp. 162, 50 Hun, 604); State v. Farley (S. C.) 4 McCord, 317, 321; Cooper v. Greeley (N. Y.) 1 Denio, 347, 359; Cole v. Neustadter, 29 Pac. 550, 552, 22 Or. 191; Tappan v. Wilson, 7 Ohio (7 Ham.) 190, 191, 193, pt. 1.

It has always seemed strange to lawyers that some text-writers and judges, in defining "libel," in reference to civil actions, should quote Hamilton's definition of a "criminal libel" in his argument in the criminal case of People v. Crowell, 3 Johns. Cas. 337, 354, viz: "A libel is a censorious or ridiculous writing, picture, or sign, made with a mischievous and malicious intent toward government, magistrates, or individuals." See incorrect quotation of it in Moore v. Francis, 121 N. Y. 199, 204, 23 N. E. 1127, 8 L. R. A. 214, 18 Am. St. Rep. 810. A libel, to be a criminal offense, must be published with a mischievous and malicious intent, or maliciously, but not so in order to sustain an action for damages, and Hamilton never thought of saying so, much less as forever being quoted as having said so. Failure to keep in mind the difference between a criminal and a civil action for libel on this question of malice has led to most of the vexations and confusion about malice in civil actions; a like failure to observe such difference as between qualifiedly privileged and unprivileged items and publications is responsible for the rest of it. Cady v. Brooklyn Union Pub. Co., 51 N. Y. Supp. 198, 201, 23 Misc. Rep. 409.

False and defamatory words, if written and published, constitute a libel. Gambrill v. Schooley, 48 Atl. 730, 93 Md. 48, 52 L. R. A. 87, 86 Am. St. Rep. 414 (citing Odgers, L. & Sland. 150).

Words that impute to a party dishonest, dishonorable, immoral, and degrading conduct constitute a libel. Shanks v. Stumpf, 51 N. Y. Supp. 154, 157, 23 Misc. Rep. 264.

Every willful and unauthorized publication, written or printed, which imputes to a merchant or other business man conduct which is injurious to his character and standing as a merchant or business man, is a libel, and implies malice. Minter v. Bradstreet Co., 73 S. W. 668, 679, 174 Mo. 444.

Libel is a malicious defamation of any person made public by writing, printing, signs, or pictures. Sharff v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 2 Bin. 514, 517; White v. Nicholls, 44 U. S. (3 How.) 266, 284, 11 L. Ed. 591; People v. Crowell (N. Y.) 3 Johns. Cas. 337, 377; Gambrill v. Schooley, 48 Atl. 730, 93 Md. 48, 52 L. R. A. 87, 86 Am. St. Rep. 414; Clark v. Binney, 19 Mass. (2 Pick.) 113, 115.

A libel does not necessarily charge the plaintiff with a crime, for if its design be wanton and malicious ridicule, and the tendency of the publication to hold up the plaintiff to the sneers of society, to degrade him and lessen his standing, an action may be sustained. Tappan v. Wilson, 7 Ohio (7 Ham.) 190, 191, 193, pt. 1.

A "libel" is defined by Blackstone to be a malicious defamation of any person, and especially a magistrate, made public by either printing, writing, signs, or pictures, in order to provoke him to wrath, or expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule. Root v. King (N. Y.) 7 Cow. 613, 620; Moore v. Francis, 3 N. Y. Supp. 162, 50 Hun, 604 (citing 4 Bl. Comm. 150; Hawk. P. C. c. 73, § 1).

Libel is a publication, without justification or lawful excuse, of words calculated to injure the reputation of another and expose him to hatred or contempt. Whitney v. Janesville Gazette (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 1091; Negley v. Farrow, 60 Md. 158, 175, 45 Am. Rep. 715; Miller v. Donovan, 39 N. Y. Supp. 820, 16 Misc. Rep. 453; Armentrout v. Moranda (Ind.) 8 Blackf. 426, 427; Patchell v. Jaqua, 33 N. E. 132, 133, 6 Ind. App. 70.

Any defamatory words calculated to degrade or injure the reputation of a person in society, when written or published maliciously, constitutes a libel. Browning v. Commonwealth, 76 S. W. 19, 20, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 482.

A libel is any malicious publication, expressed either in printing or writing, or by signs and pictures, tending either to blacken the memory of one dead or the reputation of one who is alive, and expose him to public hatred, contempt, and ridicule. Commonwealth v. Clap, 4 Mass. 163, 168, 3 Am. Dec. 212; Clark v. Binney, 19 Mass. (2 Pick.) 113, 115; Goldberger v. Philadelphia Grocer Pub. Co. (U. S.) 42 Fed. 42, 43; Hillhouse v. Dunning, 6 Conn. 391, 407; State v. Avery, 7 Conn. 266, 263, 18 Am. Dec. 105; Stow v. Converse, 3 Conn. 325, 341, 8 Am. Dec. 189; Root v. King (N. Y.) 7 Cow. 613, 620; Moore v. Francis, 3 N. Y. Supp. 162, 50 Hun, 604; Ryckman v. Delavan (N. Y.) 25 Wend. 186, 198; Weston v. Weston, 82 N. Y. Supp. 351, 352, 83 App. Div. 520; Finch v. Viquain, 9 N. W. 43, 11 Neb. 280; Collins v. Dispatch Pub. Co., 25 Atl. 546, 547, 152 Pa. 187, 34 Am. St. Rep. 636; Stewart v. Swift Specific Co., 76 Ga. 280, 283, 2 Am. St. Rep. 40; Price v. Whitely, 50 Mo. 439, 440; Minter v. Bradstreet Co., 73 S. W. 668, 672, 174 Mo. 444; Republican Pub. Co. v. Mosman, 15 Colo. 399, 407, 408, 24 Pac. 1051, 1054; Hartford v. State, 96 Ind. 461, 463, 49 Am. Rep. 185; Cole v. Neustadter, 29 Pac. 550, 552, 22 Or. 191.

A publication is libelous on its face when the words impute to the plaintiff the commission of a crime or a contagious disorder tending to exclude him from society, or when the injurious words are spoken or published with respect to his profession or trade, or to disparage him in a public office, or tend to bring him into ridicule and contempt. McFadden v. Morning Journal Ass'n, 51 N. Y. Supp. 275, 281, 28 App. Div. 508.

The term "libel" includes "every written publication which implies or may be generally understood to imply reproach, dishonor, scandal, or ridicule to any person. Such written publication, though not charging a punishable offense, is nevertheless libelous if it tends to subject the party to whom it refers to social disgrace, public distrust, hatred, ridicule, or contempt." Bradley v. Kramer, 18 N. W. 268, 269, 59 Wis. 309, 48 Am. Rep. 511; Witcher v. Jones, 17 N. Y. Supp. 491, 493; Shea v. Sun Printing & Publishing Ass'n, 35 N. Y. Supp. 703, 14 Misc. Rep. 415; Barr v. Moore, 87 Pa. 385, 390, 30 Am. Rep. 367; Regensperger v. Klefer (Pa.) 7 Atl. 724, 725; Patchell v. Jaqua, 33 N. E. 132, 133, 6 Ind. App. 70; Hatt v. Evening News Ass'n, 53 N. W. 952, 953, 94 Mich. 114; Brown v. Boynton, 80 N. W. 1099, 122 Mich. 251; Palmer v. City of Concord, 48 N. H. 211, 214, 97 Am. Dec. 605.

Any written or printed words constitute libel where they tend to injure the reputation or the standing of a person, or expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or tend to degrade him in society, lessen him in public esteem, or lower him in the confidence of the community, though the words do not impute to him the commission of a crime or immoral conduct. Every false and malicious publication which naturally tends to injure a person's character or lower him in the confidence and respect of his neighbors is libelous. Davis v. Hamilton, 88 N. W. 744, 745, 85 Minn. 209; Croasdale v. Bright (Del.) 6 Houst. 52, 57; Croasdale v. Tantum (Del.) 6 Houst. 60, 61; Delaware State Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Croasdale (Del.) 6 Houst. 181, 190. A libel is a malicious publication in print, writing, or by signs and pictures, imputing to another something which has a tendency to injure his reputation, to disgrace or degrade him in society, lower him in the esteem and opinion of the world, or bring him into public hatred, contempt, or ridicule. Layton v. Harris (Del.) 3 Har. 406, 407; Riley v. Lee, 11 S. W. 713, 714, 88 Ky. 603, 21 Am. St. Rep. 358; Stone v. Cooper (N. Y.) 2 Denio. 293, 303; Moore v. Francis, 3 N. Y. Supp. 162, 163, 50 Hun. 604; Cole v. Neustader, 29 Pac. 550, 552, 22 Or. 191.

Bishop defines "libel" as any representation in writing calculated to create disturbances of the peace, to corrupt public morals, or to lead to any act which, when done, is indictable. 2 Bish. Cr. Law, § 709. The gist of the offense of libel is the publication of something which tends in contemplation of law to affect injuriously the peace and good order of society, because it injuriously affects the reputation, memory, or business of individuals. State v. Hoskins, 62 N. W. 270, 271, 60 Minn. 168, 27 L. R. A. 412.

A libel is any publication, whether in writing, printing, picture, effigy, or other fixed representation to the eye, which exposes any person to hatred, ridicule, or obloquy, or which causes him to be shunned, or which has a tendency to injure him in his occupation. Weil v. Israel, 8 South. 826, 828, 42 La. Ann. 955; Staub v. Van Benthuyssen, 36 La. Ann. 467, 468; Oles v. Pittsburg Times, 2 Pa. Super. Ct. 130, 140.

Chief Justice Lumkin said, in Giles v. State, 6 Ga. 276, 283, that "at common law any publication is a libel the tendency of which is to degrade and injure another person, or to bring him in contempt, hatred, or ridicule, or which accuses him of a crime punishable by law, as by an act odious and disgraceful in society." Parke, B., in O'Brien v. Clement, 15 Mees. & W. 435, said: "Everything printed or written which reflects on the character of another, and is published without lawful justification or excuse, is a libel, whatever the intention may have been." Stewart v. Swift Specific Co., 76 Ga. 280, 283, 2 Am. St. Rep. 40; McDonald v. Woodruff (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 49, 50.

A "libel" is defined to be a malicious publication by writing, printing, pictures, effigy, sign, or otherwise than mere speech, which exposes any living person, or the memory of any person deceased, to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, which causes or tends to cause any person to be shunned or avoided, or which has a tendency to injure any person, corporation, or association of persons in his or their business or occupation. Miller v. Donovan, 39 N. Y. Supp. 820, 16 Misc. Rep. 453; People v. Sherlock, 68 N. Y. Supp. 74, 75, 56 App. Div. 422; Taylor v. Hearst, 40 Pac. 392, 393, 107 Cal. 262.

Any publication, the tendency of which is to degrade and injure another person or to bring him into contempt, ridicule, and hatred, or which accuses him or her of a crime punishable by law, or of an act odious and disgraceful in society is a libel. Dexter v. Spear (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 624; Goldberger v. Philadelphia Grocer Pub. Co. (U. S.) 42 Fed. 42, 43; Benton v. State, 36 Atl. 1041, 1043, 59 N. J. Law, 551; Commonwealth v. McClure (Pa.) 3 Kulp. 464, 468.

A libel is any false and malicious publication, when expressed in printing or writing, or by signs or pictures, which charges an offense punishable by indictment, or which tends to bring an individual into public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or charges an act odious and disgraceful in society. It includes whatever tends to injure the character of an individual, blacken his reputation, or imputes fraud, dishonesty, or other moral turpitude, or reflects shame, or tends to put him without the pale of social intercourse. Iron Age Pub. Co. v. Crudup, 5 South. 332, 333, 85 Ala. 519; Ivey v. Pioneer Saving & Loan Co., 21 South. 531, 533, 113 Ala. 349; Schomberg v. Walker, 64 Pac. 290, 291, 132 Cal. 224; Cole v. Neustadter, 29 Pac. 550, 552, 22 Or. 191.

A libel is a false and malicious writing published of another, which renders him contemptible or ridiculous in public estimation, or exposes him to public hatred or contempt, or hinders virtuous men from associating with him. Lindley v. Horton, 27 Conn. 58, 61; Donaghue v. Gaffy, 54 Conn. 257, 268, 7 Atl. 552; Williams v. Fuller (Neb.) 94 N. W. 118, 119.

Any written or printed words are actionable which tend to blacken the memory of one who is dead, or to injure the reputation of one who is alive, and thereby expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, degrade him in society, lessen him in public esteem, or lower him in the confidence of the community, even though the words do not impute to him criminality or immorality. It is impossible, as well as impolitic, to lay down any more definite rule than such general statement of the law, and then make a common-sense application of it to the facts of each case as it arises. On the other hand, it will not do to hold that everything published in disparagement of a person is actionable, or to adopt Bentham's sarcastic definition of "libel" as "anything of which any one thinks proper to complain." But, on the other hand, everything falsely and maliciously published of another which necessarily or naturally tends to injure his standing and good name in the community, or lower him in the confidence and respect of his neighbors, ought to be held actionable. McDermott v. Union Credit Co., 78 N. W. 967, 968, 76 Minn. 84.

"It has been held that in order to constitute language libelous per se, it must be 'either such as necessarily in fact, or by presumption of evidence, occasions damage to him of whom or whose affairs it is spoken.' Townsh. Sland. & L. (4th Ed.) § 146; Newell, Defam. p. 181, § 14. 'Such language confers a prima facie right of action, and is prima facie a wrong, and injurious per se; and the law will presume damage, without proof, merely from implication or presumption from the publication.' Townsh. Sland. & L. (4th Ed.) § 147. 'Language which, however, does not, as a necessary consequence, occasion damage to the party published, is not per se libelous, and in such cases a right of action exists only when, as a necessary and proximate consequence of the publication, special damage ensued to the party published.' Id. §§ 146-148. We think a statement in substance and effect the same, but in different language, is that words which upon their face, and without the aid of extrinsic proof, are injurious, are libelous per se; but if the injurious character of the words appear, not from their face, in their usual and natural signification, but only in consequence of extrinsic circumstances, they are not libelous per se." Fry v. McCord, 33 S. W. 568-570, 95 Tenn. (11 Pickle) 678.

In the case of Cropp v. Tilney, 3 Salk. 226, Holt, C. J., said: "Scandalous matter is not necessary to make a libel; it is enough if the defendant induces an ill opinion to be held of the plaintiff, or to make him contemptible or ridiculous." Cooper v. Greeley (N. Y.) 1 Denio, 347, 359.

"It is not necessary that words should be slanderous to sustain an action for libel. Any publication which tends to degrade, disgrace, or injure the character of a person, or bring him into contempt, hatred, or ridicule, is as much a libel as though it contains charges of infamy or crime." Johnson v. Stebbins, 5 Ind. 364, 366 (citing Dexter v. Spear [U. S.] 7 Fed. Cas. 624; Commonwealth v. Clap, 4 Mass. 163, 168, 3 Am. Dec. 212; Steele v. Southwick [N. Y.] 9 Johns. 214; Cooper v. Greeley [N. Y.] 1 Denio, 347; White v. Nicholls, 44 U. S. [3 How.] 266, 11 L. Ed. 591).

There are many definitions of "libel." The one by Hamilton, in his argument in People v. Croswell (N. Y.) 3 Johns. Cas. 337, 5 Wds. & P.—13

354, viz., "a censorious or ridiculing writing, picture, or sign, made with mischievous and malicious intent towards government, magistrates, or individuals," has often been referred to with approval. But unless the word "censorious" is given a much broader signification than strictly belongs to it, the definition would not seem to comprehend all cases of libelous words. The word "libel," as expounded in the cases, is not limited to written or printed words which defame a man, in the ordinary sense, or which impute blame or moral turpitude, or which criticise or censure him. Moore v. Francis, 23 N. E. 1127, 1129, 121 N. Y. 199, 8 L. R. A. 214, 18 Am. St. Rep. 810. It may be said generally that language in writing is libelous which denies to a man the possession of some such worthy quality as every man is, a priori, to be taken to possess, or which tends to bring the party into public hatred or disgrace, or to degrade him in society. Collins v. Dispatch Pub. Co., 25 Atl. 546, 547, 152 Pa. 187, 34 Am. St. Rep. 636.

Statutory definitions.

A libel is the malicious defamation of a person made public by printing, writing, sign, picture, representation, or effigy, tending to provoke him to wrath, or expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or to deprive him of the benefits of public confidence and social intercourse, or any malicious defamation made public as aforesaid, designed to blacken and vilify the memory of one who is dead, and tending to scandalize or provoke his surviving relatives and friends. Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 2271; Crimes and Punishments Act, § 270; State v. Mayberry, 6 Pac. 553, 555, 33 Kan. 441. An essential to the commission of libel is its tendency to provoke to wrath or expose to hatred or contempt. Not only is its tendency in that respect made essential by the statute quoted, but it is essential at common law. State v. Grinstead, 64 Pac. 49, 52, 62 Kan. 593. So by statute in Iowa. State v. Keenan, 82 N. W. 792, 794, 111 Iowa, 286; Wallace v. Homestead Co., 90 N. W. 835, 840, 117 Iowa, 348; Mosnat v. Snyder, 105 Iowa, 500, 504, 75 N. W. 356; Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, §§ 6658, 6659.

Libel is a false or malicious unprivileged publication by writing, printing, picture, or effigy, or other fixed representation to the eye, which exposes any person to public hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or which tends to deprive him of public confidence, or to injure him in his occupation, or any malicious publication as aforesaid, designed to blacken or vilify the memory of one who is dead, and tending to scandalize his surviving relatives or friends. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2237.

Libel is a false and unprivileged publication by writing, printing, picture, effigy, or other fixed representation to the eye, which exposes any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, which causes him to be shunned or avoided, or which has a tendency to injure him in his occupation. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 32.

A libel is a malicious defamation, expressed either by printing, or by signs, or pictures, or the like, tending to blacken the memory of one who is dead, or to impeach the honesty, integrity, virtue, or reputation, or publish the natural defects, of one who is alive, and thereby expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 4196; Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 1313.

A libel is a malicious defamation of a living person, made public by any printing, writing, sign, picture, representation, or effigy, tending to provoke him to wrath, expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or deprive him of the benefit of public confidence or social intercourse; or of a deceased person, thus making public a design to blacken and vilify his memory, or tending to provoke his friends and relatives. But nothing shall be deemed a libel unless there is a publication thereof; and the delivery, selling, reading, or otherwise communicating a libel, directly or indirectly, to any person, or to the party libeled, is a publication. Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 926, c. 129, § 1; State v. Robbins, 66 Me. 324, 325.

Libel is a false and unprivileged publication by writing, printing, picture, effigy, or other fixed representation to the eye, which exposes any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or which causes him to be shunned or avoided, or which has a tendency to injure him in his occupation. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 45; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 2715; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 29; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 3926. This definition, says the court, is very broad, and includes almost any language which upon its face has the natural tendency to injure a man's reputation either generally or with respect to his occupation. Tonini v. Cevasco, 46 Pac. 103, 104, 114 Cal. 266.

He is guilty of libel who, with intent to injure, makes, writes, prints, publishes, sells, or circulates any malicious statement affecting the reputation of another in respect to any matter or thing pointed out in the statute. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 721.

A libel is defined by Pen. Code, § 242, to be a malicious publication by writing, printing, picture, effigy, sign, or otherwise than by mere speech, which exposes any living person, or the memory of one dead, to hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or which causes any person to be shunned or avoided, or which has a tendency to injure any person in their business or occupation. Shea v. Sun Printing & Publishing Ass'n, 70 N.

Y. St. Rep. 438, 439, 35 N. Y. Supp. 703; People v. Stark, 12 N. Y. Supp. 688, 691, 59 Hun, 51, 35 N. Y. St. Rep. 150, 152; Cornish v. Bennett, 38 Misc. Rep. 688, 689, 78 N. Y. Supp. 244.

A libel is a false and malicious defamation of another, expressed in print, or writing, or pictures, or signs, tending to injure the reputation of an individual, and exposing him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3832; Behre v. National Cash Register Co., 27 S. E. 986, 987, 100 Ga. 213, 62 Am. St. Rep. 320. Under this definition it is held that to write and publish of another that he is a liar is libelous. Colvard v. Black, 110 Ga. 642, 645, 36 S. E. 80.

By Pen. Code, § 248, libel is a malicious defamation, expressed either by writing, printing, or by signs or pictures, or the like, tending to blacken the memory of one who is dead, or impeach the honesty, virtue, or integrity of one who is alive, and thereby expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule. In re Kowalsky, 14 Pac. 399, 73 Cal. 120; People v. Seeley, 72 Pac. 834, 835, 139 Cal. 118.

Libel is defined in Laws 27th Leg. p. 30, as a defamation expressed in printing or writing, by signs and pictures or drawings, tending to blacken the memory of the dead, or tending to injure the reputation of one who is alive, and thereby expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or financial injury, or to impeach the honesty, integrity, or virtue, or reputation of any one, or to publish the natural defects of anyone, and thereby expose such person to public hatred, ridicule, or financial injury. Walker v. San Antonio Light Pub. Co., 70 S. W. 555, 557, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 165.

General abuse.

Terms of mere general abuse, published in a newspaper, are not libelous. Tappan v. Wilson, 7 Ohio (7 Ham.) 190, pt. 1.

Any publication which tends to disgrace a man, or bring him into contempt or ridicule, is a libel. But a degrading imputation must appear on the face of the libel, or by necessary inference from it. Hence mere scurrility or abuse, without point or specific imputation, is not actionable. Rice v. Simmons (Del.) 2 Har. 417.

Injury in business or trade.

Words which naturally tend to injure a man in his office trade, business, or profession are libelous in themselves, without alleging any special damage. Harris v. Burley, 8 N. H. 216, 218.

Imputations applicable to class.

A declaration in libel cannot be adjudged insufficient by reason of the accusation being directed against a class of society, unless it is manifest and unquestionable that the charge is clearly made against a class of society, or an order or body of men as such, and cannot possibly import any personal application tending to private injury. If to the common understanding of men the description evidently points to several individuals, or if on the face of the declaration it appears that the words are capable of being so meant and understood, then the fact that a person is defamed under a description of office or of profession common to himself and other individuals included in the same libel cannot take away the right of private action. So, there being six firms, composed of two or more partners each, owning and conducting malhous-es on the hill in a city, a publication that "there are several malhous-es on the hill, all of which rely on water taken from such places," which were previously described in the article as being filthy, and that "the facts stated are known to hundreds residing in the neighborhood of the malting establishments," constitutes a libel against the plaintiff, who was one of two partners owning and operating one of such malhous-es. Ryckman v. Delavan (N. Y.) 25 Wend. 186, 197.

It is the malicious intention of the libeler toward the injured individual that authorizes the latter to seek redress. A general censure or reproof, satire, or invective, directed against large classes of society, whether on moral, theological, or political grounds, cannot ordinarily be prompted by individual malice, or intended to produce personal injury. Ryckman v. Delavan (N. Y.) 25 Wend. 186, 198.

Construction of language.

The fact that supersensitive and morbid imaginations may be able by reading between the lines of an article to discover some defamatory meaning therein, is not sufficient to make it libelous. In other words, if the language is not reasonably capable of conveying to the ordinary mind the defamatory meaning alleged in the innuendo, it is the province and duty of the court to so declare, and to deny the right to maintain an action thereon. Reid v. Providence Journal Co., 37 Atl. 637, 20 R. I. 120.

Briefly defined, "libel" is the malicious defamation of a person, made public by any printing, writing, effigy, or pictorial representation. For a written or printed article to be defamatory, the language of the document must be such that, when given its natural and ordinary meaning, it imputes to the person thus assailed some act or attribute or character which tends to expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or to deprive him of the benefits of public confidence and social intercourse; or, if the language upon its face does not bear such injurious significance, then there must be shown extrinsic facts and circumstances by which it is made to appear that the writing, though innocent and unobjectionable in form, is intended to convey and does convey to its readers a defamatory meaning. Quinn v. Prudential Ins. Co., 90 N. W. 349, 350, 116 Iowa, 522.

A publication without justification or lawful excuse, which is calculated to injure the reputation of another by exposing him to hatred or contempt, is a libel. The effect of the words used is the test of whether they are actionable or not, for the injury caused depends on the meaning which any reasonable man would give to the words on reading them. The ordinary sense of the words is to be taken as the meaning of the party who employs them. To say of a person that he is a professional swindler is actionable, because every person would understand that the charge was that he made a practice of defrauding others by imposition; and to charge a man with bringing another to financial ruin by his mechanisms is libelous. Whitney v. Janesville Gazette (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 1091.

Words which are clearly not defamatory cannot have their meaning enlarged by innuendo. Between these extremes lies the case of ambiguous language, where it is for the jury to say whether, in view of all the facts charged, the publication amounted to a libel. Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Sheftall, 45 S. E. 687, 118 Ga. 865.

An article is libelous which imputes in slang terms dishonest or dishonorable conduct. Byrnes v. Mathews, 12 N. Y. St. Rep. 74, 79.

As a crime.

The term "making a libel," used in a charge that another has made a libel, and is a dirty creature, etc., may be fairly understood to mean such a making as constitutes a complete indictable offense. In common parlance, "making" includes publishing, and words are to be taken according to common understanding. Such a charge is slanderous. Andres v. Koppenhefer (Pa.) 3 Serg. & R. 255, 256, 8 Am. Dec. 647.

Libel, both at common law and under the statute, is a crime, and for it the offender may be prosecuted civilly or criminally. Also both at common law and by Pen. Code, § 243, a libel on the memory of the dead is punishable as a crime; and, speaking of this rule, Mr. Odgers says: "The criminal remedy for libel, as it is the earlier, so it is the more extensive, remedy. A libel may be indictable though it be not actionable. Thus in neither of the above cases [a libel on a deceased person] would an action lie, for the want of a proper plaintiff." Sorenson v. Balaban, 42 N. Y. Supp. 654, 657, 11 App. Div. 164.

Imputation of crime.

Any publication which imputes to a person the commission of a criminal offense, which will, in case the imputation or charge is true, subject the party charged to punishment for a crime involving moral turpitude, or subject such party to an infamous punishment, is actionable in itself, when published orally, and hence, when expressed otherwise than by oral language, is a libel. Boucher v. Clark Pub. Co., 84 N. W. 237, 238, 14 S. D. 72.

Defamatory publications of an officer with respect to his office are actionable per se, if untrue. It is not necessary that the language of the alleged libel should in terms charge that the plaintiff has committed crime, naming it, but it will be actionable if calculated to induce persons who read it to believe that the plaintiff was guilty of acts which would constitute a crime. Houston Printing Co. v. Moulden, 41 S. W. 381, 386, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 574.

A publication, to be libelous per se, because charging another with the commission of a crime, does not need to contain the technical statutory language and phrases essential to a good indictment for the crime charged; but any language the nature and obvious meaning of which is to impute to a person the commission of a crime, or to subject him to public ridicule, ignominy, or disgrace, is libelous. World Pub. Co. v. Mullen, 43 Neb. 126, 61 N. W. 108, 47 Am. St. Rep. 737.

Where in an action for libel the words set forth in their ordinary sense import a charge of crime, so as to be libelous, yet if they are spoken in connection with other words, so as to rebut the idea of criminality, there is no libel. Edgerley v. Swain, 32 N. H. 478, 482.

It is not necessary that a crime should be charged in technical language in a written or printed publication to constitute it a libel. But any such publication which holds the plaintiff up to scorn or ridicule, or to contempt, or execution, or impairs his enjoyment of general society, or implies his commission of the crime, is a libelous publication. Bain v. Myrick, 88 Ind. 137, 138.

It is not necessary that words, to be actionable per se, should make a charge of crime in express terms. They are actionable if they consist of a statement of facts which would naturally and presumably be understood by the hearers as a charge of crime. Belo v. Fuller, 82 Tex. 450, 19 S. W. 616, 617, 31 Am. St. Rep. 75.

Imputation of being diseased.

"The definition of libel embraces not only all slanders if written or printed, but much else. Any written or printed words which expose one to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or which tend to injure him in his profession or trade, or cause him to be shunned or avoided by his neighbors, is a libel per se. Odgers, Lib. & Sland. 21." That which is a slander if spoken is a libel if written or printed; but to say of one that he has consumption is no slander. A complaint for libel in charging that defendant published the charge that plaintiff had consumption is not sufficient unless special damages are alleged. Rade v. Press Pub. Co., 75 N. Y. Supp. 298, 37 Misc. Rep. 254.

Injury to feelings.

Injury to feelings alone is not a basis for an action for libel. There must be an injury to character. Samuels v. Evening Mail Ass'n (N. Y.) 6 Hun, 5, 9.

Imputation of former corruption in office.

Words which tend to expose the character of the plaintiff to the ridicule and contempt of the community, whether they impute a punishable offense or not, are actionable when put forth in the shape of written or printed slander. The proposition that the imputation of a previous vicious and corrupt life tends necessarily and directly to degrade the individual in the estimation of the community at the time of the publication of the libel, is too obvious to require argument. Where a libel was published imputing corrupt conduct to the plaintiff in his office of a senator of the state, his term of office having expired, it is a mistake to suppose that the ground of the action is the libel upon his official character. It is the calumny against his private character, charging him with having been guilty of previous conduct seriously impeaching his integrity and honor, and which tends to degrade him in the opinion of the public of which he complains. Cramer v. Riggs (N. Y.) 17 Wend. 209, 210.

Imputation of fraud.

A writing which imputes, and is understood by the readers to impute, that plaintiff was a person engaged in making accounts which he never paid or intended to pay, and was wholly unworthy of credit, is libelous. Ingraham v. Lyon, 105 Cal. 254, 38 Pac. 892.

Imputation of indebtedness.

Written or printed words which are injurious to a person in his office, profession, or calling, or which impeach the credit of any merchant or trader by imputing to him insolvency, or even embarrassment, are libelous. The law carefully guards the credit of merchants and traders. Imputations of their solvency, or suggestions that they are in pecuniary difficulties, etc., are, as a general rule, actionable. Wood v. Boyle, 35 Atl. 853, 854, 177 Pa. 620, 55 Am. St. Rep. 747.

A libel is a malicious publication expressed either in printing or writing, or by signs or pictures, tending to either blacken the memory of the dead or the reputation of one who is alive, and expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule. Every willful and unauthorized publication, written or printed, which imputes to a merchant or other business man conduct which is injurious to his character and standing as a merchant and business man, is a libel. For a mercantile commercial agency to publish a statement concerning a firm that they had assigned, being false, is a libel. Mitchell v. Bradstreet Co., 22 S. W. 358, 359, 116 Mo. 226, 20 L. R. A. 138, 38 Am. St. Rep. 592.

The publication of a false statement that plaintiff had executed a mortgage on his stock of goods, which statement was circulated throughout the country, was a libel per se. Smith v. Bradstreet Co., 41 S. E. 763, 764, 63 S. C. 525.

To publish of one that he has for several years owed for medical services, and that finally, being sued therefor, he has cowardly slunk behind the statute of limitations, does not constitute a libel. Hollenbeck v. Hall, 72 N. W. 518, 519, 103 Iowa, 214, 39 L. R. A. 734, 64 Am. St. Rep. 175

The sending through the mail of envelopes with the clause "For Collecting Bad Debts" printed on them, and the distribution of books containing a list of persons not worthy of credit, and containing plaintiff's name among the list, constitutes a libel. Muetze v. Tuteur, 77 Wis. 236, 46 N. W. 123, 9 L. R. A. 86, 20 Am. St. Rep. 115.

Imputation of insolvency.

Publishing one's name in a list of "dead-beats and delinquents," for circulation among business men, is libelous per se. Nettles v. Somervell, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 627, 25 S. W. 658.

"Every publication in writing or in print, which charges on or imputes to a merchant or business man insolvency or bankruptcy, or conduct which would prejudice him in his business or trade, or by injuries to his standing and credit as a merchant or business man, is a libel." Erber v. Dun (U. S.) 12 Fed. 526, 532.

To publish of a trader that he is insolvent injuriously affects him, and special circumstances need not be shown to entitle him to recover damages. Woodruff v. Bradstreet Co. (N. Y.) 35 Hun, 16, 17.

Imputation of lasciviousness.

A publication which renders a person ridiculous and exposes him to contempt; which tends to render his situation in society uncomfortable and irksome; which reflects a moral turpitude upon the party, and holds him up as a dishonest and mischievous member of society, and disgraces him in a scurrilous and ignominious manner; which tends to impair his standing in society as a man of rectitude and principle, or unfit him for the society and intercourse of honest and honorable men—is libelous. Judged by this standard, a portion of a letter which alleged that a party's conduct with a certain woman was unbecoming of him as a married man and as a minister of the gospel was certainly libelous, as it would tend to lower him in the opinion of his friends and acquaintances, and would have material effect in regard to him as a married man and a minister of the gospel. Jones v. Roberts, 50 Atl. 1071, 1072, 73 Vt. 201.

An article charging that plaintiff had been arrested with a married woman was held libelous, as tending to expose plaintiff to public ridicule and contempt. O'Brien v. Bennett, 76 N. Y. Supp. 498, 499, 72 App. Div. 367.

Imputation of untruthfulness.

A newspaper article is libelous which contains an imputation on plaintiff's honesty and integrity and tends to expose him to public hatred and contempt. Huse v. Inter-Ocean Pub. Co., 12 Ill. App. (12 Bradw.) 627, 630.

It is libelous per se to write concerning defendant that he is "unreliable," that "he cannot tell the truth," and that "he does not regard his financial obligations." Rider v. Rulison, 74 Hun, 239, 26 N. Y. Supp. 234.

A publication of one who had been a witness in court, representing him as "swearing terribly," and as being "no slouch at swearing to an old story," imports that he swore with levity, and rashly and inconsiderately, without due regard to the solemnity of the oath, or to the truth and accuracy of what he said. Though the words did not import perjury in the legal sense, they held him up to contempt and ridicule, as being so thoughtless or so immoral as to be regardless of the obligations becoming a witness, and therefore to be utterly unworthy of credit. In this view the words are actionable, for a writing published maliciously with a view to expose a person to contempt and ridicule is undoubtedly actionable. Steele v. Southwick (N. Y.) 9 Johns. 214, 215.

A letter written to C. by H. concerning B. was as follows: "I was unfortunate enough to have him in my employ at one time as a bookkeeper. He is a liar. I would not believe him under oath." Held, that each of the sets of words constitutes a libel, as written or printed matter may be libelous without charging a crime. Hake v. Brames, 95 Ind. 161, 162.

Intent.

The intent with which a publication is made, rather than its truth or falsity, is the correct criterion by which the jury is to determine whether such a publication is a libel. State v. Nichols, 45 Pac. 647, 648, 15 Wash. 1.

Joint act.

It has been held that several defendants might be joined in one and the same indictment or information for a libel, if the offense wholly arises from such a joint act as is criminal in itself, without any regard to any particular fault of the defendant which is peculiar to himself. The making and publishing a libel are matters susceptible of a joint concern and undertaking, as much as a trespass, or falsely and maliciously procuring another to be indicted. It is not like an action against several persons for speaking the same words. Such an action cannot be maintained, because the words of one are not the words of another. But with respect to libels, if one repeat and another write and a third approve what is written, they are all makers of the libel, for all persons who concur and show their assent or approbation to the doing of an unlawful act are guilty; and in this respect the murdering a man's reputation by a scandalous libel has been compared to murdering his person, where all who are assisting and encouraging in the act are guilty of homicide, though the stroke be given by one only. Thomas v. Rumsey (N. Y.) 6 Johns. 26, 31.

Malice.

Malice is said to be essential to an action for libel, but it is malice in a special technical sense which exists in the absence of lawful excuse, and where there may be no spite or ill will or disposition to injure others. Every publication having the other qualities of a libel, if willful and unprivileged, is in law malicious. The publication of words actionable in themselves is sufficient evidence of legal malice. Legal malice exists where a wrongful act is done intentionally. Neeb v. Hope, 2 Atl. 568, 570, 111 Pa. 145.

"A libel is both a public wrong and a private wrong. The remedy for the public wrong is by indictment or other criminal proceeding, while the remedy for the private wrong is by a civil action at common law, which is classed and known as a tort action. One of the essential elements of every libel is malice. And no declaration which should fail to charge that the publication complained of was malicious would state a cause of action." McDonald v. Brown, 51 Atl. 213, 23 R. I. 546, 58 L. R. A. 768, 91 Am. St. Rep. 659.

The right to an action of libel (where special damages are not sought) depends on a publication of matter affecting the reputation of the plaintiff of that character which is defined by law as necessarily causing actionable damage, made by the defendant in violation of a legal duty. The two main elements are injury to the plaintiff and a wrongful act; i. e., an act in violation of a legal duty by the defendant. The first element involves the definition of a defamatory publication; the second, of the duties imposed by law in respect to such publications. These duties are well settled. They are restrictive and permissive. The general duty which binds every one to absolutely refrain from the publication of defamatory matter, unless he possesses evidences of its truth so certain that he can successfully establish his charge in a court of justice; and the special duty to communicate such matter in good faith upon any subject in which one has an interest, or has, or honestly believes he has, a duty (including certain moral and social duties), to a person having a corresponding interest or duty. An act by which another must be injured, intentionally done, in violation of legal duty, is in law maliciously done; and so it is held that the wrongful act of the defendant essential to actionable libel must be malicious, and this essential element of libel is briefly expressed in the rule, "Malice is the gist of the action of libel." Atwater v. Morning News Co., 34 Atl. 865, 866, 67 Conn. 504.

The essence of this offense is malice, which is a question of fact for the jury. Rice v. Simmons (Del.) 2 Har. 309, 310, 31 Am. Dec. 766.

As personal injury.

See "Personal Injury."

Slander distinguished.

Libel is the printed or written declarations of one person against another, while slander is defined to be oral or spoken defamatory words used by one person against another. Woodruff v. Woodruff, 72 N. Y. Supp. 39, 40, 36 Misc. Rep. 15.

False, defamatory words, when written, constitute a libel, and, when spoken, a slander. Gambrill v. Schooley, 48 Atl. 730, 93 Md. 48, 52 L. R. A. 87, 86 Am. St. Rep. 414.

There is a material difference between words spoken and words written. To be actionable, the former must tend to bring a man into danger of punishment, exclude him from society, or injure him in his occupation; but it is enough if the latter induce an ill opinion to be had of the party, or make him contemptible and ridiculous. Hillhouse v. Dunning, 6 Conn. 391, 407.

"Every slander is a libel if published by writing, but there are many libels which are not slander. Any false publication by writing, which exposes one to ridicule, hatred, contempt, or obloquy, or causes him to be shunned or avoided, is a libel per se, though, if spoken, it may be no slander. The definition of slander per se is not general, like that of libel, but is restricted and specific. To falsely charge one in writing with having any repulsive disease or condition which would necessarily cause him to be shunned or avoided, would be a libel, but it would not be slander if spoken, unless it was of one of the diseases embraced within the definition of slander." A false charge that plaintiff has the leprosy is libelous per se, though science may have established that the disease is not contagious, but only hereditary, as it tends to cause plaintiff to be shunned and excluded from society. Simpson v. Press Pub. Co., 67 N. Y. Supp. 401, 402, 33 Misc. Rep. 228.

Libel, at the common law, was any false and malicious writing published of another, and having a tendency to render him contemptible or ridiculous in public estimation, or expose him to public contempt, or hinder a virtuous man from associating with him. There is a difference between slander and libel as to what is required to constitute an actionable charge. It is perfectly reasonable to allow greater liberty of vocal speech than of a writing or printing for the reasons that vocal utterance does not imply the same degree of deliberation, and is more likely to be the expression of momentary passion or excitement, and is not so open to the implication of settled malice. Therefore to such oral expressions little importance is generally attached. On the other hand, the same words deliberately written or printed, and afterwards placed before the public, justify an inference that they are the expression of settled conviction, and they affect the public mind greatly. Second. An oral charge is merely heard, while a written or printed charge may be passed from hand to hand indefinitely, for many years, constituting all the time a continuous condemnation. Republican Pub. Co. v. Mosman, 24 Pac. 1051, 1054, 15 Colo. 399.

Libel is a malicious defamation of a person otherwise than by words, as by writing, printing, figures, signs, or any other symbol. Rosewater v. Hoffman, 24 Neb. 222, 38 N. W. 857, 860.

In order to support an action for oral slander something criminal must have been imputed; but in libel any tendency to bring a party into contempt or ridicule is actionable, and in general any charge of immoral conduct, although in matters not punishable by law. Feder v. Herrick, 43 N. J. Law (14 Vroom) 24, 27.

LIBEL (In Practice)

The term "libel," as used in admiralty, is pleading, which occupies a similar place in admiralty pleadings to that of the declaration in an action at law. It is the first pleading of the libellant. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. The Atlas, 93 U. S. 302, 316, 23 L. Ed. 863.

The term "information" is not exclusively applied to a proceeding at common law. A libel on a seizure is in its terms and essence an information. So it is held that, where the cause is of admiralty jurisdiction, and the proceeding is by information, the suit is not withdrawn by the nature of the remedy from the jurisdiction to which it otherwise belongs. The Sauriel, 14 U. S. (1 Wheat.) 9, 14, 4 L. Ed. 23.

LIBERAL

An agreement by a person "to pay as well or as liberal as he had paid for certain other land," means the same price in proportion to the value, and not the same price per acre. Cooper v. Carlisle, 17 N. J. Eq. (2 C. E. Green) 525, 533.

LIBERAL ART.

A polite or "liberal art" is that in which the mind or imagination is chiefly concerned, as poetry, music, and painting, as distinguished from a useful or mechanical art, which is one in which the hands and body are more concerned than the brain. City of New Orleans v. Robira, 8 South. 402, 403, 42 La. Ann. 1098, 11 L. R. A. 141.

LIBERAL CONSTRUCTION.

Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries, lays down the rule that a guaranty is to receive a "liberal construction" for the purpose of ascertaining its latitude, or the interests of the party to it. Held, that the words "liberal construction," as so used, do not mean that the words shall be forced out of their natural meaning, but simply that the words should receive a fair and reasonable interpretation, so as to attain the object for which the instrument is designed and the purpose to which it is applied. Lawrence v. McCalmont, 43 U. S. (2 How.) 426, 449, 11 L. Ed. 326 (cited in Crist v. Burlingame [N. Y.] 62 Barb. 351, 355).

Liberal construction does not mean enlargement or restriction of any plain provision of law. If a statutory provision is plain and unambiguous, it is the duty of the court to enforce it as it is written. If it is ambiguous or doubtful, or susceptible of different constructions or interpretations, then such liberality of construction may be indulged in as, within the fair interpretation of its language, will effect its apparent object and promote justice. In re Johnson's Estate, 33 Pac. 460, 466, 98 Cal. 531, 21 L. R. A. 380; In re Jessup, 22 Pac. 742, 745, 81 Cal. 408, 6 L. R. A. 594.

The liberal construction of a statute is such construction as does not presume that the Legislature intended the very least innovation on previous law, but, looking primarily at the intent of the Legislature, endeavors to fulfill it at any cost of innovation. Liberal construction looks to the intent to determine the amount of innovation. Shorey v. Wyckoff, 1 Wash. T. 348, 351.

LIBERAL INTERPRETATION.

"Liberal interpretation," as used in the statement that certain statutes should receive a liberal interpretation, does not mean that "the words should be forced out of their natural meaning, but simply that the words should receive a fair and reasonable interpretation, so as to attain the objects for which the instrument is designed and the purpose to which it is applied." Lawrence v. McCalmont, 43 U. S. (2 How.) 426, 449, 11 L. Ed. 326.

LIBERAL REWARD.

The liberal reward offered for information leading to the apprehension of a fugitive from justice does not require that the specific sum offered for his apprehension should be paid, unless the party claiming it apprehended the fugitive, or the arrest was made by his agent. Shuey v. United States, 92 U. S. 73, 76, 23 L. Ed. 697.

LIBERALITY.

A bequest in trust for such business of benevolence and "liberality" as the trustee shall approve cannot be supported as a charitable legacy. If the word "benevolence" means charity, and "liberality" means something different from that idea, which a court of justice is obliged to apply to that word "charity," there is no ground for the application of the bequest partially, if it cannot be wholly, to charity. Morice v. Bishop of Durham, 10 Ves. 522, 524.

LIBERALLY.

The word "liberally," as used in a provision in a will for paying the executors liberally, means no more than compensation that is fair and just. Kenan v. Graham, 33 South. 699, 702, 135 Ala. 585.

"Liberally," as used in Code, § 159, requiring pleadings to be liberally construed with a view to substantial justice between the parties, means that if, from the whole pleading, it can be seen that a party has a cause of action or defense, he shall not be deprived of it because he has stated it in an improper or informal manner; but it does not mean that substantial averments may be omitted, and the omission disregarded. Koenig v. Nott (N. Y.) 8 Abb. Prac. 384, 393.

LIBERTY.

A vote of a town providing that certain persons have the "liberty to make a road from," etc., "over the public land," is to be construed as a mere license, which must be executed and the road made in a reasonable time and manner for the public travel, in order to have any efficacy. Curtiss v. Hoyt, 19 Conn. 154, 169, 48 Am. Dec. 149.

"Liberty," as used in the Constitution of the United States, does not mean mere freedom from arrest and restraint, but means liberty in a broader and more comprehensive sense, embracing freedom of action, freedom in the selection of a business calling or avocation, freedom in the control and use of one's property so far as its use does not infringe the rights of others, freedom in exercising the rights, privileges, and immunities that belong to the citizen generally, and freedom in the pursuit of any lawful business selected by the citizen. State v. Scougal (S. D.) 51 N. W. 858, 861; People v. Warden of City Prison, 51 N. E. 1006, 1010, 157 N. Y. 116, 43 L. R. A. 264, 68 Am. St. Rep. 763; People v. Marx, 3 N. Y. Cr. R. 200, 207; People v. Marx, 2 N. E. 29, 33, 99 N. Y. 377, 52 Am. Rep. 34; People v. Rosenberg, 22 N. Y. Supp. 56, 57, 67 Hun, 52; Wilson v. Telegram Co., 3 N. Y. Supp. 633, 638, 18 N. Y. St. Rep. 78; Bell v. Gaynor, 36 N. Y. Supp. 122, 123, 14 Misc. Rep. 334; People v. Gillson, 17 N. E. 343, 345, 109 N. Y. 389, 4 Am. St. Rep. 465; State v. Loomis, 22 S. W. 350, 351, 115 Mo. 307, 21 L. R. A. 789; State v. Julow, 31 S. W. 781, 782, 129 Mo. 163, 29 L. R. A. 257, 50 Am. St. Rep. 443; Allgeyer v. Louisiana, 17 Sup. Ct. 427, 431, 165 U. S. 578, 41 L. Ed. 832; Booth v. Illinois, 22 Sup. Ct. 425, 426, 184 U. S. 425, 46 L. Ed. 623; Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339, 344, 25 L. Ed. 676; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 142, 24 L. Ed. 77; Lansburgh v. District of Columbia, 11 App. D. C. 512, 521; Bessette v. People, 62 N. E. 215, 218, 193 Ill. 334; Low v. Rees Printing Co., 59 N. W. 362, 366, 41 Neb. 127, 24 L. R. A. 702, 43 Am. St. Rep. 670; Kuhn v. Common Council of City of Detroit, 38 N. W. 470, 471, 70 Mich. 534; City of Helena v. Dwyer, 42 S. W. 1071, 1072, 64 Ark. 424, 39 L. R. A. 266, 62 Am. St. Rep. 206. "Sir W. Blackstone says that every man, when he enters into society, gives up a part of his natural liberty as the price of so valuable a purchase as the acquisition of social and municipal relations. Mr. Jefferson denies this doctrine, because he was of the opinion that no man had a natural right to commit aggression on the equal rights of another, and that every man is under the natural duty of contributing to the interests of society, and that no man had a natural right to be the judge between himself and another, but was bound to submit to the umpirage of an impartial third. This contrariety of opinion between Judge Blackstone and the American statesman is rather apparent than real, for Blackstone's definition of natural rights is far more comprehensive than Mr. Jefferson's. The former supposes natural liberty to consist properly in the power of acting as one thinks fit, without any restraint or control, unless by the law of nature. If this law of nature, as Mr. Jefferson thinks, comprehends those restrictions which the equal rights of others, the duty of contributing to the interest of society, and submitting to the decision of impartial judges in disputes between individuals would imply, there is no essential difference between the opinions alluded to." Snyder v. Warford, 11 Mo. 513, 515, 49 Am. Dec. 94; State v. Dalton, 22 R. I. 77, 86, 46 Atl. 234, 237, 48 L. R. A. 775, 84 Am. St. Rep. 818; People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 389, 17 N. E. 343, 345, 4 Am. St. Rep. 465; Bessette v. People, 62 N. E. 215, 218, 193 Ill. 334 (citing Braceville Coal Co. v. People, 147 Ill. 66, 37 N. E. 62, 22 L. R. A. 340, 37 Am. St. Rep. 206). Allgeyer v. Louisiana, 17 Sup. Ct. 427, 431, 165 U. S. 578, 41 L. Ed. 832.

The term "liberty," as used in the constitutional declarations, means more than freedom of locomotion. It includes and comprehends, among other things, freedom of speech, the right to self-defense against unlawful violence, and the right to freely buy and sell as others may. State ex inf. Crow v. Continental Tobacco Co., 75 S. W. 737, 747, 177 Mo. 1 (citing State v. Loomis, 115 Mo. 307, 22 S. W. 350, 21 L. R. A. 789).

The "liberty" of the Constitution has been defined, and it will be continued to be defined, by some as the right of an individual to keep out of prison excepting for crime committed. Others will define liberty as also including the right to earn a livelihood, acquire property, perform services for another, employ others, make contracts not tainted with an illegal or immoral consideration, and those not injurious to the health or welfare of people. Greenwich Ins. Co. v. Carroll (U. S.) 125 Fed. 121, 129.

Liberty is nothing more than mere freedom from physical restraint. It means freedom to go where one may choose, and to act in such manner, not inconsistent with the equal rights of others, as one's judgment may dictate for the promotion of one's happiness; that is, to pursue such callings and avocations as may be most suitable to develop one's capacities and to give them their highest enjoyment. Kuhn v. City of Detroit Common Council, 70 Mich. 534, 537, 38 N. W. 470.

"Liberty" is a constitutional term, embodying a practical idea. It means the enjoyment of the rights which belong to us as individuals. To secure this to every human being is the object of social organization and the end of government. The law defines, regulates, and secures the rights of each individual, and upon this supremacy depends the existence of civil liberty. In the practical sense, therefore, in which we understand liberty, there is nothing imaginative or utopian about it. It implies the duty of obedience to laws, which, if unsuited to our condition, we have the right to change, but which, while in force, we are bound to obey. People v. Judson (N. Y.) 11 Daly, 1, 11, 12.

A convict pardoned by the executive on condition that he shall depart from the state and remain away therefrom is restrained in his liberty by such condition within the meaning of the Constitution providing that no man can be deprived of his liberty unless by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land. The restraint is one voluntarily substituted by the convict and the executive in lieu of that which had been imposed upon him by law, but it is nevertheless a restraint of personal liberty. He is by the condition, if it is binding, restrained of his liberty in some degree. Commonwealth v. Hatsfield, 2 Pa. Law J. 37, 40.

As franchise

"Blackstone says that 'liberty' and 'franchise' are used as synonymous terms, and their definition is a real privilege or branch of the King's prerogative subsisting in the hands of a subject." Spring Valley Water Works v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 69, 106 (quoting 2 Bl. Comm. 37).

In a legal sense "franchise" and "liberty" are used as synonymous terms, and the kinds of them are various, and almost infinite. 2 Bl. Comm. 37. A franchise is defined by Webster as a particular privilege or right granted by a prince or sovereign to an individual or to a number of persons; an exemption from a burden or duty to which others are subject. Central R. & Banking Co. v. State, 54 Ga. 401, 409.

"Liberty," as used in the colony ordinance of 1647, commonly known as the "Ordinance of 1641," providing that in all creeks, coves, and other places by and on salt water where the sea ebbs and flows the proprietor of the land adjoining shall have propriety to the low-water mark, provided that such proprietor shall not by this liberty have power to stop or hinder the passage of boats or other vessels, is synonymous with "right," "franchise," and "privilege," and does not mean only the license or permission. Commonwealth v. Alger, 61 Mass. (7 Cush.) 53, 70.

Right to contract.

The term "liberty" in the constitutional provision against the deprivation of life, liberty, etc., without due process of law, includes the right to make all proper contracts in relation thereto, and to enjoy the legitimate fruits thereof. Harbison v. Knoxville Iron Co., 53 S. W. 955, 957, 103 Tenn. 421, 56 L. R. A. 316, 76 Am. St. Rep. 682.

"Liberty," as used in Const. art. 1, § 8, declaring that no man shall be deprived of his life, liberty, or property but by the law of the land, should be construed to include the right of contract. It is an inherent part of the right of liberty. State v. Schlitz Brewing Co., 59 S. W. 1033, 1040, 104 Tenn. 715, 78 Am. St. Rep. 941.

The efforts to prevent competition, to restrict individual effort and freedom of action in trade or commerce, are restrictions hostile to the public welfare, and not consonant with the spirit of our institutions, and in violation of law. It was held in Fraser v. People, 140 Ill. 171, 31 N. E. 395, 16 L. R. A. 492, that the privilege of contracting is both a liberty and a property right, and, if A. is denied the right to contract and acquire property in a manner which he has hitherto enjoyed under the law and B., C., and D. are still allowed by the law to enjoy, it is clear that he is deprived of both liberty and property to the extent that he is thus denied the right to contract. People v. Chicago Live Stock Exchange, 48 N. E. 1062, 1065, 170 Ill. 556, 39 L. R. A. 373, 62 Am. St. Rep. 404.

"Liberty," as used in the first section of the Bill of Rights, does not mean a mere freedom from physical restraint or state of slavery, but is deemed to embrace the right of man to be free in the enjoyment of the faculties with which he has been endowed by the Creator, subject only to such restraints as are necessary for the common welfare. Contracts and compacts have been entered into between men and women, tribes and nations, during all time, from the earliest dawn of history, and the life and liberty of contract is one of those inalienable rights of man fully secured and protected by our Constitution, and it can only be restrained so far as is necessary for the common welfare and the equal protection and benefit of the people. Palmer v. Tingle, 45 N. E. 313, 314, 55 Ohio St. 423.

"Liberty," as used in Const. U. S. Amend. 14, providing that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, means more than freedom of locomotion. It includes and comprehends, among other things, freedom of speech, the right of self-defense against unlawful violence, and the right to freely buy and sell as others may. It includes the right to contract as others may; and to take away that right from a class of persons following lawful pursuits is simply depriving such persons of a time-honored right, which the Constitution undertakes to secure to every citizen. State v. Loomis, 22 S. W. 350, 351, 115 Mo. 307, 21 L. R. A. 789 (citing Story, Const. [5th Ed.] § 1590).

"Liberty" includes the right of private contract. In a constitutional sense it means only civil liberty; that is, that measure of freedom which may be enjoyed in a civilized community consistently with peaceful enjoyment of like freedom in others. Thus an act forbidding the discharge of an employé because he was a member of a labor organization is void for imposing a restraint on individual freedom guaranteed by the state and federal Constitutions. State v. Kreutzberg, 90 N. W. 1098, 1101, 114 Wis. 530, 58 L. R. A. 748, 91 Am. St. Rep. 934.

"Liberty," as that term is used in the Constitution, includes the right of lawful contract. Maupin v. Scottish Union & Nat. Ins. Co., 45 S. E. 1003, 1009, 53 W. Va. 557.

"Liberty," in its broad sense, as understood in this country, means the right not only of freedom from servitude, imprisonment, or restraint, but the right of one to use his faculties in all lawful ways to live and work where he will, to earn his livelihood in any lawful calling, and to pursue any lawful trade or avocation. The term "liberty," as used in the Constitution of New York, is not dwarfed into mere freedom from physical restraint of the person as by incarceration, but embraces the right of man to be free in the enjoyment of the faculties with which he has been endowed by his Creator, subject only to such restraints as are necessary for the common welfare. Laws 1887, c. 691, providing that no person shall sell, exchange, or dispose of any article of food, or offer or attempt to do so, upon any representation, advertisement, or inducement that anything other than what is specifically stated to be the subject of the sale or exchange is or is to be delivered or received as a part of the transaction as a gift, prize, premium, or reward to the purchaser, and providing that any person violating the provision of the section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, is an infringement on the liberty of the citizens as guaranteed by the Constitution. People v. Gillson, 16 N. Y. St. Rep. 185, 189, 109 N. Y. 389, 17 N. E. 343, 4 Am. St. Rep. 465.

Right to choose employment.

"Liberty," as used in the provision of the federal Constitution declaring that persons shall not be deprived of liberty, etc., without due process of law, includes the right to adopt a lawful employment in choice of occupation; and hence a city ordinance that makes it an offense for any person to carry on a laundry where clothes are washed for pay, within the habitable portion of the city, is a deprivation of a liberty within the meaning of the federal Constitution. The Stockton Laundry Case (U. S.) 26 Fed. 611, 614.

So much of the different acts of the assembly regulating peddling as makes physical disability on the part of an applicant for a peddler's license one of the tests of his eligibility, is unconstitutional and void as interfering with the liberty guaranteed by the Constitution. Such a requirement is not a police regulation, but is in the nature of class legislation, intending to restrict to a few a right which under proper regulations should be given to all. In re Brittain's Application, 5 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 318, 320.

The word "liberty," as used in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, is deemed to embrace the right of a citizen to be free in the employment of all his faculties; to be free to use them in all lawful ways; to live and work where he will; to earn his livelihood by any lawful calling, and for that purpose to enter into all contracts which may be proper, necessary, and essential to his carrying out to a successful conclusion the purpose above mentioned. Young v. Commonwealth (Va.) 45 S. E. 327.

Liberty includes the right to contract as others may, and to take a right away from the class of persons following lawful pursuits is simply depriving such persons of a time-honored right, which the Constitution undertakes to secure to every citizen. State v. Loomis, 115 Mo. 307, 22 S. W. 350, 21 L. R. A. 789. All laws which impair or trammel the rights to contract or to earn a livelihood in any lawful calling or pursue any lawful trade or vocation, which limit one in his choice of a trade or vocation, or confine him to work or live in a specified locality, or restrain his otherwise lawful movements, except such as may be passed in the exercise by the Legislature of the police power, are infringements upon his fundamental rights of liberty. Marshall & Bruce Co. v. City of Nashville, 71 S. W. 815, 818, 109 Tenn. 495 (citing In re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 106, 50 Am. Rep. 636).

As individual liberty.

Under a provision of the treaty with the Creek Indian Nation to the effect that in their property rights and liberty they shall never be disturbed, it is held that by the words "rights and liberty" is not meant rights claimed by the Indian nation to the destruction of the rights of the United States, nor a liberty to do every imaginable act unrestrained by law, but that the word "liberty" has regard to individual liberty, and did not confer upon them any rights as a nation. Caldwell v. State (Ala.) 1 Stew. & P. 327, 442.

Right to labor.

"Liberty," within the meaning of Const. art. 1, cl. 1, declaring that all men have the right to enjoy life and liberty, and to acquire possession and protect property, includes the right to labor and transact business. State v. Cadigan, 50 Atl. 1079, 1081, 73 Vt. 245, 57 L. R. A. 668, 87 Am. St. Rep. 714.

The right to liberty embraces the right of a man to exercise his faculties, and to follow a lawful avocation for the support of his life. There is no proposition more firmly fixed than that it is one of the fundamental rights and privileges of an American citizen to follow and adopt such lawful industrial pursuits not injurious to the community as he may see fit. City of Helena v. Dwyer, 42 S. W. 1071, 1072, 64 Ark. 424, 39 L. R. A. 206, 62 Am. St. Rep. 206.

Laws 1895, c. 283, § 1, prohibiting barbers from carrying on their business on Sunday, is within the police powers of the Legislature, and is not void as being in violation of the provision of the Constitution that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. People v. Havnor, 11 N. Y. Cr. R. 35, 36, 37 N. Y. Supp. 314.

"Liberty" includes the right to make and enforce contracts, because the right to make and enforce contracts is included in the right to acquire property. Labor is property. To deprive the laborer and employer of this right to contract with one another is to violate Const. art. 2, § 2, providing that no person shall be deprived of liberty or property without due process of law. Mathews v. People, 67 N. E. 28, 32, 202 Ill. 389, 63 L. R. A. 73, 95 Am. St. Rep. 241.

Right to deal in options.

"Liberty" and "property," within the meaning of Const. 1870, art. 2, § 2, providing that no person can be deprived without due process of law, includes the right to acquire property, and that means and includes the privilege of contracting and making and enforcing contracts. The right, however, does not preclude the exercise of the police power of the state, and therein Cr. Code, § 130, making it a misdemeanor to purchase options on commodities for future delivery is not in violation of the constitutional provision, as such act is designed to prevent gambling in any commodities. Booth v. People, 57 N. E. 798, 799, 186 Ill. 43, 50 L. R. A. 762, 78 Am. St. Rep. 229.

A statute containing prohibitions against options to buy and sell grain or other commodities at a certain time does not invade the liberty granted to every citizen by the United States Constitution, Amend. 14. Booth v. Illinois, 22 Sup. Ct. 425, 426, 184 U. S. 425, 46 L. Ed. 623.

Restraint by law implied.

Under our government the only liberty we know anything about is liberty regulated by law. United States v. Hudson (U. S.) 65 Fed. 68, 74.

The word "liberty," as used in the fourteenth amendment of the federal Constitution, is freedom from all restraints but such as are imposed by law. In re Marshall (U. S.) 102 Fed. 323, 324.

"Liberty," as used in the federal Constitution, guarantying every person liberty and equal protection of the law, etc., means freedom from all restraints but such as are justly imposed by law. Slaughter House Cases, 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 36, 127, 21 L. Ed. 394.

"Liberty, as understood in this country, is not license, but liberty regulated by law. The personal property of every man is subject to such reasonable regulations as in the wisdom of the Legislature are considered necessary to promote not only the peace and good order of society, but its well-being. Thus the statute prohibiting Sunday baseball is not a violation of Bill of Rights, § 1, guarantying personal liberty." State v. Powell, 50 N. E. 900, 902, 58 Ohio St. 324, 41 L. R. A. 854.

"The words 'liberties of the people' in a judicial sense mean the aggregate political rights and franchises of the people of the state at large. The liberties of the people here and elsewhere are not only essentially subject to the ordinary jurisdiction of the courts, not only unimpaired by them, but are absolutely dependent upon them. The supremacy of original judicial process enters into the liberties of the people, and is essential to them. Order is essential to all liberty, and judicial supremacy is essential to order." In re Pierce, 44 Wis. 411, 431, 443 (cited in State v. Cunningham, 51 N. W. 724, 735, 81 Wis. 440, 15 L. R. A. 561).

In a broad sense, whatever prevents a man from following a useful calling is an invasion of his liberty. Yet many laws have been passed which, to some extent, have interfered with the right to liberty and property, but their accord with the Constitution has seldom been questioned, and when questioned has been generally sustained. The power of taxation, the right to preserve the public health, to protect the public morals, and to provide for the public safety, may interfere somewhat with both liberty and property, yet proper statutes to effect these ends have never been held to invade the guaranties of the Constitution. Thus Laws 1895, c. 823, § 1, prohibiting barbers from carrying on their business on Sunday, is within the police powers of the Legislature, which include the enactment of legislation adapted to the promotion of health by enforcing the observance of a day of rest. People v. Havnor, 43 N. E. 541, 542, 149 N. Y. 195, 31 L. R. A. 689, 52 Am. St. Rep. 707.

Liberty, the greatest of all rights, is not unrestricted license to act, according to one's own will. It is only freedom from restraint under conditions essential to equal enjoyment of the same right by others. It is then liberty regulated by law. Kentucky Board of Pharmacy v. Cassidy, 74 S. W. 730, 732, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 102 (citing Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86, 89, 11 Sup. Ct. 13, 34 L. Ed. 620).

Right to attend school.

The provision of the fourteenth amendment of the federal Constitution that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, has no reference to the privilege accorded by the law of the state of attending public schools maintained at the expense of the state, and no person can be said to have been deprived of either life, liberty, or property because denied the right to attend as a pupil at school, however obviously insufficient and untenable be the ground upon which the exclusion is put. Ward v. Flood, 48 Cal. 36, 50, 17 Am. Rep. 405.

Right to keep secret books and papers.

Under Const. art. 1, § 6, providing that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, the word "liberty" includes liberty of action, and embraces the right to keep secret one's books and papers, his business methods, and his knowledge of his own affairs. Organized society, however, requires some sacrifice of personal liberty of its members, and the Constitution, which organized the state government, makes liberty subject to due process of law. The anti-monopoly act (Laws 1899, c. 690), authorizing the court to appoint a referee to take testimony on the petition of the attorney general preparatory to action by him for violation of said law, would not be infringing upon the personal liberty of the person to be examined without due process of law. There must be reasonable protection against danger of abuse. No general inquiry into private affairs should be allowed. The testimony must be material, and his vested rights should not be interfered with. In re Davies, 61 N. E. 118, 122, 168 N. Y. 89, 56 L. R. A. 855.

Right to transfer property.

The right to sell or transfer one's property is as much an inalienable right as that of enjoyment of property free from unnecessary restrictions. Bell v. Gaynor, 36 N. Y. Supp. 122, 123, 14 Misc. Rep. 334.

An act making it a misdemeanor for any person who sells food to give away therewith as a part of the transaction of sale any other thing as a premium, gift, etc., interferes with a person's liberty. People v. Gillson, 17 N. E. 343, 345, 109 N. Y. 389, 4 Am. St. Rep. 465.

LIBERTY OF THE GLOBE.

A marine policy providing that the vessel may have the "liberty of the globe" means that she may go to any part of the world. Eyre v. Marine Ins. Co. (Pa.) 6 Whart. 247, 254.

LIBERTY OF A PORT.

"Liberty of a port," in marine insurance, is a power subordinate to the general course of the voyage. It does not necessarily import an intention to trade. It may, and ordinarily is, granted for other and different purposes. It is not an assurance or intimation to the underwriters that the assured looks to the port of privilege, under any circumstances in the contemplation of the parties, as that at which the voyage was to terminate. The knowledge of the nature of the cargo is not to be imputed to underwriters because they gave the assured the liberty of a certain port, which conferred the license to trade there. Allegre's Adm'r's v. Maryland Ins. Co. (Md.) 8 Gill & J. 190, 200, 29 Am. Dec. 536.

LIBERTY OF SPEECH AND THE PRESS.

Judge Cooley in speaking of the constitutional provisions relating to liberty of speech and of the press, says: "We understand 'liberty of speech and of the press' to imply not only liberty to publish, but complete immunity from legal censure and punishment for the publication, so long as it is not harmful in its character, when tested by such standards as the law affords." Cooper v. People, 22 Pac. 790-798, 13 Colo. 337, 6 L. R. A. 430; State ex rel. Crow v. Shepherd, 76 S. W. 79-91, 177 Mo. 205.

"Liberty of the press," as used in the provision of the federal Constitution guarantying the liberty of the press, etc., means a right in the conductor of a newspaper to print whatever he chooses without any previous license, but subject to be held responsible therefor to exactly the same extent that any one else would be responsible for the publication. Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 158, 182, 31 Am. Rep. 757; Negley v. Farrow, 60 Md. 158, 175, 45 Am. Rep. 715; Jones v. Townsend's Adm'r, 21 Fla. 431, 450, 58 Am. Rep. 676; Upton v. Hume, 33 Pac. 810, 812, 24 Or. 420, 21 L. R. A. 493, 41 Am. St. Rep. 863; Fitzpatrick v. Daily States Pub. Co., 20 South. 173, 179, 48 La. Ann. 1116; Commonwealth v. Buckingham (Mass.) Thacher, Cr. Cas. 29, 39.

The liberty of the press was said by Blackstone to consist "in laying no previous restraints upon publication, and not in freedom from censure for a criminal matter when published. Every freeman has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public. To forbid this is to destroy the freedom of the press, but if he publishes what is improper, mischievous, or illegal, he must take the consequences of his own temerity." Morton v. State, 3 Tex. App. 510, 516 (citing 4 Bl. Comm., side p. 152).

"Liberty of the press," as used in Const. art. 16, which declares that the "liberty of the press is essential to the security of freedom in a state; it ought not therefore to be restrained in this commonwealth"—is used for the purpose of preventing all such restraints on publications as had previously been practiced by other governments, and in this country, before the adoption of this Constitution, to stifle the efforts of patriots towards enlightening their fellow subjects on their rights and the duties of rulers. It does not affect the right to prosecute for the abuse of such liberty. Commonwealth v. Blanding, 20 Mass. (3 Pick.) 304, 813, 15 Am. Dec. 214.

By the provisions of the federal and state Constitutions, guarantying the "freedom of the press," it was simply intended to secure to the conductors of the press the same rights and immunities as are enjoyed by the public at large. The citizen has the right to speak the truth in reference to the acts of government, public officials, or individuals. The press is guarantied the same right, but no greater right. The citizen has the right to criticise the acts of the government, provided it is with a good motive of correcting what he believes to be existing evils, and of bringing about a more efficient or honest administration of government. For a like purpose and like motive he may criticise the acts of public officials, and for the honest purpose of better subserving the public interests he may criticise the fitness and qualifications of candidates for office, not only in respect to their ability, fidelity, and experience, but in respect to their personal habits. The press has precisely the same rights, but no more. The citizen may, in what he honestly believes to be in the interest of morals and good order, and the suppression of immorality and disorder, criticise the acts of other individuals; so may the press. Riley v. Lee, 11 S. W. 713, 714, 88 Ky. 603, 21 Am. St. Rep. 358.

In its broadest sense, "freedom of the press" includes not only exemption from censorship, but security against laws enacted by the legislative department of the government, or measures resorted to by either of the branches for the purpose of stifling just criticism or muzzling public opinion. It will not apply to a contract for the sale of a newspaper, whereby it was agreed that the seller would not edit, print, or conduct a newspaper, or be connected with one in the state, without consent of the purchaser. Cowan v. Fairbrother, 24 S. E. 212, 215, 118 N. C. 406.

The constitutional provision guarantying the liberties of the speech or the press does not give the right to publish articles inciting a murder. What it does permit is liberty of action to the extent that such liberty does not interfere with or deprive others of an equal right. In the eye of the law each citizen has an equal right to live and act, and to enjoy the benefits of the laws of the state under which he lives. But no one has the right to use the privileges thus conferred in such a way as to injure his fellow citizen, and one who imagines that he has, labors under a serious misconception, not only of the true meaning of the constitutional provision referred to, but of his duty and obligations to his fellow citizens and to the state itself. People v. Most, 75 N. Y. Supp. 591, 592, 71 App. Div. 160.

"Freedom of the press" does not mean "a press wholly beyond the reach of the law, for this would be emphatically Pandora's Box, the source of every evil. The founders of our governments were too wise and too just ever to have intended by the freedom of the press a right to circulate falsehood as well as truth, or that the press should be the lawful vehicle of malicious defamation, or an engine for evil and designing men to cherish, for malicious purposes, sedition, irreligion, and impurity. I adopt in this case as perfectly correct the comprehensive and accurate definition of one of the counsel at the bar (General Hamilton), that the liberty of the press consists in the right to publish with impunity truth, with good motives and for justifiable ends, whether it respects government, magistracy, or individuals." People v. Croswell, 3 Johns. Cas. 337, 393; State v. Meyers, 21 Wkly. Law Bul. 302, 10 Ohio Dec. 238.

Liberty of speech and of the press is guarantied by the supreme law of the land, and will be zealously guarded, preserved, and enforced by the courts. The provisions of the federal and state Constitutions were designed to secure rights of the people and of the press for the public good, and they do not license the utterance of false, slanderous, or libelous matter. Individuals are free to talk, and the press is at liberty to publish, and neither may be restrained by injunction, but they are answerable for the abuse of this privilege in an action for libel and slander under the common law, except where by that law, or by statute enacted in the interest of public policy, the publication is privileged and deemed for the general good, even though it works a private injury. Stuart v. Press Pub. Co., 82 N. Y. Supp. 401, 408, 83 App. Div. 467.

The "liberty of the press consists in the right to publish with impunity the truth, with good motives and for justifiable ends, whether it respects governments or individuals; the right freely to publish whatever the citizen may please, and to be protected against any responsibility for so doing, except in so far as such publications, from their blasphemy, obscenity, or scandalous character, may be a public offense, or as by their falsehood and malice they may injuriously affect the standing and reputation, or pecuniary interests, of individuals." State ex inf. Crow v. Shepherd, 76 S. W. 79, 91, 177 Mo. 205.

The "liberty of the press," as Chancellor Kent declared in a celebrated case, "consists in the right to publish, with impunity, truth, with good motives, and for justifiable ends, whether it respects governments, magistracy, or individuals." People v. Croswell (N. Y.) 3 Johns. Cas. 337, 393. Mr. Justice Story defined the phrase to mean "that every man shall have a right to speak, write, and print his opinion upon any subject whatsoever without any prior restraint, so always that he does not injure any other person in his rights, person, property, or reputation, and so always that he does not thereby disturb the public peace or attempt to subvert the government." Story, Comm. § 1874. The publisher of an article which instigates revolution and murder, and suggests the persons to be murdered, through the positions occupied, and which denounces those who spare the ministers of public justice as guilty of a crime, is not protected by a provision of the Constitution respecting the liberty of the speech and of the press. People v. Most, 64 N. E. 175, 178, 171 N. Y. 423, 58 L. R. A. 509.

The constitutional guaranty of freedom of speech and liberty of the press were designed to secure constitutional immunity for the expression of opinion; but that does not mean unrestrained license, nor does it confer the right upon the editor of the newspapers to write or publish whatever he may choose, no matter how false, malicious, or injurious it may be, without full responsibility for the damage it may cause. Fitzpatrick v. Daily States Pub. Co., 20 South. 173, 179, 48 La. Ann. 1116.

"Freedom of speech," within the meaning of Bill of Rights, § 7, prohibiting any law impairing the freedom of speech, and providing that every person shall be free to say, privately or publicly, whatever he will, being responsible for all abuse of that liberty, does not include the right of publishing or disseminating a paper devoted mainly to scandal and immoral conduct, and therefore a statute prohibiting such an act is not in violation of the clause. State v. Van Wye, 37 S. W. 938, 136 Mo. 227, 58 Am. St. Rep. 627.

The administration of the law of libel is concerned with two important rights, the rights of an individual to reparation for malicious injuries to his reputation, and the rights of the people to liberty of speech and of the press. The two rights are not inconsistent, but interdependent. Freedom of the press is the offspring of law, and its primary meaning excludes all notion of malicious injury. Indeed, any true freedom of the press becomes impossible where malicious injuries are not forbidden and punished, and the strongest guaranty of that freedom lies in the impartial administration of the law, that distinguishes the performance of a public or social duty from the infliction of a malicious injury. Atwater v. Morning News Co., 34 Atl. 865, 868, 67 Conn. 504.

It is founded on personal confidence, and is not assignable or within the statute of frauds. Sampson v. Burnside, 13 N. H. 264, 265; Dolittle v. Eddy (N. Y.) 7 Barb. 74, 78 (citing Mumford v. Whitney [N. Y.] 15 Wend. 380, 30 Am. Dec. 60); Wolfe v. Frost (N. Y.) 4 Sandf. Ch. 72, 73; Greenwood Lake & P. L. R. Co. v. New York & G. L. R. Co., 31 N. E. 874, 875, 134 N. Y. 435; Hazelton v. Putnam (Wis.) 3 Pin. 107, 115, 54 Am. Dec. 158. It may be created by parol, and is generally revocable at the will of the licensor. Wessels v. Colebank, 51 N. E. 639, 640, 174 Ill. 618; Jamieson v. Millemann, 10 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Duer) 255, 258; Cary Hardware Co. v. McCarty, 50 Pac. 744, 746, 10 Colo. App. 200.

A "license" is described by Jones in his book on Easements as a personal and revocable privilege to do some act or series of acts upon the lands of another without possessing any estate therein, and may be created by parol. It gives immunity to the licensee while acting under the privilege, but confers no vested right by which he can rightfully enjoy it contrary to the will of the grantor. Great Falls Waterworks Co. v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 54 Pac. 963, 966, 21 Mont. 487.

A "license," in the law of real property, is an authority to do an act or a series of acts upon the land of the person granting the license, without, however, conferring on the licensee any estate in the land. It does not create an easement nor give rise to an interest in land, and hence it is not within the statute of frauds, and need not be in writing, although it may be in writing and under seal. The form of the authority, however, does not affect its nature, and a written license, even though under seal, has only the same effect as an oral license. Price & Baker Co. v. Madison (S. D.) 95 N. W. 933, 934.

The word "license" means permission or authority, and a license to do any particular thing is a permission or authority to do that thing, and, if granted by a person having power to grant it, transfers to the grantee the right to do whatever it purports to authorize. It certainly transfers to him all the right which the grantor can transfer to do what is within the terms of the license. United States v. The James Morrison, 4 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 333, 338 (citing Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. [9 Wheat.] 193, 6 L. Ed. 23).

A license grants authority to do a particular thing. United States v. Planter (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 544, 546.

A license is merely a permission to do an act that, without such permission, would amount to a trespass, and such permission, when relating to real estate, is not equivalent to an easement, nor will the continuous enjoyment of the privilege, conferred for any period of time, cause it to ripen into a tangible interest in the land affected. A parol license to do an act upon the land of the licensor is revocable at the option of the licensor, though it may have been his intention to confer a continuing right, and money is expended by the licensee. Clifford v. O'Neil, 42 N. Y. Supp. 607, 609, 12 App. Div. 17.

A license is, technically, an authority to do some one act or a series of acts on the land of another without passing any estate in the land, such as a license to hunt in another's land, or to cut down a certain number of trees. These are held to be revocable when executory, unless a definite time is fixed, but irrevocable when executed. Davis v. Townsend (N. Y.) 10 Barb. 333, 343.

License to the use of land is a mere power or authority founded on personal confidence, not assignable, and revocable at pleasure, unless subsidiary to a valid grant, to the beneficial enjoyment of which its exercise is necessary, or unless executed under such circumstances as to warrant the interposition of equity. Johnson v. Skillman, 29 Minn. 95, 12 N. W. 149, 43 Am. Rep. 192.

A "license" is defined as an authority to do a private act upon another's land without possessing any estate therein. It may be granted by parol, and needs no consideration to support it. An executed license exists when the licensed act has been done. Wiseman v. Eastman, 57 Pac. 398, 404, 21 Wash. 163.

A license is an authority to enter upon the lands of another and do a particular act or series of acts without possessing any interest in the lands. It does not include a right to enter upon lands and to erect and maintain a dam as long as there shall be employment for the water power thus created. Mumford v. Whitney (N. Y.) 15 Wend. 380, 390, 30 Am. Dec. 60.

A "license," as relating to occupation or use of real estate, is defined in Morrill v. Mackman, 24 Mich. 282, 9 Am. Rep. 124. The court said a license is a permission to do some act or series of acts on the land of the licensor without having any permanent interest in it. It is founded on personal confidence, and is not assignable. It may be given in writing or by parol. It may be with or without consideration, but in either case it is subject to revocation, though constituting a protection to the party acting under it until the revocation takes place. Where nothing beyond a mere license is contemplated, and no interest in the land is proposed to be created, the statute of frauds has no application, and the observance of no formality is important. But there may also be a license where the understanding of the parties has in view a privilege of a less precarious nature, where something beyond the mere temporary use of the land is promised; where the promise apparently is not founded on personal confidence, but has reference to the ownership and occupancy of other lands, and is made to facilitate the use of those lands in a particular manner and for an indefinite period, and where the right to revoke at any time would be inconsistent with the evident purpose of the permission; wherever, in short, the purpose has been to give an interest in the land, there may be a license, but there will be something more than a license if the proper formalities for the conveyance of the proposed interest have been observed. Stewart v. Cincinnati, W. & M. Ry. Co., 50 N. W. 852, 854, 89 Mich. 315, 17 L. R. A. 539.

A license is a grant of permission or authority, and the word "license" in Rev. St. § 1211, requiring every railroad to apply for a license to operate the road, means a permission or authority to operate the road. State v. McFetridge, 56 Wis. 256, 259, 14 N. W. 185.

A simple or voluntary license is merely an authority, without reward or consideration, to do a particular act or series of acts on another's land, without passing any interest or estate in the soil, and need not be in writing. Such license is revocable at the pleasure of the grantor, but its revocation will not be allowed, where the grantee has been induced to expend his means or money towards its enjoyment, without reimbursing him in the amount expended. Wynn v. Garland, 19 Ark. 23, 68 Am. Dec. 190.

A license, which is an authority given to do some one act or a series of acts on the land of another without possessing any estate in the land, is in its nature countermandable. Still the distinction between a "license executed" and a "license executory" is obvious and well-founded in law. To say that an executed license cannot be revoked is saying only in other words that an act, lawful when it was done by virtue of a license and permission of the owner of the land, cannot be unlawful by a subsequent revocation of such authority. And the license which legalizes the act itself renders lawful also its necessary circumstances. But where it extended further, it would be a right to use the land of another without his consent, which is an interest in the lands. Cheever v. Pearson, 33 Mass. (16 Pick.) 266-273.

A license pure and simple is a mere personal privilege extending only to the person to whom it was given, and it cannot be granted over, even when money has been paid for it. It is revocable at law at pleasure of the licensor. The death of either of the parties will terminate it, and when it affects lands a conveyance of them will revoke it. A license to work a mine simply confers a right of property in the minerals when they have been severed from the freehold, while a lease is an actual interest in the thing demised. East Jersey Iron Co. v. Wright, 32 N. J. Eq. (5 Stew.) 248, 253.

As incapable of countermand.

"A license is a power or authority given to a man to do a lawful act. Unquestionably no countermand can make an act done under it illegal." Bridges v. Purcell, 18 N. C. 492, 496.

Easement distinguished.

A license, unlike an easement, is not an interest in land, but only a privilege to go on the land for a specific purpose, and is revocable at the will of the owner, whilst an easement is irrevocable. Forbes v. Balenseifer, 74 Ill. 183, 185 (citing Washb. Easem. 23).

A "license" is distinguished from an "easement," which must be created by grant or prescription, in the fact that the latter always implies an interest in the land upon which it is imposed, while a dispensation or license passes no interest, nor does it alter or transfer property in anything, but only makes an action lawful which without it would have been unlawful. Baldwin v. Taylor, 31 Atl. 250, 251, 166 Pa. 507.

An "easement" always implies an interest in the land, while the mere "license" does not. The former passes by grant, while the latter is generally unassignable. A right to which premises are subject in favor of adjoining premises, to continue until the servient premise is destroyed in any manner or torn down for the purpose of building, is an easement, and not a license. Schaeffer v. Miehling, 34 N. Y. Supp. 603, 13 Misc. Rep. 520.

An easement implies an interest in the land which can only be created by writing, or, constructively its equivalent, prescription. A license may be created by parol. A license is authority to do particular acts or series of acts on another's land without possessing any estate therein, and hence a "license" and "easement" are distinguished by the fact that it requires words of grant to create an easement or permanent interest in realty; so that a writing signed by N., reciting that for a certain consideration he agrees to allow the W. Co. to pass the muddy water from its ore washers through a stream on his farm so long as the said W. Co. may wish to run or have run said washers, merely gives a license, and not an easement. Nunnally v. Southern Iron Co., 29 S. W. 361, 365, 94 Tenn. 397, 28 L. R. A. 421.

An easement is a liberty, privilege, or advantage in land, without profit, existing distinct from the ownership of the soil; and because it is a permanent interest in another's land, with a right to enter at all times and enjoy it, it must be founded upon an agreement by writing, or upon prescription. But a license is an authority to do a particular act or series of acts upon another's land without possessing any estate therein. It is founded on personal confidence, and is not assignable nor within the statute of frauds. The distinction between a "license" and an "easement" is oftentimes very subtle and difficult to discern. Cook v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 40 Iowa, 456. The right to use a stairway granted by the owner of the building to the owner of an adjoining building constitutes an easement. Stokes v. Maxson, 84 N. W. 949, 950, 113 Iowa, 122, 86 Am. St. Rep. 367; Rochester Trust & Safe-Deposit Co. v. Rochester & I. R. Co., 60 N. Y. Supp. 409, 410, 29 Misc. Rep. 222.

A "license" is defined to be an authority given to do some act or a series of acts on the land of another, without passing any interest in the land, while an "easement" is a right in the owner of one parcel of land, by reason of such ownership, to use the land of another for a specific purpose not inconsistent with a general property in the owner—a right which one proprietor has to some profit, benefit, or beneficial use out of, in, or over the estate of another proprietor. It is well settled that an easement must pass by deed or by prescription, while a mere license to do a particular act or series of acts on the lands may be by parol. It is apparent that the distinction between an easement and a parol license cannot always be maintained either in respect to the extent of the privilege or its duration. Clark v. Glidden, 15 Atl. 358, 360, 60 Vt. 702.

Washburn, in discussing the distinction between an "easement" and a "license," says that "an easement always implies an interest in the land on or over which it is to be enjoyed. A license carries no such interest. The interest of an easement may be a freehold or a chattel one, according to its duration; an easement must be an interest in or over the soil. It lies not in livery, but in a grant, and a freehold interest in it cannot be created or passed otherwise than by deed." Nellis v. Munson, 13 N. Y. St. Rep. 825, 827.

As grant.

See, also, "Grant."

"License and empower," as used in an indenture relating to a patent, reciting that the patentee had agreed to license and empower certain parties to construct and use a certain number of the patented machines within a certain territory, should be construed to mean a grant. The words may be used in contradistinction to "grant," but it by no means follows that they are or must naturally or necessarily be so construed. In a broad and general sense, in common parlance, the words are used indiscriminately. A mere "license," properly so speaking, passes no interest in a thing, but only makes an action lawful which without it would have been unlawful; but if it passes an interest therein, then it is no longer a mere license, but a grant. Washburn v. Gould (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 312, 326.

Invitation distinguished.

There is a clear distinction between a "license" and an "invitation" to enter premises, and an equally clear distinction as to the duty of an owner in the two cases. An owner owes to a licensee no duty as to the condition of premises, unless imposed by statute, save that he should not knowingly let him run upon a hidden peril, or willfully cause him harm; while to one invited he is under obligation for reasonable security for the purposes of the invitation. It is held that a fireman entering a building in the course of his duty at a fire enters under a license, and not under invitation. Beehler v. Daniels, 29 Atl. 6, 7, 18 R. I. 563, 27 L. R. A. 512, 49 Am. St. Rep. 790.

Lease or grant distinguished.

See, also, "Lease"; "Mining Lease."

A written agreement by the owner of coal land, giving another the exclusive right to mine coal thereon for a term of years, is not a mere license, but a lease, which is assignable. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Peers, 37 N. E. 937, 938, 150 Ill. 344; Crane v. Patton, 21 S. W. 466, 57 Ark. 340; Malcomson v. Wappoo Mills (U. S.) 85 Fed. 907, 908.

If a person enter premises under an agreement for a lease, awaiting the execution of that agreement, his entry is one under a license, and if after being in possession of the premises he pays rent for the use of them in accordance with the agreement, which was to be reduced to writing, his relation is that of a tenant at will, and the relation between the parties cannot be other than that of landlord and tenant. Huntington v. Parkhurst, 49 N. W. 597, 598, 87 Mich. 38, 24 Am. St. Rep. 146.

"In both legal and popular sense, the term 'license' implies no right of estate conveyed or ceded, no binding contract between the parties, but mere leave and liberty, to be enjoyed as matter of indulgence at the will of the party who gives the license." State v. Holmes, 38 N. H. 225, 227.

Where the owners of a steamer, desiring to make repairs upon her, contracted with the owners of a marine railway to take the steamer out of the water on the railway for the purpose of repairs and return her to the water when the repairs were finished, and the owners of the steamer were to have the use and occupancy of the railway while the repairs were being made, the relation of the parties was that of licensor and licensee, and not that of lessor and lessee. Moore v. Stetson, 52 Atl. 767, 769, 96 Me. 197.

There is a clear distinction between the effect of a "license" to enter lands, uncoupled with an interest, and a "grant." A grant passes some estate of a greater or less degree, must be in writing, and is irrevocable unless it contains words of revocation; whereas a license is a personal privilege, can be conferred by parol or in writing, conveys no estate, and is revocable at the pleasure of the party making it. There are also other incidents attaching to a license. It is an authority to do a lawful act which without it would be unlawful, and, while it remains unrevoked, is a justification for the act which it authorizes to be done. It ceases with the death of either party, and cannot be transferred or alienated by the licensee, because it is a personal matter, and is limited to the original parties to it. Jensen v. Hunter (Cal.) 41 Pac. 14, 17.

A license is an authority to do some act or series of acts on the lands of another, for the benefit of the licensee, without passing any estate in the land; and, in a license to mine on the land of another, the right of property in the minerals, when they are severed from the soil, vests in the licensee. Licenses are, however, frequently granted with terms and conditions, and on considerations which ally them so closely to leases that it is frequently difficult to determine when the border line has been transcended, and whether they are in reality leases instead of licenses. A mere license, while it remains executory, is revocable at the pleasure of the licensor, indivisible, and nonassignable. But a license may confer either a sole or exclusive right, or simply a right in common, and it has been said that if it simply confers a right to take ore or to work in a mine it is not exclusive, and the licensor may himself take ore from the same land or mine, or license others to do so. Stinson v. Hardy, 41 Pac. 116, 118, 27 Or. 584.

A resolution by the trustees of a town, which gives a person "liberty to make a roadway and erect a bridge," was held not to be a license, because it is neither temporary nor personal, as the drawbridge and roadway authorized were substantially fixed and permanent improvements for the benefit of defendant's lands, and assignable therewith. Trustees of Freeholders and Commonalty of Town of Southampton v. Jessup, 56 N. E. 538, 539, 162 N. Y. 122.

As a revocable authority.

A bare authority to enter upon the land of another and take gravel is a privilege known in the law as a license, and is revocable at the pleasure of the party making it. It is not assignable, and it is inoperative if the owner of the land conveys the land to another, and is revoked by the death of either the licensor or the licensee. Lambe v. Manning, 49 N. E. 509, 512, 171 Ill. 612.

A license is an authority given to do some act or a series of acts on the land of another without possessing an estate therein. Cook v. Stearns, 11 Mass. 533; Mumford v. Whitney (N. Y.) 15 Wend. 380, 30 Am. Dec. 60. A mere license is revocable, but what is called a "license" is sometimes connected with the interest or grant, and then it cannot be revoked. A deed executed for a valuable consideration, giving the grantee the right to cut and remove timber from lands of the grantor for a certain length of time, is a license coupled with an interest, which is not revocable by the grantor. McLeod v. Dial, 37 S. W. 306, 63 Ark. 10.

Patents.

As the term "license" is used in the law of patents, it is an authority to exercise some of the privileges secured by the patent, but which still leaves an interest in the monopoly in the patentee. Theberath v. Celluloid Mfg. Co. (C. C.) 3 Fed. 143, 147 (citing Curtis, Patents, §§ 212, 213).

A license is a grant of a right to manufacture, use, or sell the thing patented, but does not imply a covenant that the licensor will protect the licensee in the full enjoyment of the monopoly. McKay v. Smith (U. S.) 39 Fed. 556, 558.

Same—As a vested right.

The right conferred by a contract to use a patent for making "self-rising flour" is held to be none the less a vested right because therein styled a "license." Oliver v. Morgau, 57 Tenn. (10 Helsk.) 322, 324.

A "license," as applied to a patent right, operates only as a waiver of the monopoly as to the licensee, and estops the licensor from exercising its prohibitory powers in derogation of the privileges conferred by him on the licensee. It has been settled that the sole matter conveyed in a license is the right not to be sued. Heaton-Peninsular Button-Fastener Co. v. Eureka Specialty Co. (U. S.) 77 Fed. 288, 290, 25 C. C. A. 267, 35 L. R. A. 728.

LICENSE (Governmental Regulation).

A "license," in its proper sense, is a permit to do business which could not be done without the license. City of Sonora v. Curtin, 70 Pac. 674, 675, 137 Cal. 583.

"License" means and is synonymous with "permission" or "authority." Harmon v. City of Chicago (Ill.) 26 N. E. 697, 700; Village of Winooski v. Gokey, 49 Vt. 282, 286; San Francisco v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co., 15 Pac. 380, 383, 74 Cal. 113, 7 Am. St. Rep. 425; Sinnot v. Davenport, 63 U. S. (22 How.) 227, 240, 16 L. Ed. 243; Neuman v. State, 45 N. W. 30, 32, 76 Wis. 112.

"A license is a right granted by some competent authority to do an act which without such authority would be illegal." Pullman Southern Car Co. v. Nolan (U. S.) 22 Fed. 276, 279; North Hudson County Ry. Co. v. City of Hoboken, 41 N. J. Law (12 Vroom) 71, 75; State v. Hardy, 7 Neb. 377, 380; State v. Hipp, 38 Ohio St. 199, 226; Anderson v. Brewster, 9 N. E. 683, 689, 44 Ohio St. 576; City of Leavenworth v. Booth, 15 Kan. 627, 635; Hackett v. Wilson, 6 Pac. 652, 657, 12 Or. 25; City of Savannah v. Charlton, 36 Ga. 460, 461; Home Ins. Co. of New York v. City Council of Augusta, 50 Ga. 530, 537; Shuman v. City of Ft. Wayne, 26 N. E. 560, 561, 127 Ind. 109, 11 L. R. A. 378; Caldwell v. Fulton, 31 Pa. (7 Casey) 475, 477, 72 Am. Dec. 760; Metcalf v. Hart, 27 Pac. 900, 905, 3 Wyo. 513, 31 Am. St. Rep. 122.

The popular understanding of the word "license" is a permission to do something which without the license would not be allowable, and such is the legal definition. Youngblood v. Sexton, 32 Mich. 406, 419, 20 Am. Rep. 654.

A license is essentially a grant of a special privilege to one or more persons, not enjoyed by citizens generally, or, at least, not enjoyed by a class of citizens to which the licensee belonged. State v. Frame, 39 Ohio St. 399, 413.

"'License,' as defined in its general sense by Okey, J., in State v. Hipp, 38 Ohio St. 199, is a permission granted by some competent authority to do an act which without such permission would be illegal. In Chilvers v. People, 11 Mich. 43, it is said: 'The object of a license is to confer a right that does not exist without a license.' 'The popular understanding of the word "license" undoubtedly is, says Cooley, J., in Youngblood v. Sexton, 32 Mich. 406, 20 Am. Rep. 654, 'a permission to do something which, without a license, would not be allowed.' This is also the legal meaning. In State v. Frame, 39 Ohio St. 399, the language employed by McIlvaine, J., is somewhat different, but the definition is in substance the same. He says: 'A license is essentially the granting of a special privilege to one or more persons, not enjoyed by the citizens generally, or, at least not enjoyed by a class of citizens to which the licensee belongs. A common right is not the creation of a license." Adler v. Whitbeck, 9 N. E. 672, 674, 44 Ohio St. 539.

A "license" obtained from a state for the sale of commercial fertilizers may be defined as the permission and authority of the state to carry on the particular business to which it refers. There is not in it, as there is not in such licenses generally, any element of transfer or assignability, and the privilege it confers is purely and strictly personal, yet there is no requirement that the licensee shall have any particular qualification. Whoever may have legal capacity to contract is entitled, as a matter of right, to the license on the payment of the prescribed fee. Furman Farm Imp. Co. v. Long, 21 South. 339, 340, 113 Ala. 203.

The "license" of an attorney is a general warrant to appear for any one who may engage his service, and his appearance is always presumed to be at the request of the person he professes to represent. Davis v. Cohn, 70 S. W. 727, 728, 96 Mo. App. 587.

Black on Intoxicating Liquors says: "A license is essentially the granting of a special privilege to one or more persons, not enjoyed by citizens generally, or, at least, not enjoyed by a class of citizens to which the licensee belongs. A common right is not the creature of a license law. In a general sense, a license is permission granted by some competent authority to do an act which without such permission would be illegal. The popular understanding of the word 'license' is undoubtedly a permission to do something which without the license would not be allowable. This is also the legal meaning. The object of a license is to confer a right which does not exist without a license. A license is a privilege granted by the state, usually on payment of a valuable consideration, though this is not essential. To constitute a privilege, the grant must confer authority to do something which without the grant would be illegal, for, if what is to be done under the license is open to every one without it, the grant would be merely idle and nugatory, conferring no privilege whatever. But the thing to be done may be something lawful in itself, and only prohibited for the purposes of the license; that is to say, prohibited in order to compel the taking out of a license. From these definitions, which are the best to be found in the books, it will be apparent that three leading ideas are involved in the definition of a 'license' under the liquor laws: First, it confers a special privilege or franchise upon selected persons to pursue a calling not open to all; second, it legalizes acts which, if done without its protection, would be offenses against the statute; third, it is a privilege granted as a part of a system of police regulations, and herein is distinguishable from 'taxation.'"

Section 117. As used in the Liquor laws of this state, a license is a privilege granted by the county court, or other competent authority, to sell liquor. Such is the meaning of the term in Act April 3, 1889, prohibiting the sale of wine except as authorized by the act, and authorizing its sale in any place where the sale of intoxicating liquors is not licensed. Hubman v. State, 33 S. W. 843, 844, 61 Ark. 482; Silver v. City of Sparta, 33 S. E. 31, 33, 107 Ga. 275.

"Licenses are of two characters, one a license for revenue, and the second conferring authority to engage in vocations which need special surveillance." Cooley, Const. Lim. 586, 587. As used in Code 1891, c. 32, §§ 1, 2, requiring corporations chartered under the laws of the state to take out a state license before doing or attempting any business in the state, a "license" is defined to be "essentially the granting of a special privilege to one or more citizens not enjoyed by citizens generally, or, at least, not enjoyed by the class of citizens to which the licensee belongs." State v. Peel Splint Coal Co., 15 S. E. 1000, 1003, 36 W. Va. 802, 17 L. R. A. 385.

A license is a privilege granted by a state, usually on payment of a valuable consideration, though payment is not essential. To constitute a privilege, the grant must confer authority to do something which without the grant would be illegal; for if what is to be done under the license is open to every one without it the grant would be merely idle, and nugatory, conferring no privilege whatever. A license, therefore, implying a privilege, cannot possibly exist with reference to something which is a right free and open to all, as is the right of the citizen to ride and drive over the streets of the city without charge and without toll, provided he does so in a reasonable manner. Therefore a city, under its power to regulate the use of streets, is not impliedly authorized to impose a license fee for the use of streets by the owners of private conveyances, because the use of the streets is a right and not a privilege. City of Chicago v. Collins, 51 N. E. 907, 910, 175 Ill. 445, 49 L. R. A. 408, 67 Am. St. Rep. 224.

A license issued by a court to practice as an attorney and counselor at law in the several courts of the state constitutes no defense to an indictment for practicing law without paying a license, under a statute requiring such license to be paid. A license to practice law, granted by a judge of the court, is not a contract, but a mere naked grant of a privilege without consideration, and which the applicant may or may not avail himself of. Therefore the state may revoke the privilege granted, or may impose such conditions upon its exercise as may be proper or demanded by the public interest.

Simmons v. State, 12 Mo. 268, 269, 271, 49 Am. Dec. 131.

A license may be imposed as to a matter of regulation. It may be levied for income. It may be exacted in order to confer exclusive right and establish monopoly. It may be laid on for the purpose of bringing on prohibition. State v. Hammond Packing Co., 34 South. 368, 371, 110 La. 180 (citing Cooley on Taxation).

The term "license" is defined by Webster as: "Authority or liberty given to do or forbear any act; especially a formal permission from the public authorities to perform certain acts; a grant or permission, as a license to preach, practice medicine, sell gunpowder, and the like." A license tax differs from other forms of taxation mainly in that it is imposed as a condition to entering upon the conduct of the business, and the authorities do not uphold the distinction between the power to impose a license tax on those callings which are regarded as altogether right and require no restriction or regulation, and those over which it is necessary to exercise supervision for police and sanitary purposes. Yount v. Denning, 35 Pac. 207, 208, 52 Kan. 629.

As a contract.

See "Contract."

As a written document.

A license is the evidence of permission to exercise a trade or calling in consequence of payment of a tax or duty imposed on persons carrying on such trade or calling. United States v. Cutting 70 U. S. (3 Wall.) 441. 443, 18 L. Ed. 241.

"License," as used in Rev. St. 1881, § 4425, providing that the county superintendent should license applicants for licenses as teachers for certain terms according to the ratio of correct answers, and other evidences of qualification, given on examination, means the written document by which a permission is conferred. The licensing authorized implies issuing to an applicant the written permission to teach in the public schools. Webster's Dictionary states the secondary meaning of the word "license" to be a written document by which a permission is conferred. Elmore v. Overton, 4 N. E. 197, 198, 104 Ind. 548, 54 Am. Rep. 343.

As right to charge fee implied.

"A license is merely a permission to do what is unlawful at common law, or is made so by some statute or ordinance, including the one authorizing or requiring the license. The power to license, as the means of regulating business, implies the power to charge a fee therefor sufficient to defray the expense of issuing the license." The Laundry License Case (U. S.) 22 Fed. 701, 703.

A statutory power to municipal corporations to license and regulate sales by transient merchants gives the municipalities the right to impose such a charge as would cover not only the necessary expenses of issuing it, but also the additional labor of officers and other expenses imposed by the public, but nothing beyond this. As said in City of Burlington v. Putman Ins. Co., 31 Iowa, 103, licenses are a part of the police regulations of the city, and should be charged for as such, and only to such extent as may reasonably compensate the city for issuing and enforcing the license, and for the care exercised by the city under its police authority over any particular person licensed. City of Ottumwa v. Zekind, 64 N. W. 646, 647, 95 Iowa, 622, 29 L. R. A. 734, 58 Am. St. Rep. 447.

As lawful act.

"License," as used in Sp. Laws, 1870, p. 253, § 178, providing that if any person shall engage in any business, calling, avocation, or occupation in a certain city, which by ordinance is subject to a license tax, without having first obtained such license, he shall be liable to punishment, is not to be construed in its general sense as meaning an official permit to carry on a business or trade or perform other acts which are forbidden by law except to persons obtaining such permit; it may apply to a business or trade or other act which is not forbidden by law. Hoefling v. City of San Antonio, 20 S. W. 85, 86, 85 Tex. 228, 16 L. R. A. 608.

"License, appointment, or authority," as used in St. 1864, c. 121, § 1, declaring that in all criminal prosecutions for the illegal sale of liquor, in which the defendant relies for his justification on any license, appointment, or authority, he shall prove the same, and until such proof the presumption shall be that he is not authorized, means the right to sell in any mode permitted or not prohibited by law. Commonwealth v. Carpenter, 100 Mass. 204, 206.

As failure to object.

A complaint in an action for injuries averred that defendant city, its servants, etc., did license boys and girls to slide downhill in the city, and that under such license and permission the young men, boys, and youths in said city used the streets to slide downhill with sleds, etc. Held, that the word "license" should be construed as expressing only an omission of the officers to perform their police duty by restraining such youths on the street, and not in the sense that the boys and girls were authorized to use the street in such manner. Schultz v. City of Milwaukee, 5 N. W. 342, 346, 49 Wis. 254, 35 Am. Rep. 779.

As a personal trust.

A license to deal in intoxicating liquors is in the nature of a personal trust, and the applicant for such privilege must be a person able, willing, and competent to carry out such trust, and not delegate it entirely to others, whose character may not be such as the law requires of the licensee. Watkins v. Grieser, 66 Pac. 332, 334, 11 Okl. 302.

A license to sell liquor is a personal privilege. It is not assignable by the holder, and at his death it does not go to his representatives. It is not an asset of his estate. In re Buck's Estate, 39 Atl. 821, 822, 185 Pa. 57, 64 Am. St. Rep. 816.

Authority to prohibit implied.

"The authority to license implies the power to prohibit, such being the meaning of the term; but it is now the generally received doctrine that in the case of useful employments prohibition cannot be exercised under authority to license. It may be different when the power is exercised upon exhibitions, theaters, and other public amusements and the like. It has been held in this state that under authority to license taxes cannot be imposed." City of Burlington v. Bumgardner, 42 Iowa, 673, 674 (citing City of Burlington v. Putnam Ins. Co., 31 Iowa, 102; State v. Herod, 29 Iowa, 123).

Where a city charter gives the city power to license and regulate a certain business, it does not include the authority to prohibit it. Ex parte Sikes, 15 South. 522, 523, 102 Ala. 173, 24 L. R. A. 774.

As property.

See "Property."

Public duties not imposed.

"License to a person to follow any particular trade or business is not an appointment to office, nor does it confer any of the powers or privileges of a public officer. It is a mere license to follow his calling, whatever it may be. The duties to be performed are not public duties, and the public have no interest in their performance or omission. The object of the license is for the purpose of controlling the business and preventing its being conducted in a manner injurious to the public welfare. Beyond that the public interest is not affected, and, if the licensee neglects to act under his license, the public cannot complain." People v. Board of Metropolitan Police (N. Y.) 33 How. Prac. 52, 55; People v. Acton (N. Y.) 48 Barb. 524, 527.

As both right and instrument.

The term "license," as used in Act 1894, c. 128, authorizing the attachment and sale of liquor licenses and all rights and interests therein, includes both the certificate of license and the franchise or grant evidenced thereby. Quinnipac Brewing Co. v. Hackbarth, 50 Atl. 1023, 1024, 74 Conn. 392.

The term "liquor license" may be used to designate either the permission to sell intoxicating liquors or the paper writing which usually, but not necessarily, evidences such license. Fliegenstan v. Mulligan, 51 Atl. 191, 193, 63 N. J. Eq. 179.

As a mere receipt.

License means permission or authority; freedom to act; to be left free; allowable; and is so used in a charter giving a city the power to license tavern keepers and certain other occupations. The use of the word in an ordinance passed under the authority of such charter authorizing the city clerk to issue a license to an insurance company means no more than the receipt of payment, stating what it is for. It protects the person, agent, or solicitor against the penalty pronounced against him for not rendering an account or failing to make payment and the corporation from further liability. Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. City of Peoria, 40 N. E. 967, 969, 156 Ill. 420.

Authority to tax implied.

A legislative grant of power to a municipal corporation to license certain companies may imply the power to tax when such is the manifest intention; but, taken disconnected and alone, they are not generally conferred with power. City of St. Joseph v. Ernst, 8 S. W. 558, 559, 95 Mo. 360.

In the case of City of St. Joseph v. Ernst, 95 Mo. 360, 8 S. W. 558, in construing the power given to the city by ordinance to tax and regulate insurance companies, the court said: "Even the words 'to license' may imply the power to tax when such is the manifest intention; but, taken disconnectedly and alone, they will not generally confer that authority." Hence, where a city was authorized to impose a license tax upon all merchants and their businesses, a city ordinance providing for public weighing, and fixing a scale of prices therefor, is not invalid for the reason that it was for the purpose of raising revenue. City of St. Charles v. Elaner, 56 S. W. 291, 293, 155 Mo. 671.

"License and regulate," as used in the charter of the city of San Jose authorizing the common council to license and regulate all and every kind of business authorized by law and transacted and carried on in such city, and to fix the rate of license tax on such business, authorizes licenses for purposes of revenue. It includes the power to raise revenue for municipal purposes by means of license fees as well as to obtain a sum reasonably sufficient to defray the expenses of granting the license. City of San Jose v. San Jose & S. C. R. Co., 53 Cal. 475, 480.

A statutory power to municipal corporations to license and regulate sales by transient merchants does not give the municipality power to tax such occupation. "The municipality, under the power given it to license, had the right to impose such a charge as would cover not only the necessary expenses of issuing it, but also the additional labor of officers and other expenses imposed by the public, but nothing beyond this. As said in City of Burlington v. Putnam Ins. Co., 31 Iowa, 102, 103, licenses are a part of the police regulations of the city, and should be charged for as such, and only to such extent as may reasonably compensate the city for issuing and enforcing the license, and for the care exercised by the city under its police authority over any particular person licensed. The amount of the license fee or charge is to be considered in determining whether the exactness is not really one of revenue or prohibition, instead of one of regulation under the police power. Thus the power does not warrant a municipality in imposing a license fee of $250 per month, or $25 per day if the license is issued for a shorter period, as it amounts to a prohibitory tax. City of Ottumwa v. Zekind, 64 N. W. 622, 646, 95 Iowa, 622, 29 L. R. A. 734, 58 Am. St. Rep. 447.

The "power to license" given to a city does not confer a power to tax, by which we understand to be meant the power to take from the citizen a sum for the support of the government, whether that be national, state, or municipal. Hoeffling v. City of San Antonio, 20 S. W. 85, 87, 85 Tex. 228, 16 L. R. A. 608.

Tax distinguished.

Mr. Justice Cooley, in Younghood v. Sexton, 32 Mich. 406, 419, 20 Am. Rep. 654, says: "The popular understanding of the word 'license' undoubtedly is a permission to do something which without the license would not be allowable. Within this definition a mere tax on the traffic cannot be a license of the traffic unless the tax confer some right to carry on the traffic which otherwise would not have existed." People v. Lyng, 42 N. W. 139, 141, 74 Mich. 579.

A "license," as the term is used in reference to a license for the sale of liquor, "is part of the police regulations of the country, and the fee is rather intended to prevent the indiscriminate opening of such establishments than to raise revenue by taxation." It is in no proper sense a tax. Burch v. City of Savannah, 42 Ga. 596, 598.

Temporary permit.

Rev. Code 1831, providing that every person not licensed according to law who shall barter or sell any spirituous liquors in less quantities than a quart at a time, may be fined, etc., includes not only the license granted by the board of county commissioners while in session, but also a permit given by the clerk to retail until the next meeting of the board, though the latter is called a "permit," to distinguish it from a permission given by the board. State v. Watson (Ind.) 5 Blackf. 155.

LICENSE COMMISSIONERS.

License commissioners provided by statute in Massachusetts are public officers, in the performance of whose duties the whole community has an interest. Towns have no authority to direct or control them, but all their powers and duties are prescribed and regulated by statute; and, in case they do not perform their duties, the town has no remedy against them. They are not, in any sense, the agents or servants of the town, and the town, by their election, enters into no contract with them for the payment of their services. Cook v. City of Springfield, 68 N. E. 201, 202, 184 Mass. 245.

LICENSE FEE.

As a tax, see, also, "Tax—Taxation."

A "license fee" is a price paid for a franchise or a public right vested in an individual. It is not a tax. Chilvers v. People, 11 Mich. 43, 50.

License fee is a fee exacted in order to secure the authority to engage in a business, which, without paying for and obtaining such authority, would be illegal. Home Ins. Co. v. City Council of Augusta, 50 Ga. 530, 537.

A "license tax" is one imposed on the privilege of exercising certain callings, professions, or avocations, that, when collected, goes into the state treasury, and when applied to municipal taxation is termed a "license fee." Levi v. City of Louisville, 30 S. W. 973, 974, 97 Ky. 394, 28 L. R. A. 480.

A license fee does not lose its character as such, and cease to be sustainable as a police regulation, because called a tax in the legislation which permits it. Levy v. State, 68 N. E. 172, 176, 161 Ind. 251.

A license fee is a tax when imposed mainly for the purposes of revenue. Ward v. Maryland, 79 U. S. (12 Wall.) 418, 20 L. Ed. 449; Glasgow v. Rowse, 43 Mo. 479. In City of St. Louis v. Spiegel, 75 Mo. 145, the litigated ordinance showed that it was imposed for purpose of revenue, and upon this this court said: "In this case it is apparent at first blush that the license fee is imposed for the purpose of revenue. That such fee is also imposed for the purpose of regulation does not deprive it of the salient characteristics of a tax." A license is issued under the police power, but the exaction of a license fee with a view to revenue would be the exercise of the power of taxation. State v. Bengsch, 70 S. W. 710, 717, 170 Mo. 81.

A license fee, so called, is such a sum as will compensate for the expense of issuing and recording a license, and, when the license is issued for the purpose of securing public control over the matter licensed, such further sum as will probably be incurred in inspecting and regulating such business. When such a license may lawfully be issued, such a fee may lawfully be charged. People v. Jarvis, 48 N. Y. Supp. 596, 597, 19 App. Div. 403.

A license fee is a price paid for a franchise. The power to license, strictly and properly speaking, is simply a power to sell a privilege, and hence is given to the granting of a privilege to do a thing in a case where the privilege might be withheld, or the doing of the thing might lawfully be prohibited entirely. Per Dickey, J., dissenting. Wiggins Ferry Co. v. City of East St. Louis, 102 Ill. 560, 576, 577.

A "license fee" or "franchise tax," computed upon the entire capital stock of a company less the assessed value of its property in the state, is a tax upon the general business of the company and upon its extraterritorial property. Hancock v. Singer Mfg. Co., 41 Atl. 846, 852, 62 N. J. Law, 289, 42 L. R. A. 852.

A license fee is a tax sometimes and for some purposes, and sometimes not. The license taxes provided by Pol. Code, §§ 4079, 4080, providing that every person carrying on a steam laundry business shall pay a license of $15 per quarter, and that every male person engaged in the laundry business, other than the steam laundry business, shall pay a license of $10 per quarter if engaged in business by himself, but $25 if employing other persons, are not taxes within Const. art. 12, § 11, requiring assessment and levy of taxes to be uniform. State v. French, 41 Pac. 1078, 1079, 17 Mont. 54, 30 L. R. A. 415.

The license fee imposed by a state upon every commercial traveler, agent, drummer, or other person selling or offering to sell any goods, wares, or merchandise of any kind to be delivered at some future time, or carrying samples and offering to sell goods similar to such samples, to be delivered at some future time before carrying on such business, is not a tax upon the business or the importation, the traveling man representing a foreign company, but is the purchase of the privilege of engaging in the occupation of selling goods, wares, and merchandise, such as may be exacted in case of an auctioneer, peddler, saloon keeper, or other trade or profession. Territory v. Farnsworth, 5 Pac. 869, 875, 5 Mont. 303.

LICENSE, REGULATE, AND PROHIBIT.

A power given to villages to license, regulate, and prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors has been held to authorize the licensing of the sale of liquor in one part of such a village and the prohibition of such sales in other parts. People v. Cregler, 28 N. E. 812, 815, 138 Ill. 407.

A power to license, regulate, and prohibit the selling or giving away of spirituous liquors, conferred upon cities by Rev. St. Ill. c. 24, includes the power to prohibit the sale of such liquors in quantities of one gallon or more without first obtaining a license. Miller v. Ammon, 12 Sup. Ct. 884, 885, 145 U. S. 421, 36 L. Ed. 759.

LICENSE, REGULATE, AND RESTRAIN.

A municipal power to license, regulate, and restrain the sale of intoxicating liquors authorizes a prohibition of the bartering or giving away of liquors without license. Vinson v. Town of Monticello, 19 N. E. 734, 118 Ind. 103.

"License, regulate, and restrain," as used in a municipal charter, granting to the city power to license, regulate, and restrain the sale, etc., of intoxicating liquors, does not include the power to prohibit the manufacture and sale of liquors within the city limits. Logan City v. Buck, 2 Pac. 706, 708, 3 Utah, 301.

"License, regulate, and restrain," as used in a grant of property to a municipality to license, regulate, and restrain theatrical amusements, should be construed to include the taxing power to effect this object. Hodges v. Town of Nashville, 21 Tenn. (2 Humph.) 61, 67.

LICENSE, REGULATE, AND TAX.

"License, tax, and regulate," as used in city charter authorizing the council to license, tax, and regulate telephone companies and all other branches of business, includes the power to grant such companies the right to erect poles in the streets. Herschfield v. Rocky Mt. Bell Tel. Co., 29 Pac. 883, 884, 12 Mont. 102.

"License, tax, and regulate," as used in a city charter, granting the right to license, tax, and regulate hackney carriages and omnibuses, etc., should not be construed to authorize the city authorities to grant to one person the sole and exclusive right to run omnibuses in the city. Logan v. Pyne, 43 Iowa, 524, 526, 22 Am. Rep. 261.

LICENSE TAX.

An ordinance providing that every attorney at law shall pay a license of a specified sum per quarter is a provision for a license tax upon the business of the practice of law. City of Sonora v. Curtin, 70 Pac. 674, 675, 137 Cal. 583.

A license tax is one imposed on the privilege of exercising certain callings, professions, or avocations, that, when collected, goes into the state treasury, and when applied to municipal taxation is termed a "license fee." Levi v. City of Louisville, 80 S. W. 973, 974, 97 Ky. 894, 28 L. R. A. 480.

A license tax on foreign corporations is evidently intended as a compensation to the state for the protection which it affords foreign corporations who have an office within its borders for the convenience of its officers, but upon whose property it could impose no tax because not within its jurisdiction. Commonwealth v. Standard Oil Co., 101 Pa. 119, 145, 146.

Act 1894, c. 113, requiring traders in the city of Baltimore to take out separate licenses to carry on business in disconnected buildings, does not violate the Bill of Rights (article 15), providing that every person ought to contribute his proportion of taxes according to his actual worth in property, as a license tax is not a property tax, but a tax "for the good government and benefit of the community." Rohr v. Gray, 30 Atl. 632, 633, 80 Md. 274.

"License tax," as used in Laws 1879, c. 3099, § 11, subd. 2, providing that all keepers of keno or pool tables or wheels of fortune shall pay in each county a license tax of $100 for each table or wheel, means the amount paid for the purpose of procuring a license which is to be issued by the clerk of the circuit court under the seal of the county on filing the receipt of the collector for the necessary amount therefor. Overby v. State, 18 Fla. 178, 180.

Const. art. 11, § 11, gives counties and municipalities power to enact police and sanitary regulations. St. 1901, p. 635, is entitled "An act relating to the powers of the boards of supervisors, city councils, and town trustees in their respective counties, cities and towns, and to impose a license tax." The body of the act forbade all license tax for revenue. Held, that the title of the act was not insufficient on the ground that the words "license tax" therein meant a license tax for revenue, which was forbidden by the body of the act, but that those words should be construed as synonymous with license "fee" or "charge." Ex parte Pfirrmann, 66 Pac. 205, 207, 134 Cal. 143.

A charge imposed by a city on a telegraph company for the privilege of using the streets, alleys, and public places of the city, which is graduated by the amount of such use, is not a license tax, the amount not being graduated by the amount of the business, and not being a sum fixed for the privilege of doing business, but is more in the nature of a charge for the use of property belonging to the city, which may properly be called rental. City of St. Louis v. Western Union Tel. Co., 13 Sup. Ct. 485, 487, 148 U. S. 92, 37 L. Ed. 380.

As tonnage duty.

See "Tonnage Duty."

LICENSED.

Where a party who applies for a license to sell liquors removes from the state, without intending to return, between the granting or awarding of the license by the court and a payment of the license fee, he is a "party licensed," within Act April 20, 1858, § 7, providing that if a party licensed shall die or remove his license may be transferred by the authorities granting the same, or a license be granted to the successor for the remainder of the year. In re Umholtz, 43 Atl. 75, 76, 191 Pa. 177.

LICENSED PILOT.

"Licensed pilot," as used in Laws 1853, c. 469, as amended by Laws 1857, c. 243, declaring that masters of vessels sailing under register from the port of New York should take a licensed pilot, means only those pilots appointed by the board of commissioners established by the act, and does not include a New Jersey pilot. Brown v. Elwell, 60 N. Y. 249, 251.

LICENSEE.

As assign, see "Assigns."

"A licensee is one who has transferred to him, in writing or orally, a less or different interest than either the interest in the whole patent, or an undivided part of such whole interest, or an exclusive sectional interest." Potter v. Holland (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 1154, 1156.

"Licensee," as used in Pub. St. c. 100, in reference to certain licensees, and providing that no such licensee shall place or maintain any screen, curtain, or other obstruction on the licensed premises, refers to every licensee, and not merely such as have been required by the licensing board to remove a screen, curtain, or other obstruction. Commonwealth v. Rourke, 6 N. E. 383, 384, 141 Mass. 321.

A licensee is one who is not the owner of an interest in the patent, but who has by contract acquired a right to make or use or sell machines embodying the invention. Heaton-Peninsular Button-Fastener Co. v. Eureka Specialty Co. (U. S.) 77 Fed. 288, 290, 25 C. C. A. 267, 35 L. R. A. 728.

The term "licensee," as applied to a common carrier, relates more properly to persons entering by express or implied permission on depot grounds or standing trains for purposes other than that of transportation, such as news venders to sell papers, persons receiving or parting with guests, or any one having business with the company. It would seem that no one can become such licensee on premises of a railroad company or on its train while standing at the station without the consent of the company either express or implied. Berry v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 25 S. W. 229, 246, 124 Mo. 223.

LICENTIATE IN PHARMACY.

"Licentiates in pharmacy," within the meaning of the pharmacy act, shall be such persons not less than eighteen years of age, who shall have had not less than three years' practical experience in pharmacy, and who shall have passed a satisfactory examination touching their competency before the board of examiners. Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 9478.

LICENTIOUSNESS.

"Licentiousness" is defined by Bouvier to be the doing what one pleases without regard to the rights of others, and such is its meaning in the definition of wantonness as the licentious act of one toward the person of another. State v. Brigman, 94 N. C. 888, 889; Welch v. Durand, 36 Conn. 182, 184, 4 Am. Rep. 55.

"Licentiousness" is defined in 2 Abb. Law Dict. as being equivalent to "lewdness." The word "licentiousness" is so used in an act entitled to protect females from licentiousness. Holton v. State, 9 South. 716, 717, 28 Fla. 303.

LIE.

A right of way may be said to "lie" in the county where it exists and is exercisable within the meaning of an act requiring deeds to be acknowledged in the county court where the lands, tenements, or hereditaments lie. Hays v. Richardson (Md.) 1 Gill & J. 366, 380.

LIE.

See "Bare Naked Lie"; "Sworn to a Lie."

A charge that another "will swear, lie, cheat, or steal" may import that he lies, swears, cheats, and steals, and, if used in the latter sense, it is to be determined by the jury whether the language is actionable. Dottarar v. Bushey, 16 Pa. (4 Harris) 204, 209.

The term "lie" in a statement that one swore to a lie on the oath which he took as a viewer of a proposed alteration of a road cannot be construed as meaning perjury, which in common as well as legal understanding applies to the statement of a fact in the course of some judicial or quasi judicial proceedings, and not to a statement of a promise, or to an oath of office. Beswick v. Chapel, 47 Ky. (8 B. Mon.) 486.

Telling a bare naked lie, without intention to injure, cheat, or deceive another person, is not ground for an action. Though every deceit comprehends a lie, yet it is more than a lie on account of the view with which it is practiced and the injury which it is calculated to occasion and does occasion to another person. If a man will willfully assert that which he knows to be false, and thereby draws his neighbor into a heavy loss, the law will compel him to pay for it. Benton v. Pratt (N. Y.) 2 Wend. 385, 389, 20 Am. Dec. 623.

LIEGE SUBJECT.

Perhaps a person who owes but a temporary allegiance might without impropriety be called a "liege subject." And it is certain that in an indictment of such a person for treason it would be said that he had committed the treason contra liegeantiae sue debitum. Among lawyers, however, by the term "liege subject" is generally understood a natural-born subject, and this is the sense in which it is used in a charter reciting that "divers members of the German Lutheran Congregation, his Britannic Majesty's liege and naturalized subjects," etc. Commonwealth v. Woelper (Pa.) 3 Serg. & R. 29, 34, 8 Am. Dec. 628.

LIEN.

See "Absolute Lien"; "Admiralty Lien"; "Agricultural Lien"; "Attorney's Lien"; "Building Lien"; "Charging Lien"; "Concurrent Liens"; "Contractor's Lien"; "Equitable Lien"; "Existing Lien"; "Factor's Lien"; "General Lien"; "Judgment Lien"; "Manufacturer's Lien"; "Maritime Lien"; "Mechanic's Lien"; "Municipal Lien"; "Particular Lien"; "Perpetual Lien"; "Possessory Lien"; "Prior Liens"; "Retaining Lien"; "Special Lien"; "Specific Lien"; "Statutory Lien"; "Superior Lien"; "Vendor's Lien."

All other liens, see "All Other."

Any lien, see "Any."

Other lien, see "Other."

At common law a lien implies a power to hold; nothing more. Marsh v. The Minnie (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 810, 811.

A lien is a claim which one person has upon the property of another as a security for some debt or charge; a tie that binds property to a debt or claim for its satisfaction. Mendenhall v. Burnette, 49 Pac. 93, 96, 58 Kan. 355; Whiting v. Beebe, 12 Ark. (7 Eng.) 421, 570; Atwater v. Manchester Sav. Bank, 48 N. W. 187, 188, 45 Minn. 341, 12 L. R. A. 741; In re Byrne (U. S.) 97 Fed. 762, 764; In re Laird, 109 Fed. 550, 555, 48

C. C. A. 538 (quoting Bouv. Law Dict.); Arnold v. Porter, 29 S. E. 414, 416, 122 N. C. 242; Central City Brick Co. v. Norfolk & W. R. Co., 44 W. Va. 286, 294, 28 S. E. 926, 929; Stillings v. Gibson, 63 N. H. 1, 2; Hamlett v. Tallman, 30 Ark. 505, 509; Buchner v. Metz, 77 Va. 107, 115.

A lien may be defined to be a charge on property for the payment of a debt or duty, and for which it may be sold in discharge of the lien. Bliss v. Clark, 39 Ill. 590, 594, 89 Am. Dec. 330; Thigpen v. Leigh, 93 N. C. 47, 49; Rohrbach v. Germania Fire Ins. Co., 62 N. Y. 47, 56, 20 Am. Rep. 451; Rowley v. Bigelow, 29 Mass. (12 Pick.) 307, 313, 23 Am. Dec. 607; Frowenfeld v. Hastings, 66 Pac. 178, 179, 134 Cal. 123.

A lien in general may be defined to be a right to retain property until a debt due to the party retaining it has been satisfied. Houston & T. C. Ry. Co. v. Bremond, 18 S. W. 448, 449, 68 Tex. 159; Neil v. Staten, 54 Tenn. (7 Heisk.) 290; In re Byrne (U. S.) 97 Fed. 762, 764; Ex parte Foster (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 508, 513; The Nestor (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 9, 14; Crommelin v. New York & H. R. Co., 23 N. Y. Super. Ct. (10 Bosw.) 77, 80; Appeal of Riddle (Pa.) 7 Atl. 232, 235; Andrews v. Wilkes, 7 Miss. (6 How.) 554, 562, 38 Am. Dec. 450; Alexander v. Pardue, 30 Ark. 359, 361; Boorman v. Wisconsin Rotary Engine Co., 36 Wis. 207, 211, 212; Trust v. Pirsson (N. Y.) 1 Hilt. 292, 296.

"Lien" is a technical term that means a charge upon lands, running with them and incumbering them, in any change of ownership, as mortgages, judgments, ground rents, etc." Ingles v. Bringhurst (Pa.) 1 Dall. 341, 345, 1 L. Ed. 167.

A lien is a security given by law to secure the payment of money. It is as much a security as a mortgage, which is given by contract. Gilchrist v. Helena, H. S. & S. R. Co. (U. S.) 58 Fed. 708, 711.

The word "lien" includes every case in which personal or real property is charged with the payment of a debt. Bell v. Hiner, 44 N. E. 576, 577, 16 Ind. App. 184; Lafferty v. People's Sav. Bank, 43 N. W. 34, 39, 76 Mich. 35 (citing Bidwell v. Whitaker, 1 Mich. 469, 472).

The word "lien" is of the same origin as the word "liable," and the right of lien expresses the liability of certain property for a certain legal duty, or a right to resort to it in order to enforce the duty. Appeal of Wood, 30 Pa. (6 Casey) 274, 277.

"Lien," as used in Rev. St. Me. c. 125, § 35, giving to those who perform labor or furnish materials for or on account of any vessel building or undergoing repairs a lien on such vessel for his wages and materials, "was intended to be employed in the same sense in which it had been previously known and used, and the right or interest which it designates is the same right or interest which laborers and materialmen had previously possessed in foreign vessels." The effect of the act was to give mechanics and materialmen the same lien on domestic vessels as the general admiralty law had previously given foreign vessels. The Young Mechanic (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 873, 876.

A lien is defined to be a hold or claim which one has upon the property of another as security for some debt or charge. At common law there could be no lien without possession. It is therein defined as a right in one man to retain that which is in possession and belonging to another. In maritime law liens exist independently of possession, either actual or constructive, and in the courts of equity the term "lien" is used as synonymous with a charge or incumbrance upon the thing where there is neither jus in re nor ad rem, nor possession of the thing. In re Byrne (U. S.) 97 Fed. 762, 764.

A lien is a special right which one has in that of which another has the general property, and to the extent of the lien it is an abridgment of the dominion which the latter has in the thing. From its nature, therefore, a lien can only be created by the consent of the party who has the general property, or by operation of some positive rule; or, in other words, it can only exist where the person having the absolute dominion of the thing has so far voluntarily parted with his right, or it has been taken from him without his consent. Hayden v. Delay, 16 Ky. (Litt. Sel. Cas.) 278, 279.

"Lien," as used in Act 1867, p. 44, relating to mortgages, embraces any charge or right upon the land by means of which a sale thereof could be compelled. Wright v. Vickers, 81 Pa. (31 P. F. Smith) 122, 132.

A lien is a charge imposed upon specific property, by which it is made security for the performance of an act. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 3438; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4673; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2017; Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 2216; Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 1180; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 3730; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2872; Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2785.

A lien is a charge imposed upon specific property, and may be created by the contract of the parties or by operation of law. Krelling v. Krelling, 50 Pac. 546, 548, 118 Cal. 413.

Kent's Comm. 642, says a lien is in many cases like an asset at common law, and gives the party detaining the chattel the right to hold it as a pledge or security for a debt. McCaffry v. Knapp, Stout & Co. Company, 74 Ill. App. 80, 85.

A lien is a qualified ownership, enforced by detention of the property till the claim resting on it shall be paid and satisfied. Hamilton v. Buck, 36 Me. 536, 539.

The word "lien" has a well-known signification. In law it signifies an obligation, tie, or claim annexed to or attaching upon any property, without satisfying which such property cannot be demanded by its owner. In the everyday use of the term, "liens" include mortgages as well as the more restricted interests which one may hold in the property of another, and its usual and accepted meaning is quite as extensive as the definition of it. In the clause of the bankruptcy act providing that nothing in the act shall be construed to annul and destroy or impair any liens, mortgages, or other securities on property there was no intent to limit the provision to common-law liens, which exist only where the party entitled to it has possession of the goods, and which are lost whenever he parts with the possession. This is one of the smallest classes of liens known to our jurisprudence. There are numerous statutory liens and liens by the maritime laws, some of which require possession to accompany them, while others exist independent of possession. Nor is there any distinction between absolute and conditional liens. Although the latter may be defeated by the condition, they are nevertheless liens until the contingency happens. Storm v. Waddell (N. Y.) 2 Sandf. Ch. 494, 507, 508.

The word "lien" is a French word, and originally signified a string, tie, or bond, and in the metaphorical sense in which the law uses it it signifies such hold or claim on a thing for the satisfaction of a debt, duty, or demand as that it cannot be taken away until the same be satisfied and paid. It is in this sense properly applicable and originally was only applied to chattels, things movable and easily passed from hand to hand, and with respect to these the claim which one has on them is called a lien, a string which binds them fast, and holds them in his possession. In most instances in which one has such lien, if the debt or duty be not paid on reasonable request and within reasonable time the party himself may sell the chattel so held without the intervention of any judiciary, as in the case of pledges, etc. Stansbury v. Patent Cloth Mfg. Co., 5 N. J. Law (2 South.) 433, 441.

Liens are, so far as the source of their creation is concerned, divisible into common-law, equitable, maritime, and statutory. Originally, by the common law, a lien consisted merely in the right to retain possession, under certain circumstances, of the property of another, until some debt or charge was paid. Equitable liens did not depend upon possession, nor, strictly speaking, did they constitute a jus in re or a jus ad rem, but more properly constituted a charge upon the thing. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1215; Peck v. Jenness, 48 U. S. (7 How.) 612, 12 L. Ed. 841. At common law, though ordinarily the delivery of possession by the one entitled to a lien destroyed or terminated the lien, yet by contract the parties might agree to continue the lien after delivery, or, in other words, might agree that the property, after delivery, should be subject to be taken and sold if the purchase price or other charge thereon was not paid. Gregory v. Morris, 96 U. S. 619, 24 L. Ed. 740. In equity, the lien consisted in the right to subject the property, even though not in possession of the lienor, to the payment of the debt or claim, as a charge upon the property; and a maritime lien is of like nature in this respect. Thus, in the case of Galena, Dubuque, Dunleith & Minn. Packet Co. v. Rock Island Bridge, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 213, 18 L. Ed. 753, it is said: "A maritime lien, unlike a lien at common law, may in many instances exist without possession of the thing upon which it is asserted, either actually or constructively. It confers, however, upon its holder such a right in the thing that he may subject it to condemnation and sale to satisfy his claim for damages." Bouvier defines a lien to be "a hold or claim which one has upon the property of another as security for some debt or charge." When, therefore, a statute declares that under certain circumstances a person shall have a lien upon a certain class of property for a debt due or charge due, what is meant is that the person shall have the right to hold the property for, or subject it to, the payment of the claim or charge. On the other hand, if the statute declares that the person shall have the right, under the given circumstances, to hold certain property for, or subject it to, the payment of a certain claim or charge, this in like manner creates and confers a lien, although the word "lien" may not be used in the statute. It is the right to hold or subject the property to the payment of the claim or debt that constitutes the lien, and the mere words used in the statute are immaterial so long as the substantial right itself is created. The Menominee (U. S.) 38 Fed. 197, 199.

A lien is defined to be a right, by which one person in certain cases possesses or retains property placed in his possession belonging to another until some demand which the former has is satisfied. They are of two kinds: particular or special and general. A particular or special lien is the right to retain the property of another on account of labor bestowed or money expended on the same property, and is established by common law and by express agreement. A general lien is the right to detain property for a general balance due from the owner, and arises by usage of trade, usage of the parties, or by express contract. The lien of a common carrier is a special, and not a general, lien. Crommellin v. New York & H. R. Co., 23 N. Y. Super. Ct. (10 Bosw.) 77, 80.

"Lien" is a term of very large and comprehensive signification, but which never imports more than security. At common law it imported a right to retain possession of property until a demand was satisfied. Now it is of more extended signification, and designates all the various charges on land or personalty created by contract or by law. Thus we have in common law the lien of a judgment, the lien on land of a vendor, the lien of a mortgage; and whenever the word is employed it carries with it a right to remove it by satisfying the charge or demand it is intended to secure. Mobile Building & Loan Ass'n v. Robertson, 65 Ala. 382, 383.

A lien is the ligament which binds certain property to a certain debt or claim for its payment or satisfaction. It may be created by contract expressly or impliedly, or it may be created by statute. The mechanic's lien on buildings and the land on which they are erected, as we know it, is the creature of statute, and was unknown in common law or in equity. United States Blowpipe Co. v. Spencer, 21 S. E. 769, 771, 40 W. Va. 698.

A lien is a right of property, and not a mere matter of procedure. The J. E. Rumbell, 13 Sup. Ct. 498, 500, 148 U. S. 1, 37 L. Ed. 345.

The term "lien," in a narrow and more technical sense, signifies the right by which a person in possession of personal property holds and detains it against the owner in satisfaction of a demand; but it has a more extensive meaning, and in common acceptance is understood and used to denote a legal claim or charge on property, either real or personal, for the payment of any debt or duty. Every such claim or charge is still a lien on the property, although the property be not in the possession of him to whom the debt or duty is due. The right of a vendor of land as a security for the purchase money, the right of a judgment creditor against the lands or goods of the judgment debtor given by the law in England and in many of the states of this country, and the right acquired by a creditor under an attachment of property, where the law of attachment exists, are all spoken of and treated as liens in elementary treatises and judicial proceedings, and the term "lien" is so used in the bankruptcy act providing that nothing contained therein shall be taken or construed to invalidate any lien given by the laws of the state, and not inconsistent with other provisions of the act. Downer v. Brackett, 21 Vt. 599, 602.

A lien is not a quitclaim, nor is it the subject of a quitclaim. A lien is a certain right or control which one man has in or over the property of another. The lien is something entirely distinct from the claim. It is in the nature of security for the claim. It may or may not be asserted, and the claim may be enforced with or without its aid. Rochester Distilling Co. v. O'Brien, 25 N. Y. Supp. 281, 282, 72 Hun, 462.

The word "lien" is ordinarily used as a noun, and its use as an adjective is unusual; and therefore, though no comma follows the word "lien" in a bond accompanying a mortgage, and providing that any judgment entered by virtue of the bond shall be restricted "in its lien operation and effect" to the premises described in the mortgage, the word "lien" will not be considered an adjective, but the restriction will be held to apply both to the lien of the judgment and to its operation and effect. In re Abbott's Estate, 48 Atl. 435, 198 Pa. 493; Appeal of Huber, Id.

Assessment.

In courts of equity the term "lien" is used as synonymous with a charge or incumbrance upon a thing where there is neither jus in re nor ad rem, nor possession of the thing. Peck v. Jenness, 48 U. S. (7 How.) 611, 612, 12 L. Ed. 841. In Bouvier's Law Dictionary, a lien is defined to be a hold or claim which one has on the property of another as a security for some debt or charge. Thus a paving assessment under the provisions of a charter making such assessment a charge on the property with authority to sell the same for collection of the tax was said to be in substance a lien. American Nat. Bank v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 89 Fed. 610, 616, 32 C. C. A. 275.

A "lien," under Code Civ. Proc. § 1180, is a charge imposed on specific property by which it is made security for the performance of an act. A swamp-land assessment on property, imposed thereon by authority of the Legislature, is a lien on the property assessed. People v. Hulbert, 12 Pac. 43, 71 Cal. 72.

Attorney's lien.

"Lien," as used in Rev. Code, § 1980, protecting "any lien or claim under contract with" the client, includes attorney's liens arising by operation of law. Jones v. Groover, 46 Ga. 568, 575.

As claim or demand.

Where goods sold were returned by the purchaser on the claim that they did not comply with a warranty, while the seller, claiming an unconditional and absolute sale, notified the purchaser that the goods returned would be treated as on a consignment from him, and sold, and the proceeds applied upon the seller's lien for the price, the word "lien" was not used in the technical sense, but was equivalent to "claim" or "demand" for the price. Stone v. Browning (N. Y.) 49 Barb. 244, 249.

A lien is a right or control which one man has in or over the property of another. A lien is something distinct from a claim. It is in the nature of security. Rochester Distilling Co. v. O'Brien (N. Y.) 72 Hun, 462, 25 N. Y. Supp. 281.

Consent of owner implied.

One making repairs on a hack at the request of a person in possession under a contract of purchase the terms of which were unperformed can acquire no lien on the hack for the cost of such repairs, as against the owner. A lien is a proprietary interest and qualified ownership, and in general can only be created by the owner, or by some person by him authorized. A bailee can give no lien upon the property bailed as against the owner, nor a mortgagor as against the mortgagee. The exceptional case of the innkeeper rests upon the ground that, as he is by law bound to receive a guest and his goods, and might be liable for indictment for not so receiving them, he shall have a lien on such goods as he is bound to receive, whether owned by his guest or not. Small v. Robinson, 69 Me. 425, 427, 428, 31 Am. Rep. 299.

Contingent remainder.

"Lien," as used in Gen. St. 1894, § 1603, providing that minors, insane persons, idiots, or persons in captivity, having an estate in or lien on lands sold for taxes, may redeem the same within two years after such disability shall cease, cannot be construed to include contingent remainders. Minnesota Debuture Co. v. Dean, 89 N. W. 848, 849, 85 Minn. 473 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.).

As contractual lien.

The word "lien," as used in the registry act of 1889, providing when transfers and liens shall take effect as against third parties, has reference exclusively to liens acquired by contract. "Lien" is a generic term, and includes both liens acquired by contract and by operation of law, but the context clearly indicates it is used here in its restricted sense as applicable only to contractual liens. Donovan v. Simmons, 22 S. E. 966, 968, 96 Ga. 340.

The word "lien" in the phrase "who may have acquired a transfer or lien binding the defendant's property," applies only to liens acquired by contract, and consequently this act has no application to contests between ordinary common-law judgments. Griffith v. Posey, 25 S. E. 515, 98 Ga. 475.

Equitable lien.

An equitable lien is not a jus in re or a jus ad rem. It is not a property in the thing itself, but a charge upon the thing. It is simply a right to have a demand satisfied out of the property of another. Arnold v. Porter, 29 S. E. 414, 416, 122 N. C. 242.

A lien is neither a jus ad rem nor a jus in re, and the lien of a vendor on the land sold is so mere a creature of the court of equity that its existence cannot be safely predicated in any case until established by the decree of the court. Gilman v. Brown (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 392.

"Lien," in its enlarged signification, denotes the various charges or debts upon land or personalty, whether created by contract or by statute or suit in equity. In courts of equity the term "lien" is used to suit a charge or incumbrance on the thing when there is no possession. Hines v. Duncan, 79 Ala. 112, 117, 58 Am. Rep. 580.

The term "lien," as used in courts of equity, is synonymous with a charge or incumbrance upon a thing where there is neither jus in re nor ad rem nor possession of the thing. The term is applied as well to charges arising by express engagement of the owner of the property as to a duty or intention implied on his part to make the property answerable for the specific debt or engagement. An instrument in the form of a promissory note executed by the trustee of an incorporated society, the members of which held its property in common, and on behalf of such society, in the form in which the trustees were accustomed to do business, and in return for money which went to increase the funds of the society, created an equitable lien on the society's property. Society of Shakers v. Watson (U. S.) 68 Fed. 730, 739, 15 C. C. A. 632.

At common law it is almost universally held that a lien can only exist in cases where the party entitled to the lien has either actual or constructive possession of the goods, but this does not hold true in maritime law and in equity, where a lien may exist independently of possession. A lien in equity is not a property in the thing, nor does it constitute a right of action for the thing, but is a charge upon it. Ex parte Foster (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 508, 513.

"At common law a lien is the right to retain the possession of personal property until moneys due on or secured by it shall be paid. If the possession is lost, the lien is gone; and, although in equity possession is not necessary to the existence of a lien, yet it is necessary that the property or fund be distinctly traced." Grinnell v. Suydam, 5 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Sandf.) 132, 135.

So shadowy a right as the claim of the vendor of land to have the unpaid purchase money after default charged upon the land by a court of equity is not a lien within the provisions of the practice act, which precludes the right to attach. It is not a lien acquired by express contract, but is one of a very imperfect character, at least inchoate, not recognized at all in a court of law where attachments are enforced, but fastened upon the land by a court of equity upon application duly made, even against the apparent intention of the parties. The vendor has no present indefeasible right to have his debt charged upon the land. It is not a present specific lien. He is simply in a condition which may or may not at some future time, depending upon contingencies over which he has no control, enable him to acquire a lien or obtain an appropriation of the proceeds of the land to the payment of the debt through the intervention of a court of equity. It seems to be a misnomer to call this imperfect, contingent, unassignable, personal privilege, before suit brought, a present, subsisting lien in any sense. It is but a possible capacity to acquire a lien at some future day. It is not a lien by which a debtor can be said to be secured within the meaning of those terms as used in the practice act with reference to attachments. Porter v. Brooks, 35 Cal. 199, 204, 205.

Execution.

See "Execution (Writ of)."

Inchoate dower interest.

A married woman's "inchoate interest" in the lands of her husband is not a lien suffered or created upon lands, within Rev. St. 1867, § 650, providing that the mechanics' liens therein mentioned "shall relate to the time when the work on certain buildings or repairs began, and to the time when the person furnishing material began to furnish the same, and shall have priority over all liens suffered or created thereafter, except other mechanics' and materialmen's liens, over which there shall be no such priority." Mark v. Murphy, 76 Ind. 534, 543.

Interest of plaintiff in garnishment.

The interest which the plaintiff in a garnishee action obtains in the property or credits of the defendant by the due service of a garnishee process upon the person liable to such defendant as a debtor or custodian of his property is a lien created by law within the meaning of the bankrupt act, and an action pending to recover an indebtedness which has been discharged in bankruptcy, having a garnishee action incidental thereto, will survive the discharge and defense on that ground so far as to permit enforcement as to the equitable lien secured in the garnishee action. Bank of Commerce v. Elliott, 85 N. W. 417, 421, 109 Wis. 648.

As interest in land.

See "Interest (In Property)."

Judgment or attachment.

A judgment is a lien on land only because the land can be taken in execution and sold. Morton v. Grafflin, 13 Atl. 341, 346, 63 Md. 545.

A judgment is not necessarily a lien. In re Sedgely Ave., 88 Pa. 509, 513.

A judgment cannot be a lien on land without statutory authority therefor. At the present day such a lien is a creature of statute, and, when there is no express statute authorizing a judgment to be a lien on land, such a judgment does not take effect as a lien in the modern sense of the term. Noe v. Montray, 48 N. E. 709, 711, 170 Ill. 169.

A judgment, in general, is for the defendant's debt, and involves a personal obligation. The proceedings to obtain it are in personam. Unless restricted in its terms, it is a lien upon all the defendant's property within the jurisdiction, and is without limitation as to the defendant, his heirs or devisees; but judgments recovered upon mechanics' and municipal liens are not themselves liens as of the date of their entry, but simply give effect to the lien of the original debt or lien which they represent, as a means of enforcement and collection. Consequently judgments on municipal liens are not governed by Act March 27, 1827, providing that all judgments shall constitute a lien on the real estate of the defendant for the term of five years, and no judgment shall constitute a lien on such real estate for a longer period than five years unless revived, etc., which statute has been construed to in no manner interfere with the lien of the judgment as to the defendant, his heirs and devisees, but is rather governed by Acts April 16, 1845, and June 16, 1836, providing that municipal and mechanics' liens shall expire at the end of five years unless revived in a certain manner, in which case the lien shall continue for another five years, "and so from one such period to another." Haddington M. E. Church v. City of Philadelphia, 108 Pa. 466, 471.

The lien of a judgment or attachment does not extend beyond the interest of the debtor in the land. In strictness, neither a judgment nor an attachment is a lien upon the land. Both are simply charges against land existing by virtue of statute. An attachment does not come up to the exact definition or meaning of a lien, either in the general sense of the common law, or in maritime law, or in that of equity jurisprudence. Usage has perhaps justified the employment of the term "lien" as denoting a charge upon property created by statute. Shirk v. Thomas, 22 N. E. 976, 977, 121 Ind. 147, 16 Am. St. Rep. 381.

An attachment in proceedings on mesne process under the laws of Massachusetts made before the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings is a lien or security on property, within the meaning of the United States bankrupt act of 1841, § 2, which provides that such lien or security shall not be impaired or destroyed by anything contained in that act. Davenport v. Tilton, 51 Mass. (10 Metc.) 320, 328.

An attachment of property upon mesne process, if perfected by judgment and levy, is a lien protected by the bankruptcy act. In re Reed, 21 Vt. 635, 638, 20 Fed. Cas. 417, 419.

The provision in the insolvent debtor's act that all legal mortgages and bona fide liens shall remain good and valid, as though no surrender by the insolvent had been made, includes the lien of an attaching creditor. Berryman v. Stern, 14 Nev. 415, 418.

Mortgage.

Under a statute providing for a laborer's lien on crops, and that it shall be prior to all other liens, it is held that a chattel mortgage executed before the crop is grown is a lien, within the meaning of the statute. Sitton v. Dubois, 45 Pac. 303, 304, 14 Wash. 624.

"Lien" is a legal term used generally to signify any incumbrance on property, and is usually employed in connection with privileges, and not with mortgages. Succession of Benjamin, 2 South. 187, 188, 39 La. Ann. 612.

In everyday use the term "lien" includes mortgages. Storm v. Waddell (N. Y.) 2 Sandf. Ch. 494, 507.

Mortgage distinguished.

A lien is a claim which one person has on the property of another as security for some debt or charge. It is not property in the thing itself, nor does it constitute itself a right of action for the thing, nor can it be construed as a mortgage. A mortgage is made by the person having the property giving the title to another for security. Russell v. Harkness, 7 Pac. 865, 866, 4 Utah, 197.

Pledge.

A lien includes every case in which the personal or real property is charged with the payment of the debt. A pledge is a lien. Jackson v. Kincaid, 46 Pac. 587, 590, 4 Okl. 554.

By the principles of the common law, a man who has the lawful possession of a thing, and has expended his money or labor upon it at the request of the owner, has a lien upon the property, and a right to retain possession of it until his demand is satisfied. This lien is in the nature of a pledge by the owner of the property to the party with whom he contracts for labor to be bestowed upon it. But it is a personal right, and can only be created by the owner or by his authority. So a subcontractor or any servant of the person entitled to the lien acquires no interest in the property by reason of the qualified rights or interests of his employer. Jacobs v. Knapp, 50 N. H. 71, 77.

Possession required.

A lien on goods existed at common law only where the party had possession. Newhall v. Vargas, 15 Me. (3 Shep.) 314, 319, 33 Am. Dec. 617.

The right of lien is a right in one person to retain that which is in his possession, belonging to another, until certain demands of the party in possession are satisfied, and it presupposes that the person making the claim has possession of property belonging to the person against whom the claim is made. Barry v. Boninger, 46 Md. 59, 65.

Possession is essential not only to the creation, but also to the continuance, of a lien created by a pledgee; and, when a party voluntarily parts with the possession of the property upon which the lien has attached, he is divested of his lien. 2 Kent (4th Ed.) 639. A lien is always forfeited by delivery, but a delivery procured by fraud is not within the rule. Walcott v. Keith, 22 N. H. (2 Fost.) 196, 209.

The word "lien" imports that the party is in possession of the thing he claims to detain. It is a right to hold the property on which payment is required to be made, either for the purchase price, or for some care, labor, or attention bestowed upon it. At common law a large class of persons were authorized to claim such right. It included all persons who by their labor or skill imparted an additional value to the goods or chattels in their custody, though it was confined mainly to tradesmen. Sess. Laws 1878, p. 102, providing that any person who shall make, alter, repair, or bestow labor on any article of personal property at the request of the owner shall have a lien upon such property so made, altered, or repaired, or upon which labor has been bestowed, for his just and reasonable charges for the labor he has performed and the material he has furnished, does not give a lien to an employé of a farmer on a crop which the employé has harvested, for the lien, under the statute, is of the same nature it formerly was, and the same circumstances must combine to create it. There must be a possession of the thing; otherwise there cannot, without a special agreement to that effect, be any lien. And the term "lien," as used in the statute, means the same thing it did at common law. McDearmid v. Foster, 12 Pac. 813, 816, 14 Or. 417.

A lien is generally defined to be a tie, hold, or security upon goods or other things which a man has in his custody, till he is paid what is due him. From this definition it is apparent that there can be no lien where the property is annihilated, or the possession parted with voluntarily and without fraud. The claim otherwise well founded cannot be supported if there is a particular agreement made and relied on, or where the particular transaction shows that there was no intention that there should be a lien, but some other security is looked to and relied on. United States v. Barney (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 1014, 1015.

"Lien" has been well defined to be the right of one man to retain property in his possession, belonging to another, until the demands of the party in possession are satisfied. This right depends on the possession, and, if the possession is parted with, the lien is lost. So, where the owners of a sawmill permitted boards sawed by them at a stipulated price to be removed from their millyard to the bank of a canal, at the distance of half a mile from the mill, they lost their lien, in respect to third persons, although it was expressly stipulated between the parties that the liens should continue notwithstanding the removal. McFarland v. Wheeler (N. Y.) 26 Wend. 467, 472; Oakes v. Moore, 24 Me. (11 Shep.) 214, 219, 220, 41 Am. Dec. 379.

In 2 Story, Eq. Jur. 1216, a lien is defined to be "a right to retain and possess a thing until some charge upon it is paid and removed." A vendor's lien is lost by an unconditional delivery to the purchaser of the goods which are the subject of the sale. A. F. Engelhardt Co. v. Benjamin, 39 N. Y. Supp. 31, 32, 5 App. Div. 475.

A lien is the right which a creditor has of detaining in his possession the goods of his debtor until the debt is paid. To the common-law idea of a lien it is necessary that the creditor should have the actual possession of the goods over which the lien is claimed, and that the debt should have been incurred in respect to the very goods detained. As possession is the foundation of the common-law lien, any parting with the possession operates as a waiver or forfeiture of it. Fishell v. Morris, 57 Conn. 547, 551, 18 Atl. 717, 6 L. R. A. 82; Cincinnati Cooperage Co. v. Woodyard (Ky.) 54 S. W. 831, 832. See, also, United States Blowpipe Co. v. Spencer, 21 S. E. 769, 771, 40 W. Va. 698; Ex parte Foster (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 509, 513; The Nestor (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 9, 13; Grinnell v. Suydam, 5 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Sandf.) 132, 135.

The term "lien," as used in Mills' Ann. St. p. 1607, c. 77, giving any person who shall bestow labor on any personal property a lien thereon, means the same thing it ever did—the right to hold the thing until the payment of the reasonable charges for making, altering, repairing, or bestowing labor upon it. Possession of the article is essential. Wenz v. McBride, 36 Pac. 1105, 1106, 20 Colo. 195.

5 Wds. & P.—15

As right of priority.

In 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1252, the word "lien," used in reference to the lien of creditors of a corporation upon its assets, meant simply a right of priority of payment in preference to any of the stockholders in the corporation. Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Newton Cotton Mills, 20 S. E. 765, 768, 115 N. C. 507.

An execution bearing the first teste will be satisfied before one of a younger teste, first delivered and levied upon property, but not sold before that of the first teste comes to the hands of the sheriff. The lien of an execution attaches from the date of the teste. When the term "lien" is applied to other subjects in the law, its import is familiarly understood to be a binding or attachment of the thing spoken of, for the benefit of him who is entitled thereto. The lien of the vendor on goods not yet delivered, of a carrier, a factor, or pawnbroker, entitles them, respectively, to a priority over others whose claims are posterior, upon the simple rule of justice that the first lien gives a right to the first satisfaction. The same rule applies to executions. Green v. Johnson, 9 N. C. 309, 310, 11 Am. Dec. 763.

Whenever the law gives a creditor a right to have a debt satisfied from the proceeds of property, or before the property can be otherwise disposed of, it gives a lien on such property to secure the payment of this debt. In re Trim (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 197, 198.

As property.

See "Property."

Right to sell not implied.

A simple lien is a right to detain chattel property until a debt be paid, but without any right to sell it and apply the proceeds in payment. First Nat. Bank v. Illinois Trust & Savings Bank (U. S.) 84 Fed. 34, 38.

As specific lien.

Code Civ. Proc. § 181, provides that no writ of attachment shall be issued until the plaintiff, his agent or attorney, shall file with the clerk an affidavit showing that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff upon a contract, express or implied, for the payment of money, which is not secured by a mortgage, lien, or pledge upon real or personal property. The word "lien," while having a different legal signification from the words "mortgage" and "pledge," in connection with which it is used, is somewhat analogous to them; and, being used in the connection with them, they serve to explain each other's meaning, and the sense in which they were intended in the act. Bouvier defines the word "lien" as follows: "In its most extensive signification, this term includes every case in which real or personal property is charged with the payment of any debt or duty; every such charge being denominated a lien on the property. In a more limited sense, it is defined to be a right of detaining the property of another until some claim is satisfied." Doubtless the word is more comprehensive than either a mortgage or a pledge. It includes these, as it does all similar obligations by which specific property may be subjected to the payment of a particular debt. That this is what was intended by the Legislature in passing the act is manifest from the last sentence of the section referred to, in which it, in substance, says that, if the security has become insufficient by act of defendant or other cause, attachment may issue. It is obvious that the lien here contemplated was a lien on specific property, which subjected it to the payment of a debt. A creditor of a partnership has no such lien on partnership funds as is contemplated in the statute. In one sense, every creditor has a lien on the entire property of his debtor not exempt from execution. He may sue his debtor, and, when he obtains judgment, may subject his property to the payment of the judgment; and this, or something like it, was evidently what the court had in view when holding that a creditor of a partnership had a lien on partnership property as security for his debt. A lien, from its very nature, takes hold of the property, and retains it for the satisfaction of the debt. Not so with the lien of a creditor of a partnership on the property of a firm. While the partnership continues, the partners, or any of them, acting for the partnership or the firm, may sell or dispose of the property. They may assign, mortgage, or alienate it, and, if the property passes out of the possession or ownership of the partnership, the lien which the partners had is lost, with the ownership of the property; and with it is lost the quasi lien or derivative right or equity of a creditor to subject the property to the payment of the partnership debts. Krueger v. Speith, 20 Pac. 664, 667, 8 Mont. 482, 3 L. R. A. 291.

Tangible property implied.

The word "lien," as used in the act of 1872, giving a lien to mechanics, miners, laborers, and others, gives a lien upon such personal property of the employer as is subject to seizure and sale on execution, and hence a chose in action is not subject to a lien in favor of wage claimants. In re Thompson Glass Co.'s Estate, 40 Atl. 526, 528, 186 Pa. 383.

When we speak of a lien on personal property, we mean something which can be enforced by keeping in possession or which can be reduced into possession. It must be property visible and tangible. Fidelity Ins., Trust & Safe Deposit Co. v. Roanoke Iron Co., 81 Fed. 439, 443.

Tax deed.

The statute "for a more equitable appraisal of real property under judicial sales" provides that, for the purpose of appraisal, the officer and the freeholders therein named shall deduct from the real value of the lands and tenements levied on the amount of all liens and incumbrances for taxes or otherwise prior to the lien of the judgment under which the execution is levied, and the sum thereafter remaining shall be the real value of the interest therein of the persons against whom the execution is levied. An incumbrance is defined to be any right to or interest in the land which may subsist in third persons, to the diminution in value of the estate of the tenant, but consistent with the passing of the fee. A lien is defined to be "a hold or claim which one person has upon the property of another as a security for some debt or charge." Tax deeds are not liens or incumbrances, within the meaning of the statute. A party claiming title under a tax deed holds adversely, and for the time being, at least, must rely upon his title. The statute provides that, in cases where there has been a valid assessment, if the tax title fails, the holder may have a lien upon the real estate; but this is a mere possibility, and cannot be considered by the appraisers, as the validity of a tax deed must be determined by the court, and not by appraisers. Sessions v. Irwin, 8 Neb. 5, 8, 9.

LIEN AS SECURITY.

A lease on plaintiff's land for one year at a specified rent provided that plaintiff should have a "lien upon the crops as security" for the rent, and that the lessee should market the same. Held, that the words "lien on the crops as security" should not be construed to import a sale or mortgage. Milliman v. Neher, 20 Barb. 37, 40.

LIEN IN THE NATURE OF A MORTGAGE.

A lien in the nature of a mortgage is a mortgage itself. It is hard to conceive of a lien, simply, without a means to enforce it. And an agreement that certain notes shall be a lien in the nature of a mortgage on certain land, with a deed of conveyance in fee, constitutes a mortgage, so as to give a preference in regard to a lien over subsequent judgment creditors. McLanahan v. Reeside (Pa.) 9 Watts, 508, 512, 36 Am. Dec. 136.

LIEN ON TITLE DEEDS.

A "solicitor's lien on title deeds" was a right to hold the deeds so as to enforce payment of the amount intended to be secured by their deposit, by embarrassing the debtor, but unaccompanied by any charge upon the estate. Gardner v. McClure, 6 Minn. 250, 260 (Gil. 167, 171); (citing Adams, Eq. 323).

LIENS AND CLAIMS OF LIENS.

A covenant in a bond to secure plaintiff "from all liens and claim of liens" is not violated by simply permitting the liens to be filed. Carson Opera House Ass'n v. Miller, 16 Nev. 327, 329.

LIEU.

See "In Lieu of."

"Lieu lands" is the name applied to lands in a grant of public lands in aid of a railroad, which are to be selected by the company to take the place of lands within the limits of the grant and designated therein, which have been previously appropriated by settlers or for other purposes. The right to such lieu lands attaches to no specific tract until the selection is actually made by the company in the manner prescribed. Elling v. Thexton, 16 Pac. 931, 934, 7 Mont. 330.

LIFE.

See "Natural Life."

"Life" is the immediate gift of God, and a right inherited by nature in every individual. Evans v. People (N. Y.) 1 Cow. Cr. R. 494, 501.

The Court of Appeals, in Bertholf v. O'Reilly, 74 N. Y. 509, 523, 30 Am. Rep. 323, in commenting on the clause in the Bill of Rights, providing that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, says that the "right to life includes the right of the individual to his body in its completeness and without dismemberment." Wilson v. Commercial Tel. Co., 3 N. Y. Supp. 633, 638.

"Life," as used in Const. U. S. Amend. 14, providing that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, means something more than mere animal existence. The inhibition against its deprivation extends to all those limbs and faculties by which life is enjoyed. The provision equally prohibits the mutilation of the body by the amputation of an arm or leg, or the putting out of an eye, or the destruction of any other organ of the body through which the soul communicates with the outer world. The deprivation not only of life, but of whatever God has given to every one with life for its growth and enjoyment, is prohibited by the provision in question. Per Justice Field's dissenting opinion. Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 142, 24 L. Ed. 77.

LIFE EMPLOYMENT.

Under a contract for life employment, the employer would not be bound to retain in his service one who was unfaithful in the performance of his duties, or who was incapable of performing them, or if the employer had no work which the employé could perform. Jackson v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 24 South. 874, 875, 76 Miss. 607.

LIFE ESTATE.

An estate for life is defined to be a freehold interest in lands, the duration of which is confined to the life or lives of some particular person or persons, or to the happening or not happening of some uncertain event. 1 Hil. Abr. 36, § 1; 1 Lomax, Dig. 32, § 1. And where a testator provided "that the children who are now living with me hold the home on the home plantation until otherwise provided for," as such children may not be otherwise provided for during their lives, they take an estate for life in such plantation, determinable upon their being otherwise provided for. Williams v. Ratcliff, 42 Miss. 145, 154.

An estate for life, even if it be per autre vie, is a freehold. Jeffers v. Easton, Eldridge & Co., 45 Pac. 680, 681, 113 Cal. 345.

"Life estate," as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 541, § 1, providing that all controversies existing between persons which might be the subject of an action at law may be submitted to arbitrators, except those respecting the claim of any person to "any estate in fee or for life" to real estate, means legal titles, and does not include those interests which are called equitable estates and titles. The terms in question originally were only employed to designate legal titles, and when equitable rights afterwards grew up and gained recognition, and were molded into forms analogous to legal estates, these came to be designated as equitable estates in fee or for life. But the original sense has been preserved as the proper and legal force of the words. Olcott v. Wood, 14 N. Y. (4 Kern.) 32, 37.

In construing a will devising a life estate in real property to testator's widow if she remain unmarried, and giving her an estate in fee in one-half the property in case she married, it was said that, "while a fee in one-half would properly have been called by the early lawyers an estate of higher dignity than a life estate, in the whole I am not aware of any rule which would enable us to say, as a matter of law, that it was a larger or more favorable provision for the widow. That is a question of fact which depends upon circumstances, and must always be largely a matter of individual choice." Long v. Paul, 17 Atl. 988, 991, 127 Pa. 456, 14 Am. St. Rep. 862.

A life estate in personal property gives the donee a right to consume such articles as cannot be enjoyed without consuming them, and to wear out by use such as cannot be used without wearing out. Walker v. Pritchard, 12 N. E. 336, 337, 121 Ill. 221.

A gift of the income of personal property is a gift of a life estate. Bradbury v. Jackson, 54 Atl. 1068, 1072, 97 Me. 449 (citing Sampson v. Randall, 72 Me. 109).

Estates which may extend during life, but must terminate at death, so long as they exist, are deemed life estates; such are estates during widowhood. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3089.

An estate for life may be either for the life of the tenant, or of some other person or persons. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3087.

A devise to a wife, to have and hold "forever and during her life," constitutes, in the absence of anything to show a contrary intention on the part of the testator, a life estate. Sheafe v. Cushing, 17 N. H. 508, 513.

A devise to testatrix's husband of "the use and occupancy of her real estate during his natural life" was a devise of the land for life, and not of any rents springing out of it, and not of the income of the land, as distinguished from the land. McClure v. Melendy, 44 N. H. 469, 471.

A devise to D., to descend to the younger son of his body, and from him to the oldest male heir of said younger son, and, in failure of such issue, to the heirs of B. forever, gives to the younger son an estate for life only, and not an estate in fee. Dennett v. Dennett, 43 N. H. 499, 501.

A deed conveying all the right, title, and interest of the grantor for the life of the grantee would convey the land for his life, and would have the same effect as, and no higher than, if the deed had conveyed the land for life; and a reservation in a deed of all the right, title, and interest in and unto the land is the same in legal effect as a reservation of the land itself for life. Webster v. Webster, 33 N. H. 18, 22, 66 Am. Dec. 705.

A life estate is a net use and income, not including a diminution of the capital by the diversion of it to the payment of any part of the ordinary expenses of its preservation. Peirce v. Burroughs, 58 N. H. 302, 305.

LIFE INSURANCE.

See "Mutual Insurance Company."

An insurance on life is a contract by which the insurer, for a stipulated sum, engages to pay a certain amount of money if another dies within the time limited by the policy. Cason v. Owens, 28 S. E. 75, 76, 100 Ga. 142.

"Life insurance is protection given to one person against the damage he may suffer through the death of another." Fuller v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., 41 Atl. 4, 10, 70 Conn. 647.

"Life and accident insurance" is a contract whereby one party, for a stipulated consideration, agrees to indemnify another against injuries by accident or death from any cause not excepted in the contract. State v. Pittsburgh, O., C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 67 N. E. 93, 96, 68 Ohio St. 9, 64 L. R. A. 405, 96 Am. St. Rep. 635.

A contract for life insurance is really a contract for insurance for one year in consideration of an advanced premium, with the right of assured to continue it from year to year upon payment of a premium as stipulated. Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Girard Life Ins. Co., 100 Pa. 172, 180.

Life insurance is a mere business transaction, and cannot be considered as charitable. State v. Taylor, 27 Atl. 797, 798, 56 N. J. Law (27 Vroom) 49.

"The insurance of life is a contract whereby the insurer, in consideration of a certain premium, either in a gross sum or periodical payments, undertakes to pay the person for whose benefit the insurance is made a stipulated sum, or an annuity equivalent, on the death of the person whose life is insured, whenever this shall happen within a certain period, if the insurance be for a limited time." State ex rel. Beach v. Citizens' Ben. Ass'n, 6 Mo. App. 163, 169 (quoting 2 Marsh. Ins. 766).

The term "life insurance" is not alone applicable to an insurance for the full term of one's life. It includes an insurance for a term of years, or until the assured shall arrive at a certain age. It is simply an undertaking on the part of the insurer that, either at the death of the insured, whenever that event may occur, or on his death if it shall happen within a specified term or before attaining a certain age, as the case may be, there shall be paid a stipulated sum. In either form it is, strictly speaking, an insurance on the life of the party. Endowment & Benev. Ass'n v. State, 10 Pac. 872, 873, 35 Kan. 253.

"Bunyan—an English writer on the subject—defines life insurance to be that in which one party agrees to pay a given sum on the happening of a particular event consequent on the duration of human life, in consideration of the immediate payment of a smaller sum or certain equivalent periodical payments by another. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts defines it to be 'a contract by which one party promises to make a certain payment on the destruction or injury of something in which the other party has an interest, whatever may be the terms of payment of the consideration, or the mode of estimating or securing the payment of the sum to be assured in case of loss.' But the origin of life insurance, as we are told by all writers on the subject, is traceable to benevolent motives. The object was to secure to the family of a person who was dependent on a salary or other income, which ceased with his life, a support on the death of the insured, by a small contribution of the annual income; and this, it is apparent, was a laudable and benevolent object. In France, we are told, life insurance was in early times prohibited, on the ground that it might operate as an incentive to those who would benefit by the termination of a life to hasten such termination; but in England it was adopted by the judiciary long before its sanction by Parliament, on an assumption, not unusual with those islanders, of a superiority in popular morals over their continental neighbors." State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Merchants' Mut. Ben. Soc., 72 Mo. 146, 159.

A contract commonly called "life assurance," when properly considered, is a mere contract to pay a certain sum of money on the death of a person, in consideration of the due payment of a certain annuity for life; the amount of the annuity being calculated in the first instance according to the probable duration of the life, and, when once fixed, it is constant and invariable. A stipulated amount and annuity is to be paid on one side, and the sum to be paid in the event of death is always (except when bonuses have been given) the same on the other. This species of insurance in no way resembles a contract of indemnity. Dalbey v. Life Assur. Co., 15 C. B. 365, 386.

Life insurance imports a mutual agreement whereby the insurer, in consideration of the payment by the assured of a named sum annually or at certain times, stipulates to pay a larger sum at the death of the assured. The insurer takes into consideration, among other things, the age and health of the parents and relatives of the applicant for insurance, together with the applicant's own age, course of life, habits, and present physical condition; and the premium exacted from the insured is determined by the probable duration of his life, calculated upon the basis of past experience in the business of insurance. Ritter v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 18 Sup. Ct. 300, 304, 169 U. S. 139, 42 L. Ed. 693.

Life insurance is not a means of creating wealth, nor yet a contract of mere indemnity, as is that of fire and marine insurance. It is, in its most usual form, simply a mode of putting by money for savings. A sum of money is paid half-yearly or yearly, as the case may be, to a corporation, which receives and invests it carefully, and adds to it its yearly earnings, and, in consideration of such payments, agrees to pay the party insured, or such other person as may be named, a sum certain upon his death. The amount so agreed to be paid is arrived at by taking the age and state of health of the party at whose death the money is to be paid, and estimating how many years he will probably live. Merchants' & Miners' Transp. Co. v. Borland, 31 Atl. 272, 273, 53 N. J. Eq. (8 Dick.) 282.

Generally stated, a policy of life insurance may be said to be an agreement by the obligor to pay to a certain person named a sum of money on the death of the insured, subject to the condition that the premiums reserved be paid upon the day that they fall due, and subject, also, to other conditions as to residence and occupation of the assured. On the death of the assured, the other conditions of the policy having been performed, there then exists a demand for a payment of the money; but, until that contingency happens, the obligation of the insurer is not that of a debtor, and, unless the policy has a surrender value, no demand exists against the insurer which is subject to attachment. Columbia Bank v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc., 80 N. Y. Supp. 428, 431, 79 App. Div. 601.

As contract to pay certain sum.

A contract of life insurance is "not a contract of indemnity, as in the case of fire or marine insurance, but a contract to pay a certain sum of money in the event of death." Scott v. Dickson, 108 Pa. 6, 14, 56 Am. Rep. 192; Embler v. Hartford Steam Roller Inspection & Ins. Co., 40 N. Y. Supp. 450, 452, 8 App. Div. 186.

In Olmsted v. Keyes, 85 N. Y. 593, 598, it was said: "A life insurance is not, like fire insurance, a contract of indemnity, but a mere contract to pay a certain sum of money on the death of a person in consideration of the due payment of a certain annuity for his life. * * * Like every other contract to pay money, such a policy is a chose in action, with all the ordinary incidents of every other chose in action." Algate v. Horse Owners' Mut. Indemnity Ass'n, 29 N. Y. Supp. 101, 102, 77 Hun, 472.

A life policy is a contract to pay a certain sum at an indefinite time, while a fire policy is a contract to indemnify any cases of loss. Commonwealth v. American Life Ins. Co., 29 Atl. 660, 663, 162 Pa. 586, 42 Am. St. Rep. 844.

Life insurance is an arbitrary agreement to pay a fixed sum upon the happening of an inevitable event, to wit, the death of the insured, without regard to the value of his life, or the loss sustained by the insured. A contract of life insurance is not a contract of indemnity, like the ordinary insurance contract. Campbell v. Supreme Conclave I. O. Heptasophs, 49 Atl. 550, 552, 66 N. J. Law, 274, 54 L. R. A. 576.

"Life insurance," so far as the insurance company is concerned, is simply a contract to pay a certain sum of money on the death of the insured in consideration of the payment of the premiums as stipulated. It is not a contract of indemnity. Central Nat. Bank v. Hume, 9 Sup. Ct. 41, 44, 128 U. S. 195, 32 L. Ed. 370.

Insurable interest.

Life insurance is a contract by which the insurer, in consideration of an annual payment to be made by the assured, promises to pay to him a certain sum upon the death of the person whose life is insured. To prevent this from being void as a mere wager on the continuance of a life in which the parties have no interest except that created by the wager itself, it is necessary that the assured should have some pecuniary interest in the continuance of the life insured. It is not a contract for an indemnity for actual loss, but a promise to pay a certain sum on the happening of a future event from which loss or detriment may ensue, and if made in good faith for the purpose of providing against possible loss, and not as a cloak for a wager, is sustained by any interest existing at the time the contract was made. Mutual Life Ins. Co. of New York v. Allen, 138 Mass. 24, 27, 52 Am. Rep. 245.

Benefit societies.

All benefit societies, whether corporations or mere voluntary associations, are, strictly speaking, insurance organizations, whenever, in consideration of a periodical contribution, they engage to pay the member or his designated beneficiary a benefit upon the happening of a specified contingency. It may be also asserted as a general principle that, wherever or whenever a benefit society paying a benefit to the beneficiaries of its deceased members claims to be exempt from the operation of certain laws applicable to persons or companies doing a life insurance business, it can only safely base such claim on express provisions of its charter or of the statutes exempting similar organizations from such liability. The association may be benevolent and charitable, and only incidentally provide benefits for its members or their beneficiaries; but, nevertheless, when it contracts to pay a certain sum to the appointees of its members upon their decease while in good standing, in consideration of certain contributions made by such members while living, it is doing a life insurance business. Citizens' Life Ins. Co. v. Commissioner of Ins., 87 N. W. 126, 128, 128 Mich. 85.

The term "life insurance" does not include membership in a beneficial association, the constitution of which merely provides for a beneficiary fund, and for the payment out of the fund of a specified sum to the surviving or designated person or persons qualified to receive it upon the death of a member. In such case there is no contract of insurance between the members. Swift v. San Francisco Stock & Exchange Board, 8 Pac. 94, 98, 67 Cal. 567.

The term "life insurance" may be used to characterize a contract entered into by an association agreeing to pay death benefits, according to its rules and by-laws, after the death of a member of the association, to certain designated relatives of the member, or his legal representatives. Golden Star Fraternity v. Martin, 35 Atl. 908, 909, 59 N. J. Law, 207.

The ordinary contract of membership of a mutual benefit association is a policy of life insurance, within Gen. Laws, c. 175, so that the insolvency of the estate of a deceased member does not subject the sum insured to the payment of his debts. Mellows v. Mellows, 61 N. H. 137, 139.

The contract of the members of a mutual relief association, by which, on the death of one, the sum of $1 assessed on each survivor is due to an appointee of the deceased, being one of his heirs or a member of his family, is a contract of life insurance. Smith v. Bullard, 61 N. H. 381.

LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

A life insurance company shall be deemed to be a corporation doing business under any charter involving the payment of money or other thing of value to families or representatives of policy holders, continued or conditioned upon continuance or cessation of human life, or involving an insurance, guaranty, contract or pledge for the payment of endowments or annuities. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3096a.

A mutual benefit society is not a life insurance company, within the meaning of that term in the statutes relative to life insurance companies. Martin v. Stubbings, 18 N. E. 657, 660, 126 Ill. 387, 9 Am. St. Rep. 620.

LIFE, LIBERTY, AND PROPERTY.

See "Right to Life."

The term "life, liberty, and property" is a representative term, and intended to cover every right to which a member of the body politic is entitled under the law. This term includes the right of self-defense, freedom of speech, religious and political freedom, exemption from arbitrary arrest, and the right freely to buy and sell as others may. Indeed, it embraces all our liberties, personal, civil, and political, including the rights to labor, to contract, to terminate contracts, and to acquire property. Gillespie v. People, 58 N. E. 1007, 1009, 188 Ill. 176, 52 L. R. A. 283, 80 Am. St. Rep. 176.

"Life, liberty, and property," as used in Const. art. 2, § 30, declaring that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, and property without due process of law, are representative terms, and cover every right to which a member of the body politic is entitled under the law. Within their comprehensive scope are embraced the right of self-defense, freedom of speech, religious and political freedom, exemption from arbitrary arrests, and the right to buy and sell as others may; all our liberties, personal, civil, and political; in short, all that makes life worth living. The rights thus guaranteed are something more than the mere privilege of locomotion. The guaranty is the negation of arbitrary power, in every form, which results in a deprivation of a right. In re Flukes, 57 S. W. 545, 546, 157 Mo. 125, 51 L. R. A. 176 (quoting 2 Story, Const. [5th Ed.] § 1950); State v. Julow, 31 S. W. 781, 782, 129 Mo. 163, 29 L. R. A. 257, 50 Am. St. Rep. 443.

LIFE, LIBERTY, AND PURSUIT OF HAPPINESS.

The expression "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," in the Constitution of the United States, is general in its character, and includes many rights which are inherent and inalienable. Many of the rights referred to in this expression are included in the general guaranty of liberty. The happiness here referred to may consist in many things, or depend on many circumstances, but it unquestionably includes the right of the citizen to follow his individual preferences in the choice of an occupation. The right of every man to choose his own occupation, profession, or employment, though not expressly guarantied by the Constitution, is included in the right to the pursuit of happiness. In Allgeyer v. State of Louisiana, 165 U. S. 578, 17 Sup. Ct. 427, 41 L. Ed. 832, it was said: "The right to follow any of the common occupations of life is an inalienable right. It was formulated as such in the phrase 'pursuit of happiness' in the Declaration of Independence, which commenced with the fundamental phrase 'that all men are created free and equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; and that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.'" It was also said that the liberty of pursuit—the right to follow any of the ordinary callings of life—is one of the privileges of the American citizen. Ruhstrat v. People, 57 N. E. 41, 43, 185 Ill. 133, 49 L. R. A. 181, 76 Am. St. Rep. 30.

LIFE OR LIVES IN BEING.

The common-law rule against perpetuities, that any estate granted or devised must, in order to be valid, vest within a "life or lives in being, and 21 years afterwards," means that the estate will be invalid if by any possibility it will not vest within the time specified; but this rule relates entirely to time, and not to persons, since the testator is allowed to select as a measure of time the lives of any persons in existence, and the 21 years afterwards are not regulated by the birth or the coming of age of any person, for they begin, not with a birth, but with a death, and are 21 years in gross, without regard to the life or to the coming of age of any person whosoever. McArthur v. Scott, 5 Sup. Ct. 652, 663, 113 U. S. 340, 28 L. Ed. 1015.

LIFE POLICY.

As chose in action, see "Chose in Action."

A life policy for the benefit of the family of a person procuring it, though not a testament, is in the nature of a testament; and, in construing it, the courts should consider it, as far as possible, as a will, as in doing so they will more clearly approximate the intention of the parties, the destination of whose bounty is involved in such cases. It is not to be supposed that the father, in procuring insurance on his own life for the benefit of his family, intends to benefit himself or his estate. Supreme Council Catholic Knights of America v. Densford (Ky.) 56 S. W. 172, 173.

A certificate of membership in a mutual benefit society is not a "life policy," within the meaning of that phrase in the statutes relative to life insurance. Martin v. Stubblings, 18 N. E. 657, 660, 126 Ill. 387, 9 Am. St. Rep. 620.

LIFE TABLES.

Life tables are never taken as fixing the expectancy of the life of the particular person, or as forming a legal basis for a calculation, but are accepted as furnishing some evidence to be considered by the jury in connection with all the other pertinent evidence in ascertaining the probable duration of the life in question. Expressions are frequently found that such tables, to be useful as evidence, should not appear to have been made up with regard to selected lives only, exclusive of the life in question. Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Johnson, 58 S. W. 622, 625, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 180.

LIFTING.

An accident policy exempting the insurer from liability for injury or death caused by lifting should be construed to mean "a voluntary and unnecessary act of the insured—one from which injury might reasonably be anticipated, and which might, in the exercise of reasonable care, have been avoided—and an effort to lift, put forth in an emergency of danger, as, for instance, in the effort to save one's self from being crushed by a descending weight, is not within the exception of the policy." Reynolds v. Equitable Acc. Ass'n, 1 N. Y. Supp. 738, 739, 59 Hun, 13.

LIFTS.

"Lifts" is a mining phrase, and means rests or stopping points along the shaft of the mine, at which there were switches on the track, by which the descending cars could be turned off or placed back on the track. Woodward Iron Co. v. Jones, 80 Ala. 123, 124.

LIGAN.

"Ligan" is where the goods cast into the sea to lighten the vessel to save her from some danger are so heavy that they sink, and the mariners tie a buoy or something to them so that they may find them again. Lacaze v. Pennsylvania (Pa.) 1 Add. 58, 64.

LIGHT.

See "Ancient Lights"; "Servitude of Light."

The word "light," as used in Laws 1897, c. 378, § 1320, providing that in dark hallways and tenements a light shall be maintained, evidently means an artificial light, such as is furnished by a lamp, gas, or electricity. Bretsch v. Plate, 81 N. Y. Supp. 868, 869, 82 App. Div. 399.

Lights are those openings which are made rather for the admission of light than to look out of. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 715.

LIGHT-LADEN.

The expression "light-laden," as used in a charter of a steamship for the fruit trade, guarantying that she should make a certain average speed "light-laden," when construed in reference to the context, means that the vessel will make a certain speed laden with a fruit cargo or with its equivalent, i. e., when as light-laden as with a fruit cargo, or one not more cumbersome, nor more unfavorable for speed. The vessel was to be deemed light-laden in respect of draft, if her draft did not exceed that of a full fruit cargo, and, in reckoning weight of cargo, the weight of so much ballast as would be needed for a fruit cargo should not be counted. The Ceres (U. S.) 61 Fed. 701, 702, 72 Fed. 936, 938, 19 C. C. A. 243.

LIGHTER.

As vessel, see "Vessel."

Barge synonymous, see "Barge."

"Lighter," as used in Rev. St. U. S. 1878, § 4289, providing that the limited liability act shall not apply to the owners of any canal boat, barge, or lighter, or to any vessel of any description whatsoever used in rivers or inland navigation, means a vessel used in assisting to load and unload other vessels. The Mamie (U. S.) 5 Fed. 813, 818.

"Lighter," as used in St. 7 & 8, Geo. IV, c. 75, § 37, imposing a penalty on any person other than a freeman of a waterman company, or an apprentice to a freeman or the widow of a freeman, who shall navigate or work "any wherry, lighter, or other craft" within certain prescribed limits, means a boat plying for hire, and carrying passengers or goods, and does not include a steam tug used for towing boats. Reed v. Ing-ham, 26 Eng. Law & Eq. 164, 167. A lighter is a craft plying for hire for the carrying of goods. Regina v. Reed, 28 Eng. Law & Eq. 133, 135.

LIGHTERAGE.

The ordinary signification of "lighterage" is the price paid for unloading ships by lighters or boats, and is not properly applicable to the unloading of a canal boat at one wharf or pier instead of another. As used in a notice that, if property were taken out of the canal boat elsewhere than at a certain pier, lighterage would be charged, the term means additional compensation beyond the freight and ordinary charges. Western Transportation Co. v. Hawley (N. Y.) 1 Daly, 327, 332.

"Lighterage at shipper's risk," as used in a bill of lading, includes all damage or loss while on the lighters without the shipper's fault. The Seguranca (U. S.) 68 Fed. 1014, 1016.

LIGHTNING.

A policy of fire insurance providing that it was liable for any loss or damage caused by lightning to the property insured covers all known effects of electricity coming under the general head of "lightning," and not merely those arising from combustion. The word "lightning," in its ordinary and popular sense, applies to any sudden and violent discharge of electricity occurring in the course of nature between positively and negatively electrified bodies, usually developing in its course the phenomena of light, heat, and disruptive force. Spensley v. Lancashire Ins. Co., 11 N. W. 894, 897, 54 Wis. 433.

In construing a policy against fire by lightning, it was held that the term did not cover the loss of a building which was prostrated and destroyed by lightning, without fire resulting therefrom. The court, however, refused to determine whether lightning is fire, scientifically considered, but based its decision on the fact that the insurance was against fire in the ordinary and popular meaning of the term; that is, actual ignition or burning. Babcock v. Montgomery County Mut. Ins. Co., 4 N. Y. (4 Comst.) 328, 331.

LIGHTNING ROD.

As building, see "Building (In Lien Laws)."

LIGIMATE PORTION.

"Ligimate portion" is a term used in the Spanish law to designate the share of an estate to which an heir is entitled. Crain v. Crain, 17 Tex. 80, 90.

LIGIOSO.

"Ligioso" is the Spanish word for "litigious," and "is defined to be that which is in dispute in a suit. The subject of the suit cannot, during its continuance, with certain exceptions pointed out in the law, be sold or transferred." White v. Gay's Ex'rs, 1 Tex. 384, 387.

LIKE.

See "Under Like Circumstances"; "Words of Like Import."

As defined by Webster, "like" means equal in quantity, quality, or degree; exactly corresponding; so that "in like manner" means with same force and effect. Badger v. Daniel, 79 N. C. 372, 387.

The term "like" means "precisely the same," and differs from the word "similar" in one of its senses, in that it means "identical," and not "resembling." Commonwealth v. Fontain, 127 Mass. 452, 455.

As analogous.

Act Cong. Aug. 1, 1888, c. 728, 25 Stat. 357 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2517], providing that the practice, pleading, forms, and motives of proceedings in cases arising under the act shall conform as near as may be to the practice, pleadings, forms, and proceedings existing at the time in like cases in courts of record of the state, means "in analogous cases." In re Rugheimer (U. S.) 36 Fed. 369, 873.

As in same manner.

The expression "like punishment," in a statute providing that an accessory shall receive like punishment with the principal, imports that he shall be liable to indictment in the same manner as the principal. Commonwealth v. Andrews, 2 Mass. 409, 410.

As others.

A city ordinance provided that the outside walls of buildings having trussed roofs, such as churches, public halls, theaters, restaurants, and the like, if more than 16 and less than 25 feet high, shall average at least 17 inches in thickness. Held, that the words "and the like," occurring after the particular buildings or structures mentioned, cannot be interpreted as limiting the buildings having trussed roofs to uses similar to the uses to which churches, public halls, theaters, and restaurants are particularly appropriated, but are meant to give extension to the uses to which buildings having trussed roofs may be particularly applied; and protection to persons properly and lawfully in any such building having trussed roofs, whatever their lawful uses may be, was as much intended by this provision as it was to persons who might be in churches, public halls, theaters, and restaurants. Diamond State Iron Co. v. Giles (Del.) 11 Atl. 189, 195, 7 Houst. 557.

As resembling.

Webster defines "like" to mean "having the same, or nearly the same, appearance, qualities, or characteristics; resembling; similar to." Thus the word in a municipal ordinance making it unlawful for any person or persons to sell any malt, hop tea, hop tonic, ginger ale, American hop ale, cider, or any other drink of a like nature, no matter by what name it might be called, etc., applies to liquors which are like the specified liquors, in this: that they are liquids; that they are kept in bottles; that they are nonintoxicants; that they contain a mere trace of spirits; that they are put up for the Kansas trade; and, finally, that they are all used as a beverage. City of Lincoln Center v. Linker, 53 Pac. 787, 788, 7 Kan. App. 282.

As same.

A shipper's receipt stipulating that goods shall be "delivered in like good condition" means the same condition as that in which they were received. If in good order when received, they must be delivered in that condition, in order to comply with the contract, while, if broken or damaged when received, the contract is complied with by delivering in the same condition. Kiff v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 4 Pac. 401, 403, 32 Kan. 263.

As of same class or kind.

Under a statute declaring it unlawful for any person to keep or exhibit a gaming table commonly called A B C or E O table, or faro bank, or a table of the like kind under any denomination, an indictment, though it does not charge the keeping of one of the enumerated games, must charge a game of the like kind—that is, one of unequal gains—included in the class prohibited. Huff v. Commonwealth (Va.) 14 Grat. 648, 650.

The word "like" is defined to mean resembling; having resemblance; similar; or, equal; same in quantity, amount, or extent. Where a statute required that, when a pleading had been adjudged insufficient, a like pleading must be filed, it was clear that the requirement was not that a pleading precisely similar in character should be filed, since such proceeding would have led to an absurdity, but the true meaning of the words "like pleading" is that they refer to a petition, answer, or reply, as the case may be, which has been adjudged insufficient, or, in other words, if a petition, answer or reply has been adjudged insufficient, another petition, answer, or reply must be filed, but it must not be like the petition, answer or reply which has been adjudged insufficient, at least in the sense of resembling it as to its insufficiency. Mumford v. Keet, 55 S. W. 271, 274, 154 Mo. 36.

As substantially alike

Saying that one article is like another does not necessarily mean that they are the same in all particulars, but rather the contrary, that is, that they are the same in some particulars, and not in others. Houghton v. Field, 56 Mass. (2 Cush.) 141, 145.

"Like," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 847, providing that for issuing any warrant or writ, and for any other service, the United States commissioners shall receive the same compensation as is allowed to clerks for like services, does not necessarily mean "identical with," but includes those services of the clerks which bear a substantial resemblance to the duty performed by the commissioners. The phrase should receive a reasonable construction. United States v. Wallace, 6 Sup. Ct. 408, 409, 116 U. S. 393, 29 L. Ed. 675.

The term "like courts," in the Constitution, providing that writs of error lie to the Supreme Court from the superior courts of the state, and from the city courts of Atlanta and Savannah, and such other like courts as may be established in other cities, does not mean courts identical in all respects. It is sufficient if the courts established be substantially like the courts of Savannah or Atlanta, or either of them. Ivey v. State, 37 S. E. 398, 399, 112 Ga. 175.

LIKE ANIMAL.

Paragraph 377, Act. Oct. 1, 1890, imposing a certain duty per pound upon the hair of goats and other "like animals," cannot be construed to include a sheep, for the sheep, in respect to its fleece, is not a like animal to the goat, but is almost sui generis. In that respect it differs wholly from the goat and from almost every other known animal. Lyon v. Marine (U. S.) 55 Fed. 964, 967, 5 C. C. A. 359.

LIKE AUTHORITY.

Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8, provides that Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district as may become the seat of the government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the state in which the same shall be used for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings. Held to mean the power of exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever when the lands acquired by the United States within the limits of a state have upon them forts, arsenals, or other public buildings erected for the use of the general government. Such buildings, with their appurtenances, as instrumentalities for the execution of its powers, are free from any such interference and jurisdiction of the state as would destroy or impair their effective use for the purposes designed, but, when not used as such instrumentalities, the legislative power of the state over the places acquired will be as full and complete as over any other places within her limits. Ft. Leavenworth R. Co. v. Lowe, 5 Sup. Ct. 995, 997, 114 U. S. 525, 29 L. Ed. 264.

LIKE CHARACTER.

"Like character," within the meaning of Code, § 4465, providing that any person who shall preside and deal at any faro table, or use any E O or A B C table or roulette table, or any other table of like character, for the purpose of playing and betting at the same, shall be guilty, etc., means that character common to all the instruments or tables described, to wit, a device decided by chance, the result upon which bystanders might play and bet. Brown v. State, 40 Ga. 689, 693.

LIKE CRIMES.

Gen. St. c. 33, art. 12, § 15, providing that any person convicted of robbery, counterfeiting, or perjury, or other like crimes, should forfeit his right of suffrage and right to hold office, embraces all crimes, besides those specifically mentioned, which are inconsistent with the common principles of honesty or humanity, and convict the perpetrator of moral turpitude, such as grand larceny. Anderson v. Winfree, 4 S. W. 351-352, 85 Ky. 597.

LIKE EFFECT.

A statute requiring that a certain notice be given in a specified form, or to the like effect, was complied with by a notice which gave all the information which the Legislature intended to be given by the form recommended. Regina v. Harwich, 1 El. & Bl. 617, 618.

LIKE INSTRUMENT.

A note is not a conveyance, mortgage, or like formal instrument in writing, within the Acts of 1887, which provide that such instruments executed by a married woman shall be effectual to convey or charge her separate estate when the intention to do so is declared in them. Singluff v. Tindal, 18 S. E. 137, 138, 40 S. C. 504.

LIKE MANNER.

Code, p. 1347, rule 13, provides that in all cases of claims, where the burden of proof rests with the plaintiff in execution, he is entitled to the conclusion, but if the claimant introduces no evidence he shall have the conclusion, and in cases of illegality the plaintiff in execution shall "in like manner" conclude. Held, that the words "in like manner" do not mean that in illegality cases the defendant shall have the conclusion where he assumes the burden of proof. The words should be construed to mean that the defendant on the trial of an affidavit of illegality is not entitled to assume the burden of proof by admitting the apparent regularity of the fl. fa. and levy, and alleging that the judgment is void for want of service. Bertody v. Ison, 69 Ga. 317, 318.

"In like manner," as used in Laws 1888, providing that comparison of a disputed writing with any writing proved to the satisfaction of the court to be the genuine handwriting of any person claimed on a trial to have made or executed the disputed instrument or writing shall be permitted and submitted to the court and jury "in like manner," refers to the manner provided in the prior execution to which it was an addition, requiring that the submission of a writing to a jury must be in connection with the testimony of witnesses in regard to the validity or authorship of the various handwritings, and that, independent of the examination of witnesses, such handwriting cannot be submitted to the jury for the purpose of arbitrary comparison by them. People v. Pinckney, 22 N. Y. Supp. 118, 121, 67 Hun, 428.

By the words "in like manner" in a will giving certain leasehold houses in trust for A. absolutely for her separate use, and leasehold houses for B. for her separate use for her life, and after her decease for her children; if none, to fall into the residue; and giving the residue in trust for A. and B., to be divided between them share and share alike, and to be paid and applied in like manner for their use and benefit as the rents and profits of the leasehold premises thereinbefore settled upon them, was meant for their separate use. Shanley v. Baker, 4 Ves. 732, 734.

Act 1844, Bat. Rev. c. 43, § 10, provides that in actions brought upon official bonds of administrators, "when it may be necessary for the plaintiff to prove any default of the principal obligors, any receipt or acknowledgment of such obligors, or any other matter or thing which by law would be admissible and competent for or toward proving the same as against him, shall 'in like manner' be admissible and competent against all or any of his sureties who may be defendants with or without him in said action." The only natural and reasonable construction of this act is that, when the evidence was conclusive against the principal prior to the act, it became in like manner conclusive against the sureties after the act. A judgment against the administrator was therefore conclusive against the surety, both of the debt and assets sufficient to pay it. Brown v. Pike, 74 N. C. 531, 534.

In a statute providing that a written petition in summary proceedings shall be verified in like manner as a verified complaint, "in like manner" means in like form as pleadings are verified. "Manner" means method of procedure, habit, or custom. Stuyvesant Real Estate Co. v. Sherman, 81 N. Y. Supp. 642, 643, 40 Misc. Rep. 205.

Where a testator, after giving an estate to one son, and to his issue male after his death, directed that in default of such issue the estate should go "in like manner" to another son, it was held that the words "in like manner" imported a gift of the same estate with respect to the second son as was previously given to the first. Lewis v. Puxley, 16 Mees. & W. 733, 743.

LIKE NATURE.

In St. 5 & 6 Wm. IV, c. 107, § 171, providing that the provision of the statute shall not extend to articles, matters, or things sent in large aggregate quantities, although made up of separate and distinct parcels, such as bags of sugar, coffee, meal, and the like, but only to "single parcels unconnected with parcels of a 'like nature' which may be sent upon the railway at the same time," the expression "like nature" refers only to the quality or kind of parcels. Parker v. Great Western R. R. Co., 6 El. & Bl. 77, 105.

LIKE OCCUPATIONS.

"Like occupations," as used in a statute authorizing the incorporation of cities and villages, and providing that the city council in cities shall have authority to license hackmen, draymen, omnibus drivers, cabmen, expressmen, and all others pursuing "like occupations," includes street railroads. Allerton v. City of Chicago (U. S.) 6 Fed. 555.

LIKE PROCEEDINGS.

"Like proceedings," as used in Detroit City Charter, § 24, providing, that "all the proceedings of the recorders' court may be removed to the Supreme Court by writ of error, or other process, in the same manner that like proceedings may be removed from the circuit courts of the state," refers as well to character as to details, and does not authorize the removing of convictions for offenses against city ordinances. People v. Jackson, 8 Mich. 110, 112.

Where a statute in one section provides that a certain proceeding shall not be carried further than the examination on oath of the party sought to be charged, and in another section, that "like" proceedings may be had against another, the word "like" necessarily limits the latter proceedings to the examination under oath of the party against whom the proceedings are instituted. In re Stuart's Estate, 67 Mo. App. 61, 65.

LIKE PROPORTION.

"In like proportion," as used in Elliott's Supp. § 1193, providing that the cost of repairs shall be apportioned on the land adjudged benefited by the construction of the drain "in like proportion" as benefits were assessed against the land for the construction of the work, does not mean that the apportionment to any tract of land for the repairs and improvement should be based upon the exact portion of the original cost of construction with which that tract was originally assessed, without reference to the benefits accruing to the land from the present improvement; but that the assessments for repairs should be assessed in proportion to the benefits received therefrom. Parke County Coal Co. v. Campbell, 39 N.

El. 149, 150, 140 Ind. 28; Morrow v. Greeting, 41 N. E. 848, 15 Ind. App. 358.

LIKE PURPOSE.

A by-law of the Associated Press of New York, providing that "no member of this association shall receive or publish the regular news dispatches of any other news association covering a like territory, and organized for a 'like purpose' with this association," should be construed to include an association which obtains news directly through its own agents from various parts of the world, though the Associated Press of New York obtains news from its own agents only in New York, and from other parts of the world through contracts with other agents. Matthews v. Associated Press, 32 N. E. 981, 136 N. Y. 333, 32 Am. St. Rep. 741.

LIKE SERVICE AND PROOF.

"Like service and proof," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 66, § 210, allowing judgment on default to be entered in certain actions on like service and proof as in an action arising on contract for the payment of money only, means the personal service of the summons and proof of such service and of defendant's default. Exley v. Berryhill, 33 N. W. 567, 568, 37 Minn. 182.

LIKE SUM.

"Like sum," as used in Rev. St. 1874, p. 510, §§ 52, 53, prohibiting all railroads from obstructing public roads or highways by stopping trains or leaving cars standing on crossings, except for the purpose of receiving passengers, and providing that every conductor or engineer who shall violate such act shall forfeit a sum not less than $10 nor more than $100, and the corporation on whose road the offense is committed shall be liable for a "like sum," means a sum not less than $10 nor more than $100. It cannot be construed to only mean the same sum which had formerly been adjudged against the engineer or conductor for the same offense, and hence the corporation may be required to pay the penalty before the prior conviction of the engineer or conductor. Toledo, W. & W. Ry. Co. v. People, 81 Ill. 141, 142.

LIKE TENOR.

In the statute providing that bonds issued in renewal of former bonds shall be of like tenor with the old ones, the words "of like tenor" are not to be taken in the sense in which they are used in reference to crimes of counterfeiting and libel, but merely mean of the same nature or character. Town of Lexington v. Union Nat. Bank, 22 South. 291, 293, 75 Miss. 1.

LIKE TERRITORY.

A by-law of the Associated Press of New York provided that no member of the association should receive or publish the regular news dispatches of any other news association covering a "like territory" and organized for a like purpose with the Associated Press. The Associated Press of New York obtained news from its own agents only in New York, and from other parts of the world through contracts with other agents. Another association obtained news directly through its own agents from various parts of the world. Held, that the latter association should be deemed to cover a "like territory" within the meaning of those words as used in the by-law. Matthews v. Associated Press, 32 N. E. 981, 138 N. Y. 333, 32 Am. St. Rep. 741.

LIKELIHOOD.

"Likelihood," as used in instructions relative to preponderance of evidence, is not a proper synonym of "probability." Howard v. State, 18 South. 813, 816, 108 Ala. 571.

LIKELY.

"Likely," as used in instructions relative to preponderance of evidence, is not a proper synonym of "probable." Howard v. State, 18 South. 813, 816, 108 Ala. 571.

The word "likely" means "probable," and is equivalent to that word as used in a question to a physician, in an action for personal injuries, as to what, in his opinion, would be the "probable" effects of the wounds on the future health of the injured party. O'Brien v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 13 N. Y. Supp. 805, 59 Hun. 623.

The word "likely" is not synonymous with the word "probable," but has practically the same meaning in a question to a witness as to whether personal injuries are "likely" to be reduced or increased as the injured person grows older. Knoll v. Third Ave. R. Co., 62 N. Y. Supp. 16, 19, 46 App. Div. 527.

A pistol, snapped so many times without being discharged as to strongly warrant, if not actually demand, the inference that it was either incapable of being fired or was not really loaded, is not "a weapon likely to produce death." Meriwether v. State, 30 S. E. 806, 104 Ga. 500.

A statute authorizing the sale of property attached when "likely" to waste or to be destroyed by keeping is subject to two constructions, the strict construction meaning those articles only which are in themselves perishable, and which contain within themselves the elements of their own destruction and decay, as, for instance, ripe fruits, fresh meats, and articles of a similar nature. With this definition applied to the term, it would necessarily comprehend but very few articles of the vast variety of personal estate liable to attachment. The other construction of which the term is susceptible, is that it comprehends all those articles which not only contain in themselves necessarily the elements of decay, but which by being kept by the officer levying upon them would become fruitless to the creditor and by consequence an entire loss of the debtor. This construction agrees with the object and intent of the statute, and would comprehend slaves. Millard's Adm'r's v. Hall, 24 Ala. 209, 210, 230.

In an instruction, in an action for personal injuries, that the jury should consider the nature of the injuries suffered, as to whether they are likely to prove permanent or temporary only, the use of the word "likely" is not objectionable as permitting and encouraging the jury to indulge in conjecture and speculation in determining the extent of the injuries, the definition of "likely" being "In all probability," there being always more or less conjecture as to whether injuries are permanent or temporary; and, while the words "likely" or "In all probability" are not exactly interchangeable or synonymous with the words "reasonably certain," the difference is but slight, and will not warrant a reversal. Union Gold Min. Co. v. Crawford, 69 Pac. 600, 603, 29 Colo. 511.

The phrase "likely to become chargeable," in St. 1821, c. 122, § 15, authorizing the removal of paupers likely to become chargeable on the town, does not apply to persons who may be likely to become chargeable at some future and yet an uncertain time, but authorizes their removal only when the fact that they are likely to become chargeable would not depend upon a contingency, but upon an ascertained necessity. Inhabitants of Cornish v. Inhabitants of Parsonsfield, 22 Me. (9 Shep.) 433, 436.

LIKEWISE.

A will provided that the testator's funeral expenses should be paid, and "likewise" all his just debts, and that certain land was to be set apart as dower for his wife, and "likewise" to have one-half of certain personalty, and that certain persons "in likewise manner" were to have certain tracts of land. The will then reserved certain property from general distribution, part of which was bequeathed to a son, "likewise" certain land, and "likewise" a farm, etc. Construing the various provisions of the will in which the word "likewise" occurs, the word was more probably used to mean "also." This construction is manifest when we look to other parts of the will, in which the words "in likewise manner" are used to convey a different meaning from what the word "also" would convey. State Bank v. Ewing, 17 Ind. 68, 74.

Where by will testator gave to his wife his horses and cattle, with the household furniture, to be wholly and solely at her disposal, "and likewise Sam, Nan and Cuff to be at her disposal for the use and purpose of working and raising the children," by the word "likewise" the testator does not mean that a like disposition is made of the negroes to that which has been made of the horses and cattle, but, having devised the stock and furniture to his wife, he now likewise devises to her the negroes, but to be used for the purpose indicated. King v. Smith, 25 Tenn. (6 Humph.) 55, 57.

LIMEKILN.

As building, see "Building (In Lien Laws)."

A limekiln is a structure fit only for burning lime. Slight v. Gutzlaff, 35 Wis. 675, 678, 17 Am. Rep. 476.

LIMESTONE ROCK.

In a contract for the construction of bridge piers, reciting that the foundation of the same should rest on "limestone rock," that term is synonymous with "solid rock" or "bed rock." Sullivan County v. Ruth, 59 S. W. 138, 140, 106 Tenn. 85.

LIMIT.

See "City Limits"; "Within the Limits."

The words "limit and appoint," in a deed may operate as words of grant so as to pass a reversion. Shove v. Pincke, 5 Term R. 124.

"Limit" means boundary, border, the outer line of a thing, and nothing else, except when used to convey the idea of restraint. Casler v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co., 22 N. Y. 427, 431.

"Change or limit," as used in Laws 1867, p. 165, § 1, providing that a railroad company shall not "change or limit" its common-law liability as a common carrier except by written contract, etc., is used as synonymous with "lessen" or "abridge." Feige v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 28 N. W. 685, 687, 62 Mich. 1.

LIMITATION.

See "Collateral Limitation"; "Conditional Limitation"; "Special Limitation"; "Title by Limitation"; "Words of Limitation."

"A 'limitation' marks the period which determines the estate, without any act on the part of him who has the next expectant interest. On the happening of the prescribed contingency, the estate first limited comes at once to an end, and the subsequent estate arises." Church in Brattle Square v. Grant, 69 Mass. (3 Gray) 142, 147, 63 Am. Dec. 725.

The word "limitation" has two well-known and distinct meanings. In the one, the primary meaning, it signifies the marking out the bounds or limits of the estate created; in the other it signifies simply the creating of an estate. Starnes v. Hill, 16 S. E. 1011, 1016, 112 N. O. 1, 22 L. R. A. 598.

The word "limitation," in its most technical sense, when used in the habendum clause of a deed, is an appropriate term under which to declare the nature and extent of the estate granted, and the uses for which the grant is made. Mills v. Davison, 35 Atl. 1072, 1075, 54 N. J. Eq. 659, 35 L. R. A. 113, 55 Am. St. Rep. 594.

A limitation is conclusive of the time of continuance and of the extent of the estate granted, and beyond which it is declared that its creation is not to be extended and continued. Limitations render an estate void without entry. Smith v. Smith, 23 Wis. 176, 181, 99 Am. Dec. 153.

The word "limitation," as used in Const. art. 8, § 3, providing that the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, which extends to all cases at law and in equity, subject to such limitations and regulations as may be prescribed by law, does not give to the Legislature authority to limit absolutely the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to the extent of cutting off the right of appeal, but merely enables the Legislature to enact reasonable regulations as to the time at which and the mode by which an appeal is to be taken. Finlen v. Heinze, 70 Pac. 517, 27 Mont. 107.

Estate on condition distinguished.

A limitation determines an estate upon the happening of the event itself, without the necessity of doing any act to regain the estate. The distinction between an estate upon condition and the limitation by which an estate is determined upon the happening of some event is that in the latter case the estate reverts to the grantor, or passes to the person by whom it is granted, by limitation over, upon the mere happening of the event upon which it is limited, without any entry or other act. Hoselton v. Hoselton, 65 S. W. 1005, 1006, 166 Mo. 182.

"A condition is to be carefully distinguished from a limitation. It is the character and quality of the estate granted, and not the terms used in their creation, that distinguishes them. The latter requires no entry to determine the estate, but terminates it ipso facto by the happening of the event referred to, while the former is determined only by the re-entry of the grantor or his heirs for the condition broken." Bryan v. Spires (Pa.) 3 Brewst. 580, 583.

The principal difference between a condition and a limitation is that a condition does not defeat the estate, when broken, until it is avoided by the act of the grantor, but a limitation marks the period which is to determine the estate, without entry or claim. Smith v. White, 5 Neb. 405, 407 (citing Stearns v. Godfrey, 16 Me. [4 Shep.] 153, 160).

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

The statute of limitations alters the common law by introducing limitations to the right of actions in mentioned cases. The object of the act is to secure and quiet men in their estates and possessions, and one means of doing so is by obliging creditors to demand their debts within a reasonable time, under the penalty of losing the right of action in case of their neglect to sue within a prescribed time. The debt is not abolished—it is the remedy in the judicial form that is denied—by reason of the creditor's default. Smith v. Mitchell (S. C.) Rice, 316, 319, 33 Am. Dec. 119.

The reasons upon which these statutes are founded, Sir William Blackstone tells us, are: First, because the law will not disturb an actual possession in favor of a claim which has been suffered to lie dormant for a long and unreasonable time; secondly, because it presumes that he who has for a long time had the undisturbed possession of either goods or lands, however wrongfully obtained at first, has either procured a lawful title or made satisfaction to the injured, otherwise he would have been sooner sued; and, thirdly, because it judges that such limitations tend to the prevention of innumerable perjuries, the preservation of the public tranquillity, and, what it values perhaps more than all, the suppression of contention and strife among men. Taking these principles as the basis of their conduct, the courts of justice built up upon them a system extending beyond the letter of the statutes themselves. And the judges extended the principle of the presumption of payment to cases which, though not within the letter, were yet within the reason and spirit, of the law. Buchanan v. Rowland, 5 N. J. Law (2 Southard) 721, 830, 839.

The word "limitation," according to Mr. Angell in his work on Limitations of Actions, is used in reference to the time, which is prescribed by the authority of the law, during which a title may be acquired to property by virtue of a simple adverse possession and enjoyment, or the time at the end of which no action at law or suit in equity can be maintained. Busby v. Florida Cent. & P. R. Co., 23 S. E. 50, 51, 45 S. C. 312; Arraington v. Liscom, 34 Cal. 365, 381, 94 Am. Dec. 722; Reynolds v. Baker, 46 Tenn. (6 Cold.) 221, 228.

The essential attribute of a statute of limitations is that it accords and limits a reasonable time within which a suit may be brought on causes of action which it affects. Keyser v. Lowell (U. S.) 117 Fed. 400, 404, 54 C. C. A. 574.

Statutes of limitations are statutes of repose, intended to put at rest controverted facts, to insure to a degree certainty in testimony by compelling its production. Bettman v. Cowley, 53 Pac. 53, 56, 19 Wash. 207, 40 L. R. A. 815.

Statutes of limitations are acts limiting the time within which actions shall be brought. They are based upon presumptions arising from lapse of time, which may be rebutted by showing an acknowledgment by defendant or proving plaintiff under a disability to sue. Acts regulating proceedings at law, as the time limited for entering an appeal, staying an execution, serving a notice, and the like, and acts regulating the rights of two persons against a third as to preferences between them, though they limit the time within which certain acts may be done, do not come within this definition of "statutes of limitations." They are not acts limiting the time within which actions or proceedings shall be commenced in a court of justice, nor are they based on the presumption arising from the lapse of time. They are for public convenience, and for the purpose of giving to third persons reasonable notice of acts affecting their conduct. Battle v. Shivers, 39 Ga. 405, 409.

"Statutes of limitations are statutes which prescribe a period within which a right may be enforced, afterward withholding a remedy for reasons of private justice and public policy. It would encourage fraud, oppression, and interminable litigation to permit a party to delay a contest until it is probable that papers may be lost, facts forgotten, or witnesses dead." Baker v. Kelley, 11 Minn. 480, 493 (Gil. 358, 371).

The word "limitations," in its ordinary legal and popular sense, refers to the time within which an action may be brought for some act done to preserve a right. In this sense it implies power in the Legislature to enact reasonable provisions fixing a limit to the time within which an appeal to a final judgment may be prosecuted. It refers also to the power of the Legislature to provide for appeals from interlocutory or intermediate orders and decisions, and, in its discretion, to direct that such appeals shall be taken and entertained prior to final judgment, but

It does not extend to the right of appeal from final judgments, or to the power of the court on such appeals. Finlen v. Heinze, 69 Pac. 829, 832, 27 Mont. 107.

"Statutes of limitations relate to the remedies which are furnished in the courts. They establish that certain circumstances shall amount to evidence that a contract has been performed, rather than dispense with its performance." Sturges v. Crowninshield, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 122, 207, 4 L. Ed. 529.

Statutes of limitations are statutes of repose. They are enacted upon the presumption that one having a well-founded claim will not delay enforcing it beyond a reasonable time if he has the power to sue. Such reasonable time is therefore defined and allowed. They rather establish that certain circumstances shall amount to evidence that a contract has been performed, than dispense with its performance. Such statutes must be reasonable, and therefore Laws 1874, c. 623, which provides that no action for personal injuries shall be maintained against a certain village unless the claim has been presented in writing within 30 days after the injuries have been received, is unconstitutional as to one sustaining injuries through the negligence of the village, which injuries prevent the presentation of such claim within the prescribed time, as such requirement deprived him of his right to a remedy without due process of law, as guaranteed by Const. art. 1, §§ 1, 6. "All limitation laws, however," says Judge Cooley (Const. Lim. [6th Ed.] p. 449), "must proceed on the theory that the party, by a lapse of time and omission on his part, has forfeited his right to assert his title in law, and these laws must also proceed on the idea that the party has full opportunity afforded him to try his right in the courts." Williams v. Village of Port Chester, 76 N. Y. Supp. 631, 638, 72 App. Div. 505.

Statutes of limitation are statutes limiting the time in which actions may be brought. "They do not confer any right of action. They are enacted to restrict the period in which the right, otherwise unlimited, may be asserted. They are founded upon the general experiences of mankind that claims which are valid are not usually allowed to remain neglected. The lapse of years without any attempt to enforce a demand creates a presumption against its original validity, or that it has ceased to exist. This presumption is made by these statutes a positive bar, and they thus become statutes of repose, protecting parties from the prosecution of stale claims when, by loss of evidence from death of some witnesses and the imperfect recollection of others, or the destruction of documents, it may be impossible to establish the truth." Riddlesbarger v. Hartford Fire

Ins. Co., 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 388, 390, 19 L. Ed. 257.

A statute granting a right of action for damages, for death caused by wrongful act, which did not exist at common law, and which did not obtain in the absence of the statute which prescribed that such action must commence within a specified time, is a condition imposed upon the exercise of the right of action granted, and is not, properly speaking, a "limitation," as that term is generally used. Rodman v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 70 Pac. 642, 644, 65 Kan. 645, 59 L. R. A. 704.

The statute of limitations does not, after the prescribed period, destroy, discharge, or pay the debt, but it simply bars a remedy thereon. The debt and the obligation to pay the same remain, and the arbitrary bar of the statute alone stands in the way of the creditor seeking to compel payment. Maxwell v. Cottle, 25 N. Y. Supp. 635, 638, 72 Hun, 529.

The word "limitation," in Comp. St. 534, § 24, providing "whenever any payment of principal or interest has been or shall be made upon an existing contract, etc., if such payment be made after the same became due, the limitation shall commence from the time the last payment was made," means the limitation within which an action can be brought on the contract as made originally between the parties. Whitaker v. Rice, 9 Minn. 13, 20 (Gil. 1, 9), 86 Am. Dec. 78.

Equitable actions.

"Formerly, when statutes of limitations applied only to actions at law, courts of equity, proceeding on the analogy of such statutes, would ordinarily refuse relief when the party had slept on his rights for a length of time which would constitute a bar to an action at law on the same cause of action; but with us statutes of limitations apply as well to equitable as to legal actions." Mueller v. Fruen, 38 Minn. 273, 274, 30 N. W. 886.

"It is true that a mere formal plea of the statute of limitations has been said in courts of common law not to be a plea to the merits, but a reliance on the presumption arising from a great lapse of time has never been considered in chancery as a defense of the same rigid character. Limitations must be pleaded or relied on in equity specially, but a presumption founded on a long lapse of time is a defense which has always been allowed to be made out as a matter of substance, and which was not necessary specially to advance." In re Hepburn (Md.) 3 Bland, 95, 106, 110

Extraterritorial operation.

Statutes of limitations are municipal regulations founded on local policy, which have no coercive authority abroad, and with which foreign or independent governments have no concern. Ruggles v. Keeler (N. Y.) 8 Johns. 263, 265, 8 Am. Dec. 482.

As prescription.

According to some writers, the term "prescription" covers both senses in which the word "limitations" has been used; that is to say, as conferring a right and taking away a remedy. In Billings v. Hall, 7 Cal. 1, 4, Chief Justice Murray says: "Statutes of limitations are designed to effect the remedy and not the right of contract. 'Prescription' is defined by civilians to be a right by which a mere possessor acquires the property of a thing which he possesses by the continuance of his possession during the time fixed by law, so that the difference between 'statutes of limitations,' as they are known to the course of common law, and the 'law of prescriptions,' consists in this, that one confers a right and the other takes away a remedy." Alhambra Addition Water Co. v. Richardson, 14 Pac. 379, 381, 72 Cal. 598.

"Prescription" and "limitation" are convertible terms, and a plea of the proper statute of limitations is a good plea of a prescriptive right. Churchill v. Louie, 67 Pac. 1052, 1053, 135 Cal. 608. See, also, Chenot v. Lefevre, 8 Ill. (3 Gilman) 637, 642.

Speaking of the defense of limitation, the court says it is quite immaterial whether this defense is called "limitation," "prescription," or "adverse user." These terms may be used interchangeably, and they mean substantially the same thing. Prescription properly applies to incorporeal easements, and is of the same length of time as limitation by statute, and adverse user is the same. It is not worth while to spend time in distinctions which do not exist. Murray v. Scribner, 43 N. W. 549, 74 Wis. 602.

LIMITATION OVER.

A limitation over includes any estate in the same property, created or contemplated by the conveyance, to be enjoyed after the first estate granted expires or is exhausted. Thus, in a gift to A. for life, remainder to the heirs of his body, the remainder is a limitation over to the heirs of the body. Ewing v. Shropshire, 7 S. E. 554, 556, 80 Ga. 374.

LIMITED.

The word "limited" means narrow, restricted. It is synonymous with the word "circumscribe;" and that word means to inclose within a certain limit, to hem in, to confine, to bound, to limit, to restrict, etc. Cheyney v. Smith (Ariz.) 23 Pac. 680, 685.

The phrase "limited to the following effect," in Comp. Laws 1884, § 2750, providing that the words "bargained and sold," etc., in all conveyances of hereditary real estate, etc., shall be limited to the following effect, etc., means "construed to the following effect." Douglass v. Lewis, 9 Pac. 377, 379, 8 N. M. (Johns.) 345.

Property is limited or qualified when the control which one has over external objects or things falls short of the absolute property, which is appropriation of the thing by one to his own use in exclusion of all others. Griffith v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co., 23 S. C. 25, 38, 55 Am. Rep. 1.

LIMITED BY LAW.

The term "limited by law," when used in a statute, is to be construed as meaning limited by the statute law, and not to mean limited by the general law. Brinckerhoff v. Bostwick, 1 N. E. 663, 665, 99 N. Y. 185.

Rev. St. U. S. 1878, § 1866, which declares that the jurisdiction of justices of the peace, as well as the jurisdiction of other courts referred to, shall be "limited by law," should be construed to mean that justices of the peace shall have jurisdiction to try all causes of action that might arise within the limits fixed by law. It extends their authority to such limits. People v. Douglass, 14 Pac. 801, 802, 5 Utah, 283.

The term "as limited by law," as used in the ninth section of the organic act, conferring upon district courts common-law and chancery jurisdiction, etc., provided that such jurisdiction shall be as limited by law, means that the "mode and manner of proceedings may be controlled and governed by law" (Gallagher v. Basey, 1 Mont. 457, 462); not that the Legislature may enlarge or contract such jurisdiction or that the common-law or chancery jurisdiction can be taken away, or that the right of a territorial district to exercise such jurisdiction can be transferred or disturbed, but that the mode of exercising such jurisdiction may be by law. United States v. Ensign, 2 Mont. 396, 401.

LIMITED FEE.

The term "limited fee," rather than "fee simple," is properly to be used in describing the estate of one who owns a reversion or remainder in realty. Brackett v. Ridlon, 54 Me. 426, 434.

"A limited or qualified fee simple is such as has some collateral matter annexed to it whereby it is made by some means determinable, viz., by limitation or condition." Lott v. Wyckoff (N. Y.) 1 Barb. 565, 575 (quoting Hale, Com. Law, p. 58).

"Limited fees" are (1) qualified or base fees; (2) fees conditional at the common law. A "base fee" was confined to a person as tenant of a particular place; a "conditional fee" was restrained to particular heirs, as to the heirs of a man's body. Paterson v. Ellis' Ex'rs (N. Y.) 11 Wend. 259, 277.

LIMITED INTEREST.

A "limited interest" is a duration less than that of the property. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 692; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3291; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 207; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1113.

LIMITED JURISDICTION.

"Limited jurisdiction," as applied to courts, has been often used instead of the term "special," to distinguish such courts from courts which have general jurisdiction. A court of limited or special jurisdiction is one which has jurisdiction only for a particular purpose, or is clothed with special powers for the performance of specific duties, beyond which they have no manner of authority; and these special powers are to be exercised in a summary way, either by a tribunal already existing for general purposes, or by persons appointed or to be appointed in some definite form. Such tribunals with special powers for adjudicating particular cases are very numerous, such as commissioners, surveyors, appraisers, committees, overseers, and the like, but they relate only in a small degree to the general administration of justice. Obert v. Hammel, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 73, 78.

The jurisdiction of a court of limited jurisdiction must be proved when the acts and judgments of such court are relied upon as giving a right or furnishing a defense. People v. Liscomb, 60 N. Y. 559, 568, 569, 19 Am. Rep. 211.

LIMITED PARTNERSHIP.

Limited partnerships were unknown to the common law, but in some countries of Europe have existed for hundreds of years. In Italy they were known and recognized in the laws of Pisa and Florence as early as 1166, in Geneva in 1562, in France in 1253, also under Louis the Tenth in 1315, and still continue under the republic. In England, it is said that limited partnerships only exist as joint-stock companies. They seem to have been devised to enable persons to engage in mercantile business without being known or named, and became the most frequent combinations of trade, and in a large degree contributed to the commercial prosperity which the above countries afterwards enjoyed. In our own state there was enacted a statute authorizing limited partnerships in the year 1822, being substantially a copy from the French act, and since that time similar laws have been adopted in most of the other states and territories which have patterned their statutes after that of New York. Moorhead v. Seymour, 77 N. Y. Supp. 1050, 1054.

The term "limited partnerships" is commonly used to designate partnerships which extend to a single transaction or adventure only, such as the purchase or sale of a particular parcel of goods. Bigelow v. Elliot (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 349, 351.

A partnership, general and unlimited so far as the liability of the partners to third persons are concerned, and limited only, as nearly all partnerships are, in respect to the nature and scope of the business to be carried on, is not a "limited partnership." Such a partnership is one in which one or more of the partners are so in the usual way in respect to power, property, and obligation, and one or more of them have placed a certain sum in the business and may lose that, but are not liable further. Taylor v. Webster, 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 102, 104.

LIMITED PUBLICATION.

"A limited publication" of a literary composition is the act of communicating the knowledge of the contents to a select few, upon conditions expressly or impliedly limiting its rightful ulterior communication except in restricted private intercourse. Keene v. Wheatley (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 180, 199.

LIMITED TICKET.

The term "limited ticket," as applied to railroad tickets, may be one the use of which is limited, as by requiring a continuous journey to be made by the holder of the ticket. United States v. Egan (U. S.) 47 Fed. 112, 116.

LINE.

See "Telephone Line."

A testator who, intending to devise part of his farm, begins at one of the corners of it and says, "thence as the line runs," is to be understood to mean the line of the farm, whether it be straight or crooked. A crooked line is a line just as much as a straight one. We say the line of a state, a county, a coast, or of the seashore, though it have a great many bendings; and, with equal propriety, a line of a fence, a road, or a farm. Cubberly v. Cubberly, 12 N. J. Law (7 Halst.) 308, 315.

"Line," as used in 18 and 19 Vict. c. 120, § 143, providing that no building shall be erected beyond "the regular line of buildings in the street in which the same is situate," does not mean a strict mathematical line, but means substantially such a line as shall preserve uniformity of appearance. Tear v. Freebody, 4 C. B. (N. S.) 228, 263.

As boundary.

We say the line of a state, a county or coast, or a seashore, though it may have a great many bendings and inflections, and with equal propriety the line of a fence, a road, or a farm; so when a testator, intending to devise part of his farm, begins at one of its corners and says, "thence as the line runs," we understand by it the line of the farm, whether it be straight or crooked. Cubberly v. Cubberly, 12 N. J. Law (7 Halst.) 308, 314.

A "line," within the meaning of a will directing that the testator's property shall be divided between his sons, and that the division line shall be run between the house and the barn, must be construed to mean a straight line, if it is practicable to make the partition in such a manner. Brown v. Brown (Pa.) 6 Watts, 54, 55.

As heirs.

In a will giving a plantation, after a life estate in another, to the next male heir nearest in kindred and relation to testator according to law, and so on in succession "on that line," the expression "on that line" does not necessarily mean that the estate shall go to the heirs of the body of the devisee in remainder, nor the male issue of the devisee, but simply to his heirs, as contradistinguishing from the heirs of the tenant of the life estate previously given; for to create an estate tail by construction, it would have to be done, not only without words of procreation, but without any words which could supply their place. McIntyre v. Ramsey, 23 Pa. (11 Harris) 317, 320.

In printing.

The word "line" is not a technical term, but one in common use, and having in common usage, when applied to printed matter, a well-known signification. It then means a row of words, letters, or figures printed across a page or column, without regard to the size of the type. Such is its meaning as used in Act April 14, 1891 (2 Gen. St. p. 2325), fixing the rate of legal advertising at a certain sum per line. Sheehy v. City of Hoboken, 40 Atl. 626, 627, 62 N. J. Law, 184.

In surveying.

"A 'line,' in surveying and dividing grounds, means, prima facie, a mathematical line, without breadth; yet this theoretic idea of a line may be explained by the facts referred to, and connected with the division, to mean a wall, a ditch, a crooked fence, or a hedge—a line having breadth." As used in a deed of partition of two lots, reciting that the parties had made a "line" through the lot, running with a certain entry across the lot, the term was construed, not to mean an alley, but to mean a mathematical line, as the parties could have expressly stated that they intended an alley, if such was their intention. Baker v. Talbott, 22 Ky. (6 T. B. Mon.) 179, 182.

LINE OF CREDIT.

In a contract guarantying the account of a merchant for a line of credit to a certain amount, the term "line of credit" has a fixed and definite meaning in the mercantile world, and means a margin of credit, enabling one to continue buying so long as he keeps his account within the limit by payments. Shneider-Davis Co. v. Hart, 57 S. W. 903, 904, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 529.

In a contract by which a wholesale dealer agreed to extend a line of credit of $5,000 to a retailer, and another party became surety for the payment of all goods purchased by the retailer, the expression "line of credit" did not have the effect of limiting the surety's liability to the sum of $5,000. Isadore Bush Wine & Liquor Co. v. Wolff, 19 South. 765, 766, 48 La. Ann. 918.

Defendant contracted with plaintiff to sell its machines and make monthly settlements "with cash or by note at 4 months," and that "on such basis" of settlement he should have "any reasonable line of credit." Held, that the phrase "line of credit" meant the amount of goods to be furnished on credit, and did not modify the provision that the notes should be made payable at 4 months. American Button-Hole, Overseaming & Sewing Mach. Co. v. Gurnee, 44 Wis. 49, 62.

LINE OF DUTY.

Attorney General Cushing in 1855, in discussing Rev. St. 4693, 4694, providing that a soldier who is disabled while in the service of the United States, and in the line of his duty, shall be entitled to a pension, characterized the phrase "line of duty" as an apt one to denote that an act of duty performed must have relation of causation, mediate or immediate, to the wound, the casualty, the injury, or the disease producing disability or death. Rhodes v. United States (U. S.) 79 Fed. 740, 743, 25 C. C. A. 186 (citing 7 Op. Atty. Gen. 149, 161; 17 Op. Atty. Gen. 172).

"Line of duty," as used in a statement that an act of a brakeman was in the line of duty, is synonymous with the words "in the discharge of duty" Allen v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co., 11 N. W. 614, 616, 57 Iowa, 623.

LINE OF NAVIGATION.

The state of Kentucky improved the Green and Barren rivers by means of locks and dams, but by Act March 9, 1868, the legislature incorporated the G. & B. R. N. Co., and leased to it the G. and B. "river line of navigation," together with the grounds, tools, and machinery, etc., appurtenant thereto, requiring it to keep "said line of navigation in good repair," and to permit boats to navigate the rivers on payment of a certain toll. Held, that the locks, dams, and other improvements were what constituted the line of navigation, and that the grant of a license to a railroad company to build bridges so as not unreasonably to obstruct navigation does not impair the rights of the navigation company under the lease. Green & B. R. Nav. Co. v. Chesapeake, O. & S. W. R. Co., 10 S. W. 6, 88 Ky. 1, 2 L. R. A. 540.

LINE OF RAILROAD.

"Line of the railroad," as used in a city ordinance granting a railroad company the right to build its road in a street, and providing that the company should grade the street, and that the "line of the railroad" should be located so as not to approach the sidewalk curbstone nearer than 15 feet, does not mean the extreme limit, including ties and grade, or the center or thread of the track, but refers to the rails on which the cars run. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. v. Eisert, 26 N. E. 759, 761, 127 Ind. 156.

In a proceeding by mandamus to compel a railroad company to deliver at the elevator or grain warehouse of the relator, in the city of Chicago, whatever grain in bulk might be consigned to it upon the "line" of their road, it appeared that the company entered the city from different points upon separate tracks, these separate tracks or lines of road being called "divisions." The elevator was situated upon a track used by the company in connection with the business of one of those divisions exclusively, but could be reached from the other division, though by a very indirect route, and subjecting the company to great loss of time and pecuniary damages in the delay that would be caused to their regular trains and business on the latter division. It was held that the roads constituting these different divisions, though belonging to the same corporation and having a common name, were, for the purposes of transportation, substantially different roads, constructed under different charters; and, the track upon which the elevator in question was situated having been laid for the convenience especially of one of those divisions, and only approachable from the other under the difficulties mentioned, it could not be regarded that the elevator was upon the line of the latter division in any such sense as to make it obligatory upon the company to deliver thereat freight coming over that division. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. People, 56 Ill. 365, 8 Am. Rep. 690.

Where a fire policy issued to a railroad corporation was "on their road furniture, consisting of locomotive engines, cars of all descriptions, and snow plows on the line of their road and in actual use but not in machine or repair shops," the phrase "line of road" did not confine the policy to cars while on the particular road, in distinction from any spurs used in connection therewith, and included cars in the ordinary course of business on a track connected with the road, though not owned or controlled by the corporation. Fitchburg R. Co. v. Charlestown Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 73 Mass. (7 Gray) 64, 66.

As right of way.

"Line," as used in Act March 17, 1869, authorizing any railroad to widen, enlarge, and improve its line of railroad, means what is commonly called the "right of way," and not the track. Western New York & P. Ry. Co. v. Buffalo, R. & P. Ry. Co., 44 Atl. 242, 244, 193 Pa. 127.

The term "line of road," standing alone, used in relation to a railroad, may be sufficiently comprehensive to include spurs, yards, and side tracks; but when it is followed by the specification of "spurs, yards, and side tracks," the words will be held as referring to a line of road, as contradistinguished from spurs, yards, and side tracks. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. McNeill (U. S.) 89 Fed. 131, 137, 32 C. C. A. 173.

"On the line of a railroad," as used in a deed describing the land as lying "on the line of a certain railroad," means next to or bounded by the railroad. The line of a road must mean, as used in the contract, the boundary of the land appropriated for its use. Burnam v. Banks, 45 Mo. 349, 350.

In a statute (Rev. St. §§ 4358, 4359) providing that railroads shall be liable for damages caused by disease being communicated from diseased cattle, in course of transportation, to other cattle in the neighborhood or along the line of such transportation, the word "line" means the right of way of the railway company, and "along the line of the road" means in a line with it, by the side of it, near to it. Coyle v. Chicago & A. R. Co., 27 Mo. App. 584, 593.

LINE OF THE ROAD.

"Line," as used in a description of land, conveyed by deed, as commencing at a certain point south of a road, thence running westerly along the line of said road, means center line of the road, for there is no other line of the road. The sides of the road are quite different from the line of the road. Helmer v. Castle, 109 Ill. 664, 672.

A grant of land described as bounded "by the line of," or "by the margin of," or "by the side of" a highway, excludes the soil of the highway. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Gould, 8 Atl. 754, 756, 67 Md. 60.

"Line," as used in a deed describing the tract of land as beginning at a certain corner, then running in the east line of a certain street, and further on in the same course a certain number of feet to the line of a certain street, thence in line with such street, means the exterior limits, and not the middle of the street. Hamlin v. Pairpoint Mfg. Co., 6 N. E. 531, 532, 141 Mass. 51.

Where the words "line of the road" are used in a deed to describe a boundary of the land, commencing at the corner formed by the intersecting of the road with another road, the land conveyed only extends to the edge of the road, and not to the center. In Smith v. Slocomb, 75 Mass. (9 Gray) 36-38, 69 Am. Dec. 274, the court held the conclusion to be inevitable that the road is excluded when the boundary starts at the side of the road and comes back to the road. In Sibley v. Holden, 27 Mass. (10 Pick.) 249, 20 Am. Dec. 521, the court arrives at a similar conclusion. Mead v. Riley, 50 N. Y. Super. Ct. (13 Jones & S.) 20, 25.

The use of the words "line of the street," to describe a boundary line commencing at the junction of two streets, operates to fix the boundary of the lot at the side line of the street, and not the center line. Hughes v. Providence & W. R. Co., 2 R. I. 508, 512.

Where the words "south line of the road" is used to designate a boundary of land which is described as lying north of the road, the land will be construed to include the entire road. Williams v. Sparks, 24 Ohio St. 141, 142.

LINE OF STEAMERS.

"Line," as used in an agreement by a party that during a certain year all steamers belonging to his line at New York or Brooklyn should be sent to a certain pier, should be construed to include a vessel belonging to such party which was under contract of affreightment to a London firm, the captain, crew, and ship being, however, under the control and direction of the owner. Elwell v. Fabre, 13 N. Y. Supp. 829, 830.

LINE OF TUNNEL.

"Line," as a term of surveying, is that which has length without breadth, but as used in Act Cong. May 10, 1872, providing that, when any tunnel is run for the development of a vein or lode or for the discovery of mines, the owners shall have the right of possession of all veins or lodes, not previously known to exist within 3,000 feet from the face of such tunnel on the line thereof, the word has reference to the subject it intends to describe, and designates the width marked by the exterior lines or sides of the tunnel. The "line" of the tunnel does not mean the entire width and length of the surveyed site, nor does the act provide for or authorize a tunnel site survey and location 1,500 feet in width. Corning Tunnel Co. v. Pell, 4 Colo. 507, 511.

"Line of the tunnel," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 2323 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1426], allowing persons who are engaged in exploring for precious metals by means of tunnels, the right of possession of all veins or lodes along the line of the tunnel for 3,000 feet from its face, and not previously known to exist, designates the width marked by the exterior lines or sides of the tunnel. The line of the tunnel is the width of the tunnel excavation, and no more or less. Hope Mining Co. v. Brown, 19 Pac. 218, 220, 6 Mont. 550.

Under Rev. St. U. S. § 2323 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1426], providing that one running a tunnel for the development or discovery of mines shall have "the right of possession of all veins or lodes within 3,000 feet from the face of the tunnel on the line thereof; secondly, that locations on the line of such tunnel, of veins or lodes not appearing on the surface, made by other parties at the commencement of the tunnel etc., shall be invalid"—after the location of a tunnel claim a person discovering, within the surface boundaries thereof, a lode which crosses the line of the tunnel, will be restrained from prosecuting proceedings for a patent while the tunnel is duly worked, and until it is demonstrated that the lode will not be discovered in the tunnel. Disapproving Corning Tunnel Co. v. Pell, 4 Colo. 507, 508, holding that the "line of the tunnel," as used in the statute, "designates a width marked by the exterior lines or sides of the tunnel." Hope Min. Co. v. Brown, 11 Mont. 370, 379, 380, 28 Pac. 732, 734.

LINE TREES.

By "line trees" is to be understood not trees marked and set apart by the parties as evidence or monuments of the division line, but trees deriving their nourishment from roots extending on both sides of the line, and with bodies so directly over the line, and necessarily on both sides of that line, that it could not be determined upon which side of the line the tree was planted. Dubois v. Beaver, 25 N. Y. 123, 126, 82 Am. Dec. 326.

LINEAGE.

The word "lineage," as used in a will giving certain property to testator's daughter and her "lineage," should be construed to mean heirs, and as simply a word of limitation. "Lineage" is not a legal term, but means, according to Webster's Dictionary, race, progeny, descendants in a line from a common progenitor. Lockett v. Lockett, 22 S. W. 224, 94 Ky. 289.

LINEAL

The term "lineal descents" is used to designate descents from father to son, or grandfather to grandson, etc., as distinguished from "collateral descents," as from brother to brother, cousin to cousin, etc. Levy v. McCartee, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 102, 112, 8 L. Ed. 334.

LINEAL CONSANGUINITY.

A series of degrees between persons who descend from one another is called direct or lineal consanguinity. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1390; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1856.

Lineal consanguinity is that relation which exists among persons where one is descended from the other, as between the son and the father, or the grandfather, and so upward in the ascending line, and between the father and the son, or the grandson, and so downward in a direct descending line. Willis Coal & Min. Co. v. Grizzell, 65 N. E. 74, 76, 198 Ill. 313 (quoting Bouv. Law Dict.).

Lineal consanguinity is the relation which subsists between persons of whom one is descended in a direct line from the other. McDowell v. Addams, 45 Pa. (9 Wright) 430, 432.

LINEAL DESCENDANTS.

"Lineal descendants," in Laws 1885, c. 483, imposing a tax on inheritances to persons through father, mother, husband, wife, children, brother, and sister, and lineal descendants born in lawful wedlock, extends only to those who occupy that relation toward the testator, intestate, or person making the transfer described in the statute. In re Smith (N. Y.) 5 Dem. Sur. 90, 91.

The term "lineal descendants," as used in a statute which imposes a tax upon all property which passes by will or by the intestate laws of the state to any person other than to the lineal descendants born in lawful wedlock, and certain others specified in the statute, includes only the direct descendants of the testator or intestate, and does not include children of brothers and sisters of the deceased. In re Miller, 45 Hun, 244, 246.

Laws 1855, c. 483, provides in the first section that all property, or the income thereof, given by will to corporations or persons other than "to or for the use of father, mother, husband, wife * * * and lineal descendants," and the wife or widow of a son and the husband of a daughter, shall be subject to a tax of 5 per cent. on the market value. Held, that the phrase "lineal descendants" included only those who were lineal descendants of the testator or intestate. In re Jones (N. Y.) 19 Abb. N. C. 221, 224.

Testator by will bequeathed to a sister, and at her death to her child, children, or other "lineal descendants," any money and other property, real or personal, which he possessed, etc. Held, that the words "child" and "children" were used in the sense of heirs of his sister's body, and, this being so, the term "other lineal descendants" could mean none other than the issue of her body, indicating indefinite issue, and the estate would, under the expression "lineal descendants," have gone to grandchildren and great-grandchildren, thus clearly defining the nature of the estate intended to be given to the successors of his sister as one which the testator meant they should take by descent from her. The words "other lineal descendants" so qualified the previous words "child" and "children," which would otherwise be words of purchase, as to make them words of limitation. Mason v. Ammon, 11 Atl. 449, 450, 117 Pa. 127.

As issue.

In Rev. St. c. 74, § 10, providing that a devise shall not lapse when the devisee is a relative of the testator and died before him, leaving "lineal descendants," who take by substitution, the term "lineal descendants" cannot be construed to include the devisee's mother, "lineal descendants" being synonymous with "issue." Morse v. Hayden, 19 Atl. 443, 444, 82 Me. 227.

Adopted child.

"Lineal descendant," as used in Rev. St. c. 74, § 10, providing that lineal descendants shall take from their ancestor, etc., includes a legally adopted child. Warren v. Prescott, 24 Atl. 948, 949, 84 Me. 483, 17 L. R. A. 435, 30 Am. St. Rep. 370.

LINEAL HEIRS OF THE BODY.

The phrase "lineal heirs of her body," in a will in which testator devises land to his daughter, her heirs and assigns, forever, providing that she dies leaving "lineal heirs of her body," means all lineal descendants, and therefore the will operates to create an estate tail, and not an executory devise. Holden v. Wells, 31 Atl. 265, 266, 18 R. I. 802.

LINEN.

As merchandise, see "Merchandise."

A bequest of "all my clothes and linen whatsoever" passes body linen only. The connecting of the word "linen" with "clothes" showed that such was the intention. Hunt v. Hort, 3 Brown, Ch. 312.

"Linen," in the dictionary, is described as a thread or cloth made of flax or hemp. From linen cloth are made hemstitched pocket handkerchiefs. Testimony merely to the fact that these handkerchiefs are never bought and sold in the trade by any other name than "hemstitched pocket handkerchiefs," and that they are never known in the trade as "linen," would not take these goods out of the class of linens, unless it is also shown that the word "linen" has been distorted from its actual meaning, and is by the trade used solely in a restricted sense as covering only goods other than handkerchiefs. Clafin v. Robertson (U. S.) 38 Fed. 92, 93.

"Linens or a manufacture of flax," as used in Tariff Act Aug. 30, 1842, 5 Stat. 549, imposing a duty of 25 per cent. on linens or a manufacture of flax, would include linen pocket handkerchiefs hemstitched or hemmed. Richardson v. Lawrence (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 717, 718.

LINK.

An instruction, in a criminal prosecution, that the rule requiring the jury to be satisfied of the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt in order to warrant a conviction does not require that the jury should be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of each "link" in the chain of circumstances relied upon to establish defendant's guilt, may refer only to evidentiary facts which might add force or weight to other facts from which the inference of guilt could be drawn, in which case the instruction might be said to be correct; or it may mean such criminatory facts as of themselves form the chain of evidence from which the inference of guilt is to be drawn, in which case it would not state the law correctly. No chain can be stronger than its weakest link; if the link is gone, it is no longer a chain. Marion v. State, 20 N. W. 239, 294, 16 Neb. 349.

LINOLEUM.

Linoleum is a preparation of linseed oil and ground cork, intimately mixed and spread in a uniform layer over a sheet of rough jute canvas, and is often used for floor cloth. A sole of a bathing shoe made of linoleum is not an infringement of a cork sole treated with rubber cement. S. Rauh & Co. v. Guinzburg (U. S.) 95 Fed. 151, 152.

The term "linoleum" signifies solidified oil, and appropriately describes an article made of such a composition and used as a floor covering, as oilcloth. Linoleum Mfg. Co. v. Nairn, 7 Ch. Div. 834, 836.

LINOTYPE.

As machinery, see "Machinery."

LIQUEUR.

The cordial known as "Chartreuse," imported from France, is a liqueur, and included in the provision for a reduced rate of duty on brandy and other spirits in the commercial agreement with France, May 30, 1898. Nicholas v. United States (U. S.) 122 Fed. 892, 893.

The term "liqueur," in French, corresponds with the English word "cordial," and is defined to be a liquor composed of alcohol, water, sugar, and different aromatic substances. United States v. Three Hundred Casks of Juniper Cordial (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 141.

LIQUIDATE.

"To 'liquidate' is to settle, to adjust, to ascertain, reduce to precision in amount." Midgett v. Watson, 29 N. C. 143, 145.

To liquidate an account "is to ascertain the balance due, to whom due, and to whom payable." Midgett v. Watson, 29 N. C. 143, 145.

"'Liquidate' is said to be a term of jurisprudence, finance, and of commerce; the action by which one determines or fixes that which has been indeterminate in every species of accounts; liquidation of expenses, of interest, of accounts; liquidation of profits; liquidation and partition of a succession. He labors for a liquidation of his debts, of his effects, of his accounts." Dictionary of the French Academy. It is defined by Webster as "to pay; settle; adjust and satisfy." When applied to a bill or note or bill of exchange it means a payment in satisfaction thereof, and when applied to open accounts it means settlement and adjustment of the accounts by which the amount due is to be ascertained by mutual examination by the parties interested. Martin v. Kirk, 21 Tenn. (2 Humph.) 529, 531.

"Liquidate" means not merely the ascertainment of the amount of a debt, but in common parlance signifies its payment or satisfaction. Fleckner v. Bank of United States, 21 U. S. (8 Wheat.) 338, 362, 5 L. Ed. 631.

"Liquidate" means to clear away—to lessen—debts; and in common parlance, especially among merchants, to "liquidate" a balance means to pay it. Austin v. Tecumseh Nat. Bank, 68 N. W. 628, 629, 49 Neb. 412, 35 L. R. A. 444, 59 Am. St. Rep. 543.

The term "settle up and liquidate," as used in a bond conditioned that, if the said J. shall settle up and liquidate all the just claims against the firm of J. & Co., then the obligation shall be void, is equivalent to the word "pay," and imposes the obligation to "pay" all the debts of the firm. Wilson

v. Stillwell, 9 Ohio St. 467, 469, 75 Am. Dec. 477.

LIQUIDATED.

Arranged synonymous, see "Arrange."

"Bouvier says 'liquidated' is that which is made clear, manifest, as 'liquidated damages,' ascertained damages; 'liquidated debts,' ascertained debts, as to amount." Roberts v. Prior, 20 Ga. 561, 562.

A claim is "liquidated" when the amount due is fixed by law, or has been ascertained and agreed upon by the parties. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Mills (Colo.) 69 Pac. 317, 318; Commercial Union Assur. Co. v. Meyer, 29 S. W. 93, 97, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 7; Jones v. Hunt, 12 S. W. 832, 833, 74 Tex. 657; Mitchell v. Addison, 20 Ga. 50, 53; Hargroves v. Cooke, 15 Ga. 321, 332; Kennedy v. Queens County, 62 N. Y. Supp. 276, 283, 47 App. Div. 250; Kercheval v. Doty, 31 Wis. 476, 485; Treat v. Price, 66 N. W. 834, 836, 47 Neb. 875. Such is the meaning of the word in Rev. St. art. 2971, providing that a fire insurance policy covering real property shall in case of total loss be considered a liquidated demand against the company for the full amount thereof. Continental Ins. Co. v. Chase, 33 S. W. 602, 603; Kennedy v. Queens County, 62 N. Y. Supp. 276, 283, 47 App. Div. 250.

"Liquidated account" means that the amount due has been ascertained and fixed either by the acts and agreements of the parties or by operation of law, or a sum which cannot be varied by proof, and the term does not necessarily refer to a writing. Nisbet v. Lawson, 1 Ga. (1 Kelly) 275, 287; Anderson v. State, 2 Ga. (2 Kelly) 370, 374.

A debt is "liquidated" when it appears that something, and how much, is due. Ditman v. Hotz (La.) 9 Mart. (O. S.) 200, 203; Kennedy v. Queens County, 62 N. Y. Supp. 276, 283, 47 App. Div. 250.

A claim is "liquidated" only when the amount of it has been determined, or the data settled upon by which the amount can be calculated. Charnley v. Sibley, 73 Fed. 980, 982, 20 C. C. A. 157; Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co. v. Clark, 92 Fed. 968, 985, 35 C. C. A. 120.

A claim for damages founded on a tort or breach of covenant is not a "liquidated claim." Worley v. Smith, 63 S. W. 903, 904, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 270.

The commonest example of a liquidated demand is an action of debt where there is an express contract to pay the sum certain at a fixed time. Thus, where a contract provides a minimum amount for which one party may be liable, such minimum amount is certain, and constitutes a liquidated demand. Kennedy v. Queens County, 62 N. Y. Supp. 276, 283, 47 App. Div. 250.

The word "liquidated," in the sense of the rule that payment of a lesser sum is a discharge as to the remainder where the amount in dispute is unliquidated, but that it is not a discharge when it is liquidated, means that the amount due has been ascertained and agreed on by the parties or fixed by operation of law. The rule does not apply where there is a bona fide dispute as to the amount actually due. Treat v. Price, 66 N. W. 834, 836, 47 Neb. 875.

A demand is not liquidated, even if it appears that something is due, unless it appears how much is due; and when it is admitted that one of two specific sums is due, but there is a general dispute as to which is the proper amount, the demand is regarded as "unliquidated" within the meaning of that term as applied to the subject of accord and satisfaction. Lestienne v. Ernst, 39 N. Y. Supp. 199, 200, 5 App. Div. 373 (citing Nassoly v. Tomlinson, 148 N. Y. 326, 331, 42 N. E. 715); Ives v. Jefferson County Sup'rs, 18 Wis. 166, 168; Clark v. Dutton, 69 Ill. 521, 523; Greenlee v. Mosnat, 90 N. W. 338, 339, 116 Iowa, 535 (citing Nassoly v. Tomlinson, 148 N. Y. 326, 42 N. E. 715).

A claim is not liquidated when the balance due is fairly disputed. Plaintiff's claim is therefore an unliquidated one, so as to be the subject of a compromise, though the dispute is only as to whether damages to the fire and sprinkling plugs was caused by it, where it did street sprinkling for defendant city under a contract that it should receive a certain amount therefor, but that from such sum there should be deducted any damages to the fire and sprinkling plugs caused by it. H. C. Pollman & Bros. Coal & Sprinkling Co. v. City of St. Louis, 47 S. W. 563, 564, 145 Mo. 651.

Where there is a controversy over a set-off, and the balance due the plaintiff is fairly in dispute, the claim cannot be treated as liquidated, although the items of the plaintiff's claim are not disputed. Ostrander v. Scott, 43 N. E. 1089, 1091, 161 Ill. 339.

"An account is to be considered as liquidated after a demand of payment, with knowledge of what is claimed upon the part of the debtor, and without objection by him; or after it has been rendered to him without objection to it on his part within a reasonable time." Henderson Cotton Mfg. Co. v. Lowell Mach. Shops, 7 S. W. 142, 145, 86 Ky. 668.

"Liquidated," as used in Code, § 447, providing that debts which in the aggregate amount to more than justices' courts have jurisdiction of may be divided into liquidated demands so as to bring each within such jurisdiction, "is equivalent to 'settlement,' 'arrangement,' 'acknowledgment,' 'agreement to clear from obscurity,' etc., with each of which it is synonymous." Parris v. Hightower, 76 Ga. 631, 634.

"Liquidated" is used in different senses, but as used in a referee's finding of fact stating that, of two sums representing the aggregates of various business transactions between the parties, one was as much liquidated as the other, means certain as to what and how much is due; made certain by an agreement of the parties or by operation of law. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Clark, 20 Sup. Ct. 924, 931, 178 U. S. 353, 44 L. Ed. 1099.

Where counsel were employed by parol contract at a gross sum to defend accused, and he died before all the contemplated services were rendered, and there was no abandonment of the case on the part of the attorneys, one-half of the stipulated fee was a "liquidated demand" against the client's estate, under Code, § 406, providing that one-half of the fee of an attorney, unless otherwise stipulated, is a retainer and due at once. McNulty v. Pruden, 62 Ga. 135, 136.

"Liquidated," when stamped by a collector of customs on the entry of goods at a custom house, meant that the entry had been passed regularly through the various divisions of the collector's office, and the duties thereon had been finally ascertained and fixed by the custom officials. Merritt v. Cameron, 11 Sup. Ct. 174, 175, 137 U. S. 542, 34 L. Ed. 772.

LIQUIDATED BY LITIGATION.

The claim of a surety for a bankrupt is not "liquidated by litigation," within the meaning of Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 57n, 30 Stat. 561 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 344], so as to entitle it to be proved after the expiration of the year fixed for proving claims, because of litigation between the principal creditor and the surety to determine the latter's liability, where the amount was not in controversy. In re E. O. Thompson's Sons (U. S.) 123 Fed. 174, 176.

LIQUIDATED DAMAGES.

Liquidated damages in a contract mean the payment of a certain and reasonable sum of money which should operate to extinguish any claim of plaintiff's for damages by reason of the breach of the contract by defendants. Rosenquist v. Canary, 45 N. Y. Supp. 342, 343, 20 Misc. Rep. 46.

When it is provided in a contract that on a breach thereof a certain sum shall be payable to the other party as "liquidated damages," the phrase means a positive debt, excluding evidence of actual damage. Beale

v. Hayes, 7 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Sandf.) 640, 644.

Liquidated damages is a sum agreed to be paid by the party in default where the damages which may result from the non-performance of a contract are uncertain, and cannot be admeasured with any degree of accuracy, or where a party stipulates to perform work by a definite time, and upon default to pay so much, weekly or monthly, if the sum is not so unreasonably large as to induce the belief that the parties never contemplated its payment. Watts' Ex'rs v. Sheppard, 2 Ala. 425, 445.

Where it is agreed that if a party shall do a particular thing a stipulated sum shall be paid by him, the sum stated may be treated as liquidated damages. As, for example, where a bond was conditioned that the obligor should not practice medicine within a certain distance from the location of the physician to whom he had sold his business, and in case he did so that he should pay $500 for every month he so practiced, the sum stated is properly treated as liquidated damages. Smith v. Smith, 4 Wend. 468, 470. See, also, Heatwole v. Gorrell, 12 Pac. 135, 137, 35 Kan. 692; Tobler v. Austin, 53 S. W. 706, 707, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 99.

Attorney's fees.

"Liquidated damages," as used in a mortgage containing a stipulation that the mortgagor should not only pay the debts secured by the mortgage and the interest thereon, but also $50 as "liquidated damages" in case of foreclosure, will not be construed to mean attorney's fees, and hence a judgment for $50 attorney's fees is invalid. Roote v. Sprague, 13 Kan. 155, 160.

Construction of contracts.

In determining whether a sum stipulated to be paid upon default of a contract is a penalty or liquidated damages, the court will always seek to ascertain the true and real intention of the contracting parties, giving due weight to the language or words used in the contract, but not always being absolutely controlled by them when the enforcement of such contract operates with unconscionable hardship, or otherwise works an injustice. The mere denomination of the sum to be paid as "liquidated damages" or as "a penalty" is not conclusive on the court as to its real character. Although designated as "liquidated damages," it may be construed as a penalty, and often when called a "penalty" it may be held to be liquidated damages, where the intention to the contrary is plain. The courts are disposed to lean against any interpretation of a contract which will make it liquidated damages, and in all cases of doubtful intention will pronounce the stipulated sum a penalty. Where the payment of a smaller sum is secured by an obligation to pay a larger sum, it will be held a penalty, and not liquidated damages. Where the agreement is for the performance or nonperformance of a single act, or of several acts, or of several things which are but minor parts of a single complex act, and the precise damage resulting from the violation of each covenant is wholly uncertain or incapable of being ascertained save by conjecture, the parties may agree on a fixed sum as liquidated damages, and the courts will so construe it, unless it is clear on other grounds that a penalty was really intended. When the contract provides for the performance of several acts of different degrees of importance, and the damages resulting from the violation of some, although not all, of the provisions are of easy ascertainment, and one large gross sum is stipulated to be paid for the breach of any, it will be construed a penalty, and not as liquidated damages. When the agreement provides for the performance of one or more acts, and the stipulation is to pay the same gross sum for a partial as for a total or complete breach of performance, the sum will be construed to be a penalty. Whether the sum agreed to be paid is out of proportion to the actual damages, which will probably be sustained by a breach, is a fact into which the court will not enter on inquiry, if the intent is otherwise made clear that liquidated damages, and not a penalty, is in contemplation. Where the agreement is in the alternative to do one of two acts, but is to pay a larger sum of money in the one event than in the other, the obligor having his election to do either, the amount thus agreed to be paid will be held liquidated damages, and not a penalty. In applying these rules, the controlling purpose of which is to ascertain the real intention of the parties, the court will consider the nature of the contract, the terms of the whole instrument, the consequences naturally resulting from a breach of its stipulations, and the peculiar circumstances surrounding the transaction; thus permitting each case to stand, as far as possible, on its own merits and peculiarities. These rules are believed to be sustained by the preponderance of judicial decision. Plaintiff was employed by defendant's testator as a business manager, having been his partner. He had sold to him his entire interest, but remained ostensibly a partner. A written agreement imposed on plaintiff the obligation "to wholly abstain from the use of intoxicating liquors," and "to continue and remain sober," giving his attention to the business, and promising, in the event he should become intoxicated, that he would pay, "as liquidated damages," the sum of $1,000, which the testator was authorized to retain out of a debt he owed plaintiff. Plaintiff became intoxicated, and remained so for a long time, injuring thereby the business. Held, that the sum agreed to be paid was liquidated damages, and not a penalty. Keeble v. Keeble, 5 South. 149, 85 Ala. 552.

Stipulations for liquidated damages are generally for amounts in excess of the actual damage, and in such cases work a hardship upon the party in default. In consequence courts are strongly inclined to treat all agreements to pay a lump sum in case of failure to perform the contract as a mere penalty, and in all doubtful cases to allow a recovery only for actual damages. This is even so where the contract expressly names the sum as liquidated damages, if the damages are such as can be ascertained with reasonable certainty according to the terms of law, and if, from inspection of the entire instrument, it appears that the sum may have been named as a penalty. Still it may be admitted that a contract for liquidated damages is lawful; that in the construction of these contracts, as in all others, the intention of the parties must govern. Where a stipulation in a contract to purchase cattle provided that a certain note given for a part of the purchase money should act as a forfeiture in case the vendee abandoned the trade, it was held an agreement for liquidated damages, although the actual damages were capable of being ascertained; the word "forfeiture" not being synonymous with "penalty." Eakin v. Scott, 7 S. W. 777, 778, 70 Tex. 442.

Though parties to a contract have named a specified sum as liquidated damages for its breach, the courts may in certain cases treat the provision as a penalty, and restrict the recovery to the actual damages which have accrued. If the damages be in their very nature uncertain, or the amount indeterminate, the sum specified will be treated as fixing by stipulation the amount of the recovery. The principle would seem to be that, though a sum be named as liquidated damages, the court will not so treat it unless it bear such proportion to the actual damages that it may reasonably be presumed to have been arrived at upon a fair estimation by the parties of the compensation to be paid for the prospective loss. Collier v. Betterton, 29 S. W. 467, 468, 87 Tex. 440; Wilcox v. Walker (Tex.) 43 S. W. 579, 580. See Taylor v. Sandiford, 20 U. S. (7 Wheat.) 14, 5 L. Ed. 384; Sun Printing & Publishing Ass'n v. Moore, 22 Sup. Ct. 240, 248, 183 U. S. 642, 46 L. Ed. 368.

Whether a sum agreed upon by the parties as the measure of damages for the violation of covenants shall be considered as liquidated damages or only as a penalty depends upon the meaning and intent of the parties, as gathered from a full view of the provisions of the contract and the terms used to express such intent. Where it is doubtful whether the sum inserted was intended as a penalty or as liquidated damages, it will be considered in the nature of a penalty, especially if the payment of a certain damage less than the whole sum is provided for by the instrument; but where the sum applies as well to stipulations where the damages, in case of breach, necessarily must be uncertain, as to stipulations where the damages would be certain, it will be regarded as liquidated damages, and not as a penalty. Where the plaintiffs gave $3,000 for the patronage and good will of a newspaper establishment, and $500 for the type and printing apparatus, and the defendants (the vendors) covenanted that they would not publish or aid or assist in the publishing of a rival paper, and fixed the measure of damages at $3,000, the case, from its peculiar nature and the total uncertainty of arriving at a correct conclusion as to the amount of damages, was held to be a fit and proper one for the application of the rule that the sum agreed upon should be regarded as stipulated damages, and not as a penalty. Dakin v. Williams (N. Y.) 17 Wend. 447. See, also, Williams v. Dakin (N. Y.) 22 Wend. 201, and Hahn v. Horstman, 75 Ky. (12 Bush) 249, 254.

Where a contract provides a forfeiture for the purpose of securing the payment of a sum of money or the performance of an act which may be compensated in damages, the sum forfeited may be deemed a penalty, and not liquidated damages. Flagg v. Monger, 9 N. Y. (5 Seld.) 483, 500.

The distinction between penalty and liquidated damages is clearly stated in People v. Love, 19 Cal. 676, 677, and cases there cited. As there said, it matters not what particular terms are used in contract. Even if the thing to be done be called a "penalty" or "liquidated damages" or given no name at all, it will be treated according to the evident intent of the parties, and the subject-matter of the contract. Pogue v. Kaweah Power & Water Co., 72 Pac. 144, 145, 138 Cal. 664.

Where an agreement secures the performance or omission of various acts which are not measureable by any exact pecuniary standard, together with one or more acts in respect to which the damages for a breach of contract are readily ascertainable by a jury, and there is a sum stipulated as damages for a breach of any one of the covenants, such sum is held to be a penalty merely, and not liquidated damages. So, where defendant agreed with plaintiffs not to pay for ore taken from plaintiffs' land or elsewhere more than plaintiffs were paying, and to sell ore purchased by him to plaintiffs for which he was to receive $4 per thousand pounds more than plaintiffs were then paying to the miners on their own land, and bound himself in a certain sum as liquidated damages to be paid in case of a violation or failure to perform any such stipulation, it was held that such sum was a penalty. Long v. Towl, 42 Mo. 545, 550, 97 Am. Dec. 355; Emery v. Boyle, 49 Atl. 779, 780, 200 Pa. 249.

A sum which a contract of sale of business and good will provides that the seller shall pay as liquidated damages in case they re-engage in business is not a penalty. While the definition of the parties in contracts of such a character is not an invariable and controlling guide for construction, the subject-matter of such a contract was such in its very nature as to render proof of the damages exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, and manifestly to make it a case of liquidated damages. Potter v. Ahrens, 43 Pac. 388, 389, 110 Cal. 674.

The phrase "liquidated damages" in a contract providing for the payment of a certain sum as liquidated damages was said in Scofield v. Tompkins, 95 Ill. 190, 193, 35 Am. Rep. 160, as having often "been made to read 'penalty' if the strict construction of the phraseology would work oppression upon the obligor, or, if the enforcement of the contract would be unconscionable, the courts will then construe the amount named in the contract as a penalty. And it seems from all the cases that, whatever may be the working of the contract, the courts will admit evidence as to whether or not the strict enforcement of its provisions would work a hardship upon the obligor." Radloff v. Haase, 63 N. E. 729, 730, 196 Ill. 365.

The intention of the party as to whether a sum is liquidated damages or a penalty under the artificial rules that have been adopted is determined by a very latitudinarian construction. To be potential and controlling that a sum is liquidated damages, that sum must be fixed as the basis of compensation, and substantially limited to it; for just compensation is recognized as the universal measure of damages not punitive. Parties may liquidate the amount by previous agreement. But when a liquidated sum is evidently not based on that principle, the intention to liquidate damages will either be found not to exist, or will be disregarded, and the sum treated as a penalty. Muldoon v. Lynch, 6 Pac. 417, 419, 66 Cal. 536.

Where, from the nature of the transaction, the actual damages consequent on a breach of the contract are incapable of accurate measurement, or where the sum specified is not out of all proportion to any damages which could arise, the provision will be treated as liquidated damages. But where these facts do not exist the tendency of the court is to treat the stipulation in the nature of a penalty. Cesar v. Robinson, 67 N. E. 58, 59, 174 N. Y. 492.

It would seem that the expressed intention of the parties to a contract should govern. In every case where they say that a certain sum shall be paid in case of a breach it shall be construed as fixing the amount of recovery, and yet, notwithstanding such provision, in certain cases the damages may be limited to a just compensation for the loss which has been suffered. Therefore the principle would appear to be that, though a sum be named as liquidated damages, the court will not so treat it unless it bears such a proportion to the actual damages that it would reasonably be presumed to have been arrived at upon a fair estimation by the parties of the compensation to be paid, or the prospective loss. After all that is said, it is the intention of the parties that must govern in the construction of such contracts, as in all others. Dobbs v. Turner (Tex.) 70 S. W. 458, 460 (citing Collier v. Betterton, 87 Tex. 442, 29 S. W. 468).

A stipulation for liquidated damages, however positively assented to, will be construed as one for a penalty if it be necessary to do so in order to avoid extortion and oppression; but if it is not oppressive, in view of the circumstances, it will be enforced as the compensation an aggrieved party is entitled to receive, even if it is probably greater than the loss he sustains by the other party's breach, if his actual damage cannot be measured with approximate certainty. Menges v. Milton Piano Co., 70 S. W. 250, 251, 96 Mo. App. 283.

A clause in a charter party in which the parties mutually bind themselves "in the penal sum of estimated amount of freight" to the performance of all and every of their agreements, is not a stipulation for liquidated damages, but a penalty to secure the payment of the amount of damage that either party may actually suffer from any breach of the contract. Watts v. Camors, 6 Sup. Ct. 91, 94, 115 U. S. 353, 29 L. Ed. 406.

A penalty in general is a sum of money in gross to be paid for nonperformance of an agreement. The question whether a sum stipulated in a written contract to be paid on the breach of its condition is a penalty or liquidated damages is a question for the court, to be determined by the intention of the parties as drawn from the words of the whole contract, examined in the light of its subject-matter and its surroundings. A seller of his stock of merchandise and good will stipulated in the contract of sale that he would not engage in or open a store doing the same kind of business within certain defined limits "under penalty of $1,000," and in case the party should fail to comply with the conditions of the agreement he should "forfeit and pay to the other a sum of $1,000." The sum specified in the agreement is a penalty, and not liquidated damages. March v. Allabough, 103 Pa. 335, 340.

The purpose of a penalty is to insure the performance of a contract and not to fix the measure of damages which may be recovered for a breach of it; and, except in actions to recover the penalty, the injured party can recover the full amount of his damages. The intention of the parties is generally the test to determine whether a promise to pay a fixed sum of money for any default in the performance of a contract is in the nature of a penalty or of liquidated damages, but a promise to pay a large sum of money in the event of a default in the payment of a much smaller sum is an exception to this rule, for the law makes interest the measure of damages for failure to pay money when it is due, and will not permit the parties to avoid the usury laws in this way. Such a promise will be treated as a penalty, and not as liquidated damages. Where a partnership agreement provided that, in the event of default by either party in the performance of its conditions, or on default in payment of any moneys due from one party to the other after demand, the defaulting party agreed to forfeit the sum of $300 to the other as liquidated damages, such amount was in the nature of a penalty, and not liquidated damages. Morrill v. Weeks, 46 Atl. 32, 33, 70 N. H. 178.

The tendency and preference of the law is to regard a stated sum as a penalty, except where the actual damages cannot be ascertained by any standard. But where the damages which must result from the breach of a single contract are uncertain in their nature, any stipulation which the parties may make, ostensibly for the purpose of liquidating the damages, should receive favorable consideration. Where the sum is agreed to be paid for any of several breaches of contract, and the damage resulting from a breach of all of them are uncertain, and there is no fixed rule for measuring them, but the breach was apparently of various degrees of importance and injury, cases in this country are somewhat conflicting as to whether the sum should be held to be a penalty or as liquidated damages. But where the same is made payable for one breach and for many, for a breach attended with a small loss or a great loss, and the actual damages are easily computed, the inequality is at once seen. The stipulation as to a definite sum is so framed that it cannot possibly be construed to adjust the recompense to actual injury. The sum mentioned under such circumstances is to be treated as a penalty, and not as liquidated damages. People v. Central Pac. R. Co., 18 Pac. 90, 94, 76 Cal. 29.

The word "penalty" prima facie excludes the notion of stipulated damages, although the use of either the word "penalty" or the words "liquidated damages" is not conclusive. A contract for the construction and delivery of two engines recited that the purchaser was desirous that the contract should contain a penalty in the way of stipulated damages, and provided that one of the engines should be delivered on the 1st of April and the other on the 1st of May, the manufacturer agreeing to pay, as liquidated damages for any delay in delivery after the 1st of April as to the first engine, and after the 1st of May as to the second, the sum of $50 per day for all time which the delivery should be delayed. The purchaser made a payment on the contract price after the default, without informing the vendor that he intended to claim the $50 per day as liquidated damages. Held, that the agreement stipulated for a penalty, and not for liquidated damages, and could not be enforced. Iroquois Furnace Co. v. Wilkin Mfg. Co., 54 N. E. 987, 994, 181 Ill. 582.

Conclusiveness of terms.

The use of the term "liquidated damages" in a contract, when fixing the sum to be paid on breach thereof, is not sufficient to control the construction, if the court can discover in the other parts of the instrument a reason even to doubt as to the intention of the parties. Bagley v. Peddle, 16 N. Y. 469, 471, 69 Am. Dec. 713; Pastor v. Solomon, 55 N. Y. Supp. 956, 957, 26 Misc. Rep. 125; People v. Love, 19 Cal. 676, 682.

The law will permit parties to determine by an agreement which enters into the contract what shall be the damages which he who violates the contract shall pay to the other; but it does not always sanction or enforce the bargain they may make on this subject. Where the parties make this agreement, but not in such wise that the law adopts it, then the damages thus agreed upon are a penalty, or in the nature of a penalty. And the question whether damages agreed upon are to be treated as liquidated or as in the nature of a penalty, and therefore reduced to the actual damage, often occurs, and it is not always of easy or obvious solution. "One rule for determining the question is this: that the action of the court shall not be defined and determined by the terms which the parties have seen fit to apply to the sum fixed upon. Though they call it a 'penalty,' or give it no name at all, it will be treated as liquidated damages; that is, it will be recognized and enforced as the measure of damages, if, from the nature of the agreement and the surrounding circumstances, and in reason and justice, it ought to be. And, although they call it 'liquidated damages,' it will be treated as a penalty if, from a consideration of the whole contract, it appears that the parties intended it as such, or if, where the injury is certain, the sum fixed upon is clearly disproportionate to such injury and the real claim which grows out of it." Wibaux v. Grinnell Live-Stock Co., 22 Pac. 492, 494, 9 Mont. 154.

Though the use of a particular word will not be regarded as determinative of the question as to whether a sum stipulated to be paid for breach of a contract is liquidated damages or a penalty, it may be remarked that while the phrase "liquidated damages" is frequently declared to signify no more than a penalty, a sum expressly designated a penalty has rarely been construed to be liquidated damages. Kelly v. Fejervary, 83 N. W. 791, 792, 111 Iowa, 693.

"Whether a sum agreed to be paid as damages for the violation of an agreement is to be considered as liquidated damages or as a penalty is held to depend on the meaning and intent of the parties as gathered from a full view of the provisions of the contract, the terms used to express such intent, and the peculiar circumstances of the subject-matter of agreement. * * * The mere use of the term 'penalty' or the term 'liquidated damages' does not determine this intention if, on the whole, the instrument discloses a different intent." Yetter v. Hudson, 57 Tex. 604, 612.

The word "penalty" in a contract providing for the payment of a certain sum as a penalty for a breach of the contract will never be construed to mean liquidated damages. Radloff v. Haase, 63 N. E. 729, 730, 196 Ill. 365.

Wherever the words "penal sum" or "penalty" are used in a contract, it must be construed as being so intended by the parties; but where a sum named is called "liquidated damages" it will be held as a penalty if it seems from the contract that it was so intended by the party and the justice of the case requires such a construction. White v. Arleth (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 978, 981.

Where the word "penalty" is used in fixing a sum to be paid on breach of a contract, it is generally conclusive against its being held liquidated damages, however strong the language of the other parts of the instrument in favor of such construction. Bagley v. Peddle, 16 N. Y. 469, 471, 69 Am. Dec. 713.

The word "penalty" in a contract providing for the payment of a certain sum as a penalty for a breach thereof will be construed to mean liquidated damages where it appears that it was intended as a provision for liquidated damages. Pastor v. Solomon, 55 N. Y. Supp. 956, 957, 26 Misc. Rep. 125.

The use of the term "penalty" in a contract to designate a sum payable on a breach thereof, which, from the nature of the agreement and surrounding circumstances, is shown to be liquidated damages, does not have the effect of causing such liquidated damages to become a "penalty." People v. Love, 19 Cal. 676, 682.

Forfeit.

See "Forfeit—Forfeiture."

LIQUIDATION.

Liquidation "is the act of settling, adjusting debts, or ascertaining their amounts or balance due." Midgett v. Watson, 29 N. C. 143, 145.

Mr. Justice Story said in Fleckner v. Bank of United States, 21 U. S. (8 Wheat.) 338, 362, 5 L. Ed. 631: "The ordinary sense of liquidation, as given by lexicographers, is to clear away—to lessen—a debt; and in common parlance, especially among merchants, to liquidate the balance is to pay it." Richmond v. Irons, 7 Sup. Ct. 788, 804, 121 U. S. 27, 30 L. Ed. 864.

"In its general sense, liquidation means the act or operation of winding up the affairs of a firm or company by getting in the assets, settling with its debtors and creditors, and appropriating the amount of profit or loss." 3 Cent. Dict. 3474. The word was so used in a resolution of the directors of an insurance company to reinsure its risks and to liquidate its affairs. L. D. Garrett Co. v. Morton, 71 N. Y. Supp. 17, 19, 35 Misc. Rep. 10.

A bill of lading for goods sent to a purchaser, and not objected to by him, amounts to a liquidation of an account within a statute allowing interest on money due on the settlements of accounts from the day of "liquidating accounts" from the parties and ascertaining the balance. Cooper v. Coates, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 105, 22 L. Ed. 481.

As decision.

Act Cong. 1864, § 14, declares that the decision of the collector of customs is conclusive unless the party, if dissatisfied with his decision, gives notice thereof within ten days after the "ascertainment and liquidation of the duties by the proper officers of the customs," and within thirty days after the date of such ascertainment and liquidation appeals therefrom to the Secretary of the Treasury. Held, that "ascertainment and liquidation" is synonymous with "decision of the collector of customs." Such ascertainment and liquidation of the duties by the proper officers of the customs—that is, the proper officers in the collector's office or department—is the decision of the collector. When the duties are ascertained and liquidated in the usual manner by such officers, and the usual indicia thereof by checks and stamps are placed on the usual papers in the collector's office, such transaction is the decision of the collector of customs in the premises. United States v. Cousinery (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 677, 679.

As notice of dissolution.

The words "in liquidation," written across the face of a note executed by a partnership, indicate in commercial usage that the firm was dissolved at the time of the making of the note. Burr v. Williams, 20 Ark. 171, 188.

"Liquidation," as used in notes signed in the name of a partnership with the words "in liquidation" added to it, are no part of the signature or description of the firm, and they do not necessarily indicate a dissolution of the firm. They were probably added to denote the purpose for which the notes were given, and a mere addition of this kind need not be noticed in the declaration, and, if omitted, it does not amount to a variance. Fairchild v. Grand Gulf Bank, 6 Miss. (5 How.) 597, 604.

Payment implied.

"Liquidation," as used in Rev. St. § 2931, requiring notice of an intention to recover a tax alleged to have been wrongfully collected to be given within ten days from the "ascertainment and liquidation" of the same, means the ascertaining and demanding and receiving the same, necessarily implying payment. Laidlaw v. Abraham (U. S.) 43 Fed. 297, 298.

As statement.

"The liquidation of an account cannot mean anything less than a statement and adjustment of it by the parties interested." McLellan v. Crofton, 6 Me. (6 Greenl.) 307, 349.

LIQUIDATING PARTNER.

A liquidating partner is one of a dissolving firm, who receives and disburses the assets to the exclusion of the other partners, but with their assent, and by his own apparent voluntary action. Formal appointment is not necessary, nor must every act of his be without consultation with the others. Garretson v. Brown, 40 Atl. 293, 300, 185 Pa. 447.

Where a partnership is mutually dissolved, and one of the members of the firm is made the liquidator, the position which he occupies is one of agency. He becomes the sole authorizing agent of the partnership for the single purpose of winding up and settling its affairs. He represents creditors on the one hand, and all of the partners on the other, and for this reason he is sometimes spoken of as a trustee; but he is not accurately so described, inasmuch as he has in his possession no more property or power after being appointed liquidator than he had theretofore. Smith v. Proskey, 81 N. Y. Supp. 424, 425, 82 App. Div. 18.

LIQUOR.

See "Alcoholic Liquor"; "Contraband Liquors"; "Fermented Liquor"; "Intoxicating Liquor"; "Malt Liquor"; "Mixed Liquor"; "Spiritous Liquors"; "Strong Liquor"; "Vinous Liquor."

The word "liquor" may be used in either of two senses. The first is practically synonymous with "liquid"; the second, as given in Webster's Dictionary is, specifically, alcoholic or spirituous fluid, either distilled or fermented, as brandy, wine, whisky, beer, etc. In common parlance the word is universally understood in the latter sense when used in speaking of a dealer in liquors. This being true, when the statute first prescribes a penalty for dealing in intoxicating liquors, and then prescribes a form of indictment to be used in prosecuting for a breach of this law, using therein the word "liquors," it is beyond cavil that the word is used in the special sense of intoxicating liquors as above defined, and that under such an indictment the sale only of such liquor can be shown. Brass v. State (Fla.) 34 South. 307, 308.

Liquor is said by Webster to be a liquid or fluid substance, a word extending in its general signification to water, milk, blood, sap, juice, etc.; but its most common application is to spirituous fluids, whether distilled or fermented; to decoctions, solutions, tincture. Houser v. State, 18 Ind. 106, 107.

The term "liquor" applies only to liquors containing a sufficient percentage of alcohol to cause intoxication. Board of Com'rs of Excise of Tompkins County v. Taylor, 21 N. Y. 173, 177.

The word "liquors," as placed on a card on which the name of a jurymen is placed, and which is placed in a box from which the names are drawn, is a sufficient indication of his occupation to comply with Pub. St. c. 170, § 31, requiring such cards to designate the occupation of a juror. Commonwealth v. Bacon, 135 Mass. 521, 525.

In a prosecution for the sale of intoxicating liquors the court instructed the jury that "the sale of intoxicating liquors may be proven by circumstantial evidence, and where it is shown that the person was sold or furnished liquor at a licensed saloon the presumption is that such liquor was intoxicating." The court, in discussing this charge, said: "Whether or not intoxicating liquors were sold by defendant to deceased was the most seriously contested question in this case. The word 'liquor' is defined by Webster: '(1) Any liquid or fluid substance; as water, milk, blood, sap, juice, and the like. (2) Especially alcoholic or spirituous fluid, either distilled or fermented; as brandy, wine, whisky, beer,' etc. If the witnesses, in describing what liquor had been sold to deceased, had uniformly described it merely as 'liquor,' it might be proper for the jury to assume that it was in that class specifically referred to in the second definition above given. But such was not this case. There was evidence that the liquor furnished by defendant to deceased, at least on one occasion, was seltzer, and within one of the definitions first given above seltzer is clearly embraced. Under these circumstances it was erroneous to instruct the jury that whatever liquor is shown to have been sold in a licensed saloon is presumed to be intoxicating." Dolan v. McLaughlin, 64 N. W. 1076, 1078, 46 Neb. 449.

All wines, champagnes, and cider shall be comprehended within the term "liquors" for the purposes of an act relating to the inspection of liquors. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 2932.

Alcohol.

The term "liquor" does not include alcohol. State v. Martin, 34 Ark. 340, 341.

Beer.

"Liquors," as used in Tariff Act March 3, 1883 (22 Stat. 505, Schedule H), prohibiting any allowance for breakage, leakage, or damage in respect to wines, liquors, cordials, or distilled spirits, implies spirituous liquors, and does not include beer. The word "liquors" is frequently, if not generally, used to define spirits or distilled beverages, in contradistinction to those that are fermented. Thus, in the Century Dictionary, one of its definitions is "an intoxicating beverage, especially a spirituous or distilled drink, as distinguished from fermented beverages, as wine and beer, and does not include beer." Hollender v. Magon, 13 Sup. Ct. 932, 933, 149 U. S. 586, 37 L. Ed. 860 (reversing [C. C.] 38 Fed. 912).

Liquor is defined as meaning distilled or rectified spirits, wine, fermented or malt liquors. Liquor Tax Law, § 2. Evidence in an injunction suit to restrain the illegal sale of liquor that defendant sold beer is not sufficient to show a sale of liquor, as it will not be presumed that beer means fermented or malt liquor. In re Hunter, 69 N. Y. Supp. 908, 909, 34 Misc. Rep. 389.

Champagne.

"Liquors," as used in Rev. Code, c. 79, § 4, forbidding a credit of more than $10 for liquors sold, includes champagne. Kizer v. Randleman, 50 N. C. 428, 429.

As fermented or spirituous liquor.

Liquor, according to Webster, may be any liquid or fluid substance; so that an indictment charging a sale of liquor does not charge any offense under a statute prohibiting the sale of spirituous, vinous, fermented, or malt liquors. State v. Quinlan, 41 N. W. 299, 300, 40 Minn. 55.

In its most comprehensive signification, liquor implies fluid substances generally, such as water, milk, blood, sap, juice; but in a more limited sense, and its more common application, it implies spirituous fluids, whether fermented or distilled, such as brandy, whisky, rum, gin, beer, and wine, and also decoctions, solutions, tinctures, and the like fluids in great variety. State v. Giersch, 4 S. E. 193, 194, 98 N. C. 720.

Liquor includes all fermented liquors. Town of Mandeville v. Baudot, 21 South. 258, 49 La. Ann. 236.

Most generally the term "liquors" implies spirituous liquors, and therefore proof that a defendant sold liquors is sufficient to show, in the absence of adverse testimony, that he sold spirituous liquors. State v. Brittain, 89 N. C. 574, 576.

"The word 'liquors,' as commonly used, includes all that are spirituous, vinous, or inferior fermented, including malt." People v. Crilly (N. Y.) 20 Barb. 246, 248.

LIQUOR DEALER.

See "Retail Liquor Dealer"; "Wholesale Dealer."

"Liquor dealers," as used in the Constitution giving the General Assembly power to tax liquor dealers, is employed in a generic sense, and includes all kinds and classes. There may be different classes and varieties included under the general description of "liquor dealers," and it is competent for the General Assembly to classify the different kinds of liquor dealers included within the description as used in the Constitution. Timm v. Harrison, 109 Ill. 593, 601; Dennehy v. City of Chicago, 12 N. E. 227, 229, 120 Ill. 627.

"Dealer," as used in Pen. Code, art. 186, providing for the punishment of "dealers" in spirituous liquors for selling such liquors on Sunday, cannot be construed to include one who has made but a single sale. Archer v. State, 10 Tex. App. 482, 483.

One who engages in the business of procuring from the manufacturers beer by the case and disposing of it by the bottle is dealing in liquors, and it can make no difference if it is true that the customers left their orders for specific quantities before the defendant undertook the procurement thereof. The word "dealer" is not confined to one who sells his own property only. If one open a place of business for the purpose of furnishing to all who may patronize him liquors in quantities of less than five gallons, he is engaged in the business of a retail liquor dealer, irrespective of the question of the manner or mode in which he procures the liquors from the manufacturers. United States v. Allen (U. S.) 38 Fed. 736, 738.

Since the passage of the Georgia act of December 24, 1890 (1 Acts 1890-91, p. 128), rendering it unlawful to sell spirituous liquors in any quantity whatever without first obtaining a license, the phrase "dealers in spirituous liquors," when used in a statute, comprehends all persons who sell such liquors in any quantity. Consequently the fifteenth clause of the second section of the general tax act of 1892 is to be construed as imposing the tax therein specified upon dealers who sell by wholesale in the original packages corn whisky of their own manufacture in this state, the same as upon other dealers of such liquors. Fincannon v. State, 21 S. E. 53, 93 Ga. 418.

The statute of 1846 relating to the punishment of a dealer in spirituous liquors without a license does not mean that one should actually do the business in person, or even that it should be done in his presence, or by his express command. A merchant who keeps liquors in his store for sale, and clerks to deal it out in common with other commodities kept for sale, is equally as liable for sales made by such clerks as if made by him in person. It is a dealing by him. State v. Dow, 21 Vt. 484, 487.

The term "liquor dealer" does not characterize a person making only one sale of intoxicating liquors, but repeated sales at or about the same time is strong evidence that the person making the sales is a liquor dealer. Mansfield v. State, 17 Tex. App. 468, 472.

Club or association.

A club or association of persons not incorporated, combined together for social and literary objects, is a "dealer in malt liquors," and subject to a tax, though it is sustained by initiation fees and equal monthly assessments, where the liquor was paid for out of the general fund, and was served by glass to the members of the club. United States v. Wittig (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 744, 745.

A benevolent association, which sells as such to its members tickets entitling them at a picnic to a glass of beer, is a "dealer in malt liquors," within the statute requiring a license for that purpose. United States v. Giller (U. S.) 54 Fed. 656, 658.

LIQUOR SHOP.

"A liquor shop is correctly described as a house where spirituous liquors are kept and sold." Wooster v. State, 65 Tenn. (6 Baxt.) 533, 534.

LIQUOR LICENSE.

See "License."

As franchise, see "Franchise."

As property, see "Property."

LIQUOR TAX CERTIFICATE.

A liquor tax certificate issued under the existing law is essentially different from the former license. The license was a personal privilege, which the holder took subject to the conditions of law by which it was rendered revocable. The certificate represents a species of property transferable by the owner, and accordingly protected by the general rules of law in any proceeding having for its object the forfeiture or destruction of the right which it confers. In re Cullinan, 51 N. Y. Supp. 567, 568, 82 App. Div. 445 (citing In re Lyman, 160 N. Y. 96, 54 N. E. 577).

LIS.

"Lis" means a suit, action, controversy, or dispute. State v. Guinotte, 57 S. W. 281, 283, 156 Mo. 513, 50 L. R. A. 787 (citing Whart. Law Dict.).

LIS MOTA.

Within the rule that ex parte declarations, even though made upon oath, referring to a date subsequent to the beginning of the controversy, are rejected as not evidence, the term "lis mota," as used in this rule of evidence in the Roman law, was there applied strictly to the commencement of the action, and was not referred to an early period of a controversy. But in our law the term "lis mota" is taken in the classical and larger sense of controversy, and is understood to mean the commencement of the controversy, and not the commencement of a suit. Westfeldt v. Adams, 42 S. E. 823, 826, 131 N. C. 379.

LIS PENDENS.

Lis pendens is the pendency of a suit and an action is pendent after it is entered. Parker v. Colcord, 2 N. H. 36, 37.

A lis pendens is defined in Wharton's Law Dictionary as a pending suit. "Lis" means a suit, action, controversy, or dispute, and dispute is a conflict or contest, while controversy is a disputed question, a suit at law; and the pendens of the lis is not disturbed or in any manner affected by the fact of an appeal taken from one court to another. The litigation or contest still goes on. State v. Guinotte, 57 S. W. 281, 283, 156 Mo. 513, 50 L. R. A. 787.

"The doctrine of lis pendens is that real property, when it has been put in litigation by a suit in equity, in which it is specifically described, will, if the suit is prosecuted with vigilance, be bound by the final decree, notwithstanding any intermediate alienation; and one who intermeddles with property in litigation does so at his peril, and is as conclusively bound by the results of the litigation, whatever they may be, as if he had been a party from the outset. See Tilton v. Coffield, 93 U. S. 168, 23 L. Ed. 858. Mr.

Bennett, in his work on Lis Pendens, p. 153, says: 'It is essential to the existence of a valid and effective lis pendens that three elements be present: First, the property must be of a character to be subjected to the rule; second, the court must have jurisdiction both of the person and the res; and, third, the property or res involved must be sufficiently described in the pleadings.' And this definition is quoted with approval in the case of Leavell v. Poore, 91 Ky. 324, 15 S. W. 858." Boyd v. Eimmons' Adm'r, 45 S. W. 364, 366, 103 Ky. 393.

A lis pendens is notice of all facts apparent on the fact of the pleadings and of all the other facts of which the facts stated necessarily put the purchaser on inquiry. Powell v. Campbell, 20 Nev. 232, 239, 20 Pac. 156, 162, 2 L. R. A. 615, 19 Am. St. Rep. 350; Parks v. Smoot, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 1043, 1044, 48 S. W. 146, 105 Ky. 63.

Judge Story, in 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 405, defines the doctrine of lis pendens as follows: "A purchase made of the property actually in litigation pendente lite for a valuable consideration, and without any express or implied notice, in point of fact affects the purchaser in the same manner as if he had such notice, and he will accordingly be bound by the judgment or decree in the suit." Garver v. Graham, 51 Pac. 812, 813, 6 Kan. App. 344.

"The doctrine of lis pendens, as generally understood and applied by the courts of this country, is not based upon presumption of notice, but upon a public policy, imperatively demanded by a necessity which can be met and overcome in no other way." It is careless "use of language which has led judges to speak of it as notice, because it happens to have in some instances similar effect with notice," Freem. Judgm. § 191. Smith v. Kimball, 13 Pac. 801, 808, 36 Kan. 474.

"Lis pendens is defined to be the jurisdiction, power, or control, which the court acquires over the property involved in the suit pending the continuance of the action; and until its final judgment therein it has for its object the keeping of the subject or res within the power of the court until the judgment or decree shall be entered, to make it possible for courts of justice to give effect to their judgments and decrees." Tinsley v. Rice, 31 S. E. 174, 176, 105 Ga. 285.

The underlying, if not the sole, object of the maxim, "Pendente lite nihil innovetur," is to keep the subject of the suit, or res, within the power of the court until the judgment or decree shall be entered, and thus make it possible for courts of justice to give effect to their judgments and decrees. This gives a correct general idea of the doctrine of lis pendens, which is said to arise out of necessity, and is constructive notice to the world of the issues involved in pending litigation; and he that purchases property which is the subject of litigation from one of the parties litigant takes title subject to the judgment which may be therein rendered. Bowen v. Kirkland, 44 S. W. 189, 194, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 346.

Lis pendens is notice of all facts apparent on the face of the pleading, and all those other facts of which the facts so stated put a purchaser on inquiry. Lis pendens applies only to rights or interests acquired from a party after the institution of the suit, and not to the case of a right previously contingent or conditionally becoming perfect. Parks v. Smoot, 48 S. W. 146, 105 Ky. 63.

Lis pendens is created by the institution of suit, and is operative against all persons coming in subsequently by purchase or otherwise; or creates a specific lien if successfully prosecuted to a final decree, the decree taking effect by relation from the day of the service of the summons to answer. Hines v. Duncan, 79 Ala. 112, 117, 58 Am. Rep. 580.

A lis pendens is for the purpose of giving notice of the jurisdiction or control which the court acquires over property involved in a suit pending the continuance of the action, and where matters in dispute have been finally determined the filing of a lis pendens is without authority of law. Washington Dredging & Improvement Co. v. Kinnear, 64 Pac. 522, 24 Wash. 405.

Chancellor Kent, in Murray v. Ballou, 1 Johns. Ch. 566, 576, says: "The established rule is that a lis pendens duly prosecuted, and not collusive, is notice to a purchaser so as to effect and bind his interest by the decree; and the lis pendens begins from the service of the subpoena after the bill is filed." And a late writer (2 Pom. Eq. Jur.) says that "during the pendency of an equitable suit neither party to the litigation can alienate the property in dispute so as to affect the rights of his opponent." Walker v. Goldsmith, 12 Pac. 537, 542, 14 Or. 125.

A lis pendens only relates to and affects voluntary alienations of property pending a suit in respect to it by or from the defendants therein, and in no way affects independent parties asserting adverse rights in respect to it. It only operates as a notice requiring all persons to beware of acquiring rights in the subject-matter of the litigation from any of the parties named therein during the pendency of the suit. In Sheffield v. Robinson, 73 Hun, 173, 25 N. Y. Supp. 1098, the court said: "The object of the lis pendens is to give notice of the pendency of the action to all persons who may subsequently acquire or seek to acquire rights in property, but it is not required for the protection of the parties to the action, and an omission of the same is not a defense to the action." Stuyvesant v. Well, 57 N. Y. Supp. 592, 597, 26 Misc. Rep. 445.

In custodia legis distinguished.

There is necessarily a difference in the doctrines described as "lis pendens" and "in custodia legis." As illustrating the limitations of the doctrine of lis pendens, the case of Boshear v. Lay, 53 Tenn. (6 Heisk.) 163, may be referred to, where it is held that a party purchasing property pendente lite, the property being involved in litigation, is not affected with notice unless the pleadings clearly show the specific property in controversy. In the opinion it is stated that the principle of lis pendens is that the proceedings must be of such character as to point out to all the world the property or right affected by them. To effect a notice that he is buying property involved in litigation it must appear from the proceedings so pending that the specific property was so involved. Ewin v. Lindsay (Tenn.) 58 S. W. 388, 394.

As notice.

A lis pendens is constructive notice to a purchaser that he will be bound by a decree to be entered in a pending suit. Harrington v. Slade (N. Y.) 22 Barb. 161, 166.

Lis pendens is only constructive notice of that which is involved in the litigation. Hoffman v. Blume, 64 Tex. 334, 336.

The doctrine of lis pendens is not founded on any idea of constructive notice, but upon the public necessity of preserving property, the subject of litigation, to await the result of the pending suit. It has no application to suits in personam not involving the title or right to charge particular property. Greenwood v. Warren, 23 South. 686, 687, 120 Ala. 71.

It is frequently said that lis pendens is notice, but that is a loose mode of expression, not warranted by the reason or spirit of the rule. If lis pendens was notice, then it should bind the purchaser like actual notice in any subsequent suit prosecuted for the same cause, but this it does not. A pendente lite purchaser should rather be regarded in the attitude of a party, or at least of a privy, to the suit, for his rights are absolutely concluded by the final determination of the suit, as though he were a party or privy. Where the legal estate is conveyed to a third person pending a suit for the recovery of the property, whether the title will remain with him, notwithstanding the successful prosecution of the suit, subject to be divested by a new suit, or whether the decree and proceedings under it are made, by relation, to take effect from the institution of the suit, so as to totally vacate the intermediate conveyance, is a question of some difficulty, on the score of authority. The inquiry, however, has more of nicety than substantial utility, for, if the result of the suit concludes the question as though the purchaser had been a party to the suit, it must be conclusive between them in any other litigation concerning the actual right to the property. However, in order to maintain lis pendens in effect, suit must at least be prosecuted with diligence, though it does not distinctly appear what degree of intermission will deprive the complainant of the protection of the rule. But where during the pendency of the suit one of the defendants died, and the suit was not revived against his heirs for over two years, the unexplained lapse of time shows such negligence as to lose the complainant the benefit of the rule of lis pendens. Watson v. Wilson, 32 Ky. (2 Dana) 406, 408, 409, 26 Am. Dec. 459.

Notice of lis pendens distinguished.

In Empire Land & Canal Co. v. Engley, 33 Pac. 153, 154, 18 Colo. 388, it is said that the distinction between the term "lis pendens" and the phrase "notice of lis pendens" is not always observed. The former is a common-law term. The latter is regulated by statute. At common law the general rule is that all persons are bound to take notice, at their peril, of suits affecting the title to property, and purchasers pendente lite, either with or without notice, take no better title than their grantor shall be adjudged to have. The hardship of this rule in cases of certain equitable liens and secret trust estates led to the adoption of statutes providing for the registry of the notice of the pendency of certain actions. This, it seems, is the statutory notice of lis pendens.

Service required.

The filing of a bill, in the absence of statutory provisions, does not make a lis pendens. A suit in equity or at law does not become lis pendens until service of process. Wheeler v. Walton & Whann Co. (U. S.) 65 Fed. 720, 722.

Specification of property required.

Lis pendens is but a constructive notice, and, to make it available, the specific property must be so pointed out by the proceedings as to warn the whole world that they meddle with it at their peril. This is necessary to justice, for, as liberty is very much, though necessarily, invaded by executing a decree over a party's head without allowing him even a hearing, it is but fair to grant him the means of informing himself when he is in a likely way of getting into such danger. So an action to enforce a vendor's lien against the interest of one having title to an undivided half of certain land is no notice to a purchaser of the other undivided half interest that the plaintiff in such action has a lien or claim on the half interest so purchased, and in which the defendant in such action never had any. Russell v. Kirkbride, 62 Tex. 455, 459.

LIST.

See "Separate List"; "Tax List"; "True List."

The list and inventory mentioned in Rev. St. § 1697, requiring an assignee for creditors to file in the office of the clerk a correct inventory of his assets and a list of his creditors, which inventory and list shall each be verified by his oath, and have affixed a certificate of the assignee, do not include the oath and certificate which are extraneous and distinct from them, and are merely the verification and certificate of them. They do not in any sense affect the essential qualities or character of the inventory or list, or make them more correct and perfect than they are inherently. Steinlein v. Halstead, 8 N. W. 881, 52 Wis. 289.

Mansf. Dig. §§ 5904, 5908, requiring a justice of the peace to make out two lists of the road hands apportioned to each road overseer, means a simple series of names, in a brief form; and a list of plantations and designation of all the hands residing on them is not sufficient, though it furnishes data from which a list of the hands may be made. Chiles v. State, 45 Ark. 143, 144, 147.

"List," as used in Laws 1860, c. 1, §§ 18, 21, providing that, in case a person refuses or neglects to make out the requisite statement of his personal property for taxation, the assessor shall list it, means to describe it so as to show, more or less definitely, according to its character, to what property the valuation relates. Thompson v. Davidson, 15 Minn. 412, 415 (Gil. 333, 335).

LIST OF CREDITORS.

The list of creditors required of the defendant debtor by Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 59d, 30 Stat. 561 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3445], when he sets up as a defense to a petition by a single creditor that the number of his creditors is more than 12, should contain, besides the bare names and addresses of such creditors, at least a statement of the amount due each, the date of the debt, when it is due, whether due by note or account or by some other form of contract, the consideration therefor, whether owed jointly with another as partner or otherwise, and such full particulars as will enable the petitioning creditor to negotiate with others to join with him in the petition, and save the necessity and cost of a reference to ascertain the facts. Gage & Co. v. Bell (U. S.) 124 Fed. 371, 372.

LISTING.

While the words "listing" and "assessing" are used, in relation to taxation, in a somewhat different sense, but always as a part of the same process of getting the property upon the tax roll, the use of the word "listing" in the title of an act to authorize boards of supervisors to provide for discovery of property withheld from taxation, and to list the same and collect taxes thereon, includes an assessment, so that the statute is not unconstitutional. Beresheim v. Arnd, 90 N. W. 506, 508, 117 Iowa, 83.

LITERAL INTERPRETATION.

The "literal interpretation" of a statute, according to Lieber's definition, is finding out the true sense by making the statute its own expositor. If the true sense can thus be discovered, there is no resort to construction. It is, beyond question, the duty of courts, in construing statutes, to give effect to the intent of the lawmaking power, and seek for that intent in every legitimate way, but first of all in the words and language employed; and if the words are free from ambiguity and doubt, and express plainly, clearly, and distinctly the sense of the framers of the instrument, there is no occasion to resort to other means of interpretation. It is not allowable to interpret what has no need of interpretation. State v. Manson, 58 S. W. 319, 321, 105 Tenn. 232 (quoting Suth. St. Const. p. 237, § 236).

LITERARY.

A historical society, the object of which is the gathering up of facts, the writing out of them, and reading the same at meetings, whereupon discussions arise, etc., is properly incorporated under the statute for the incorporation of literary societies. Carpenter v. Historical Society (N. Y.) 2 Dem. Sur. 574, 576.

Laws 1872, c. 649, providing that any five or more persons of full age may associate themselves together for benevolent, charitable, literary, or scientific purposes, does not authorize five or more persons to associate themselves together for the formation of a medical college; and, according to the ordinary use of language, a medical college is not a scientific or literary institution, and it would not be generally classified as such. People v. Gunn, 96 N. Y. 317, 321.

A house merely occupied as a dwelling house, and not as a place where any of the exercises and recitations of a college are had—a house whose size and value may wholly extend on the extent of a professor's family, not one of whom have any connection with the college—cannot be said to be a building occupied for literary purposes, within the meaning of Act Ohio 1831 exempting the buildings, or any of them, belonging to schoolhouses, academies, or colleges, occupied for literary purposes. Kendrick v. Farquhar, 8 Ohio (8 Ham.) 189, 197.

LITERARY COMPOSITION.

"A literary composition, within the meaning of the copyright laws, is an original result of mental production, developed in a series of written or printed words, arranged for an intelligent purpose, in an orderly succession of expressive combinations. A literary composition is of an abstract, incorporeal nature. Its existence is independent of that of any material on which it may have been produced, or copies of it may have been inscribed or printed. The incorporeal contents of the original sheets and of written or printed copies are thus one and the same composition." Keene v. Wheatley (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 180, 192.

Every letter is, in the general and proper sense of the term, a "literary composition," the sole and exclusive right of publishing which is vested in the writer, without whose consent they cannot be published either by a person to whom they are addressed or by any other. Such letter is a literary composition, and nothing else, and it is so however defective it may be in sense, grammar, or orthography. Every writing in which words are so arranged as to convey the thoughts of the writer to the mind of the reader is a literary composition, and the definition applies just as certainly to a trivial letter as to an elaborate treatise or a finished poem. Literary compositions differ widely in their merit and value, but not at all from the facts from which they derive their common name. It cannot be said that letters are not to be regarded as literary compositions unless it appears that they were originally written with the intent to publish them, or that their author would derive from their publication a certain profit, or from their intrinsic merits their publication would be a benefit to the world. Intended publication, pecuniary value, or intrinsic merit do not furnish the test by which to determine whether or not letters are literary compositions. Woolsey v. Judd, 11 N. Y. Super. Ct. (14 Duer) 379, 396.

LITERARY INSTITUTIONS.

"Literary," as used in 6 & 7 Vict. c. 36, § 1, exempting from parochial and other rates property belonging to any society instituted for purposes of literature, exclusively, would not include a society organized for religious purposes. Regina v. Jones, 8 Q. B. 719, 725, 728.

Pub. St. c. 11, § 5, cl. 3, as amended by St. 1889, c. 465, exempting literary, benevolent, charitable, and scientific institutions from taxation, does not include a corporation having for its paramount object the dissemination of theosophical ideas, and the procuring of converts thereto, even though, in furtherance of such object, books are collected, instruction given, and literary work done. New England Theosophical Corp. v. Board of Assessors, 51 N. E. 456, 457, 172 Mass. 60, 42 L. R. A. 281.

Rev. St. 1878, § 2039, as amended by Laws 1891, c. 359, providing that the power of alienation should not be suspended beyond two lives in being, except in the case of land given to "literary corporations," etc., cannot be construed to include a religious corporation, since, if that were so, there would have been no necessity for the Legislature to declare that a religious corporation should be construed to be a charitable corporation within such section. Milwaukee Protestant Home for the Aged v. Becher, 58 N. W. 774, 776, 87 Wis. 409.

Laws 1852, providing that property set apart for the use of any literary institution shall be exempt from taxation, should not be construed to include a private boarding school; the words "literary institution," as used in the statute, having reference only to schools of a public nature. Common Council of City of Indianapolis v. McLean 8 Ind. 328, 332.

Acts 1882, § 2, providing that all "scientific or literary colleges or universities" organized under certain acts which should have reported to the regents within a certain time were declared legally incorporated, cannot be construed to include a medical college. People v. Gunn, 96 N. Y. 317, 323.

LITERARY PROPERTY.

"The ordinary definition of 'literary property' as an exclusive right of the proprietor to multiply copies of the composition is for general purposes too narrow, because, where the proprietorship exists, the circulation of copies is not the only method in which the subject may be properly used. That the definition is thus too narrow for specific purposes is seen in the case where the question to be decided arises from the use of a literary composition in another mode—that of theatrical composition. Literary property may be described as the right which entitles an author and his assigns to all the use and profit of his composition to which no independent right is, either by act or omission on his or their part, vested in another person. This definition or description cannot be applied without a specification of the uses of the literary composition. Their specification includes all such methods of communicating the knowledge of the contents as are not exclusively confidential. Such communications are effected by the reciting or audible reading of the composition, or by circulating it. The recitation or lecture or circulation may be private or public." Keene v. Wheatley (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 180, 192.

In order to decide what is an infringement of an author's rights, we must inquire what constitutes literary property, and what is recognized as such by the act of Congress, and secured and protected thereby. An author may be said to be the creator or inventor both of the ideas contained in his book, and the combination of words to represent them. Before publication, he has the exclusive possession of his invention. His dominion is perfect, but when he has published his book, and given his thoughts, sentiments, knowledge, or discoveries to the world, he can no longer have an exclusive possession of them. Such an appropriation becomes impossible, and is inconsistent with the object of publication. The author's conceptions have become the common property of his readers, who cannot be deprived of the use of them, or their right to communicate them to others clothed in their own language, by lecture or by treatise. His exclusive property in the creation of his mind cannot be vested in the author as an abstraction, but only in the concrete form which he has given them, and the language in which he has clothed them. When he has sold his book, the only property which he reserves to himself, or which the law gives to him, is the exclusive right to multiply the copies of that particular combination of characters which exhibits to the eyes of another the ideas intended to be conveyed. This is what the law terms "copy" or "copyright." A translation may be called a transcript or copy of the thoughts or conceptions of the author, but in no correct sense can it be called a copy of the book, and hence a translation of a book is not a violation of the literary property rights of the author or of the copyright. Stowe v. Thomas, 2 Am. Law Reg. 210, 223.

In discussing the right of an author in his literary production, the court said: "The property which a composer ordinarily has in his composition is a pecuniary value which it has to him, and not merely the amount of fame he may acquire; and such pecuniary value is necessary and wholly dependent upon the means which he may lawfully employ to bring the production before the public, and the approval of the public of his work, and there is no other property in that description of literary composition. When the right of property in the invention or creation of an author is recognized as an inherent right by the common law, it assumes that the thing to be secured and protected is of value to the owner. The law does not regard as property a thing entirely worthless." Palmer v. De Witt, 32 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Sweeny) 530, 552.

The literary property does not depend at all upon whether or not the manuscript sought to be protected is intended to be published, nor upon its pecuniary value or intrinsic merits as a literary composition. The right itself entitled the author to determine for himself whether the manuscript shall be published at all, and in all cases to forbid its publication by another. The right is absolute and exclusive, and exists as long as the manuscript may exist unpublished, and is, if the author or his representatives may so will, perpetual. It appears that the object or intention with which the manuscript was originally written has no effect in limiting the literary property which the author has therein; it being held that the writer of letters, whether they are literary compositions or family letters or letters of business, possesses the sole and exclusive right of publishing them. Woolsey v. Judd, 11 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Duer) 379, 385.

LITERARY PROPRIETOR.

The term "literary proprietor," within the meaning of the copyright laws, includes an author and his assigns. Keene v. Wheatley (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 180, 192.

LITHARGE.

"Litharge," which is used as one of the ingredients of an elastic packing, is an oxide of lead. Jenking v. Johnson (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 525, 527.

LITHOGRAPH.

A lithograph is a print from a drawing on stone, as a lithographic picture. Worcester says: "A mark, form, character; a figure made by impression." Arthur v. Moller, 97 U. S. 365, 368, 24 L. Ed. 1046.

"Lithograph," as used in the proviso in section 3 of the copyright act of March 3, 1891, c. 565, 26 Stat. 1107 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3407], that "in the case of a book, photograph, chromo, or lithograph," the two copies required to be delivered to the librarian of Congress shall be manufactured in this country, represents only a subdivision of the matters embraced in the word "print" in the same section, which gets its meaning and limitation from its immediate association with the words "engraving, cut." Oliver. Ditson Co. v. Littleton (U. S.) 67 Fed. 905, 906, 15 C. C. A. 61.

LITHOGRAPHIC PROCESS.

Articles consisting of lithographic prints, pasted upon sheets of paper which project beyond the prints, and are embossed so as to form frames—such frames being of more value than the prints—are dutiable as articles "produced in part by lithographic process," under Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 420. United States v. Weiller (U. S.) 65 Fed. 413, 420, 12 C. C. A. 668.

LITIGATED.

See "Might have been Litigated."

Facts in controversy bearing such relation to a judgment rendered as to be necessarily within the issue presented, and without proof of which the judgment could not have been rendered, are the only ones which can in any legal sense be said to have been litigated in any judicial proceeding, so as to come within the rule of res judicata. Eastman v. Symonds, 108 Mass. 567, 569.

"Litigated motions," as used in a rule of court providing that such motions must be heard in part one of the special term, mean motions which can be heard only on notice. Sturz v. Fischer, 36 N. Y. Supp. 893, 15 Misc. Rep. 410.

LITIGATION.

Under the provision of the state Constitution authorizing counties to levy taxes, among other purposes, for litigation, the "litigation" referred to is such as involves the right of the county as a corporation only, and moneys collected for general county purposes cannot, by those persons charged with the disbursement of such funds, be legally appropriated to the payment of attorney's fees to counsel employed to enforce the provisions of the liquor law. Koger v. Hunter, 29 S. E. 141, 102 Ga. 76.

"Litigation," as used in a fire policy providing that it shall be void if the title or possession be now or shall hereafter become involved in litigation, means "a litigation in which there could be a recovery of the assured's title in part or in whole. I do not mean that the litigation should show that there would be a recovery against the assured, but only that the litigation should be of such a character that there might be some recovery against him." Williams v. Buffalo German Ins. Co. (U. S.) 17 Fed. 63, 66.

"Litigation pending," as applied to a purchase of public land during litigation, so as to charge the purchaser with the title only of a purchaser pendente lite, means an actual contest, involving contested and conflicting claims, and hence does not include an application to change the entry, and transfer a payment from a tract of land alleged to have been erroneously entered to that intended to be entered as authorized by Rev. St. U. S. § 2372; the applicant in such a case seeking a mere matter of favor or grace, and not attempting to enforce a right. Manuel v. Fabyanski, 46 N. W. 208, 209, 44 Minn. 71.

LITIGIOUS RIGHT.

A right is said to be litigious whenever there exists a suit and contestation on the same. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2653; Sanders v. Ditch, 34 South. 860, 868, 110 La. 884; Cucullu v. Hernandez, 103 U. S. 105, 26 L. Ed. 322.

Litigious rights are those which cannot be exercised without undergoing a lawsuit. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3558, subd. 18; Sanders v. Ditch, 34 South. 860, 866, 110 La. 884.

In 1 Brown, Civ. Law, p. 256, things litigious are referred to as those about which there is any dispute. It was held that a right was not characterized at Rome as litigious until it was controverted in a judicial proceeding, and an authority is quoted. In France, according to Pothier in his Treatise on Sales (page 353), a right was regarded as litigious not only after the inception of the suit, but also before, when a suit might be reasonably apprehended. But by the Code a right is not considered as litigious until after it is put in contest in a suit. Prevost's Heirs v. Johnson (La.) 9 Mart. (O. S.) 123, 183; White v. Gay's Ex'rs, 1 Tex. 384, 387.

LITTLE.

A devise of what little property remains after the payment of testator's debts, construed in connection with Gen. St. c. 113, § 22, which provides that a devise or bequest shall extend to any real or personal estate over which testator has the discretionary power of appointment, and to which it would apply if the estate were his own property, carries with it land in which testator has a life estate, with power of appointment by deed or will. Payne v. Johnson's Ex'rs, 24 S. W. 238, 240, 95 Ky. 175.

"A little more or less," as used in a grant of public land describing premises as containing three-fourths of a square league of land, a little more or less, should be disregarded as immaterial. We reject the words "a little more or less," as having no meaning in a system of location and survey, like that of the United States, and the claim of the grantee is valid for the quantity clearly expressed. United States v. Fossat, 61 U. S. (20 How.) 413, 415, 423, 15 L. Ed. 944 (cited in United States v. Cameron [Ariz.] 21 Pac. 177, 178).

Where, in a conveyance of land, incapable of determination by metes and bounds, it was stated to consist of a little more than three leagues, it was held that the words "a little more than" were not susceptible of any definite construction, but were probably inserted as an authority to slightly increase the quantity for convenience of boundary or similar reasons. Marsh v. United States (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 820, 821.

LIVE—LIVING.

In a policy of fire insurance providing that the insured should, if required, furnish a certificate of the notary living nearest the place of fire, stating that he had examined the circumstances, and believed the insured had honestly sustained loss to a certain amount, "living" is not synonymous with "residing." Paltrovitch v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 23 N. Y. Supp. 38, 39, 68 Hun. 304.

A policy of fire insurance requiring that the insured should, if required, furnish a certificate of the "notary living nearest the place of fire," stating that he had examined the circumstances, and believed the insured had honestly sustained loss to a certain amount, means the notary whose place of business was nearest to the fire, and who could be found during business hours, though there were other notaries who lived nearer, but who were not housekeepers, and did not have signs out at the houses where they lived, and did not transact business there. Paltrovitch v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 23 N. Y. Supp. 38, 39, 68 Hun. 304.

As resides.

"Living," as used in Gen. St. c. 107, § 14, requiring a libel for divorce to be held in the county where the divorced party is still living, means residence or having a domicile, and does not apply to another county where such party is merely serving a term in State Prison. Hanson v. Hanson, 111 Mass. 158, 159.

Testator devised to his daughter the farm on which F. "now lives." F. then occupied, under agreement with the testator, about 140 acres of land, composed of three separate purchases, containing 100, 18, and 23 acres, respectively. A small portion only of each of the two smaller lots was cultivated, and the remainder was woodland. The 100 acres upon which F. resided contained all the buildings. Held, that the word "lives" was not used in the sense of "dwell" or "reside," but in the general sense of "subsisting," and the devise carried all the land used and occupied by F. Kendall v. Miller (N. Y.) 47 How. Prac. 446, 449.

The words "to live," "to reside," "to dwell," "to have one's home or domicile," are usually, in our statutes, equivalent and convertible terms. Relating to questions of residence, they refer to the domicile of the party, or the place where he is deemed, in law, to reside, which is not always the place of one's present actual abode. Allgood v. Williams, 8 South. 722, 723, 92 Ala. 551.

A witness lives where he can be found, and is sojourning, residing, or abiding for his health or any other lawful purpose, within the meaning of Rev. St. § 863 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 661], authorizing the taking of a deposition when the witness lives a greater distance from the place of trial than 100 miles. Mutual Ben. Life. Ins. Co. v. Robison, 58 Fed. 723, 732, 7 C. C. A. 444, 22 L. R. A. 325.

Gen. St. c. 107, § 112, declares that no divorce shall be decreed for any cause if the parties have never "lived together as husband and wife" in this state. Held, that the true interpretation of the provision "lived together as husband and wife" is that the parties must have had a domicile in Massachusetts, and not merely lived together as travelers passing through the state, or as visitors for a purpose that is merely temporary, or with an intent to acquire a domicile. The remedy is intended to be for the benefit of citizens of the state of Massachusetts only, and not to enable the court to dissolve marital relations existing between citizens of other states, neither of whom has ever had a domicile in Massachusetts. Ross v. Ross, 103 Mass. 575, 576.

The term "living within the county," within the meaning of St. 1791, c. 58, authorizing a complaint against a person traveling on Sunday before a justice of the peace in the county where the offense is committed, if such person lives in such county, cannot be extended to include all persons being in the county, without regard to their place of residence. Pearce v. Atwood, 13 Mass. 324, 340.

In Gen. St. c. 107, §§ 11, 12, providing that no divorce can be granted for any cause occurring in any other state or country, unless, before such cause occurred, the parties had lived together as husband and wife in this state, and one of them lived in this state when the cause occurred, except when the libellant has resided in this state five consecutive years next preceding the time of filing the libel, the words "to live" and "to reside" are obviously synonymous, and both relate to the domicile of the party, or the place where he is deemed, in law, to reside, which is not always the place of one's present actual abode. Shaw v. Shaw, 98 Mass. 158, 159.

An averment that the complainant lives in the state is not a sufficient allegation of citizenship. One may live even for many years in one state, and at the same time retain his citizenship in another. Gale v. Southern Bldg. & Loan Ass'n (U. S.) 117 Fed. 732, 734.

Death of beneficiary referred to.

The phrase "without living heirs of their body," in a will devising property to testator's children, and directing that, in the event of the death of any of the children without living heirs of their bodies, their shares shall go, etc., imports a definite failure of issue, and refers to the death of any one of the children of the testator without heirs of his body, or issue living at the time of his death. Glover v. Condell, 45 N. E. 173, 179, 163 Ill. 566, 35 L. R. A. 360.

Where a testator having two daughters devised to each of them, and the heirs of their body, forever, certain personal chattels, but provided that, if they should die without having a lawful heir of their body to live, the said chattels should be equally divided among the survivors, it was held that the words "heirs of her body to live" meant living children. Keating v. Reynolds (S. C.) 1 Bay, 80, 87.

In a will devising a homestead to two beneficiaries, their heirs and assigns, or to the "one living, should either die," the latter phrase was construed as referring to the death of a beneficiary in the lifetime of the testator. Miller v. Von Schwarzenstein, 64 N. Y. Supp. 475, 478, 51 App. Div. 18.

"Living issue," within the meaning of the devise to a certain beneficiary, but with a remainder over in case the first beneficiary dies without issue then living, includes a child born after the death of the first beneficiary. Appeal of Laird, 85 Pa. 339, 343.

Death of testator referred to.

A testator gave his residuary estate upon trust to pay an annuity during her life, and to accumulate the surplus income until the expiration of six months after A.'s death, and then to divide the residue and accumulation into as many shares as there should be children living of A. and B. who should have lived to attain 21, or, in case of any of them being dead under that age, who should have left issue, to pay and apply one share to each of the children of A. and B. which should have lived to have attained 21, and to the issue of each child who should have died under that age. Held, that the word "living" did not refer to the period of distribution, but to the testator's death, so that each child on attaining 21 took a vested interest absolutely. Kidd v. North, 27 Eng. Law & Eq. 479, 481.

"Living," as used in a will bequeathing "to my sister," etc., a certain sum, "if she be living," means if she be living at the testator's death. McCoury's Ex'rs v. Leek, 14 N. J. Eq. (1 McCart) 70, 76.

In an assignment of a life policy and all moneys payable under it to the beneficiary, if living, the phrase "if living" was construed to mean if the beneficiary was living at the time of the death of insured. Burton v. Burton, 67 N. Y. Supp. 333, 339, 56 App. Div. 1.

Time of distribution referred to.

The word "living," in a will providing for distribution after death of all of testator's grandchildren, and when the youngest grandchild living of his son was 22 years old, was held to refer, not to the death of testator, but to the time of distribution; there being many parts of the will which would be meaningless with the former construction, but all having a meaning with the latter construction. In re Gerber's Estate, 46 Atl. 497, 196 Pa. 366.

Where the testator by his will gave to his wife certain money, "to be laid out in good bank stock, for her to have the interest of the same during her lifetime, and after her decease to be equally divided among his living children," the term "living children" necessarily implies a gift to the surviving children, to the exclusion of those who have deceased, and excludes those who, living at the death of the testator, have died during the lifetime of his wife, and were not living at the time for distribution. Hill v. Rockingham Bank, 45 N. H. 270 273.

LIVE AND DEAD STOCK.

Testatrix devised to certain beneficiaries all her negro, mulatto, and other slaves, men, women, and children, and all her cattle, mules, horses, "and other live and dead stock upon the plantation," and all her other real estate in Jamaica. Held, that the intent to give everything connected with the plantation—particularly all stock—was expressed by the phrase "other live and dead stock on the plantation," and the title to the growing crops passed thereunder. Blake v. Gibbs, 5 Russ. 13.

Wine or books.

A bequest of the use of a house, with all the furniture and stock, carriages, and horses, and "other live and dead stock," does not include wine and books in the library. Porter v. Tournay, 3 Ves. 310.

LIVE ANIMALS.

"Live animals," as used in 14 Stat. 48, imposing a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem on all live animals imported from foreign countries, includes singing birds. Reiche v. Smythe (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 479, 480.

LIVE APART.

A statute dispensing with the concurrence of a husband in a conveyance of property by a wife, when living apart from his wife, construed not to include a temporary absence of the husband for business purposes in the pursuit of his ordinary calling. Ex parte Gilmore, 3 Man. G. & S. 967.

LIVE IN ADULTERY.

On a trial for living in adultery, under Code 1886, § 4012, the jury were properly instructed that occasional acts of adultery do not make out the offense; but if there was adulterous intercourse, and such a condition of the minds of the parties that, when opportunity offered, the act would be repeated, defendant was guilty; and that this condition makes a living in adultery. Bodiford v. State, 86 Ala. 67, 5 South. 559, 11 Am. St. Rep. 207.

A single or occasional act of criminal intercourse, without having cohabited, is not a "living together in adultery," within a statute punishing such an offense. Morrill v. State, 5 Tex. App. 447, 450.

A single act of adultery—the voluntary sexual intercourse of a married person with one not the husband or wife—is not the offense of "living together in adultery," but an element or constituent of that offense. Brown v. State, 18 South. 811, 812, 108 Ala. 18.

"Living in adultery," as used in Code, § 3231, providing that persons living in adultery or fornication shall be subject to fine and imprisonment, means that the persons must have lived together in the same house continually as man and wife; and hence proof of one act of criminal intimacy was not sufficient to constitute the offense, though such act was the result of previous arrangement and understanding between the parties. Smith v. State, 39 Ala. 554, 555.

"Living in adultery," as used in a statute providing that persons living in adultery shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, is not synonymous with "living together"; and while one act of illicit connection would not constitute living together in adultery, yet, when two persons live together in a state of cohabitation, one of them being married to some other person, both would be guilty of living together in adultery, though only one of them be married at the time; and repeated adulterous meetings at any given place, or even at different places, is sufficient to constitute the offense of adultery, and it is not necessary, in order to constitute a living together in adultery, that the parties should reside together, or should have their board, lodging, and washing in common, but their frequent acts of illicit intercourse with each other—one of them being married to some other person—is the crime the law intends should be punished. Parks v. State, 4 Tex. App. 134, 140.

"Living in adultery," as used in Clay's Dig. p. 431, § 3, providing that, if any man and woman shall live together in adultery or fornication, they shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, does not mean that the defendant should have abandoned his own home and taken up his abode with the adulteress, or that he should have taken her to his own house, or made her supreme in his affections, and excluded his wife from the conjugal bed; and hence, where a married man visited and roomed with his paramour one night in every week for seven months at her residence, a half mile from his own house, he was guilty of the offense of living with her in adultery, within the meaning of the statute, since such a course of conduct, persevered in for such a time, must become open and notorious, and, so far as the outrage on decency and morality is concerned, can be little less objectionable than making his paramour the partner of his own bed and board. Collins v. State, 14 Ala. 608, 610.

"Living in adultery," as used in the statute providing that persons who shall live together in adultery or fornication shall be liable to fine and imprisonment, is a state or condition of cohabitation, as distinguished from a single or occasional criminal act; and if the parties for a single day live together in adultery, intending a continuance of the connection, the offense is complete, though the relation may be interrupted or broken off by prosecution, or fear of prosecution, or from any other cause. Hall v. State, 53 Ala. 463, 465.

It may be true, and doubtless is the law, that occasional acts of illicit intercourse, each had by a previous understanding or agreement for the particular act, not contemplating a continuance of the unlawful cohabitation or connection, but made in each instance for the single occasion, would not be a violation of the statute against living in a state of adultery or fornication, but there may be a state or condition of cohabitation which is unlawful and prohibited by the statute, although the proof may not show more than occasional acts of illicit intercourse. Walker v. State, 16 South. 7, 104 Ala. 56.

"Living in adultery," as used in Wag. St. p. 500, § 8, providing that every person who shall live in a state of open and notorious adultery shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, means an open and notorious living or cohabiting together; and, in order to constitute the crime, the parties must reside together publicly in the face of society, as if the conjugal relation existed between them, and only occasional acts of illicit intercourse are not sufficient to constitute the offense. State v. Crouner, 56 Mo. 147, 150. To the same effect, see Goodwin v. Owen, 55 Ind. 243, 249; People v. Gates, 46 Cal. 52, 53;

Swancoat v. State, 4 Tex. App. 105, 107; State v. Gartell, 14 Ind. 280.

LIVE IN MY FAMILY.

The phrase "to live in my family," in a contract with a mother-in-law "to live in my family," "involves, to some extent, services or attention toward the mother-in-law. She is not to be fed as a brute, nor to be sheltered as a horse, simply. She is entitled to decent physical comforts, and these, it will be admitted, are implied in every such contract." But where the contract does not state the extent of such physical comforts to be so provided, the extent thereof cannot be determined by the court, or specific performance enforced. Rutan v. Crawford, 18 Atl. 180, 183, 45 N. J. Eq. (18 Stew.) 99.

LIVE STOCK.

All cattle, horses, mules, asses, sheep, and hogs are deemed live stock. Pol. Code Idaho 1901, § 660.

For the purposes of the chapter relating to railroad corporations, the terms "live stock" and "stock" shall include all classes of horses, asses, mules, neat cattle, sheep, and swine. Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 3216.

Neat cattle, horses, mules, asses, sheep, and goats are live stock. Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 1987.

Fowls.

"Live stock," as used in the order of the Secretary of War, May 13, 1863, directing the commanders of departments to prohibit the purchase and sale of horses, mules, and live stock intended for exportation, etc., does not include fowls. The Matilda A. Lewis (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 1108, 1109.

Hogs.

"Live stock," as used in Code, § 1289, requiring railroad companies, in order to exonerate themselves from liability for injuries to stock, to fence their roads against live stock running at large, includes all live stock and not merely horses and cattle, and therefore includes hogs. Lee v. Minneapolis & St. L. Ry. Co., 23 N. W. 299, 300, 66 Iowa. 131.

Horses.

"Live stock," as used in an insurance policy insuring live stock against lightning, includes horses. Hapeman v. Citizens' Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 85 N. W. 454, 126 Mich. 191, 86 Am. St. Rep. 535.

"Live stock," as used in Code, § 1289, providing that any corporation operating a railway that fails to fence the same against live stock running at large at all points where the right to fence the same exists shall be liable to the owner of any such stock injured or killed by reason of the want of such fence, should be construed to include horses harnessed and hitched to a wagon, thus constituting a team. The word "stock," as employed in agriculture, means, according to Webster, domestic animals or beasts collected, used, or raised on a farm, as cattle or sheep, called also "live stock." While it may be admitted that the term "stock" does not embrace the idea of a team, it cannot be denied that the term "team" embraces the idea of live stock. The term "team" means two or more horses, oxen, or other beasts harnessed together to the same vehicle for drawing. A team, therefore, is composed of live stock, and cannot exist without it. It would be exceedingly technical to hold that two horses, when harnessed and hitched together to a wagon, ceased to fall under the designation of live stock. Inman v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 15 N. W. 286, 287. 60 Iowa, 459.

LIVE STOCK DEALER.

As tradesman, see "Trader—Tradesman."

LIVE TOGETHER.

The question whether the word "living," in a charge that a married woman was living with a man other than her husband, imputed to her any improper conduct, was a question for the jury. Shea v. Sun Printing & Publishing Ass'n, 70 N. Y. St. Rep. 438, 439, 85 N. Y. Supp. 703.

A statute making an unmarried man and an unmarried woman who live together and have carnal intercourse with each other guilty of fornication does not mean that the parties shall actually reside together—that is, board, lodge, and have their washing together in common—to make their acts of illicit intercourse with each other fornication, but it is their habitual acts of illicit intercourse with each other which constitute the crime. Powell v. State, 12 Tex. App. 238, 239.

"Living together," as used in Pen. Code, arts. 333, 337, providing that fornication may be committed by the parties living together and having carnal intercourse with each other, or by having such intercourse without living together, means that the parties must dwell or reside together; abide together in the same habitation, as a common or joint residing place. Thomas v. State, 12 S. W. 1008, 1099, 28 Tex. App. 300.

"Living together," as used in Pen. Code, art. 333, providing that the living together of certain persons shall constitute the crime of adultery, means that the parties must actually live—that is, dwell and reside—together. Bird v. State, 11 S. W. 641, 642, 27 Tex. App. 635, 11 Am. St. Rep. 214; Massey v. State (Tex.) 65 S. W. 911, 912; Burnett v. State, 70 S. W. 207, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 228.

LIVE WITH.

Within the rule of law laid down in Tayman v. Tayman, 2 Md. Ch. 393, that, if the wife be living with her husband, an allowance of alimony pendente lite would be unnecessary and improper, would not include a case where the wife, with her children, occupied the same house with her husband, but the husband occupied a separate room, and did not eat at the same table; there being no cohabitation as husband and wife at the time of the filing of the bill for divorce, nor for several months previous. Cowan v. Cowan, 16 Pac. 215, 221, 10 Colo. 540.

"Living with me," as used by a testator in bequeathing a year's wages to each of the servants "living with me," means those living in the testator's service, and not necessarily those living in the same house. Blakewell v. Pennant, 9 Hare, 551, 553.

LIVELIHOOD.

Acts 39 & 40 Geo. III, c. 104, permitting persons earning their livelihood within the city of London to be sued therein, means seeking the whole of a livelihood there, and not obtaining it partly within and partly without the city. Stephens v. Derry, 16 East, 147.

LIVELY.

That a person was driving a team on a lively trot in a city is not, as a matter of law or fact, negligent. Crocker v. Knickerbocker Ice Co., 92 N. Y. 652.

LIVES.

See "Joint Lives."

LIVING.

In a will giving specific legacies to testator's grandchildren, and directing that his railroad stock, bank stock, and government bonds be kept at interest, and dividends paid to his living grandchildren until all his grandchildren's legacies be paid, "the testator probably meant grandchildren whose legacies had not lapsed by their death, intending thus to confine the payments to those who were or might be entitled to the legacies." House v. Ewen, 37 N. J. Eq. (10 Stew.) 368, 376.

Children en ventre sa mere.

A child en ventre sa mere at its father's death is deemed living, and entitled to participate in a devise to children living at their father's death. Beale v. Beale, 1 P. Wms. 244; Clarke v. Blake, 2 Brown, Ch. *320; Hall v. Hancock, 32 Mass. (15 Pick.) 255, 258, 26 Am. Dec. 598.

A will providing that the residue of the testator's estate should be divided equally among such of his children and grandchildren as might be living at his decease includes a grandchild born within nine months after the testator's death, since a child en ventre sa mere must be considered a child living, so as to take a beneficiary interest in the bequest, where the description is "children living." Hall v. Hancock, 32 Mass. (15 Pick.) 255, 258, 26 Am. Dec. 598.

LIVING STREAM.

The word "living," as used in referring to a stream as a living stream, is employed in the sense of permanent or continuous. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Speelman, 40 N. E. 541, 543, 12 Ind. App. 372 (citing Board of Com'rs of Parke County v. Wagner, 38 N. E. 171, 173, 138 Ind. 609).

LIVERY OF SEISIN.

"Livery of seisin is investiture or delivery of corporeal possession of the land or tenement. 2 Bl. Comm. 310; Co. Litt. 9. But whether the estate be in fee simple or in tail or for life, livery of seisin was, at the common law, equally requisite." Micheau v. Crawford, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 90, 108.

The term "livery of seisin" means delivery of possession. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Cannon (U. S.) 46 Fed. 224, 232.

LIVERY STABLE.

As storehouse, see "Storehouse."

A livery stable is defined to be a place where horses are groomed, fed, and hired, and where vehicles are let. Act April 22, 1899, providing that boroughs shall have power to enact ordinances establishing reasonable rates of license taxes on hacks, carriages, etc., used in carrying persons and property for pay, does not authorize the imposition of a license tax on the vehicles used by the keeper of a livery stable; the statute being applicable to proprietors of hacks, cabs, etc., that stand for hire in the streets. Kittanning Borough v. Montgomery, 5 Pa. Super. Ct. R. 196, 198.

LIVERY STABLE KEEPER.

As laborer, see "Laborer."
As merchant, see "Merchant."
As teamster, see "Teamster."
As trader, see "Trader—Tradesman."

LLOYD'S INSURANCE.

A Lloyd's insurance originally was an insurance based on a fund made up of deposits by each one of the members, from which, when a loss was adjusted, the agent took the means of payment. In this country, in adopting the Lloyd's system of insurance, money representing the entire insurance was not deposited; but in lieu of such a deposit the members each contributed a certain sum to make up a fund, and each contracted with agents who were the representatives of the association to pay in from time to time so much as should be needed to pay losses. Under the Lloyd's system of insurance, after the loss was adjusted, the insured received from the fund so provided the amount of the loss. The fund deposited was, in the strictest sense, a trust fund for the benefit of persons holding policies. Under the Lloyd's system, as adopted in this country, the trust in favor of the insured consists of the amount deposited by each member, and the covenant on the part of each member to pay in money to answer the amount due from him upon such loss. Durbrow v. Eppens, 46 Atl. 582, 585, 65 N. J. Law, 10.

LOAD.

See "Car Load."

"Load," as used in a contract for the sale of a load of barley, is to be construed as meaning the equivalent in bushels to the carrying capacity of the conveyance usually employed for transporting such grain. Flanagan v. Demarest, 26 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Rob.) 173, 181.

The words "vehicle and load," in Highway Law, § 154, providing that no town should be liable for damages resulting from the breaking of any bridge by transportation on the same of any vehicle and load together weighing four tons or over, were construed to include both the threshing machine and separator whose combined weight caused a bridge to break. Heib v. Town of Big Flats, 73 N. Y. Supp. 86, 87, 66 App. Div. 88.

A charter party contained a warranty that the charterer should not load the vessel more than her registered tonnage. It was held that such provision extended to all kinds of merchandise, and was not restricted by succeeding words describing particular articles, nor can such terms include, according to their obvious, strict, and natural meaning, things put on board as necessary parts of the ship's stores or provisions or equipment. Thus they would not apply to guns and ammunition for the defense of the vessel, nor to spare chains and anchors, nor to coal carried to be consumed on board, nor to salt or grain for provisions, according to the duties resting on the owner by law, and the rights reserved to him in the charter party; nor do they include articles shipped for the purpose of serving as ballast or dunnage. If the warranty not to load more than the ship's registered tonnage had extended to goods of every description, and the tonnage used had been of the ordinary kind—planks or pieces of wood placed against the sides and bottom of the hold to receive, support, and protect the cargo—it could hardly have been contended that their bulk or weight should be ascertained and computed in ascertaining the burden or tonnage of the vessel. The true meaning and whole effect of the warranty was to forbid the loading of an amount greater than prohibited articles as cargo in a ship properly fitted to receive it. Thwing v. Great Western Ins. Co., 103 Mass. 401, 406, 4 Am. Rep. 567.

As wagon load.

Where a city ordinance made it unlawful to sell coal without weighing it on the city scales, and paying 10 cents for the weighing of any load or part of a load, it was held that though the word "load," used in the ordinance, was so indefinite that it might be said to include a car load as well as a wagon load, yet, owing to the fact that it was the evident intention of the ordinance to protect the residents of the city from fraud or imposition in weighing coal, the word "load" should be construed to refer to wagon load, and to have no application to sales of very small quantities, such as a bucket or wheelbarrow load of coal. Wills v. City of Ft. Smith, 66 S. W. 922, 923, 70 Ark. 221.

Weight of vehicle.

"Ordinarily, when mention is made of a load, reference is had only to the material placed upon the carriage, and which is designed for removal from one place to another, not to the carriage itself, or to anything used or employed simply as means by which the removal or transportation of that material is effected." The word is used in this sense in Comp. St. p. 180, § 32, providing that no person shall recover against any town, damages sustained on account of the insufficiency or want of repair of any highway, which has arisen in consequence of the passing on such highway, of any carriage bearing a load exceeding 10,000 pounds in weight, and hence the weight of the carriage or wagon rack is not to be added to that of the load in computing the weight thereof. Howe v. Town of Castleman, 25 Vt. 162, 167.

LOADED ARMS.

A rifle which is loaded, but which, for want of proper priming, will not go off, is not a loaded arm, within 1 Vict. c. 85, § 3, relating to the offense of aiming a loaded arm at any person. Reg. v. James, 1 C. & K. 530, 531.

9 Geo. IV, c. 31, §§ 11, 12, punishing attempts to discharge loaded arms at persons, means some implement or weapon ordinarily used for offensive purposes, and projecting a missile impelled by explosives; and a tin box containing gunpowder and detonators intended to ignite the powder when any one opened the box is not a loaded arm. Rex v. Mountford, 7 Car. & P. 242.

Within St. 9 Geo. IV, c. 31, §§ 11, 12, prohibiting the carrying of loaded arms, a firearm which is susceptible in its then condition of being fired is a loaded arm. Hence, if a pistol be loaded with gunpowder and balls, but its touchhole is plugged so that it cannot possibly be fired, it does not constitute a loaded arm, within the statute. Rex v. Harris, 5 Car. & P. 159.

LOADING.

In a contract for the transportation of stock by railroad, by which the owner assumes all risk of injuries which the animals may receive in loading and unloading, the provision for loading and unloading the cattle had respect to the terminus of the transportation, and not to loading and unloading at any intermediate station. Penn. v. Buffalo & E. R. Co., 49 N. Y. 204-208, 10 Am. Rep. 355.

A policy of marine insurance providing that the adventure should begin "from the loading of the goods on board said vessel," without any words giving or calling for any further description of the place of loading, will be construed to mean from the loading at the port of departure. Clark v. Higgins, 132 Mass. 586, 590.

The clause "while the vessel is at B. loading," as used in a policy of insurance on a vessel, reciting that the risk was to be suspended while the vessel is at B. loading, means that the risk was to be suspended while the vessel was at B. for the purpose of loading, whether actually engaged in the process of loading or not. Reed v. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co., 95 U. S. 23, 30, 24 L. Ed. 348.

In life insurance.

"Loading" is the sum added to the net premium for a life insurance policy, deemed sufficient to pay expenses and provide for contingencies. Fuller v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 41 Atl. 4, 10, 70 Conn. 647.

LOADING OFF SHORE.

See "Off Shore."

LOAF SUGAR.

"Loaf sugar," as used in Tariff Act 1816, c. 107, laying a duty on loaf sugar, means, in a commercial sense, in the business of buying and selling sugar in loaves. The name doubtless carries in some degree an implication of quality arising from the fact that quality is usually associated with form, but the designation is primarily derived from and depends upon the form. Crushed sugar is not known as, or even called, "loaf sugar." Whatever may be its quality, it is still not loaf sugar, for it wants the form. United States v. Breed (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 1222, 1223.

LOAN.

See "Maritime Loan"; "Temporary Loan."
See, also, "Lend."

To loan is to deliver to another for temporary use on condition that the thing be returned, or to deliver for temporary use on condition that an equivalent in kind shall be returned, with a compensation for its use. (Webster.) Ramsey's Estate v. Whitbeck, 81 Ill. App. 210, 217, 218.

To loan is to lend a thing to another, either gratuitously or for reward. In order to constitute a loan, there must be a thing loaned, a lender, and a borrower, as well as a contract between the parties. State v. Brandt, 41 Iowa, 593, 610.

"Except with respect to money, 'to loan' implies that the thing is delivered to another for use without reward, and to be returned in specie." Coker v. State (Ala.) 8 South. 874, 875 (citing Nichols v. Fearson, 32 U. S. [7 Pet.] 109, 8 L. Ed. 623).

A loan for use is a contract by which one gives to another the temporary possession and use of personal property, and the latter agrees to return the same thing to him at a future time, without reward for its use. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1884.

A loan is said to be that which is furnished for temporary use, with a condition that it shall be returned, or its equivalent, with a compensation for the use. The payment of usance or interest at given times and at a given rate is one of the unerring tests of a loan of money. Rodman v. Munson (N. Y.) 13 Barb. 63, 75.

A loan for consumption is a transfer of personal property, such as corn or money, to be consumed by the borrower, and to be returned to the lender in kind or quality. Kinne v. Kinne (N. Y.) 45 How. Prac. 61, 65 (citing Bouv. Law Dict. vol. 2, p. 156, tit. "Mutuum").

A loan has been properly defined as an advancement of money upon a contract or stipulation, express or implied, to repay it some future day. Brittin v. Freeman, 17 N. J. Law (2 Har.) 191, 231.

A loan implies that the use of a thing is parted with for a limited time and for a special purpose, the right of property remaining in the lender. An estate which can never revert back cannot be a loan. As defined by Kent, a loan is the bailment of an article for a certain time, to be used by the borrower without paying for the use. Booth v. Terrell, 16 Ga. 20, 25.

A loan results where one man hands his money over to another for a definite time, generally for interest, but with the expectation that it is to be returned. City of Philadelphia v. Kelly, 81 Atl. 47, 48, 168 Pa. 207.

A loan is made when the borrower receives money, over which he exercises dominion, and which he expressly or impliedly promises to return. Griffen v. Train, 81 N. Y. Supp. 977, 981, 40 Misc. Rep. 290.

"By a loan of money is meant the delivery by one party to, and the receipt by the other party of, a given sum of money, on an agreement, express or implied, to repay the sum loaned, with or without interest. A loan is usually made at the request and for the benefit of the borrower, and differs from the commodatum of the civil law in this: that in the latter the specific thing loaned was to be returned, whereas by the other the thing loaned may be consumed, and the depositary discharge himself by returning another thing of the same value, or its equivalent in money." Payne v. Gardiner, 29 N. Y. 146, 167.

"Loaning the credit," as used in Const. 1870, art. 2, § 29, prohibiting the loaning of the credit of a city, county, or town to or in aid of any person, company, or association, except on an election first held by the qualified voters, and the assent of three-fourths of the votes cast at such election, means supporting the credit of such other person, etc., by guaranties, indorsements, or contracts of like character, and possibly donations or loans in aid of the enterprise, which must be a corporate purpose. Green v. Dyersburg (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 1099, 1103.

Defendants signed a writing which recited that they had received of plaintiff a certain sum of money, to operate with in buying and selling crude oil for him, "and we are to pay said [plaintiff] the principal and proceeds over and above cost and trouble of buying and selling, use of tanks," etc. Held, that the transaction was a loan. Brewster v. Bates, 30 N. Y. Supp. 780, 782, 51 Hun, 294.

The term "loans on stocks and bonds," used in describing an item of property assessed to a savings bank, sufficiently described the property. Savings & Loan Soc. v. City and County of San Francisco, 63 Pac. 665, 666, 131 Cal. 356.

Accommodation paper.

When an accommodation note or bill, made for the sole purpose of raising money, is discounted for that purpose, and with knowledge on the part of the party discounting it that it was made for that purpose only, the cases call it a "loan," and hold it subject to the usury laws. Niagara County Bank v. Baker, 15 Ohio St. 68, 74, 75.

If the borrower receives a note of the lender, to be used in raising money, the transaction is a "loan," within the usury laws. Fulton Bank of New York v. Benedict (N. Y.) 1 Hall, 529, 609 (citing Schermerhorn v. Talman, 14 N. Y. 93).

The words "loan and trust," within the state of Kansas authorizing the organization of a corporation to buy and sell personal property, etc., and to transact business of a loan and trust company, do not appear to have been defined by statute or decision in Kansas; and it must be assumed that the general rule is applicable that such companies have no implied power to lend their credit or to bind themselves by accommodation indorsement. They may guaranty paper owned by them, and the paper which they negotiate in due course of business, and the proceeds of which they received, but the naked power to guaranty the paper of one-third party to another is not incidental to the powers ordinarily exercised by them. Ward v. Joslin, 22 Sup. Ct. 807, 809, 186 U. S. 142, 46 L. Ed. 1093.

As an advance.

"Loan" has been defined as an advancement of money on a contract or stipulation, express or implied, to repay at some future day. Brittin v. Freeman, 17 N. J. Law (2 Har.) 191, 231.

"Loaned," as used in the following devise: "I have loaned to my children as hereinafter set forth, which loans I wish to be considered as advances to them," etc. "To this time I have advanced to my son J. $7,200"—is used interchangeably with "advanced." Appeal of Wright, 93 Pa. 82, 87; Id., 89 Pa. 67, 70.

"Loan," as used in Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 23, § 69, providing that no loan of money shall be made by any corporation to any stockholder, but that the section shall not apply to any building or homestead association, or any association for the loaning of money on real or personal property, is not synonymous with the word "advance," as used in section 113, giving power to an insurance company to advance money on any property, real or personal. Fisher v. Parr, 48 Atl. 621, 628, 92 Md. 245.

Advances are not always loans, but may mean, in an offer to make advances on a legacy, that the legacies are to be purchased. Trust & Deposit Co. of Onondaga v. Verity, 67 N. Y. Supp. 918, 920, 83 Misc. Rep. 4.

Application of money.

To constitute a loan, it is not essential that the manual delivery of the money should be made by the lender to the borrower. An agreement to advance money as a loan, and application of it as directed by the borrower, created the relation of debtor and creditor, vested title to the money in the borrower, and stamped the transaction as a loan. Hirshfeld v. Howard (Tex.) 59 S. W. 55, 58.

Bond issue.

A "loan of credit," within the meaning of the constitutional provision that the General Assembly shall not authorize any county, city, or town to loan its credit, etc., to any association, company, or incorporation, unless, etc., includes the act of a municipality in issuing its bonds to assist a railroad company in building its road or erecting its shops, which are necessary and useful in operating its road. Jarrott v. Moberly (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 366, 367.

As borrow.

In a charter of a building association, stating the object of the association to be the accumulation of a fund by small monthly installments to enable the parties to purchase real estate, loan money, and effect other similar purposes, the term "loan" should be construed in the sense of "borrow," conferring upon the corporation the power to loan its fund to its members. The word "loan" is sometimes, though improperly, used in the sense of "borrow." Massey v. Citizens' Building & Savings Ass'n, 22 Kan. 624, 631.

Credit.

While, in a broad sense of the word, the credit given for the price of goods sold may be called a "loan," it is not a loan in the ordinary and usual sense of the word, nor within the meaning of St. 1892, c. 423, entitled "An act relating to the discharge of small loans, and the redemption of the security given for such loans," and providing that no mortgage of household furniture on which interest is charged at the rate of 18 per cent. per annum, and made to secure a loan, etc., shall be valid, etc.; and hence the statute does not apply to a mortgage given by the purchaser of furniture to the seller at the time of sale to secure a part or the whole of the purchase price. Day v. Cohen, 43 N. H. 109, 165 Mass. 304.

The terms "loan or borrowing" have an apt, fixed, and certain meaning in common language, and would no more be taken to mean giving day or credit on an absolute sale of property than to express any other idea the most foreign to the subject which the mind can conceive. Henry v. Thompson (Ala.) Minor, 209, 223.

As debt.

"Loans and advances," as used in a will directing that certain loans and advances made to testator's son-in-law, and secured by mortgages, should be deducted from his daughter's distributive share of his estate, included only sums advanced so as to be an existing debt, and not sums voluntarily expended by the testator in improvement of the estate mortgaged to secure the loans and advances. Marquise de Portes v. Hurlbut, 14 Atl. 891, 892, 44 N. J. Eq. (17 Stew.) 517.

Debt distinguished.

A loan is something quite different from a debt. A loan contracted creates a debt, but there may be a debt contracted without contracting a loan. By "temporary loan" we understand something different from the general term "loan." Under the term "loan" simply the time for payment may be fixed, in the discretion of the parties to the contract. Hence a corporation may have the power to contract a debt for property which it is authorized to purchase, and not have the power to borrow money or contract a loan or issue its bonds as stock for the purpose of raising money on them. Ketchum v. City of Buffalo (N. Y.) 21 Barb. 294, 305.

Deposit.

See, also, "Deposit."

"Loaning out," as used in Rev. St. § 1327, prohibiting public officers from loaning out the public moneys, etc., does not include a deposit of such money in a bank. State v. Rubey, 77 Mo. 610, 619.

A general deposit in a bank is a loan. Ricks v. Broyles, 78 Ga. 610, 3 S. E. 772, 6 Am. St. Rep. 280.

"Loan," as used in the national currency act of June 3, 1864, prohibiting national banks from making any loan or discount on the security of the shares of their own capital stock, should be construed to include placing by one bank of its funds on permanent deposit with another bank, for a deposit is nothing but a loan, and is within both the spirit and letter of the provision, whether interest be obtained or not. The banker is accountable for deposits he receives as a debtor, and the individual borrower of money from the bank sustains no other relation to it. In both cases money is borrowed, to be returned in a greater or less period of time, according to the contract of the parties. First Nat. Bank v. Lainer, 78 U. S. (11 Wall.) 369, 374, 20 L. Ed. 172.

Under Const. art. 8, § 9, providing that moneys belonging to the permanent educational fund of the state cannot be invested or loaned except on United States or state or registered county bonds, it was held that the depositing of public funds in banks constitutes a loan and investment of the money so deposited. The fact that a person borrows money for an indefinite length of time, payable on demand of the depositor, does not make the transaction any less a loan than if the money had been taken for a fixed long period of time, and the same is regarded as true of deposits in a bank. State v. Bartley, 58 N. W. 172, 177, 39 Neb. 353, 23 L. R. A. 67.

Where the relation between a depositor in a bank and his banker is that of debtor and creditor, simply, the transaction cannot in any proper sense be regarded as a loan, unless the money is left, not for safe-keeping, but for a fixed period, at interest, in which case the transaction assumes all the characteristics of a loan. In re Law's Estate, 22 Atl. 831, 832, 144 Pa. 499, 14 L. R. A. 103.

A loan of money is a contract by which one delivers a sum of money to another, and the latter agrees to return at a future time a sum equivalent to that which he borrowed, and hence a deposit of money with a banker for safe-keeping is not a loan. Allibone v. Ames, 68 N. W. 165, 166, 9 S. D. 74, 33 L. R. A. 585.

The word "loan," and not "deposit," designates the act of an administrator in placing money in a bank, taking therefor a certificate of deposit payable after one year, with interest; and the administrator is liable for loss of the money, resulting from the subsequent insolvency of the bank. Appeal of Baer, 18 Atl. 1, 127 Pa. 360, 4 L. R. A. 609.

A deposit is where a sum of money is left with a banker for safe-keeping, subject to order, and payable, not in the specific money deposited, but in an equal sum. It may or it may not bear interest, according to the agreement. While the relation between the depositor and banker is that of debtor and creditor, the transaction cannot in any proper sense be regarded as a loan, unless the money is left, not for safe-keeping, but for a fixed period at interest, in which case the transaction assumes the characteristics of a loan. Hunt v. Hopley, 95 N. W. 205, 206, 120 Iowa, 695 (citing State v. McFetridge, 84 Wis. 473, 54 N. W. 1, 20 L. R. A. 223).

The term "loan," in Cr. Code 1873, § 124, defining embezzlement of public funds, which provides that if any officer charged with the collection, safe-keeping, or disbursement of public funds shall loan, with or without interest, any portion of the public money, every such act shall be deemed embezzlement of so much of said money as shall be thus loaned, is employed in a restricted sense, and includes those transactions only in which the conventional relation of borrower and lender exists, and has no application to the deposit in bank for safe-keeping of public funds by the custodian thereof, who so far retains his control over them that they may be by him at any time reclaimed. State v. Hill, 66 N. W. 541, 552, 47 Neb. 456.

Under Rev. St. c. 38, § 81, prohibiting any public officer from using by way of investment or loan for his use any portion of moneys, etc., intrusted to him for safe-keeping, money deposited upon a deposit account (i. e., money lodged in a bank for safe-keeping, and not capable of being withdrawn, except after certain specified notice) would be a loan, and, if so deposited by an officer for his own use, with or without interest, would be a violation of the statute. But money deposited by an officer for safe-keeping, and not for any definite length of time, and not for his own use, and subject to be withdrawn at any time, would not be a loan, as the word "loan" is used in the statute. Ramsey's Estate v. Whitbeck, 81 Ill. App. 210, 217, 218 (quoting Webst. Dict.).

Discount.

See "Discount."

Donations.

"Loan any credit," in the Constitution, declaring that no municipal corporation shall become a stockholder in any joint-stock company or loan its credit in aid of such company, means simply to prohibit subscriptions and the extending of credit to such company, and in no wise prohibit the donation of money to an association. To donate money is one thing, and to become a stockholder or loan credit, is another. The framers of the Constitution might very consistently have desired to protect the counties from the uncertain liabilities of stockholders or sureties, and still have permitted a donation of money. Gibson v. Mason, 5 Nev. 283, 301.

"Loan its credit," as used in a constitution providing that the General Assembly shall not authorize any county, city, or town to become a stockholder in, or loan its credit to, any company, association, or corporation, unless two-thirds of the qualified voters at an election held therein, shall assent thereto, cannot be construed to include the purchase of lands and the donating of them by a city to a railroad company, though the money used in such purchase was obtained on its bonds. Jarrott v. Moberly (U. S.) 13 Fed. 366, 370.

Forbearance.

See, also, "Forbearance."

"The word 'loan,' in the language of Mr. Comyn, must not be too strictly construed, for there are many cases in which, though 5 Wds. & P.—18 no loan originally occurred, yet, by some subsequent agreement between the debtor and creditor, usury may be generated. It is not necessary to the creation of a loan that money should be paid, on one hand, and received, on the other, for the circumstance of a man's money remaining in another's hands in consequence of an agreement for that purpose will equally constitute a loan." McAdams v. Randolph, 41 N. J. Law (12 Vroom) 218, 221 (quoting Comyn, Usury, 157).

"Loan of money," as used in a statute which provides that no person shall directly or indirectly receive more than 10 per cent. interest per annum for the loan of money, includes an extension of a loan. Kendig v. Linn, 47 Iowa, 62, 63.

A loan is defined to be anything furnished for a temporary use to a person at his request, on condition that the specific thing shall be returned, or its equivalent in kind. Upon a settlement between plaintiff and defendants of a transaction in which defendants acted as brokers for plaintiff, a certain sum was found due plaintiff, which he demanded; but, at the request of defendants, he accepted a part of the amount, and left the remainder on deposit with defendants until the 1st of the following month. Held, that this converted what was an obligation incurred in a fiduciary capacity into an ordinary loan. Jerome v. Morgan (N. Y.) 13 Daly, 225, 226.

As give.

"Loan," as contained in a provision of a will stating that "I loan to my wife" during her natural life all the residuary estate, was equivalent to the word "give." Chapman v. Chapman, 18 S. E. 913, 90 Va. 409.

The word "loan," in an item of a will giving and bequeathing certain slaves to testator's wife, to her and her heirs forever, and giving and bequeathing to her certain perishable property in fee simple, and then providing, "I loan my wife certain land in lieu of dower," cannot be construed to mean "give," notwithstanding the fact that Code, § 2454, provides that the word "loan," when occurring in a will, will be construed to mean "give," unless the text requires a restricted meaning, as the text clearly shows that the word was used in a restricted meaning, and therefore the wife is only entitled, under the law, to a life estate in the land in question. Britt v. Rawlings, 13 S. E. 336, 87 Ga. 146.

The word "loan," in a will stating that "I loan," certain slaves "to my daughter during her natural life, then to her bodily heirs," is to be construed to mean give. Jones v. Jones, 20 Ga. 699, 700.

A loan implies that a thing is loaned without reward. Being in its primary sig-nification a gratuitous bailment, it may be determined by the lender at his pleasure. A loan is terminated by the demand made for the return of the property loaned, and the refusal to deliver it up is therefore a conversion, for which an action of trover will lie. Cadwallader v. Wagner (Pa.) 7 Kulp, 465, 466.

As money loaned.

A loan is (1) a lending; (2) that which is lent; (3) a permission to use—so that ex vi termini a loan imports that the thing loaned has passed out of the possession of the lender into that of the borrower, and the term "loan" ordinarily means money loaned, so that an assessment on loans on stocks and bonds is sufficiently definite to describe the property. Savings & Loan Soc. v. City & County of San Francisco, 63 Pac. 665, 666, 131 Cal. 356.

"Loan," as used in 1 Rev. St. p. 772, §§ 1, 2, prohibiting a greater rate of interest than 7 per cent. for the loan or forbearance of any money, goods, or things in action, means only a loan which in substance and effect is a loan of money. Dry Dock Bank v. American Life Ins. & Trust Co., 3 N. Y. (3 Comst.) 344, 354.

"Loan," as used in Civ. Code, § 571, providing that corporations organized for the purpose of accumulating and loaning the funds of their members may loan and invest the funds thereof, is technically limited to transactions in which the corporation delivers to the borrower, and the borrower receives from it, a given sum of money upon his agreement with it to repay the same. Savings Bank of San Diego County v. Barrett, 58 Pac. 914, 915, 126 Cal. 413.

Mortgage for pre-existing debt.

A loan or discount is an advance of money to be repaid at a future day. When the interest is taken in advance, it is a discount, but when it is to be paid at the expiration of the credit, or quarterly or yearly, where an extended credit is given, it is a loan. A mortgage for a pre-existing debt is neither a loan nor a discount. It wants the chief ingredient of a loan or discount, namely, an advance of money. Bailey v. Murphy (Mich.) Walk. Ch. 424, 425.

Obligation to repay imported.

Where a certificate of a loan of 30 per cent. of the premium on a life insurance policy designates the sum as a loan, and the amount bears interest, it will be held to be an indebtedness, since a loan imports an obligation to pay back. Omaha Nat. Bank v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 81 Fed. 935, 938.

Any voluntary parting with possession.

"Loan," as used in Code 1886, § 1818, providing that all loans of personal property not in writing shall vest an absolute estate in the possessor after three years, as against purchasers and creditors, was held in Meyers v. Peek, 2 Ala. 648, "not to be technically construed; that it was not necessary to show that the possession was acquired under a strict contract of bailment, technically called 'commodatum,' or loan for use, but that if the owners of personal property parted with the possession voluntarily, either with or without an express contract, there must be a will or deed in writing declaring a loan, and duly recorded." Carr v. Lester, 8 South. 35, 90 Ala. 349.

Sale distinguished.

When one procures liquor, and agrees, as the only consideration for the same, to return an equal quantity of liquor of the same kind, such a transfer is, in common parlance, usually denominated a "loan," and does not come within the legal meaning of the word "sale." Robinson v. State, 27 S. W. 233, 234, 59 Ark. 341; Skinner v. State, 25 S. E. 304, 97 Ga. 690. Contra, see Commonwealth v. Abrams, 150 Mass. 393, 23 N. E. 53; Keaton v. State, 38 S. W. 522, 523, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 259.

It was not a loan by a city, where it purchased a lot and agreed to pay the consideration therefor, for the city got no money thereby, but merely the property and agreed to pay for it. City of Richmond v. McGirr, 78 Ind. 192, 196.

Security.

A loan of money is a lending, on one side, and a borrowing, on the other. A stipulation to repay the principal in money is not necessary to constitute a loan. It is enough if the principal is secured, and not bona fide put in hazard; and it matters not what the nature of the security is, if it is sufficient. The true ground is not that there must be a stipulation to repay the principal, at all events, in money, but that it must in some way be secured, as distinguished from being put in hazard; but whether it is secured by pawn or pledge or a conveyance of land, or is, by agreement, to be returned in lands, goods, or money, is not material. Tyson v. Rickard (Md.) 3 Har. & J. 109, 114, 5 Am. Dec. 424.

Unliquidated damages.

Unliquidated damages do not fall within the meaning of the words "the loan or use of money," and for that reason no interest is demandable upon them. Klages v. Philadelphia & R. Terminal R. Co., 28 Atl. 862, 160 Pa. 386.

LOAN AND TRUST COMPANY.

As bank, see "Bank (In Commercial Law)."

LOAN ASSOCIATION.

See "Building and Loan Association."
As benevolent association, see "Benevolent Association."

LOAN COMPANY.

As used in Laws 1874, c. 324, requiring every loan company to make a certain report, includes a corporation authorized to loan its money, though its business was not confined to the loaning of money. People v. Mutual Trust Co., 96 N. Y. 10, 14.

LOAN FOR CONSUMPTION.

The "loan for consumption" is an agreement by which one person delivers to another a certain quantity of things, which are consumed by the use, under the obligation by the borrower to return to him as much of the same kind and quality. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2910.

LOAN FOR EXCHANGE.

A "loan for exchange" is a contract by which one delivers personal property to another, and the latter agrees to return to the lender a similar thing at a future time, without reward for its use. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1902; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4053; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1406; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2877; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2570.

LOAN FOR USE.

A loan for use is a contract by which one gives to another the temporary possession and use of personal property, and the latter agrees to return the same thing to him at a future time, without reward for its use. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4041; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1394; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2550; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2865.

The loan for use is an agreement by which a person delivers a thing to another to use it according to its natural destination, or according to the agreement, under the obligation on the part of the borrower to return it after he shall have done using it. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2893.

LOAN OF MONEY.

A loan of money is a contract by which one delivers a sum of money to another, and the latter agrees to return at a future time a sum equivalent to that which he borrowed. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1912; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4058; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1411; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2580.

LOATHSOME DISEASE

Gonorrhea is a loathsome disease, within the meaning of a statute entitling the wife to a divorce on the ground that the husband has contracted a loathsome disease. Boughner v. Boughner (Ky.) 41 S. W. 26, 27.

LOBBY.

"Lobbying" signifies to address or solicit members of a legislative body, in the lobby or elsewhere, with the purpose of influencing their votes, and a contract for lobbying is void as against public policy. Colusa County v. Welch, 55 Pac. 243, 245, 122 Cal. 428. "To lobby is for a person not belonging to the Legislature to address or solicit members of the legislative body, in the lobby or elsewhere, away from the house, with a view to influencing their votes." Chippewa Valley & S. R. Co. v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. R. Co., 44 N. W. 17, 24, 75 Wis. 224, 6 L. R. A. 601 (quoting Webst. Dict.).

LOBBY MEMBER.

"A lobby member is a person who frequents the lobby of a house of legislation for the purpose of influencing measures therein pending." Webst. Dict. The term does not include an attorney openly appearing in the Legislative Assembly as a representative of parties interested in certain legislation. Chippewa Valley & S. R. Co. v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. R. Co., 44 N. W. 17, 24, 75 Wis. 224, 6 L. R. A. 601.

LOBBY SERVICES.

Lobby services are personal solicitations by persons supposed to have personal influence with members of Congress to procure the passage of a bill. Trist v. Child, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 441, 448, 22 L. Ed. 623.

"Lobby services" are generally defined to mean the use of personal solicitation, the exercise of personal influence, and improper or corrupt methods, whereby legislative or official action is to be the product. It is not, however, the doing of the improper act which is the sole test. A contract for such services is void, and cannot be enforced. Dunham v. Hastings Pavement Co., 67 N. Y. Supp. 632, 634, 56 App. Div. 244.

LOBBYING CONTRACT.

Plaintiff, a person of large experience in regard to public lands, being satisfied that a certain class of lands that had been kept out of the market on account of a supposed claim under certain railroad grants could be legally thrown open to settlement, entered into an agreement with defendant, who was desirous of acquiring such lands, to instruct the latter in regard to the manner of procuring the same, and to do all that was necessary to have such lands thrown open to settlement, in consideration of a certain proportion of the value of the land acquired by defendant. Held, that the contract was not per se invalid, as against public policy, as a lobbying contract. Houlton v. Nichol, 93 Wis. 393, 67 N. W. 715, 33 L. R. A. 166, 57 Am. St. Rep. 928.

LOBSTERS.

St. 1887, c. 314, § 1, providing a penalty for selling, offering for sale, or having in possession lobsters less than a certain length, should be construed to include dead as well as live lobsters, so that the offense would be committed by having in possession dead lobsters. Commonwealth v. Hodgkins, 49 N. E. 97, 170 Mass. 197.

LOCAL.

Burrill, in his Law Dictionary, defines the word "local" as "relating to place; belonging or confined to a particular place; distinguished from general, personal, or transitory." People v. Hills, 35 N. Y. 449, 451.

An appropriation of money to pay a debt of the state is not within the constitutional restriction as to appropriations for local and private purposes, though the debt was incurred for improvements of a local character. People v. Denmore (N. Y.) 1 Thomp. & C. 280, 282.

LOCAL ACT.

See "Local Law."

LOCAL ACTION.

A local cause of action is one which could only have arisen in a particular place. Pegram v. Owens, 64 Tex. 475, 477 (citing 1 Chit. Pl. 269).

"Local action" means that the cause of action could have arisen only in a particular place, and that the suit must be brought in the county or place in which it arose, and, according to all the authorities, includes an action for damages to real property, and actions on the case for nuisances or for the obstruction of one's right of way. Crook v. Pitcher, 61 Md. 510, 513.

Where the action of covenant is founded on privity of estate, the action is local, and must be sued in the county where the land lies. Lienow v. Ellis, 6 Mass. 331, 332.

All actions are either local or transitory. Real and mixed actions are local, and personal actions are transitory. An action for the recovery of damages for a breach of a contract is a personal action, and therefore transitory. Beirne v. Rosser (Va.) 26 Grat. 537, 541.

In the early ages of the common law all actions were local, and all issues of fact were required to be tried and determined by a jury of the vicinage; but, in the course of time, guided and influenced by the dictates of reason, the principles of justice, and other considerations, motives, and purposes, so well expressed by Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Livingston v. Jefferson (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 660, the courts established a distinction between local and transitory actions. The distinction taken is that actions are deemed transitory when the transactions on which they are founded might have taken place anywhere, but are local where their cause is in its nature necessarily local. This distinction has been recognized in the courts of England and this country in many decisions. Nonce v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 33 Fed. 429, 432.

Local actions are such as require the venue to be laid in the county in which the cause of action arose, for the reason that the cause of action could only have arisen in a particular county. This generally included all actions in which the subject or thing in controversy, or thing sought to be recovered, is, in its nature, local—such as actions of ejectment, and other actions brought to recover the seisin or possession of lands and tenements; also actions which do not directly seek the recovery of lands and tenements, but which arise out of a local subject or the violation of a local right, such as trespass, quare clausum fregit, trespass on the case for nuisances to real property, disturbance of right of way; obstruction or diversion of water courses, etc. The action is also usually held to be local because of the necessity of giving a local description of the thing taken. The test as to whether an action is transitory or local is not, in general, the subject causing the injury, but the object suffering the injury. McLeod v. Connecticut & P. R. Co., 6 Atl. 648, 649, 58 Vt. 727.

An action is local when its cause is, in its nature, necessarily local. Local actions embrace actions for the possession of land, or damages for actual trespass or waste, for nuisance to a house, for the disturbance of rights of way, for the diversion of water courses, and the like. Such causes of action must arise where the property is, and in the county in which it is situated. Condon v. Leipsiger, 55 Pac. 82, 17 Utah, 498.

"Local actions are such as require the venue to be laid in the county in which the cause of action arose. These embrace all actions in which the subject or thing sought to be recovered is in its nature local, such as real actions of waste, when brought to recover the place wasted as well as the damages, and actions of ejectment. They are local because brought to recover the seisin or possession of lands, which are local subjects. Some other actions which do not seek the direct recovery of lands or tenements are also local, because they arise out of a local subject, or the violation of some local right or interest. Of this class are waste for damages only; trespass quare clausum fregit; trespass on the case for injuries to things real, as nuisances to houses or lands; disturbance of right of way; obstruction or diversion of ancient water courses. The action of replevin is local, although it is for damages only, and does not arise out of any local subject, because of the necessity of giving a local description to the thing taken." An action for personal injuries is not local, but transitory. Ackerson v. Erie R. Co., 31 N. J. Law (2 Vroom) 309, 311; McLeod v. Connecticut & P. R. Co., 6 Atl. 648, 649, 58 Vt. 727; Hall v. Decker, 48 Me. 255, 256, 257.

Local actions embrace actions for the possession of land, or damages for actual trespass or waste, for nuisance to a house, for disturbance of right of way, for the diversion of water courses, and the like. Such causes of action must arise where the property is, and in the county in which it is situated. They are necessarily local actions, and remain so under a constitutional provision that an action must be brought in the county in which the cause of action arises. Mosby v. Gisborn, 54 Pac. 121, 127 17 Utah, 257.

An action founded on and growing out of an obstruction of a highway, and raising distinctly and specifically the plaintiff's right to use the way, is essentially a local action, because it involves an interest in the local, fixed subject itself; but an injury happening to an individual on the same highway by reason of any tort or wrongful act of another is not necessarily an injury to the bare right of the user, even though an obstruction of the highway may be incidentally concerned as a mere instrumentality immediately producing the injury complained of. If the pending action involved the right of the plaintiff to use the highway, and the defendant obstructed the way, and by that means denied its existence, the cause of action would indisputably be local. The right of the plaintiff in or to the use of the highway would then be the subject of inquiry, but, where a suit was brought to recover a personal injury sustained on the highway by defendant's negligence in obstructing it, the subject of the injury is the person, and not the highway, and the action is transitory. Guntler v. Dranbauer, 38 Atl. 33, 34, 86 Md. 1.

The line between actions termed "local and transitory" in some of the decided cases is shadowy, but in no case can a suit, the purpose of which is to subject certain property, whether real or personal, to the payment of a debt, or to have it placed in possession of and under the control of a court for any purpose of administration, be termed a local action. The difference between local and transitory actions was thus stated in the case of Mostyn v. Fabrigas, 1 Cowp. 161, by Lord Mansfield: "There is a formal and a substantial distinction as to locality of trial. I state them as different things. The substantial distinction is where the proceeding is in rem, and where the effect of a judgment cannot be had if it be laid in the wrong place. That is the case of all ejectments, where the possession is to be delivered by the sheriff of the county; and, as trials in England are in particular counties, the sheriffs are county officers, and therefore the judgment could not have effect if the action was not laid in the proper county." It has sometimes been said that the principles thus announced furnish simply a technical rule in relation to venue, and that they had no bearing on the more substantial question of jurisdiction. But the language of the great judge is not susceptible of such a construction. The principle stated met with the approval of Chief Justice Marshall in Livingstone v. Jefferson, 1 Brock. 209, Fed. Cas. No. 8,411; and, in deference to what he understood to be the difference between such actions at common law, he felt constrained to hold that an action of trespass quare clausum fregit was a local action. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Gay, 26 S. W. 599, 607, 86 Tex. 571, 25 L. R. A. 52.

"Actions, though merely for damages occasioned by injuries to real property, are local, as trespass, or case for nuisance, or waste, etc., to houses, lands, water courses, rights of common, ways, or other real property, unless there were some contract between the parties on which to ground the action. And, if the land, etc., be out of this kingdom, the plaintiff has no remedy in the English courts." 1 Chit. Pl. 298. So the superior court of the city of New York has no jurisdiction of an action for diverting a water course in the state of New Jersey. Watts' Adm'rs v. Kinney (N. Y.) 6 Hill, 82, 91.

LOCAL ADMINISTRATION.

"Local," as used in Laws 1882, c. 410, § 27, citing that for all purposes the local administration and government of the city of New York shall continue to be in and to be performed by the mayor and aldermen, applies to the extinguishment of fires; and such work, though assigned to the fire department of the corporation by section 34 of such act, is a duty of the corporation, to be performed by that department as its agent. Workman v. City of New York (U. S.) 63 Fed. 298, 304.

LOCAL AGENT.

A local agent is a representative of a corporation to transact its business and represent it in a particular locality. It does not embrace the idea of an agent who casually happens to be in the particular territory, or one who is temporarily sent to such territory to perform some particular purpose or specific act. This is the sense of the term in Rev. St. art. 1223, providing that service of citation on a foreign corporation may be on any general local agent within the state. Frick Co. v. Wright, 55 S. W. 608, 610, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 340.

The term "local agent," in Acts 1895, p. 80, authorizing the taxation of local agents of insurance companies, means any person or firm soliciting, contracting for, or receiving premiums for any insurance company, or who delivers policies, and includes a railroad agent or employé who solicits or receives premiums for accident insurance. Eichlitz v. State, 46 S. W. 643, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 486.

Certain railroad companies, including defendant, a foreign corporation, erected and maintained a joint warehouse in Texas, on the Mexican frontier, for the storage of imported goods and goods for export, until the customs laws were complied with. One-half the expense of erecting and maintaining the warehouse was paid by defendant, and the balance by the other companies, one of which owned the land on which it was built. The agent in charge of this warehouse was appointed without any action or approval by defendant. He was on the pay roll of one of the other companies, and under bond to it for the faithful discharge of his duties. He had no authority to contract for defendant and received and disbursed no money on its account, and it had no control over or power to discharge him. Held, that he was not a "local agent" of defendant, on whom service of process could be made, under Sayles' Rev. Civ. St. Tex. art. 1223a.—Mexican Cent. R. Co. v. Pinkney, 13 Sup. Ct. 859, 862, 149 U. S. 194, 37 L. Ed. 699.

Code, § 217, providing that in an action against a corporation the summons shall be served by delivering a copy to the president or other head of the corporation, secretary, cashier, treasurer, director, manager, or local agent thereof, with reference to a local agent to receive and collect money, ex vi termini means an agent residing either permanently or temporarily for the purpose of his agency, and does not embrace a mere transient agent. The term "local" pertains to place. Moore v. Freeman's Nat. Bank, 92 N. C. 590, 594.

Of the two classes of agents, special and general, Mr. May observes: "A general agent, in the strict, legal sense, is one who has all the powers of his principal as to the business in which he is engaged—an extent of authority not often conferred in insurance. In that business an agent is termed a 'general agent' rather with reference to the geographical extent of his authority, in contradistinction to a local agent, who may have original powers, though exercising them within more restricted limits. A general agent may appoint local and subagents, which a local agent cannot; but there seems to be no very well defined distinction between the powers of general agents, local agents, and subagents, and therefore they may become in any case a question of fact for the jury." 1 May, Ins. § 126. If the authority of the agent and its extent are not evidenced by a written instrument, but rest in parol, and are matters of disputed fact, then it becomes a question of fact for the jury, and not of law for the court. Syndicate Ins. Co. v. Catchings, 16 South. 46, 50, 104 Ala. 176.

LOCAL ASSESSMENTS.

Local assessments are a species of taxes on supposed benefits. City of Shreveport v. Prescott, 26 South. 664, 672, 51 La. Ann. 1895, 46 L. R. A. 193.

The essential characteristic of a local assessment is that it is levied on particularized property, and not on property generally. This feature is the corollary of what in theory, if not in actual practice, is the fundamental principle of the law of local assessment—that the tax should be levied on each particular piece of property in proportion to the benefit that is to be derived, not supposedly, but actually, from the expenditure of the avails of the tax. The mere localness of the tax is not necessarily a distinguishing feature, nor is the fact that the tax was imposed only after a consultation of the taxpayers, for local assessments may be, and often they are, levied without consultation with the contributors; hence a bridge tax levied under authority of the Constitution, on all the property generally in a ward, is not a local assessment, even though for the imposition of it a vote of the taxpayers is required. Griggsby Const. Co. v. Freeman, 32 South. 399, 400, 108 La. 435, 58 L. R. A. 349.

"Local assessments" are not ordinary taxes levied for the purposes of sustaining the government, but they are charges on individual property because the property on which the burden is imposed receives a special benefit, which is different from the general one which the owner enjoys, in common with others, as a citizen of the commonwealth. Seanor v. Whatcom County Com'rs, 42 Pac. 552, 555, 13 Wash. 48.

A local assessment is not a tax, but a consideration for the enhancement of the value of the property of the community. It not being a tax eo nomine, it is not governed by the provisions of the Constitution on the general subject of taxation. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. v. Goodenough, 32 South. 404, 410, 108 La. 442.

A local assessment is a tax levied occasionally, as may be required, on a limited class of persons interested in local improvements, and who are presumed to be benefited by the improvement over and above the ordinary benefit which the community in general derives from the expenditure of the money. Gould v. City of Baltimore, 59 Md. 378, 380.

Local or private taxes and assessments are those charges and impositions which are laid directly on property in a circumscribed locality to effect some work of local convenience, beneficial to the property especially assessed for the expense of it. Buffalo City Cemetery v. City of Buffalo, 46 N. Y. 506, 509.

The terms "local" and "vicinity," used in connection with assessments for improvements, are not to be taken as indicating any definite limits, but are usually understood to extend to the real property reported by the assessors to be actually benefited to a certain amount. State v. District Court of Ramsey County, 23 N. W. 222, 229, 33 Minn. 235.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES.

The term "local authorities," within the meaning of Laws 1892, c. 676, § 33, which provides that the court may, on application of the local authorities, compel a railroad company to station a flagman or place gates at any point where a highway passes a railroad at grade, includes the commissioners of highways of a town. In re Town of Niagara Highway Com'rs, 25 N. Y. Supp. 231, 232, 72 Hun, 575.

LOCAL BILL.

See "Local Law."

LOCAL BOARDS.

The phrase "local boards of education" applies to the territory over which the board exercises its jurisdiction as a board, which board, whether of a city, township, or county, is local as to the territory of its jurisdiction. The board in a city is local as to the city, the board of a township is local as to the township, and the board of a county is local as to the county; and, where portions of a county are subject to local boards, the county board is local as to the balance of the county. People v. Board of Education of Oakland, 55 Cal. 331, 336.

LOCAL COMMERCIAL BROKER.

The term "local commercial broker," in a municipal ordinance requiring local commercial brokers to take out licenses, includes a person engaged in selling on commission, in a city, merchandise from samples for his several principals, having an office where his samples are exhibited; but this is true though he makes special arrangements in advance with those by whom he is employed, and is their sole representative in his city. Stratford v. City Council of Montgomery, 20 South. 127, 128, 110 Ala. 619.

LOCAL COURT.

Const. art. 6, § 19, provides for the establishment by the Legislature of "inferior local courts of civil and criminal jurisdiction." "The meaning of the term 'local courts' is well established by the authorities. It means courts having a jurisdiction localized within the territorial limits of the city or village for which each is created, and by the electors of which its incumbent is chosen." People v. Upson, 29 N. Y. Supp. 615, 618, 79 Hun, 87.

"Local court," as used in Const. art. 6, § 19, providing that inferior local courts of civil and criminal jurisdiction may be established by the Legislature, "must be construed to refer to local courts as historically known—that is, courts established for and within one of the recognized territorial divisions of the state, and as a part of the system of local government—and that it cannot be so construed to authorize the Legislature to carve out from the territory of the state a district for judicial purposes not bounded by town or county, city or village, lines, and erect therein a local court." People v. Porter, 90 N. Y. 68, 75; Rockwell v. Raymond, 5 N. Y. Supp. 642, 645.

Local court, as used in a constitution conferring authority to establish a "local court" is one, the jurisdiction of which must be exercised within the locality, and its process cannot be executed outside of it. Geraty v. Reid, 78 N. Y. 64, 67.

A justice of the peace in the city of Brooklyn is a justice of a local inferior court, within Const. § 18, art. 6, providing that inferior local courts may be established by the Legislature. In re Schultes, 54 N. Y. Supp. 34, 38, 33 App. Div. 524.

A statute creating a justice's court in a village, and providing that within that village the justice shall have the same jurisdiction of crimes and misdemeanors as justices of the peace have in towns, confines the jurisdiction of the justice to the village, and makes the court a local one, and is authorized under Const. 1846, art. 6, § 14, which gives the Legislature power to create inferior local courts. People v. Terry, 14 N. E. 815, 817, 118 N. Y. 1.

Within the meaning of Const. art. 6, § 19, authorizing the Legislature to establish any inferior local courts of civil and criminal jurisdiction, such local and inferior courts take their place with defined, limited jurisdiction. None of these local courts are intended to intrench upon or overthrow the jurisdiction of any of the superior courts, and an attempt to give a local city court the prerogative of the justice of the peace of the town, without complying with the constitutional requisites by which a town justice of the peace may be created, is unconstitutional. Ziegler v. Corwin, 12 App. Div. 60, 64, 42 N. Y. Supp. 855-863.

LOCAL CUSTOMS.

"Local customs," as used in Act Cong. March 23, 1866, providing that when rights to the use of water have vested, and are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, the owner shall be protected in the same, the local custom is not a mere usage or custom, requiring proofs of undisputed, continuous possession beyond the memory of man, but the courts take knowledge of them as of the public laws. Clough v. Wing (Ariz.) 17 Pac. 453, 457.

LOCAL DISEASE.

The term "local disease," as used in a representation made by an applicant for life insurance that he has not had any local disease, includes tubercular affection of the lungs and of the brain. Scoles v. Universal Life Ins. Co., 42 Cal. 523, 528.

LOCAL DRAINAGE.

Rev. St. § 2380, providing that no lots or lands shall be assessed to pay for the construction of a sewer that do not need "local drainage," or which are provided therewith, must be construed to mean present sufficient surface drainage for the necessary and usual purposes of sewerage. Ford v. City of Toledo, 59 N. E. 779, 781, 64 Ohio St. 92.

LOCAL ELECTION.

The term "local election," as used in the title relating to elections, shall mean any election of city, town, or village officers in cities, towns, or villages of more than four thousand inhabitants. V. S. 1894, 58.

LOCAL FREIGHT.

Act April 19, 1873, providing that railroads may for the transportation of local freight demand and receive not exceeding fifty per cent. more than the rate charged for the transportation of the same description of freight over the whole line of its road, should be construed to mean freight shipped from either terminus to a way station, or vice versa, or from one way station to another. It means freight shipped only over a part of the road between the termini. Mobile & M. Ry. Co. v. Steiner, 61 Ala. 559, 579.

"Local freight" is freight shipped from either terminus to a way station, or vice versa, or from one station to another that is over a part of the road only. Mobile & M. Ry. Co. v. Steiner, 61 Ala. 559, 579.

LOCAL IMPROVEMENT.

A "local improvement" is a public improvement, which, by reason of its being confined to a locality, enhances the value of adjacent property, as distinguished from benefits diffused by it through the municipality. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. City of Decatur, 38 N. E. 626, 627, 154 Ill. 173.

Const. art. 9, § 1, as amended in 1863, allowing municipal corporations to levy assessments for local improvements, means improvements made in a particular locality, by which the real property adjoining or near such locality is especially benefited. Rogers v. City of St. Paul, 22 Minn. 494, 507.

The technical and legal meaning of the phrase "local improvement" is a public improvement, which, although it may incidentally benefit the public at large, is made primarily for the accommodation and convenience of the inhabitants of a particular locality, and which is of such a nature as to confer a special benefit upon the real property adjoining or near the locality of the improvement. Thus, if the word is used in such sense in Const. art. 10, § 17, authorizing assessments on real property for local improvements in cities and towns, the clause does not by implication forbid such assessment for improvements affecting the whole city. Crane v. City of Siloam Springs, 55 S. W. 955, 957, 67 Ark. 30.

Const. 1870, § 9, art. 5, authorizing the General Assembly to vest the corporate authority of cities, towns, and villages with power to make local improvements by special assessments, only means such local improvements as can be made by special assessments. Wilson v. Board of Trustees of Sanitary Dist. of Chicago, 27 N. E. 203, 208, 133 Ill. 443.

Electric light system.

Local improvements, within the meaning of the law which authorizes special assessments for local improvements, would not include a system of electric light towers, which were authorized to be erected by a city for the purpose of lighting the same. Putnam v. City of Grand Rapids, 25 N. W. 330, 333, 58 Mich. 416.

So much of an electric lighting improvement as relates to the placing, erection, and construction of poles, electric conductors, street lamps, and all appurtenances belonging thereto not included in the power house or generator plant is a "local improvement," the cost of which may be assessed against the property benefited under the laws of it.

Ills. Ewart v. Village of Western Springs, 54 N. E. 478, 479, 180 Ill. 318.

Filling up lots.

Local improvement, within the meaning of the laws relating to special assessments for "local improvements," does not include the filling up of a lot which had been declared to be a public nuisance under Act 1830, which authorized the city to fill up low lots which had been declared to be a public nuisance by the board of health, etc. Charleston City Council v. Werner, 17 S. E. 33, 38 S. C. 488, 37 Am. St. Rep. 776.

Rural highway.

Local improvements signify improvements made in a particular locality, by which the real property adjoining or near such locality is specially benefited, and is commonly applied to the grading, curbing, and paving of streets, rather than to any other class of improvements, and is employed in reference to improvements by municipal corporations proper, rather than to counties and towns, which are only quasi municipal corporations; and hence a rural highway is not a local improvement. Sperry v. Flygare, 83 N. W. 177, 178, 80 Minn. 325, 49 L. R. A. 757, 81 Am. St. Rep. 261.

Sewer.

"Local improvement," as used in Rev. St. c. 24, art. 9, § 1, authorizing local improvements to be constructed and paid for by special tax on contiguous property, includes a sewer. Payne v. Village of South Springfield, 44 N. E. 105, 107, 161 Ill. 285.

A sewer is a local improvement within the laws authorizing ordinances for local improvements. Ryder's Estate v. City of Alton, 51 N. E. 821, 823, 175 Ill. 94.

Street improvement.

"Local improvements," as applied to a street, mean the improvement of a street, as such, within the design of its creation, by reason of which the real property abutting or adjacent is especially benefited in its market value. New York Life Ins. Co. v. Prest (U. S.) 71 Fed. 815, 816 (citing Cooley, Tax'n, 100, 110; Dill. Mun. Corp. 596, 597).

"By common usage, especially as evidenced by the practice of courts and text writers, the term 'local improvements' is employed as signifying improvements made in a particular locality, by which real property adjoining or near such locality is specially benefited. 'Local improvements,' or terms synonymous, are more commonly applied to the grading, curbing, and paving of streets than to any other class of improvements. The term is used in such meaning in Const. art. 9, § 1, as amended in 1869, authorizing municipal corporations to levy assessments for local improvements on the property fronting on such improvements, or to be benefited thereby." Rogers v. City of St. Paul, 22 Minn. 494, 507.

Street sprinkling.

Const. art. 9, § 1, authorizing a special assessment on property fronting on a street, in proportion to its lineal front footage, without regard to its cash valuation, for the purpose of paying for local improvements, includes sprinkling a street, as it renders the property fronting on it more desirable, and hence more valuable for occupancy. State v. Reis, 38 N. W. 97, 38 Minn. 371.

A local improvement is one which benefits the property on which the cost is assessed in a manner local in its nature, and not enjoyed by property generally in the city, and includes street sprinkling. Smith v. City of Seattle, 65 Pac. 612, 616, 25 Wash. 300 (citing State v. Reis, 38 Minn. 371, 38 N. W. 97).

"Local improvement," within the meaning of a statute authorizing cities and villages to make local improvements by special assessment, signifies the improvement of the street as such, and for the purposes for which it was designed, made in a particular locality, by reason of which the real property abutting or adjacent was specially benefited in its market value; but does not include street sprinkling. City of Chicago v. Blair, 36 N. E. 829, 831, 149 Ill. 310.

Waterworks system.

The construction of reservoirs, fire hydrants, and water mains is a "local improvement," which can be paid for by special assessment under the laws; but where an ordinance contemplates the erection of a city hall, pumping works, pumps and standpipes, such structures are improvements of a general character, and not local improvements within the meaning of the statutes. There is a distinction, so far as the construction of systems of waterworks are concerned, between the standpipe, pumping works, and buildings, which are of general utility, and must be paid for by general taxation, and the pipes which convey the water along particular streets, and which are local improvements. Ewart v. Village of Western Springs, 54 N. E. 478, 479, 180 Ill. 318 (citing Harts v. People, 171 Ill. 458, 49 N. E. 538).

The laying of water-main pipes in a municipality on particular streets for the distribution of water for the use of the inhabitants is a "local improvement" for which special assessment may be made under the laws. Hewes v. Glos, 48 N. E. 922, 923, 170 Ill. 436.

A standpipe, reservoir, and pumping apparatus in connection with a system of waterworks do not constitute a "local improvement" for which a special assessment by the city is proper under the laws. Hughes v. City of Moline, 45 N. E. 302, 164 Ill. 16.

Waterworks designed for the benefit of all the inhabitants of a municipality are not a "local improvement" within the meaning of Rev. St. 1893, c. 24, art. 9, § 1, authorizing special assessments for local improvements; the term "local improvements" signifying improvements made in a particular locality, by which the real property adjoining or near such locality is specially benefited. Village of Morgan Park v. Wiswall, 40 N. E. 611, 613, 155 Ill. 262.

Widening navigable river.

"Local improvement," as used in Act 1872, art. 9, § 1, providing that the corporate authorities of cities and villages shall have power to make local improvements by special assessments, cannot be construed to include the widening of a river in the city, which is a navigable stream, for the benefit of commerce. The term "local improvement" applies in cities and in incorporated towns to the opening, grading, paving, and otherwise improving streets and alleys, making sidewalks, the construction of drains and sewers, and other improvements of this character; improvements designed to be of benefit to the locality where they are made. The improvement of the navigable river is of a different character, it not being ordered to benefit specially the locality, and thus local, but ordered to be made to benefit the public at large, making it thus a national, rather than a local, improvement. City of Chicago v. Law, 33 N. E. 855, 857, 144 Ill. 569.

LOCAL INFLUENCE.

Within the meaning of the law authorizing removal of causes on account of local influence, the local judge's fitness, and his uprightness, firmness, or ability, or the reverse, do not constitute an element of local influence. Montgomery County v. Cochran (U. S.) 116 Fed. 985, 993.

"Local influence," within Rev. St. § 639, subd. 3, authorizing a removal because of prejudice and local influence, does not mean merely an influence primarily existing against the party seeking the removal. It includes as well that element in a controversy between a stranger and resident parties having the power through wealth, business, social relations, or personal popularity, or all combined, to direct or materially aid in the direction of political parties and control the selection of public officers and the distribution of public emoluments, so that a stranger may be at great disadvantage, if not powerless to assert his right. Neale v. Foster (U. S.) 31 Fed. 53, 55.

LOCAL LAW.

A statute which relates to a particular person or particular thing of a class is a local law. Clark v. Finley, 54 S. W. 343, 345, 98 Tex. 171.

A local act is one operating over a particular locality, instead of over the whole territory of the state. State v. Irwin, 5 Nev. 111, 120.

"Local law," as used in Const. art. 3, § 57, providing for and prescribing the rules to be observed and the forms necessary to be followed in all cases where local or special laws are enacted, is defined by Mr. Bouvier as those which operate only upon particular persons and private concerns. Cox v. State, 8 Tex. App. 254, 287, 34 Am. Rep. 746.

The word "local," as a word of constitutional or statutory prohibition, signifies belonging to or confined to a particular place, and relates only to a portion of the people of a state or their property. When applied to legislation, it signifies such legislation as relates to only a portion of the territory of a state, or a part of its people, or a fraction of the property of its citizens. Territory v. School Dist. No. 83 of Oklahoma County, 64 Pac. 241, 10 Okl. 556.

"Local or special law," as used in Const. art. 4, § 7, which forbids the Legislature to pass private, local, or special laws regulating the internal affairs of towns, counties, etc., means those laws which create preferences and establish inequality; those which apply to persons, things, or places possessed of certain qualities or situations, and exclude from their effect other persons, things, or places that are not dissimilar in these respects. Central R. Co. v. State Board of Assessors, 2 Atl. 789, 798, 48 N. J. Law (19 Vroom) 1, 57 Am. Rep. 516 (citing Van Riper v. Parsens, 40 N. J. Law [11 Vroom] 1).

A law is special or local, as contradistinguished from general, which embraces less than the entire class of persons or places to whose condition such legislation would be necessary or appropriate having regard to the purpose for which the legislation was designed. A law which so particularizes, and by such means is restricted in its operation to persons or places which do not comprise all the objects which naturally belong to the class, is special or local. State v. Borough of Somers Point, 18 Atl. 694, 52 N. J. Law (23 Vroom) 32, 6 L. R. A. 57.

Local or special laws are all those that rest on a false or deficient classification. Their vice is that they do not embrace all the class that they naturally embrace. They create preference and establish inequality. They apply to persons, things, and places possessed of certain qualities or situations, and exclude from their effect other persons, things, or places which are not dissimilar in this respect. State v. Yard, 42 N. J. Law (13 Vroom) 357, 363.

"A local law is confined in its operation to the property and persons of a limited portion of the state. People v. O'Brien, 38 N. Y. 193. A local act, says Earl, J., in People v. Newburgh & S. P. R. Co., 86 N. Y. 1, is one operating only within a limited territory or specified locality. In Maxwell v. Tillamook County, 26 Pac. 803, 20 Or. 495, Mr. Justice Lord, in defining the term, says: 'Statutes are sometimes distinguished as general or local, according to whether they are intended to operate throughout the entire jurisdiction, or only within a single county or other division or place. A law which applies only to a limited part of the state and the inhabitants of that part is local.' Thus, Laws 1889, p. 152, authorizing a tax on bicycles within certain counties only, is a local act." Ellis v. Frazier, 63 Pac. 642, 644, 38 Or. 462, 53 L. R. A. 454.

Local is defined by Burrill in his Law Dictionary as follows: "Relating to place, expressive of place, belonging to or confined to a particular place; distinguished from general, personal, or transitory." An act is local when the subject relates to a portion only of the people or their property, and may not, either in its subject, operation, or immediate necessary results affect the people of the state, or their property in general. Earle v. Board of Education, 55 Cal. 489, 491; People v. Acton (N. Y.) 48 Barb. 524, 530.

A local act is one operating only within a limited or specified locality. It could not be said with propriety that a territory comprising nearly a whole state was merely a place or locality. An act operating upon persons or property in a single city or county or in two or three counties would be local, but how far must this be extended before it ceases to be local? To determine this no definite rule can be laid down, but each case must be determined upon its own circumstances. In re Hennerberger, 49 N. Y. Supp. 230, 232, 25 App. Div. 164.

Local laws are applicable to all persons, and are distinguished from public general laws only in that they are confined to certain prescribed or defined territorial limits, and the violation of them must, in the nature of things, be local. Herbert v. Baltimore County Com'rs, 55 Atl. 376, 379, 97 Md. 639.

Law applying to cities only.

"Local statute," as defined by Bouvier, is a statute whose operation is intended to be restricted within certain limits, and Act Dec. 2, 1871, known as the "Sunday Law," making it a misdemeanor for any dealer in a lawful business to sell or barter on Sunday between 9 o'clock a. m. and 4 o'clock p. m. within the limits of any city, is not a local law. Bohl v. State, 3 Tex. App. 683, 685.

Law applying to class.

"Local or special legislation," according to the well-known meaning of the words, applies exclusively to special or particular places, or special and particular persons, and is distinguished from a statute intended to be general in its operation and that relating to classes of persons or subjects. Stone v. Wilson (Ky.) 39 S. W. 49, 50.

It is not easy to define with accuracy the difference between a "general law" and a "local law." A law relating to particular persons or things as a class is said to be general, while one relating to particular persons or things of a class is deemed local and private. Laws 1881, c. 554, giving to the board of supervisors of any county containing an incorporated city of over 100,000 inhabitants, where contiguous territory in the county has been mapped out into streets and avenues, power to lay out, open, grade, and construct the same, and to provide for the assessment of damages on the property benefited, is not a local or private act, but a general law. It applies to a class, and not to the selected or particular elements of which it is composed. The class consists of every county in the state having within its boundaries a city of 100,000 inhabitants, and territory beyond the city limits mapped into streets and avenues. How many such counties there are now or may be in the future we do not know, and it is not material that we should. Whether many or few, the law operates upon them all alike, and reaches them, not by a separate selection of one or more, but through the general class of which they are individual elements. In re Church, 92 N. Y. 1, 4, 5.

Classification of buildings by height.

The term "local or special legislation" cannot be applied to Laws 1897, p. 222, requiring fire escapes on buildings four or more stories in height, except such as are used for private residence, and on buildings more than two stories in height used for manufacturing purposes, as the statute applies to all buildings falling within the designated class, and is therefore general and uniform. Arms v. Ayer, 61 N. E. 851, 855, 192 Ill. 601.

Classification as to population.

"A statute which relates to persons or things as a class is a general law, while a statute which relates to particular persons or things of a class is special, and comes within the prohibition of the Constitution of 1873, art. 5, § 7, prohibiting local or special legislation." The constitutional provision does not prevent the classification of municipal corporations with reference to taxation, and hence the act of May 23, 1874, classifying cities according to their population, is constitutional. Wheeler v. City of Philadelphia, 77 Pa. (27 P. F. Smith) 338, 348.

A statute which, by its terms, can have application to but one county in the state, although purporting to be a general law applicable to all counties having a certain population, there being but one county in the state of such population, is a local or special law, within the meaning of the provision of the Constitution "that the General Assembly shall not pass local or special laws" in certain enumerated cases. Giving to the words "local or special laws," as used in the Constitution, their ordinary meaning, as contradistinguished from "general laws," the act comes within the definition of a special or private law. Devine v. Cook County Com'rs, 84 Ill. 590, 594.

A special or local act applies only to a limited part of the state. It touches but a portion of its territory, a part of its people, or a fraction of the property of its citizens. A law may be general, however, and have but a local application, and it is none the less general and uniform because it may apply to a designated class, if it operates equally upon all the subjects within the class for which the rule is adopted. In determining whether a law is general or special, the court will look to its substance and necessary operation as well as its form and phraseology. Sess. Laws 1901, p. 317, providing a method of holding primary elections in cities having a population of 10,000 or more for the selection of delegates to nominating conventions, though applicable to but one city at the time of its enactment, extends to all cities as they subsequently acquire the prescribed population, and operates equally upon all of a designated class founded upon a reasonable and proper classification, and hence is not a local or special, but a general, law. Ladd v. Holmes, 66 Pac. 714, 716, 40 Or. 167, 91 Am. St. Rep. 457.

Act March 8, 1879, § 7 (act restricting gaming), providing that certain games shall not be carried on in any room on the first floor or story of any building, nor a license issued therefor in any county where more than 1,500 votes were cast at the general election last preceding the application, is not in violation of Const. art. 4, § 20, prohibiting local and special legislation, although at the time the application was made there was only one county in the state to which the law could apply. State v. Donovan, 15 Pac. 783, 784, 20 Nev. 75.

The local option law (Act 1887, p. 179), providing that any county or town or city having a population of 2,500 or more inhabitants may, by a majority vote, put such county, town, or city under its operation, is not a local or special law within Const. art. 4, § 53, prohibiting the passage of a local or special law, when a general law can be made applicable. State ex rel. Maggard v. Pond, 93 Mo. 606, 640, 6 S. W. 469, 472.

Law relative to county officer.

A county office not being a local office, a law regulating the compensation attached to a county office is not local in its nature, and hence must be uniform throughout the state. State v. Yates, 64 N. E. 570, 571, 66 Ohio St. 546.

An act applying to an officer in a single county and to the property and sales made therein is a "local law" within the meaning of a constitutional provision that no local law shall contain more than one subject. Kerrigan v. Force, 68 N. Y. 381, 383.

The term "local act" or "private act" in the constitutional provision providing that no private or local bill shall embrace more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title, does not apply to an act regulating the amount and manner of paying the officers, or any given number of the officers, of a county of the state for their official services, when such services are rendered in, and form a part of, the administration and execution of the laws of the state, and affect equally the whole citizens thereof, who come within their range. Thus Act March 10, 1847, entitled "An act in relation to the fees and the compensation of certain officers in the city and county of New York," and which gives salaries to four officers of that city in place of fees, is not a local or private act. Conner v. City of New York, 5 N. Y. (1 Seld.) 285, 297.

Act excluding one county.

The act of June 28, 1879 (Pub. Laws 1879, p. 182), providing for liens for labor and material on oil wells, and that the act does not apply to counties having a population of over 200,000 inhabitants, is a local or special law within the meaning of the Constitution prohibiting the passage of any local or special law authorizing the creation, extension, or impairing of liens. There is no dividing line between a local and a general statute. It must be either the one or the other. If it apply to the whole state, it is general; if to a part only, it is local. As a legal principle it is as effectually local when it applies to sixty-five counties out of the sixty-seven as if it applied to one county only. The exclusion of a single county from the operation of the act makes it local. A general statute must be applicable to every part of the commonwealth. Davis v. Clark, 106 Pa. 377, 384; City of Philadelphia v. Pepper, 8 Atl. 241, 242, 115 Pa. 291.

"Local act," as used in Const. art. 3, § 16, 18, prohibiting the passage of a local act by the Legislature, should be construed to mean an act operating only within a limited territory or specified locality. An act operating upon persons or property in a single city or county, or any two or three counties, would be local. In Burrill's Law Dictionary the word "local" is defined as "relating to place, belonging or confined to a particular place"; and a "local act" has been defined as one "confined in its operation to the particular persons of a specified locality." But it cannot be said that a territory comprising nearly the whole state is merely a place or locality, and hence an act which applies to 58 out of the 60 counties in the state is not a local act within the meaning of the Constitution. People v. Newburgh & S. Plank Road Co., 86 N. Y. 1, 6.

The phrase "local bill," as used in the Constitution providing that no private or local bill shall embrace more than one subject, which shall be expressed in the title, means, according to Folger, J. (Remsen v. People, 43 N. Y. 10), "a bill, act, or law such as touches but a portion of the territory of the state or part of its people, a fraction of the property of its citizens"; and hence an act which applies to an officer of a single county and to the property and judicial sales made therein is a local bill. An act may be public, and yet local, although the words "private" and "local" are often, and perhaps generally, used as synonymous. Kerrigan v. Force, 68 N. Y. 381, 383.

Law relating to general subject.

The act of the Legislature providing for five terms of the district court of Bexar county is not a local or special law in the sense in which these terms are used in the Constitution providing that "no local or special law shall be passed unless notice of the intention to apply therefor shall have been published in the locality where the matter or thing to be affected may be situated at least thirty days prior to the introduction into the Legislature of such bill." Such act is on a general subject—the regulation of the courts—which cannot be said to affect the welfare and interests of that district alone. Cordova v. State, 6 Tex. App. 207, 221 (cited and approved in Bejarano v. State, Id. 265, 283, and Handline v. State, Id. 347, 357).

Laws 1897, pp. 186, 187, providing that in a certain section of the state the school lands which have been leased shall not be subject to sale during the existence of the lease, is not a local law, prohibited by the Constitution, for the sale of school lands is a matter of public interest. It is local in the sense that it applies to the lands of the state situate in a particular locality, but it is not local within the meaning of the term as used in the Constitution. Reed v. Rogan, 59 S. W. 255, 257, 94 Tex. 177.

Law having local application.

A statute is not special or local merely because it authorizes or prohibits the doing of a thing in a certain locality. It is, notwithstanding this fact, a general law, if it applies to all the citizens of the state, and deals with a matter of general concern. Thus Act March 24, 1899, regulating the cultivation of oysters in certain tidal water lying wholly within the counties of the state, is not special or local within the prohibition of Const. art. 4, § 7, par. 11, the matter regulated being of general concern, and applying to all citizens. State v. Corson, 50 Atl. 780, 785, 67 N. J. Law, 178.

A statute regulating the fisheries throughout the state, and containing a provision that in the waters of certain counties named no nets shall be used during certain periods of the year, is not a local law within the meaning of the provision of the Constitution that no general law shall embrace any provision of a private, special, or local character. A law is not necessarily of a special or local character because it prohibits the doing of a thing in a certain locality. If this were so, a law regulating the use of the public roads of the state, and imposing penalties for the infringement of such rules, would be illegitimate, as such a law would be local in the sense that it prohibited the doing of certain things within certain localities, to wit, within the bounds of the public highways. A law cannot be said to have a special or local character that does not confer either a particular benefit or does not impose a particular burden upon the inhabitants of a designated place or district. Doughty v. Conover, 42 N. J. Law (13 Vroom) 103, 195.

The terms "local law" and "special law" in Const. art. 3, § 57, prohibiting the passage of special or local laws unless notice of the application therefor is given to the locality affected thereby, are synonymous, and mean a law which only applies to a particular locality. Smith v. Greyson County, 44 S. W. 921, 922, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 153.

Within the meaning of Const. art. 3, § 16, providing that "no private or local bill which may be passed by the legislature shall embrace more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title" if the bill is local in its operation and effect, although public in its character, it is within the constitutional enactment. Huber v. People, 49 N. Y. 132, 135.

The term "local act," in Const. art. 3, § 16, declaring that no local or private act which may be passed by the Legislature shall embrace more than one subject, and that shall be embraced in its title, does not include a section of a statute relating to police justices and courts and their clerks in the city of New York, which section provides for an increased punishment for petit larceny when committed by stealing from the person in the city of New York. "It has, no doubt, features which savor of locality, for it punishes a well-known common-law offense more severely if committed under peculiar circumstances within the limits of that city than if committed elsewhere; but it prescribes the rule of conduct for all persons, whether residents of the city or of any other part of the state, and its increased penalties are intended to protect residents of other localities equally with residents of the city." Williams v. People, 24 N. Y. 405, 407.

Law having optional application.

A bill that embraces all the villages of the state which may elect to take advantage of its provisions is a general, and not a local, act. Arthur v. Village of Glens Falls, 21 N. Y. Supp. 81, 83, 66 Hun, 136.

Police regulation.

The constitutional provision prohibiting the passage of any local or special law granting any special or exclusive right, privilege, or immunity is not violated by a city ordinance passed as a sanitary police regulation, granting the exclusive right to remove the carcasses of dead animals from the streets, though it be conceded that the restriction would apply to municipal legislatures as well as to the general assembly of the state. River Rendering Co. v. Behr, 7 Mo. App. 345, 351.

As public act.

See "Public Act or Statute."

Law required by Constitution.

The term "local or special law" in the clauses of the Constitution prohibiting the passage of such laws, except, etc., cannot include any law which results directly or indirectly from a specific constitutional requirement. It would be a manifest absurdity to assume that the Constitution, when directing the Legislature to pass a certain law, at the same time requires a notification to the people of the locality for the purpose of enabling them to defeat the law. Act April 27, 1877, dividing the city of St. Louis into election districts, and providing that at every general election thereafter held justices of the peace shall be elected in each of them, when construed in connection with Const. art. 6, § 39, declaring that in each county there shall be appointed or elected as many justices of the peace as the public good may require, whose powers, duties, and duration of office shall be prescribed by law, is not a local or special law within the meaning of the clause of the Constitution prohibiting the passage of such laws unless notice of the intention to apply therefor be published in the locality where the matter or thing to be effected may be situated. State ex rel. Monahan v. Walton, 69 Mo. 556, 557.

The term "local law," in Const. art. 4, § 54, prohibiting the passage of any local or special laws without publication of notice of intention to apply therefor, does not include a law which results directly from a specific constitutional requirement, and therefore a statute creating the office of reporter for the St. Louis Court of Appeals is neither a local nor a special act as the Court of Appeals was created by the Constitution, which grant carried with it the power necessary to the exercise of its jurisdiction. A law creating an office and prescribing the duties of the officer whose services are to be rendered in and form a part of the administration of the laws of the state, and affect equally all who come within their range, is neither local nor special within the meaning of the Constitution. Nor is the source from which the expenses of the office are to be paid a test by which to determine whether the act creating the office is local or special. State ex rel. Berry v. Shields, 4 Mo. App. 259, 265.

Law applying to single city.

The term "local act (or statute)" is one of modern origin, and has, therefore, no definite meaning in the common law; and yet there is no room for reasonable doubt as to its proper signification. Local, according to Webster, means pertaining to a place, or to a fixed and limited portion of space. According to Bouvier it means fixedness in a place; as local courts, or courts fixed in a particular place. An act establishing a court in a particular town, and confining its jurisdiction to the corporate limits of the town, and extending only to suits brought for violation of its ordinances, and in other cases to persons served and property found therein, is a local act within the prohibition of the laws and the Constitution prohibiting local and special acts, except, etc. Town of McGregor v. Baylies, 19 Iowa, 43, 47.

The term "local act" in the constitutional provision that a private or local bill which may be passed by the Legislature shall embrace more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in its title, includes an act entitled "To amend and consolidate the several acts relating to the city of Rochester." In so holding the court says that "Burrill, in his Law Dictionary, defines the word 'local' as relating to place; belonging or confined to a particular place, distinct from a general, personal, or transitory." People v. Hills, 35 N. Y. 449, 451.

As special law.

Const. 1876, § 23, art. 16, authorizes the Legislature to "pass laws for the regulation of live stock and the protection of stock raisers in the stock raising portion of the state and exempt from the operation of such laws other portions, sections, or counties, and shall have power to pass general and special laws for the inspection of cattle, stocks, and hides, and for the regulation of brands: provided that any local law thus passed shall be submitted to the freeholders of the section to be affected thereby and approved by them before it shall go into effect." Held, that the words "special" and "local" are synonymous, and only require local laws of the county mentioned in the section to be submitted to the freeholders to be affected by them. Lastro v. State, 3 Tex. App. 363, 374.

"Local law" and "special law" are synonymous terms. Smith v. Grayson County, 44 S. W. 921, 922, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 153.

The terms "special" and "local" are not always convertible, though the former may include the latter. A special act is one that comes short of being general. The latter comprehends the genus, while the former is confined to the species. In the course of the discussion of the case at bar the court said: "An act providing for the assessment of mortgages generally is so far a general act which comprehends the genus, but an act providing for the assessment of all mortgages for sums exceeding $500 which are not payable within one year from the date of their execution is special. It comprehends only a species of mortgages, so an act providing for the assessment of mortgages on wood lands, plow lands, or river lands, is special." Dundee Mortgage Trust Inv. Co. v. School Dist. No. 1 (U. S.) 19 Fed. 359, 371.

Universal application required.

A statute relating to mechanics' liens, and applicable to building contracts for an amount of $1,000 and any amount exceeding that sum, and applicable to cities of not less than 10,000 inhabitants, is not a local or special act. With the exception of the lower limit in amount and the lower limit in the number of inhabitants in cities in which the statute is operative, it is general. If a law is limited in some minor details, deemed proper by the Legislature in carrying out a public policy, but otherwise general in its application, it is neither local nor special. A law may be general without being universal. McKeon v. Sumner Bldg. & Supply Co., 26 South. 430, 431, 51 La. Ann. 1961.

LOCAL LEGISLATION.

"Legislation" to be "local," within the meaning of Const. art. 3, § 7, providing that the Legislature may confer on the boards of supervisors of the several counties of the state such further powers of "local legislation" and administration as they should from time to time prescribe, must apply to and operate exclusively upon a portion of the territory of the state and upon the people living therein. If it applies to or operates upon persons or property beyond such locality, it is not local. It is not meant to say that the law, to be local, must be restricted in its operation to the persons, property, or rights which belong within the locality within which the law is intended to operate. Such a construction would make all laws relating to municipal corporations general, as they affect all persons within its limits, without regard to their permanent place of residence; but the law is not local that operates upon a subject in which the people at large are interested. Healey v. Dudley (N. Y.) 5 Lans. 115, 120.

LOCAL MATTERS.

Mr. Stephens (Steph. Pl. 288) says that: "Local matters consist of such facts as carried with them the idea of some certain place comprising all matters relating to realty, and hardly any others." Mr. Chitty says: "When a cause of action could only have arisen in a particular place or county, it is local." Mehrhof Bros. Brick Mfg. Co. v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 16 Atl. 12, 13, 51 N. J. Law (22 Vroom) 56.

LOCAL MINISTER.

A "local or located minister" in the Methodist Church is one who does not travel. Guardians of the Poor v. Greene (Pa.) 5 Bin. 554, 560.

LOCAL NATURE.

"Suit of a local nature," as used in Rev. St. §§ 740-742 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 587, 588], relating to the districts in which a "suit of a local nature" may be brought, should be construed to include a suit by creditors for the appointment of a receiver for a railroad, a large part of the railroad being actually located within the district, and, in so far as the assets were personal, they were likewise largely located there; and the local character of the suit is not affected by the fact that a portion of the railroad was located in another district. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Atlanta & F. R. Co. (U. S.) 49 Fed. 608, 614, 15 L. R. A. 109.

LOCAL OFFICE OR OFFICER.

The term "local office" in the statute providing that every office shall become vacant on the incumbent's ceasing to be an inhabitant of the city, county, or town in which he shall have been elected, if such office shall be local, does not include a supervisor's, when considered in connection with his relation to the district in which he is elected; and therefore such supervisor does not lose his office by removing into another district. State v. Milwaukee County Sup'rs, 21 Wis. 443, 450.

A county office is not a local office, but a part of the permanent organization of the government of the state. State v. Yates, 64 N. E. 570, 571, 66 Ohio St. 548.

"To say that an office was a local one has always meant that it was not a state office, but an office of one of the political subdivisions of the municipal corporations of the state; and such is the statutory definition. Public Officer's Law, § 2." It has heretofore been used only in its generic sense to designate all excepting state offices. It cannot be said that a jury commissioner of a county, appointed by justices of the Supreme Court, as authorized by Laws 1901, c. 602, is a local and not a county officer, and therefore the statute is within Const. art. 10, § 2, prohibiting the appointing of county officers by other than the board of supervisors or other county authorities. In re Brenner, 71 N. Y. Supp. 44, 46, 35 Misc. Rep. 306.

The term "local officer" is defined in Laws 1892, c. 681, which first defines "state officers," and excludes congressmen, United States senators, and presidential electors, "as including every other officer who is elected by the electors of a portion only of the state, every officer of a political subdivision or municipal corporation of the state, and every officer limited in the execution of his official functions to a portion only of the state." The term includes a commission appointed by the mayor of New York and Brooklyn, in reference to a bridge between the cities, as authorized by Laws 1895, c. 789, as amended by Laws 1896, c. 612. People v. Nixon, 52 N. E. 1117, 1118, 158 N. Y. 221.

Laws 1892, c. 681, § 2, known as the "Public Officer's Law," divides public officers into two classes—state officers and local officers—and, after defining state officers, defines the term "local officers" as including every other officer who is elected by the electors of a portion only of the state, every officer of the political subdivisions of municipal corporations of the state, and every officer limited in the execution of his official functions to a portion only of the state. In re Board of Health of Village of Lansingburg, 60 N. Y. Supp. 27, 29, 43 App. Div. 236.

The term "local officers," in Const. art. 4, § 20, providing that no person holding any lucrative office under the United States or any other power shall be eligible to any civil office of profit under this state, provided that officers in the militia, who receive no annual salary, local officers or postmasters whose compensation does not exceed $500 per annum, shall not be deemed to hold local offices, means local federal officers. People v. Leonard, 14 Pac. 853, 855, 73 Cal. 230.

LOCAL OPTION LAW.

The term "local option law" includes a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, which is not to operate until the majority of the adult residents in certain local districts shall, by petition, procure an order of the county court prohibiting the sale of such liquors. Wilson v. State, 35 Ark. 414, 416.

The term "local option law" is an apt term to designate a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors which is left to take effect or operate in school districts at the option of a majority of the adult residents thereof. Boyd v. Bryant, 35 Ark. 69, 73, 37 Am. Rep. 6.

A "local option law" is a law to take or not to take effect in a given locality upon the consent or dissent of the voters of the locality, or upon other contingencies, while it may have effect in other localities. An act which simply provides that a license for the sale of intoxicating liquors shall not be granted to a particular individual unless his application is freely signed by a certain number of voters requesting that he be granted a license to sell in a designated place on payment of a certain sum of money for the privilege is not a local option law. The act is uniform in its operation throughout the state, and uniform in its operation upon every person who wishes to engage in the occupation of a liquor dealer. No person is prohibited by it from obtaining the requisite number of petitioners, or paying his money or receiving a license, nor is there any locality in the state where he is forbidden to sell liquors upon complying with the law. The law is uniform because it operates alike upon all persons in all parts of the state who may desire to engage in the particular occupation. State v. Brown, 19 Fla. 563, 598.

The words "local option" imply the grant of the right to one locality to adopt and another to decline to avail itself of the law. Moreover, it is no objection to a law that it does not operate upon every citizen alike. It is sufficient if it operates equally upon all who, in all parts of the state, come under the same circumstances and conditions. Ex parte Handler, 75 S. W. 920, 922, 176 Mo. 383.

LOCAL POSTS.

"Local posts" are special arrangements for the carriage of letters and packets to and from subordinate stations within the limits of a mail station. United States v. Kochersperger (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 803, 809.

LOCAL PURPOSE.

The term "local purpose" in the clause of the Constitution prohibiting the appropriation of public money or property for a public purpose except for compensation means a purpose the benefit of which is confined to a particular locality or limited district. A local purpose has reference to the citizens or interest of a particular locality, and not to a large or extensive district, or the community in general. An act appropriating money for removing obstructions from and improving the navigation of the navigable portion of the Boquet river, a river flowing into Lake Champlain, and navigable therefrom for three miles for boats of light burden, was held not an appropriation for a local purpose. "The improvement cannot be said to be for local purposes simply because it is made, as it necessarily must be made, in a particular or limited locality. It is not the place where the improvement is made that is to confer upon it a local character or otherwise, but the purpose for which it is made. There is, it must be admitted, considerable difficulty in defining the word 'local' by a synonymous word, or by a phrase expressing its precise meaning. I agree that it was designed to express an idea somewhat different from that of 'private,' and yet for some purposes the words are nearly synonymous. The words 'general' or 'common' will, it seems to me, express the opposite or converse idea to both those words. Both words are used for greater caution, and are doubtless somewhat different in meaning; a private purpose referring more particularly to a purpose for the benefit of an individual or a limited number of men, and a local purpose to a purpose for the benefit of a particular place or limited locality." People v. Allen (N. Y.) 1 Lans. 248, 251.

Under Const. art. 9, §§ 9, 10, authorizing municipal corporations to "levy taxes for strictly local purposes," the raising of money by taxation in towns or counties for the purpose of building bridges, maintaining public highways, and for other objects of a similar character, in which the people of the state at large are directly interested, is not included. Will County Sup'rs v. People, 110 Ill. 511, 518.

Under Const. art. 1, § 9, providing that public money or property shall not be appropriated for local or private purposes without the consent of two-thirds of each branch of the Legislature, a law authorizing the commissioners of highways of a town to lay out a highway, and vesting in a town, for road purposes, the right, title, and interest of the state, in so much of the lands as may be necessary for the purpose of such highway, is an appropriation of public property for local purposes. People v. Commissioners of Highways of Marlborough, 54 N. Y. 276, 278, 13 Am. Rep. 581.

Const. 1821, art. 1, § 9, requiring the assent of two-thirds of the members elected to each branch of the legislature to every appropriation of public moneys for private or "local purposes," means an appropriation to be expended in a particular locality, which is directly and mainly for the benefit of the people of that locality, notwithstanding the public are incidentally and remotely benefited, and an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of a river is for a local purpose. People v. Allen, 42 N. Y. 378, 383.

An indebtedness for local or corporate purposes is not imposed on a municipality against its consent by a Legislature in violation of Const. art. 9, §§ 9, 10, by Laws 1887, p. 237, making a municipality liable for property destroyed within its limits by a mob. City of Chicago v. Manhattan Cement Co., 53 N. E. 68, 71, 178 Ill. 372, 45 L. R. A. 848, 69 Am. St. Rep. 321.

LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT.

"The principle of local self-government is regarded as fundamental in American political institutions. It means that local affairs shall be decided upon and regulated by local authorities, and that the citizens of particular districts have the right to determine upon their own public concerns and select their own local officials without being controlled by the general public or the state at large. For this purpose municipal corporations are established, and are invested with rights and powers of government subordinate to the general authority of the state, but exclusive within their sphere. It is axiomatic that the management of purely local affairs belongs to the people concerned, not only because of being their own affairs, but because they will best understand and be most competent to manage them. The continued and permanent existence of local government is therefore assumed in all the state constitutions, and is a matter of constitutional right, even when not in terms expressly provided for. It would not be competent to dispense with it by statute. The institution of local self-government is not an American invention, but is traditional in England, and is justly regarded as one of the most valuable safeguards against tyranny and oppression. It is but an extension of this idea that the government of the United States should be intrusted with only such powers and rights as concern the welfare of the whole country, while the individual states are left to the uncontrolled regulation of their internal affairs." Rathbone v. Wirth, 40 N. Y. Supp. 535, 542, 6 App. Div. 277 (quoting Black, Const. Law, 373, 374. See, also, 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. p. 48).

LOCAL STATUTE.

See "Local Law."

LOCAL SUPERINTENDENT.

"Local superintendent of repairs," as the term is used when applied to an officer of a railroad company, means a superintendent of repairs whose duties are confined or limited to a particular county, city, town, place, district, or section, and as used in Comp. Laws 1885, p. 613, § 68a, which makes service of summons on a local superintendent of repairs a valid service on the railway company, includes a section foreman, where it appears that the company has not designated any person or officer on whom service can be made as provided by statute. St. Louis & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Deford, 16 Pac. 442, 443, 38 Kan. 299.

LOCAL TAXATION.

In a law "exempting from local taxation or other purposes" all the real and personal property of a charitable corporation "so long as it or its income is used for the purposes for which it was incorporated," the "other purposes" referred to are evidently local purposes, such as assessments, etc., and could never have been intended to extend to taxation by the state. In re Vanderbilt, 2 Con. Sur. 319, 326, 10 N. Y. Supp. 239.

"Local taxation," as used in Laws 1887, providing that certain property shall not be subject to local taxation, will be construed to distinguish it from that taxation which is general, and for the whole state, and hence to exempt such property from all taxation except for state purposes. People v. Board of Assessors of City of Brooklyn, 36 N. E. 508, 141 N. Y. 476.

"Local taxation," as used in Const. art. 11, § 5, providing that any county or township organization shall have such power of local taxation as may be prescribed by law, means the taxing of property which may be properly subjected to taxation in the place where such local organizations exist; that is, within the geographical limits of the county or township, as the case may be. Davidson v. Ramsey County Com'rs, 18 Minn. 482, 494 (Gil. 432, 442).

LOCAL TICKET.

Local railroad tickets are mere tokens to the passenger and vouchers to the conductor, adopted for convenience to show that the passenger has paid his fare from one place to another, and are much in the nature of baggage checks. No contract is contained in such a ticket, the contract being made when the ticket is purchased, and is simply that which the law implies by the transaction. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Turner, 47 S. W. 223, 226, 100 Tenn. 213, 43 L. R. A. 140 (citing Rawson v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 48 N. Y. 212, 8 Am. Rep. 543, 545; Cole v. Goodwin [N. Y.] 19 Wend. 251, 32 Am. Dec. 470, 505).

LOCALITY.

In Comp. St. 1887, pp. 563, 570, relating to the state board of transportation, and providing that it shall be the duty of said board to carefully investigate any complaint in writing and under oath concerning any injustice or discrimination against either any person, firm, or corporation, or locality either in rates, facilities furnished, or otherwise, "locality" means the territory unjustly discriminated against, and it may refer either to a village, city, county, or portion of the state. State v. Fremont, E. & M. V. R. Co., 35 N. W. 118, 124, 22 Neb. 313.

The word "locality" signifies a particular district; confined to a limited region; opposed to "general"; limited by boundaries, large or small—as a country, a state, a county, a town, or a portion thereof. Anderson's Law Dictionary. In human laws neither the world, nor the greater portion of it, is spoken of as a locality. Laws 1885, § 1, relating to the suppression and prevention of the spread of contagious and infectious diseases among domestic animals, and providing (section 5) that whenever the board of commissioners shall report to the Governor that such diseases have become epidemic in certain localities in other states, or that their condition would render such domestic animals liable to convey such diseases, he may, by proclamation, schedule such localities, and prohibit the importation of any live stock of the kind into the state except under such regulations as may be prescribed by the said board and approved by the Governor, does not confer the power to select certain kinds of cattle and prescribe that such cattle cannot be brought into the state of Illinois from any quarter of the globe except under such conditions as the board might prescribe. The Legislature contemplated that contagious or infectious diseases of domestic cattle might become epidemic in certain localities; that is to say, prescribed, defined, limited portions of other states. Pierce v. Dillingham, 96 Ill. App. 300, 313.

As political subdivision.

"Localities," as used in Laws 1899, c. 370, §§ 10, 17, giving the civil service commission power to prescribe rules for the classification of the offices, places, and employments in the classified service, and section 17, providing that, where the labor service of any department or institution extends to separate localities, the commission must provide separate registration lists for each district or locality, means some political subdivision of the state created and existing by legislative act at the time the registration lists are furnished. For a district or locality thus created, and not otherwise, the commission may provide separate registration lists; but it cannot of its own volition, independent of the statute, first create a district and then furnish the list. People v. Shea, 76 N. Y. Supp. 679, 681, 73 App. Div. 232.

LOCALIZED PROPERTY.

"Localized property" is defined in Acts Tenn. 1897, c. 5, relating to taxation of railroads, to consist of depot buildings, and other property, real, personal, and mixed, having an actual situs. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. King (U. S.) 120 Fed. 614, 621, 57 C. C. A. 278.

LOCALLY.

"Locally inapplicable," within Act Cong. March 3, 1893, and the President's proclamation providing that all laws of the United States not locally inapplicable should go into effect in the territory of Oklahoma, is not limited to the district within the boundaries of the territory at that time, but such laws became applicable to the territory added to the domain from time to time under the subsequent laws of Congress; and a contention that "locally inapplicable" refers to place, and not to time, is unsound. Hoffman v. County Com'rs, 3 Okl. 325, 349, 41 Pac. 566.

LOCATE.

See "Definitely Locate"; "Permanently Located."

In an act of Congress to provide a national currency, known as the "National Bank Act," it is provided that the usual business of a bank organized thereunder shall be prosecuted at an office or banking house located at the place specified in its organization certificate, and that its affairs shall be managed by a board of directors, at least three-fourths of whom shall have resided in the state, territory, or district in which such association is located one year next preceding their election as directors, and be residents of same during their continuance in office; and in other places speaks of the place where the association is located and established. "It is quite apparent from all these statutory provisions," says Judge Blatchford, "that Congress regards a national banking association as being located at the place specified in its organization certificate. If such place is a place in a state, the association is located in the state. It is, indeed, located at but one place in the state, but when it is so located it is regarded as located in the state." Davis v. Cook, 9 Nev. 134, 145.

As appropriation or occupation.

"Located," as used in a deed of land made on the express condition that a railroad company should have its road constructed and a depot located on such land within six months from that date, does not mean "erected." The depot was located thereon, though the depot building was not erected, where the ground had been staked out, a platform built, and the premises actually occupied and used for depot purposes, so far as might be, without having a depot building erected. Waldron v. Marcier, 82 Ill. 550, 552.

"Locate" means to place; to set in a particular spot or position; to select, survey, and settle the boundaries of a particular tract of land, or to designate a particular portion of land by limits; to designate and determine the place of. The same acts which amount to an "appropriation" of premises for a specified purpose also amount to a "location." Cases may arise in which it is evident that the parties have used the word "locate" to express the completion of the enterprise or structure located, but such is not the usual force of the word. Murdock v. City of Memphis, 47 Tenn. (7 Cold.) 483, 501.

As brought in.

"Located" means placed, situated, fixed in place, and "locate" means to place, to set in a particular spot or position, and, as used in Sess. Laws 1895, p. 229, providing that any personal property that shall be located in any county of the territory after the 1st day of March, etc., shall be taxed, means placed or brought into the territory after the 1st day of March, so that cattle brought in before the 1st day of March will not be taxed according to the provisions of the statute. Godfrey v. Wright, 56 Pac. 1051, 1052, 8 Okl. 151.

As build and construct.

Act April 9, 1851, § 2, provides that it shall not be lawful for any plank road company or any turnpike company to put up or erect any tollgate, gatehouse, or other building within a less distance than ten rods from the front of any dwelling house, barn, or other outhouse without the written consent of the owner thereof, and if any tollgate or other such building shall hereafter be located by any such company within said distance without such consent, the county judge of the county in which such building shall be located shall, on application, order the same to be removed. It was held that "located" is employed in reference to and synonymous with the antecedent words "erect" or "put up." Where ground was staked out, a cellar dug, and materials gotten together for building a tollgate and gatehouse within the limits prohibited by the act without the written consent of the owner before the passage of the statute, the buildings were not thereby located, though in common parlance the word "located" would describe the acts done in reference to the structures. "Locate" and "located" are words whose meaning depends on the connection in which they are used and the subjects to which they are applied. "Located," as defined by lexicographers, means placed, situated, fixed in place. Moule v. Macedon & B. Plank Road Co. (N. Y.) 6 How. Prac. 37, 38.

In a subscription agreement providing that the subscription should be void unless a railroad company should locate its road on or near a certain place, "locate" did not mean merely a resolution of the board of directors of the company that the road should be located at that place, but that the road should be actually built and constructed there. Nashville & N. W. R. Co. v. Jones, 42 Tenn. (2 Cold.) 574, 588.

"Locate," as used with reference to railroads, means to put in place. Thus, a city council may locate the route of the railroad, and may direct where the location must be, if at all, but it is for the company to make the location, and put its track in the place designated, and, if it does not choose to so locate its tracks, it is no function of the city to locate the tracks. Chicago & W. L. R. Co. v. Dunbar, 100 Ill. 110, 141.

Strictly speaking, to "locate a road" is to build it, because until it is completed it is not a road. When a subscription book speaks of locating a road, everybody understands it to mean less than a finished road—a mere line surveyed and established as the locus where the road is to be built. It must be supposed and held that it was the location of the road, and not its structure, that was intended to be specified. Warner v. Calender, 20 Ohio St. 190, 197.

"Located," as used in Pub. Laws, p. 245, § 2, providing that "from and after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of the commissioners of those townships in which a county bridge is or hereafter may be located," etc., does not mean the mere selection and approval and entering of record of the place selected for the purpose of constructing a bridge, but it is practically synonymous with "built." Everett v. Bailey, 24 Atl. 700, 701, 150 Pa. 152.

The word "located" in an agreement by a landowner granting to the railroad company undertaking to construct a road or right of way of lawful width through his land, the damages to be assessed when the road was located, was not used in the technical sense, as a final line duly adopted by the board of directors of the railroad, but as a railroad located and constructed upon the land. Hoffman v. Bloomsburg & S. R. R. Co., 27 Atl. 564, 567, 157 Pa. 174.

As lead or direct to.

A contract whereby one party agreed to "locate" another on government land meant that the party was to lead or direct the other to and point out to him public land of the United States, which was open and subject to be settled upon and entered as a homestead by any person having the qualifications required by law to settle upon and enter such land, and hence the allegation in the pleadings that defendant agreed to locate plaintiff does not show that title to real estate has become in issue to take the matter out of the jurisdiction of the justice of the peace. Hart v. Carnall-Hopkins Co., 37 Pac. 196, 197, 103 Cal. 132.

As purchase.

When applied to the acquisition of lands from the government, "locate" means the purchasing of lands from the government by means of scrip or other instruments issued by the government calling for specified quantities of land. Goodnow v. Wells, 25 N. W. 864, 866, 67 Iowa, 654.

As selection of place.

"Locating," as the word is used in speaking of the locating of lands, means the act of selecting and designating lands which the person making the location is authorized by law to select. City of Richmond v. Henrico County Sup'rs, 2 S. E. 26, 30, 83 Va. 204 (citing 2 Bouv. Law Dict. 124).

"Locate and lay out," as used in St. 1875, c. 185, establishing a board of park commissioners, and section 3, providing that said board shall have power to "locate" within the limits of the city of Boston one or more public parks and to "lay out," improve, govern, and regulate any such park or parks and the use thereof, is to be construed as meaning to determine the place of one or more public parks; and formally and distinctly designate the boundaries of the land and the place determined upon, and the dedication of the land so bounded as a public park. The ordinary meaning of the words "to locate" is to ascertain and determine the place of, and in this sense they were used in connection with the technical words "to lay out," and are not to be construed in the sense in which the words "to lay out" are used in statutes relating to highways, that "to lay out" should be construed to mean something analogous to the words "to improve." Hence, where the commissioners had taken land and called it a park, they had located and laid it out within the meaning of the statute, whether it had been constructed so as to be fit for public use as a park or not. Foster v. Park Com'rs of City of Boston, 133 Mass. 321, 322.

To locate is defined as to place, to set in a particular spot or position, or to determine the situation or limits, and Act Cong. Feb. 13, 1889, authorizing a railroad company to locate a railway line gave it power to set its railway line in a particular spot or position, to fix the place of its railway line, of surveying the place where it was to go, and fixing its boundary. United States v. Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co., 41 Pac. 729, 757, 3 Okl. 404.

"Locating," as used in St. 1863, c. 171, providing that the time for "locating and constructing a certain railroad is hereby extended," etc., means estimating the line of the railroad. The effect of a location is to bind the land described to that servitude. Abbott v. New York & N. E. R. Co., 15 N. E. 91, 100, 145 Mass. 450.

The word "located," as used in an act providing for a petition to the commissioners of a county through which a proposed road is located, means the selecting and defining the line upon which the road is to be constructed. Turner v. Thorntown & M. Gravel Road Co., 33 Ind. 317, 319.

The preliminary survey of a line of road made by the engineer, but never reported to the company or acted on by it, does not constitute a location of the line. Williamsport & N. B. R. Co. v. Philadelphia & E. R. Co., 141 Pa. 416, 21 Atl. 645, 12 L. R. A. 220.

LOCATE ANEW.

"Locate anew," as used in Gen. St. c. 43, § 12, authorizing the selectmen of a town, either for the purpose of establishing the boundary lines of a road or making alterations in the course or width thereof, to locate anew such road, means the same as to relocate the same, the words "locate anew" and "relocate" being practically synonymous; and therefore a petition using the word "relocate" was sufficient to confer jurisdiction on the commissioners under the statute. Inhabitants of Hyde Park v. Norfolk County Com'rs, 117 Mass. 416, 422.

LOCATED MINISTER.

A "local or located minister" in the Methodist Church is one who does not travel. Guardians of the Poor v. Greene (Pa.) 5 Bin. 553, 557.

LOCATIO CONDUCTIO.

"Locatio conductio" is the bailment which is created "when goods are left with the bailee to be used by him for hire." Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 909, 913.

LOCATIO OPERIS.

A contract between parties for the performance of mechanical labor and the supply of necessary materials therefor in the repair of an article is described by text-writers as "locatio operis." The subject of the contract is labor, to be expended by the workman on the property of the hirer, for an agreed price or upon a quantum meruit. The possession of the article on which the labor is to be expended passes to the workman for the purposes of the contract. Its storage from the time the article is received until the work upon it is completed is a necessary incident of the undertaking of the workman. The obligations imposed by the locatio operis, and capable of enforcement by an action on the contract, are as follows: (a) To do the work which is the subject of the undertaking; (b) to do it within the time agreed on, or within what may be, in view of all the circumstances, a proper time; (c) to do it in a proper manner; (d) to surrender the property on which the labor has been expended on payment for the work done. Zell v. Dunkle, 27 Atl. 38, 156 Pa. 353.

LOCATION.

See "Definite Location"; "Mining Location"; "Original Location"; "Placer Location"; "Practical Location"; "Valid Location."

Where the owner of land gave a real estate agent a writing in which he agreed either to lease a certain building at a stated rent, with the privilege to the lessee of buying it at a certain price, or to donate to the company whom he desired as a tenant a tract of land to build on, and the writing concluded: "Will allow you as commission for said location one third interest in five acres located near said works," the word "location," as used in such instrument, should be construed to apply to either one of the results which the parties contemplated producing, and that a location was secured when an accepted lessee of the factory was produced by the agent for the owner. Harvey v. Hamilton, 40 N. E. 592, 593, 155 Ill. 377.

"Location," as used in the chapters relating to railroads and street railways, as applied to a street railway, means the grant to a street railway company of the right to construct, maintain, and operate a street railway in a public way or place. Rev. Laws 1902, Mass. p. 978, c. 111, § 1.

Where a school district in possession of a schoolhouse voted to repair it, and to buy land enough to straighten the line west of the schoolhouse, this was a sufficient location to give the county commissioners jurisdiction of a petition to change the location. Holbrook v. Faulkner, 55 N. H. 311, 315.

As situation.

"Location," as used in a verdict in an action by a railroad employé against the company that he did not know and had no means of knowing the existence and location of the cattle chute by which he was injured, with reference to the side tracks, does not necessarily imply the exact relation of the cattle chute to the track. If the question put to the jury had been confined to the location of the structure with reference to the track, there would have been no difficulty in holding that the question called only for his knowledge of the general relation of the cattle chute to the track. The question would then have been substantially the same in meaning as if it had inquired only of existence of the cattle chute. In reference to the track, location by itself would have imported substantially the same as existence by itself. Both words being used in the question answered by the jury, each must be construed in a different sense from the other, both words implying a greater question of knowledge than either alone. General location is implied in the question by the word "existence," and the word "location," used with it, must signify more than mere existence, more than general location, in reference to the track; it must mean the exact location or distance from the track. Dorsey v. Phillips & Colby Const. Co., 42 Wis. 583-604.

The word "location," in Const. art. 8, § 5, providing that the "location of the State University, the Agricultural College, and the School of Mines, as well as all grants, gifts, and appropriation of money and property heretofore made to the said several institutions, are hereby conferred to the use and benefit of the same," is used in its ordinary sense, which is the sense of situation with respect to place. In re Senate Resolutions, 21 Pac. 472, 473, 9 Colo. 626.

Corporation.

"Location," as used in Rev. St. § 1772, providing that a corporation in its articles of incorporation shall state the name and location of such corporation, is not equivalent in language or meaning to the words "principal office or place of business." It means that the name of the corporation shall be localized; that is, a steamship company, not located in Milwaukee, should not be called the "Milwaukee Steamship Company," it being located in the town of Lake. Milwaukee Steamship Co. v. City of Milwaukee, 53 N. W. 839, 841, 83 Wis. 590, 18 L. R. A. 353.

Highway.

The "location of a highway" is a definite judicial act. The opening and building adds nothing to the legal effect of the location. The time of location is certain. The rights of the public and the duties of the town become fixed from that time. The precise time of opening and building the way is, within certain limits, a matter of municipal convenience and discretion. In re Railroad Crossing, 39 Atl. 478, 479, 91 Me. 135.

Land as application and survey.

"Locations," as used in a deed of all locations made by the grantor on Galveston Island, Tex., either individually or in connection with others, has no such well-defined meaning as would enable the court to construe the instrument without the aid of evidence. The primary signification of the word "location," as applied to land, is the land designated by a person when he files a valid certificate with the proper surveyor, and makes an application for the survey of land subject to location by virtue of the certificate. Such person acquires a vested right in the land, and to have same appropriated to his certificate, and finally patented on proper return of the field notes and otherwise complying with the law. But when the term is used by a person in speaking of locations made by himself it would ordinarily apply to the land surveyed for him on his application, without any restricted meaning as to whether it was land filed on survey or patent; yet it might be used in an appropriate sense by a grantor in conveying lands to designate the same as to locations made by him, though a part had been conveyed away to others and reconveyed to him, as contradistinguished from lands not located by him, but conveyed to him by others. Robinson v. Jones, 22 S. W. 15, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 316.

"Location," as used in Act Cong. April 26, 1822, entitled, "An act to perfect certain locations and sales of public lands in Missouri," by which it was enacted that the locations theretofore made of warrants issued under the act of February 15, 1815, which was an act for the relief of the New Madrid sufferers, if made in pursuance of the provisions of that act in other respects, should be perfected into grants in like manner as if they had conformed to the sectional or quarter-sectional lines of the public surveys, means a completed location, which does not take place on the mere application to the Surveyor General to survey the tract which the party desired to appropriate, nor when the surveyor had planted his last stake or heap of stones on the ground, nor when he had returned home with his notes in his pocket, nor when he had made out his survey and plat, but only when the surveyor had returned the survey and plat and the notice as to the party for whom the survey was made to the office of the recorder of land titles, to be by him filed and recorded. Hot Springs Cases, 92 U. S. 698, 711, 23 L. Ed. 690.

"Location," as used with reference to public lands in Pennsylvania, is "one where the lands are sufficiently described." It is distinguished from a mere application for vacant lands, which does not describe the particular lands. Biddle's Lessee v. Dougal, (Pa.) 5 Bin. 142, 151.

In judicial proceedings involving the titles to land, the term "location" occurs very frequently, and its meaning varies with the subject spoken of. The word is used in speaking of a point or place of beginning of a line and of a whole tract, but in these cases the meaning and the ideas conveyed are different. When the location of a point is the subject spoken of, an indivisible part of space, a spot comprehending no superficial extent, is alluded to. When speaking of the location of a line, an idea of the place of a certain longitudinal extension, limit, or boundary is presented; but in contemplating that subject we form no idea of space, or any superficial extent. We can, however, have no other idea of the location of a tract of land than that it is a space, a superficial extension, an area, a surface comprehended within confines. The word "location" in reference to a tract of land must therefore always be attended with these ideas. It is a place of greater or less extent. It may be a small lot, or it may be a separate lot to an extent of many hundreds of acres. It is still an individual entire location or place, small or large. The term "location" is also often used in our judicial proceedings as synonymous with the word "description." Thus it is said that the location is uncertain, that it is ambiguous, or that it has a double aspect. The word in these instances evidently means that the description of the area or the space of land is uncertain, ambiguous, or that it has a double aspect. But it would seem to be absurd to say that a place had a double aspect, or that it was a place which admitted of being put in one place or in another place. Hence in most, if not all, instances by ambiguity uncertainty in the description of the location is really meant, for it is difficult to conceive how the location of any one piece of land can be deemed certain or become known in contradistinction to any other parcel but by the accuracy of its description. The location or place of any one space or tract of land, it is most manifest, can only be distinguished from other spaces or tracts by the preciseness of its description, and that description does enough towards the distinction of a tract of land if it stops short of defining one whole and separate space or area. Cunningham v. Browning (Md.) 1 Bland, 299, 329.

The meaning of the word "location," as used in an act relating to public lands, is declared to be an application made by any person or persons for land in the office of the secretary of the late land office of Pennsylvania, and entered in the books of the said office, numbered and sent to the Surveyor General's office. P. & L. Dig. Laws 1894, Pa. vol. 2, col. 3733, § 29.

The term "location" has been very generally applied to occupations of portions of the public domain. Lux v. Haggis, 10 Pac. 674, 736, 69 Cal. 255.

Railroad.

The location of a railroad is not a mere right; it is an act. It is not the power to do a thing; it is the thing itself. Williams v. Odessa & M. Ry. Co., 44 Atl. 821, 836, 7 Del. Ch. 303.

The location of a railway upon a highway is a different thing from the right to make such a location, and presupposes a prior grant of that right. The location definitely appropriates a particular portion of the highway for railroad use, establishes the grade at which the tracks are to be laid upon it, and may make extensive changes in the course, character, or use of the remaining portions. Appeal of Central Railway & Electric Co., 35 Atl. 32, 35, 67 Conn. 197.

The word "location," as applied to a railroad, is not a typical term, and must, therefore, be interpreted according to its usual and ordinary significance. It is defined by Webster as follows: (1) To place, to set in a particular spot or position; (2) to designate the site or place of, as to locate a public building, church, etc.; (3) to select or determine the bounds or place of, as to locate a tract of land or a land warrant "Located," by the same authority, is placed, situated, fixed in place. In re Providence & W. R. Co., 17 R. I. 324, 336, 21 Atl. 965, 969.

"The location of a railroad" is the determination and designation of the precise place where the roadbed is to be built. Bucksport & B. R. Co. v. Inhabitants of Brewer, 67 Me. 295, 300.

"Location," as used in a statute making provisions for an amended route of a railroad and the location of tracks upon it, does not mean the same thing as "route." Location denotes the position of the rails in the highway, while route means the course of the railroad—the streets through which it will pass. Theberath v. City of Newark, 30 Atl. 528, 57 N. J. Law (28 Vroom) 309.

"Location," as used in Rev. St. 1874, p. 218, § 62, providing that the city council has power to provide for and change the location, grade, and crossings of any railroad, has a well-understood meaning. It is often applied, says Bouvier, to denote the act of selecting and marking out the line upon which a railroad, canal, or highway is to be constructed. 2 Bouv. Law Dict. 80. Such is the sense in which it is used in the statute. Hickey v. Chicago & W. I. R. Co., 6 Ill. App. (6 Bradw.) 172, 178.

"Location," as used in Act April 5, 1871, authorizing a railroad company to construct its road from one city to another on such route and location and through such counties as the board of directors should deem most feasible, necessarily involve a starting point and a terminus, and there cannot be a complete route and a complete location which does not comprehend the entire structure throughout its length. Mellen v. Town of Lansing (U. S.) 11 Fed. 820, 825.

Under a statute authorizing towns through or near which an extension of a railroad passes from a fixed point in the state to any point on Lake Erie to aid the same, there is no location of the road sufficient to authorize such an issue by an establishment of one terminus to a further terminus through the town issuing the bonds without the establishment of the further terminus of the road. Oswego County Sav. Bank v. Town of Genoa, 59 N. Y. Supp. 829, 835, 840, 28 Misc. Rep. 71.

Under 18 St. 482, § 1, granting a right of way through public lands to any railroad which shall have filed a copy of its articles of incorporation and due proofs of its organization, and section 4, providing that such railroads shall within 12 months after the location of any section file a profile thereof, and proofs of its organization, as required, its right of way became definitely located by the construction of its road, though the profile map had not been accepted because the land was unsurveyed. Pennsylvania Min. & Imp. Co. v. Everett & M. C. Ry. Co., 60 Pac. 628, 629, 29 Wash. 102.

Warrant.

A location of a land warrant is an actual appropriation of so much of the land of the commonwealth to the use of that warrant. It is not a mere mental purpose to appropriate, but an actual appropriation by such acts performed on the ground or return into the land office as shall give the world notice that the designated land has been withdrawn from the common mass of public lands, and has become private property. McBarron v. Gilbert, 42 Pa. (6 Wright) 268, 278.

LOCATION CERTIFICATE.

A location certificate is purely a creature of statute. Its purposes and functions are twofold. When duly recorded, it becomes notice to the world of the facts therein set forth, namely, a description of the premises claimed, and by whom and when located, in order to secure the discoverer or claimants against others seeking to locate the same ground; and it is thus constructive notice of the claimant's possession. By statute it is made one of the steps requisite to constitute a perfected mining location. It differs from ordinary documentary muniments of title in that it is not a title, nor proof of title, nor does it constitute or of itself establish the possessory right which is necessary in order to maintain an action of ejectment. Strepey v. Stark, 5 Pac. 111, 113, 7 Colo. 614.

LOCATOR.

The name of the lender in a bailment in which the goods are left with the bailee to be used by him for hire. Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 909, 913.

LOCKED HARBOR.

A locked harbor is where a vessel cannot go to sea being landlocked by shoals or reefs. United States v. Morel (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1310.

LOCKOUT.

A lockout has been defined to be the closing of a factory or workshop by an employer, usually to bring the workmen to satisfactory terms by a suspension of wages. Mathews v. People, 67 N. E. 28, 31, 202 Ill. 389, 63 L. R. A. 73, 95 Am. St. Rep. 241.

LOCO PARENTIS.

See "In Loco Parentis."

LOCMEN.

"The term 'locmen' was used in the early maritime law to designate a local pilot whose business was to assist the pilot of the vessel in guiding the course of the vessel into the harbor, or through a river or channel, so as to avoid shoals, rocks," etc. "If a vessel was lost by the false direction or ignorance of the local pilot, he was liable to lose his head at the hands of the master or one of the mariners, who were authorized to cut it off as a penalty for his false pretensions of knowledge or skill." Martin v. Farnsworth, 33 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Jones & S.) 246, 260 (quoting Laws of Oleron, arts. 13, 14).

LOCOMOTIVE.

Laws 1871, c. 609, declaring that "no railroad on which locomotive steam shall be used" shall be constructed across certain avenues, refers to railroads moving cars in the ordinary way, by means of locomotive engines, and does not include railroads moving their cars in any other way, as by horses or by a propelling rope or cable attached to stationary power. A stationary engine is not a locomotive engine, and does not, according to general understanding, use locomotive steam. Locomotive steam is such as is used in a locomotive engine, and a locomotive engine is one which moves cars by its own backward and forward motion. Stranahan v. Sea View Ry. Co., 84 N. Y. 308, 314.

The term "locomotive power," in an act giving the right to construct a street railway and convey passengers by any power other than by locomotive, means locomotion by the power of steam. "Electricity is certainly a locomotive power, and therefore, by a strict definition of the word, could not be used. Horses and mules are locomotive powers, but the act, I suppose, did not intend to exclude them. There is some authority for the use of the word 'locomotive' as meaning a steam engine, or an engine propelled by steam as its motive power. I suppose the court may safely construe the words as including every present known power of locomotion except steam." Gillert v. Chester & M. Ry. Co., 2 Pa. Dist. R. 450, 451.

A machine which moves backward and forward along the track of a railroad, by its own steam power, and which, while it had not the weight, size, speed, nor power of an ordinary locomotive, was capable of and did the same work to a certain extent, and was also used for the purpose of driving piles, was a locomotive, within Burns' Rev. St. 1901, § 7083, providing that every corporation shall be liable for injuries to an employé caused by negligence of any person in the service of the corporation who has charge of any locomotive. Jarvis v. Hitch (Ind.) 65 N. E. 608, 610.

Laws 1887, c. 270, § 1, cl. 3, making the employer liable for injuries to an employé resulting from negligence of a fellow employé in charge of a "locomotive engine or train upon a railroad," relates to those operated or originally intended to be operated to some extent by steam, and does not include electrically propelled cars on street railways. Fallon v. West End St. Ry. Co., 30 N. E. 536, 537, 171 Mass. 249.

"Locomotive engine" generally means a propelling engine on a railroad, and does not include a traction engine, with a crane used for lifting stone, but propelled by steam. Murphy v. Wilson, 27 Alb. Law J. 505.

A locomotive engine is one which moves cars by its own backward and forward motion. Stranahan v. Sea View Ry. Co., 84 N. Y. 308, 314.

In construing the statute in reference to the liability of a railroad for injuries resulting by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has the charge or control of any signal, switch, locomotive engine, or train, the court says the statute in referring to a signal, switch, locomotive engine, or train seems to contemplate the danger from a locomotive engine or train as a moving body, and to provide against the negligence of those who wholly or in part control its movements. The charge and control is of that whose characteristic is rapid and forceful motion. It relates to locomotive engines as a whole, and not to the individual parts which make up the train or engine. Thyng v. Fitchburg R. Co., 30 N. E. 169, 170, 156 Mass. 13, 32 Am. St. Rep. 425.

LOCUS IN QUO.

The term "locus in quo," when used with reference to trespass on realty, does not mean the identical place where the trespass was committed, but merely the premises described in the writ. Moor v. Campbell, 15 N. H. 208, 211.

LODE.

See "Known Lode or Vein"; "Quartz Lode."

Lodes in place, see "In Place."

"A lode consists of aggregations of peculiar matter, and its form can only be found and its limits determined, by discerning and identifying the qualities and appearances of its composition." In some cases the apex of a lode crops out on the surface, and in others it is found 100 or more feet beneath the surface. Bullion Beck & Champion Min. Co. v. Eureka Hill Min. Co., 11 Pac. 515, 516, 5 Utah, 3.

The words "vein or lode," in the United States statutes relative to mining locations and claims, were intended to apply to such veins or lodes as are described in the first portion of the statute, namely, a vein or lode of quartz or other rock in place bearing gold, silver, etc. The statute, it is said, was intended to be liberal and broad enough to apply to any kind of lode or vein of quartz or other rock bearing mineral, in whatever character, kind, or formation the mineral might be found. Shoshone Min. Co. v. Rutter (U. S.) 87 Fed. 801, 807, 31 C. C. A. 223.

To constitute a "lode," within the meaning of a statute providing that, if a lode is known to exist within the boundaries of a placer claim, the applicant for a patent must state that fact and pay a specified price per acre for that portion of the ground, or he acquires no right to the loan, it is not enough that there may have been some indications by outcropping on the surface of the existence of lodes or veins of rock in place, bearing gold, silver, or other precious metals, to justify their designation as "known veins or lodes." In order to meet that designation, the lodes or veins must be clearly ascertained, and be of such extent as to render the land more valuable on that account and justify their exploration. Migeon v. Montana Cent. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 77 Fed. 249, 256, 23 C. C. A. 156.

As any mineralized matter.

The definition of a "lode" given by geologists is that of a fissure in the earth's crust filled with mineral matter, or, more accurately, as aggregations of mineral matter containing ores in fissures. As used by miners, before being defined by any authority, the term "lode" simply meant that formation by which the miner could be led or guided. It is an alteration of the verb "lead" and whatever the miner could follow, expecting to find ore, was his lode. Some formation within which he could find ore and out of which he could not expect to find ore was his lode. A fissure in the earth's crust, an opening in its rocks and strata made by some force of nature, in which the mineral is deposited, would seem to be essential to the definition of a lode in the judgment of geologists. But to the practical miner the fissure and its walls are only of importance as indicating the boundaries within which he may look for and reasonably expect to find the ore he seeks. A continuous body of mineralized rock lying within other well-defined boundaries of the earth's surface and under it would equally constitute in his eyes a lode. The term "lode" as used in the acts of Congress is applicable to any zone or belt or mineralized rock lying within boundaries clearly separating it from the neighboring rock. It includes all deposits of mineral matter found through a mineralized zone or belt coming from the same source, impressed with the same forms, and appearing to have been created by the same process. Eureka Consol. Min. Co. v. Richmond Min. Co. (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 819, 823 (approved and followed in Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Cheesman, 6 Sup. Ct. 481, 483, 116 U. S. 529, 29 L. Ed. 712); Waterloo Min. Co. v. Doe (U. S.) 82 Fed. 45, 51, 54, 27 C. C. A. 50; Meydenbauer v. Stevens (U. S.) 78 Fed. 787, 790; King v. Amy & Silversmith Consol. Min. Co., 24 Pac. 200, 202, 9 Mont. 543.

Justice Hallett's definition of the term "lodes," as used in mining law, "is a body of mineral or mineral-bearing rock within defined boundaries in the mass of the mountain." Judge Goddard gives this definition: "Any mineralized belt or zone of rock lying within boundaries clearly distinguishing it from the neighboring rock coming from the same source, impressed with the same forms, and appearing to be created by the same process." Justice Field gives the same definition, and also the following: "A continuous body of mineralized rock lying within any other well-defined boundaries on the earth's surface and under it." And Justice Miller quotes approvingly all the definitions above given. Dr. Raymond has somewhere defined a "lode" as "that which the miner can follow, expecting to find ore." Duggan v. Davey, 26 N. W. 887, 896, 4 Dak. 110.

A "lode," as used in the mining acts 1866 and 1872, is whatever indication of ore or mineral a miner would follow and find ore. Harrington v. Chambers, 1 Pac. 362, 375, 3 Utah, 94.

"Lodes," as used in the mining land laws of the United States, means "lines or aggregations of metal imbedded in quartz or other rock in place. It is intended to indicate the presence of metal in rock." Wheeler v. Smith, 32 Pac. 784, 786, 5 Wash. 704; United States v. Iron Silver Min. Co., 9 Sup. Ct. 195, 198, 128 U. S. 673, 32 L. Ed. 571.

A "lode," as the term is used in the mining law, means "ore in mass and position in the body of a mountain, whatever its former structure or boundaries may be." Hyman v. Wheeler (U. S.) 29 Fed. 347, 353.

A lode is a connected deposit of mineral-bearing ore and concomitant vein matter. Phillipotts v. Blasdel, 8 Nev. 61, 68.

"Lode" is the term used in the mining law to designate any description of deposit of mineral-bearing rock "situated in the general mass of the country; that is to say, whether, in the language of the geologist, we say that it is a bed or a segregated vein, or a gash vein, or a true fissure vein, or merely a deposit. In other words, whenever a miner finds a valuable mineral deposit in the body of the earth he calls that a 'lode,' whatever its form may be, and however it may be situated, and whatever its extent in the body of the earth." Stevens v. Williams (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 40, 42.

As a fissure.

In defining "lodes," the text-books and several of the decisions speak of them as fissures in the earth filled with quartz in place, carrying gold and silver or other minerals. But true fissure lodes often exist and are continuous without having any filling in certain points or places of mineral matter. A majority of such lodes have, in addition to the clean fissure filling of mineral, a considerable amount of decomposed wall rock, clay, etc. Consolidated Wyoming Gold Min. Co. v. Champion Min. Co. (U. S.) 63 Fed. 540, 544.

"A vein or lode authorized to be located is a seam or fissure in the earth's crust, filled with quartz, or with some other kind of rock in place, carrying gold, silver, or other valuable mineral deposits named in the statute. It is not enough to discover detached pieces of quartz, or mere bunches of quartz not in place. The vein, however, may be thin, and it may be many feet thick, or thin in places—almost or quite 'pinched out,' in miner's phrase—and in other places widening out into extensive bodies of ore. So, also, in places it may be quite or nearly barren, and at other places immensely rich." Jupiter Mining Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. (U. S.) 11 Fed. 666, 675 (quoted in Stinchfield v. Gillis, 30 Pac. 839, 840, 96 Cal. 33).

Defined boundaries required.

A "lode," within the meaning of the act of Congress, is a mineral body of rock within defined boundaries in the general mass of the mountain. Stevens v. Williams (U. S.) 23

Fed. Cas. 40, 42; Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Chessman (U. S.) 8 Fed. 297, 307; Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Cheesman, 116 U. S. 529, 6 Sup. Ct. 481, 484, 29 L. Ed. 712 (cited in Raisbeck v. Anthony, 41 N. W. 72, 77, 73 Wis. 572); Synnott v. Shaughnessy, 7 Pac. 82, 84, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 122.

Justice Field, in Eureka Consol. Min. Co. v. Richmond Min. Co. (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 819, 823, defines a "lode" to be a zone or belt of mineralized rock lying within boundaries clearly separating it from the neighboring rock. In the case of North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. (U. S.) 1 Fed. 522, it was said that a lode is a seam or fissure in the earth's crust filled with quartz, carrying gold, silver, or other valuable mineral deposits named in the statute. In the case of Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Cheesman, 116 U. S. 535, 536, 6 Sup. Ct. 481, 29 L. Ed. 712, it was said a lode or vein is a body of mineral or mineral-bearing rock within well-defined boundaries in the general mass of the mountains. In this definition the elements are the body of mineral or mineral-bearing rock and the boundaries. With either of these things well established, very slight evidence may be accepted as to the existence of the other. A body of mineral or mineral-bearing rock in the general mass of the mountains, so far as it may continue unbroken and without interruption, may be regarded as a lode, whatever the boundaries may be. Montana Cent. Ry. Co. v. Migeon (U. S.) 68 Fed. 811, 813.

While metalliferous rock in place not in a fissure may be found under such conditions, within clearly defined boundaries, as to require recognition as a "vein" or "lode," a broad metalliferous zone having within its limits true fissure veins, plainly bounded, cannot be regarded as a single vein or lode, although such zone may itself have boundaries which can be traced. Mount Diablo Milling & Mining Co. v. Callison (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 918, 924.

A philologist would define a "lode" to be a seam or layer of any substance, more or less wide, intersecting the rock or stratum, and not corresponding with the stratification, but in mining parlance it means a body of mineral or mineralized rock in place, within defined boundaries, in the general mass of the mountains. Cheesman v. Shreeve (U. S.) 40 Fed. 787, 792.

The word "lode," as used in the United States statutes, and as understood by miners, is applicable to any body or belt of mineralized rock lying within clearly defined boundaries separating it from the country or non-mineral rock. Book v. Justice Min. Co. (U. S.) 58 Fed. 106, 125.

A body of mineral or mineral-bearing rock in the general mass of the mountain, so far as it may continue unbroken and without interruption, may be regarded as a "lode." With well-defined boundaries, very slight evidence of ore within such boundaries will prove the existence of a "lode." Meydenbauer v. Stevens (U. S.) 78 Fed. 787, 790.

"Lode," as the term is used in mining law, means "a fissure between well-defined boundaries, containing ore, even though the ore is found at considerable intervals and in small quantities." United States v. King, 22 Pac. 498, 499, 9 Mont. 75.

In the Eureka Case (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 819, 823, it was said: "It is difficult to give any definition of the term ['lode'], as understood and used in the acts of Congress, which will not be subject to criticism. A fissure in the earth's crust, made by some force of nature, in which the mineral is deposited, would seem to be essential to the definition of a 'lode' in the judgment of geologists, but to the practical miner the fissure and its walls are only of importance to indicate the boundaries of it within which he may look for and reasonably expect to find the ore he seeks. A continuous body of mineralized rock lying within any other well-defined boundaries on the earth's surface or under it would equally constitute in his eyes a 'lode.' We are of the opinion, therefore, that the term, as used in the acts of Congress, is applicable to any zone or belt of mineralized rock lying within boundaries clearly separating it from the neighboring rocks." Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Cheesman, 116 U. S. 529, 534, 6 Sup. Ct. 481, 483, 29 L. Ed. 712. The courts say in general that a lode or vein is a bed of mineral body, or mineral body of rock, within well-defined boundaries, in the general mass of the mountain. The lode or vein must be continuous in the sense that it can be traced through the surrounding rocks, though slight interruptions of the mineral-bearing rock would not be alone sufficient to destroy the identity of the vein, nor would a short partial closure of the fissure have that effect, if a little later on it recurred again with mineral-bearing rock within it. Buffalo Zinc & Copper Co. v. Crump, 69 S. W. 572, 575, 70 Ark. 525, 91 Am. St. Rep. 87.

Length, width, and depth required.

A lead or lode is not an imaginary line without dimensions; it is not a thing without shape or form; but before it can legally and rightfully be denominated a "lead" or "lode," it must have length and width and depth. It must be capable of measurement, and must occupy definite space, and be capable of identification; and, before a lode can be called a "discovery," at least one well-defined wall or side of the lode must be found. Foote v. National Min. Co., 2 Mont. 402, 404.

Placer claim.

The term "lode," in the language of miners, means a vein containing ore. The term, in a statute providing for the location and recording of mining claims on veins or lodes, or lands bearing valuable deposits, does not include a placer mining claim. Moxon v. Wilkinson, 2 Mont. 421, 424.

As used in acts of Congress relating to mines, the term "lode" is applicable to any zone or belt of mineralized rock lying within boundaries clearly separating it from the neighboring rock. It includes all deposits of mineral matter found through a mineralized zone or belt coming from the same source, impressed with the same forms, and appearing to have been created by the same process. This definition would not include a bed of gravel from which particles of gold may be washed. Gregory v. Pershbaker, 14 Pac. 401, 402, 36 Cal. 109.

Vein synonymous.

The word "lode," in mining law, is a Cornish word nearly synonymous with "vein." It is used to designate ore contained between defined walls or boundaries of rock, etc. Bullion Min. Co. v. Croesus Gold & Silver Min. Co., 2 Nev. 168, 176, 90 Am. Dec. 526; Synnott v. Shaughnessy, 7 Pac. 82, 84, 2 Idaho (Hash.) 122.

A "lode" is an aggregation of mineral matter containing ore in fissures, and, as used by miners, is synonymous with "vein," and applies to all deposits of mineralized matter within any zone or belt of mineralized rock separated from the neighboring rock by well-defined boundaries. Hayes v. Lavagnino, 53 Pac. 1029, 1032, 17 Utah, 185.

The term "vein or lode" meant lines or aggregations of metal imbedded in quartz or other rock "in place"; that is, fixed in rock. The terms are found together in the statutes, and both are intended to indicate the presence of metal in rock, yet a lode may be and often does contain more than one vein. United States v. Iron Silver Min. Co., 9 Sup. Ct. 195, 198, 128 U. S. 673, 32 L. Ed. 571.

LODE MINING CLAIM.

A "lode mining claim" is a definite, distinct, and certain tract or parcel of land, the same as is a farm or town lot, and a location according to law and the record thereof is the title by which it is held and owned. It is a claim on the surface and exposed to view, designated by stakes and monuments so that its boundaries may be readily traced. Mantle v. Noyes, 5 Pac. 856, 861, 5 Mont. 274.

LODGE.

Within the meaning of a statute which makes it the duty of the clerk of common pleas of a county to record all deeds lodged with him for that purpose, a deed is "lodged" with the clerk for record when it is sent to him with a request to record the same and inform the sender of the necessary charges therefor. Dickerson v. Bowers, 11 Atl. 142, 42 N. J. Eq. (15 Stew.) 295.

In a statute providing for calling elections upon the question of local option, providing that, after receiving the petition of a requisite number of voters in the territory to be affected, the county judge shall make an order directing an election to be held on some day not earlier than 60 days after said application is lodged with him, the word "lodged" imports that the writing is to be made a matter of record in some way, and is not to be construed differently from the word "received," as used in the act. It was intended that the petition should be received in court and there made a matter of record by the proper order entered on the order book, showing that it has been received and filed, and the purpose of it, and that the order for the election should be made at the next regular term of the court thereafter. Wilson v. Hines, 99 Ky. 229, 35 S. W. 627, 629.

As used in Kentucky statutes authorizing the county court to fix the day for a local option election not earlier than 60 days after a petition for such election is "lodged" with the judge of such court, the word "lodged" refers to the act of receiving the petition, or of making the application by petition for the whole of the election, as the starting point from which to compute the time within which the election might be held. Wilson v. Hines, 37 S. W. 148, 149, 99 Ky. 221.

As dwell.

In Act 1838, providing that the place where any person having no family shall generally lodge shall be held and considered his place of abode, etc., "lodge" means dwells, rests. Wherever a person rests or dwells for a time, whether he does so rightfully or wrongfully, voluntarily or involuntarily, he "lodges," within the meaning of the statute. Darden v. Wyatt, 15 Ga. 414, 416.

LODGER.

A lodger is one who inhabits a portion of a house of which another has the general possession and custody. Metzger v. Schnabel, 52 N. Y. Supp. 105, 106, 23 Misc. Rep. 698 (citing 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1003); McDowell v. Hyman, 48 Pac. 984, 986, 117 Cal. 67.

"A lodger is one who lives at board, or in a hired room, or who has a bed in another's house for a night." Pollock v. Landis, 36 Iowa, 651, 652 (quoting Webst. Dict.).

A "lodger" is defined by Burrill as "one who occupies hired apartments in another's house; a tenant of part of another house. Volume 2, p. 166." Ullman v. State, 1 Tex. App. 220, 222, 28 Am. Rep. 405.

Where the landlord lets a person into possession of the second floor, the landlord himself retaining the possession of the rest of the house, such person is merely a "lodger" or inmate. Wansey v. Perkins, 7 Man. & G. 151, 155.

Where the owner of a house takes in a person to reside in a part of it, though such person has the exclusive possession of the rooms appropriated to him, and the uncontrolled right of ingress and egress, yet if the owner retains his character of master of the house, the individual so occupying it occupies it as a lodger only, and not as a tenant, within the meaning of 2 Wm. IV, c. 45, § 27, providing that every male person of full age occupying any house as owner or tenant, of the clear yearly value of a certain sum, should be entitled to vote. Toms v. Lockett, 5 Man., G. & S. 22, 37.

Guest distinguished.

A lodger is one who inhabits a portion of a house, of which another has the general possession and capacity. As distinguished from a "guest," a "lodger" is one who for the time being has his home at his lodging place. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Lowe, 44 N. W. 226, 227, 28 Neb. 239, 6 L. R. A. 809, 26 Am. St. Rep. 325.

Tenant distinguished.

A lodger is one who has the right to inhabit another man's house; one who lives in a hired room or rooms in the house of another. The distinction between "lodgers" and "tenants" may in some cases be fairly drawn, and may depend upon the character of the hiring, with reference sometimes to the business of the lessor and the presumed intention of the parties, as gathered from all the other surrounding circumstances of the particular case. The tenant is put into the exclusive possession of his rooms, while the boarder or lodger has merely the use of them, without the actual or exclusive possession, which is in the lessor, subject to such use. Linwood Park Co. v. Van Dusen, 58 N. E. 576, 580, 63 Ohio St. 183 (citing 1 McAdam, Landl. & Ten. 619, 621; Cent. Dict.).

LODGING HOUSE.

See "Public Lodging House."

A lodging house is a house where lodgings are let. Linwood Park Co. v. Van Dusen, 58 N. E. 576, 581, 63 Ohio St. 183.

"Lodging houses" is the term applied to houses containing furnished apartments which are let out by the week or by the month, without meals, or with breakfast simply. They are called by the French "hotels," but not so by us. Cromwell v. Stephens (N. Y.) 2 Daly, 15, 25, 3 Abb. Prac. 26, 35.

Inn, hotel, and tavern distinguished.

See, also, "Inn"; "Tavern."

The term "lodging house" and the words "inn," "hotel," or "boarding house" are not convertible terms or words, and a distinction exists between these several institutions and a lodging house. Bailey v. People, 60 N. E. 98, 100, 190 Ill. 28, 54 L. R. A. 838, 83 Am. St. Rep. 116.

LODGING HOUSE KEEPER.

The "keeper of a lodging house" is not in a legal sense an innkeeper, a hotel keeper, or a boarding house keeper; so that a statute regulating the number of people a lodging house keeper may permit to sleep in one room is discriminatory against lodging house keepers as a class, and exempts keepers of other houses of public entertainment, such as inns, hotels, and boarding houses. Bailey v. People, 60 N. E. 98, 99, 190 Ill. 28, 54 L. R. A. 838, 83 Am. St. Rep. 116.

A "lodging house keeper," as distinguished from an "innkeeper," makes a contract with every man that comes to his lodging house, whereas an innkeeper is bound, without making any special contract, to provide lodging and entertainment for all at a reasonable price. Thompson v. Lacy, 3 Barn. & Ald. 283.

LODGE.

See "Supreme Lodge."

A lodge is the meeting room of an association. Laycock v. State, 36 N. E. 137, 140, 136 Ind. 217.

"Lodge," as used in reference to associations by that name, "is defined by Webster to be a secret association, as the free Masons, Odd Fellows, and the like." State v. National Ass'n of Farmers' & Mechanics' Mut. Aid Ass'n, 9 Pac. 956, 960, 35 Kan. 51.

LOG.

The term "log" has a definite significance, and means the trunk of a tree cut down and stripped of its branches. State v. Addington, 27 S. E. 988, 990, 121 N. C. 538.

The words "logs or timber," as used in the act relating to booms and dams, shall be taken to mean logs and timber of every kind and description, manufactured or unmanufactured. Code W. Va. 1899, p. 1071, § 27.

Manufactured timber.

"Logs," as used in Rev. St. § 330, as amended by Laws 1879, c. 167, § 1, in that part of the section which applies to the county of Marathon, and provides for a lien in favor of persons furnishing supplies to men engaged in getting out logs and timber in that county, means the stems or trunks of trees cut into convenient length for the purpose of afterwards being manufactured into timber of various kinds to supply the manifold wants of a civilized community, and does not include manufactured lumber of any kind, nor timber which is square or otherwise shaped for use, without further change in form. Kolloch v. Parcher, 9 N. W. 67, 69, 52 Wis. 393.

Masts and spars.

"Log" is a word of large signification, and might under some circumstances include within its meaning masts and spars, where there was something in the context to indicate an intent to use it in that manner, but as used in the following contract: "Said H. agrees to sell and does hereby sell to said H. & Co., all the logs, cut and hauled into the J. M. waters the present lumbering season," etc.—it would not include masts or spars. Haynes v. Hayward, 40 Me. 145, 148.

Shingle rift.

"Logs and timber," in Rev. St. c. 91, § 34, giving a labor lien on logs and timber for cutting the same, includes cedar shingle rift cut four feet in length. Cutting up the logs does not defeat the lien. Sands v. Sands, 74 Me. 239, 240.

LOG MAN.

In construing an order given to a captain of a tug employed for rafting purposes, which recited that the bearer was defendant's "log man," and any orders from him would be the same as from the employer's office, the court said: "The term 'log man' is a technical term, and may have a signification limiting the range of the duties of the person to whom applied. It may be that in the performance of his duties, such as the booming of the logs and the care of the raft, the co-operation of the tug captain was essential, and that the authority conferred related only to such as was necessary to secure that co-operation. In the absence of such explanation, it cannot be said that by these letters the defendant, a log-towing company, engaged in the navigation of logs, and expert in all matters pertaining to such navigation, intended to restrict the authority of the bearer of the letter to matters respecting the booming of the raft, and the placing of lights thereon while in transit." Stevenson v. Michigan Log-Towing Co., 61 N. W. 536, 538, 103 Mich. 412.

LOG MEASURE.

"Log measure" is the measurement of the logs before sawing them, then by calculation ascertaining what quantity of lumber they would produce when sawed into pieces the required size. Smith v. Aikin, 75 Ala. 209, 210.

LOGGING RAILROAD.

A "logging railroad" is a private road constructed for the convenience and accommodation of lumbermen. Tompkins v. Gardner & Spry Co., 37 N. W. 43, 44, 69 Mich. 58.

LOGROLLING.

Logrolling is a union of interest to secure legislation. Attorney General v. Amos, 27 N. W. 571, 572, 60 Mich. 372 (citing People v. Briggs, 50 N. Y. 553).

"Logrolling" is the public name, universally understood, designating the practice of corrupt combinations of minorities with different interests to force the passage of bills with provisions which could never succeed if they stood on their separate merits. Commonwealth v. Barnett, 48 Atl. 976, 977, 199 Pa. 161, 55 L. R. A. 882.

Sandford, J., in the case of Conner v. City of New York, 4 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Sandf.) 261, in reference to a provision of the Constitution that "no private or local law shall embrace more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title," said that the provision was aimed at "logrolling," a well-known process by which bills to promote individual interests and mere neighborhood projects often, at the expense of the people of the county at large, were combined together in order to aggregate a sufficient number of votes to carry them all through the Legislature—the learned judge might have added, "and in one bill." O'Leary v. Cook County, 28 Ill. (18 Peck) 534, 542.

The vicious and corruptive system familiarly known as "logrolling" is the practice of comprising in one bill subjects of a diverse and antagonistic nature, in order to combine in its support members who were in favor of particular measures, but neither of which measures could command the requisite majority on its own merits; and it was to prevent this practice that Const. art. 4, § 32, provides that no law enacted by the General Assembly shall relate to more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title. City of St. Louis v. Tiefel, 42 Mo. 578, 590.

The term "logrolling" is used to designate the legislative practice "of embracing in one bill several distinct matters, none of which perhaps would singly obtain the assent of the Legislature, and then procuring its passage by a combination of the minorities in favor of each of the measures into a majority that will adopt them all." Walker v. Griffith, 60 Ala. 361, 369.

LOGICAL RELEVANCY.

Stephen defines "logical relevancy," as follows: "Two facts are said to be 'relevant' to each other when so related that according to the common course of events only, either, taken by itself or in connection with other facts, proves or renders probable the past, present, or future existence or nonexistence of the other." Cole v. Boardman, 4 Atl. 572, 575, 63 N. H. 580 (quoting from Steph. Dig. Ev. art. 1).

LOITER.

"To loiter," according to the lexicographers, means to be slow in moving; to delay; to hinder; to be dilatory; to spend time idly; to saunter; to lag behind. Under an ordinance providing that vehicles for hire seeking employment shall not stop or loiter upon any street, etc., it is held that the mere fact that a person drove his vehicle slowly along the streets, and turned and returned upon the same street, does not necessarily constitute "loitering" in the sense of the law. Stephens v. District of Columbia, 16 App. D. C. 279, 281.

LONDON.

The word "London" is a nomen collectivum when used in stating the termini and declaring against the carrier, and includes all that is commonly so called, and not the city merely. Beckford v. Crutwell, 5 Car. & P. 242.

An agreement wherein it was stipulated that a certain party should not carry on a certain business "in London" or any of the towns in England, etc., meant the city of London, in its strict and proper meaning. Mallan v. May, 13 Mees. & W. 510, 517.

LONG.

See "As Long As"; "So Long As."

In construing the provisions of a towing contract providing that "a long line" shall be furnished, the words "a long line" will not be construed to mean the longest line in use, but will be a matter for the jury to determine. Stevenson v. Michigan Log-Towing Co., 61 N. W. 536, 537, 103 Mich. 412.

"Long," within the meaning of the rule that, to constitute title by adverse possession, the possession must be long, continuous, and peaceable, according to the doctrine of the law of England as cited by Lord Coke in Bracton, means during the time required by law. Ingraham v. Hough, 46 N. C. 39, 43.

LONG ACCOUNT.

Five items in an account do not constitute a "long account," within Code Civ. Proc. § 271, authorizing a compulsory reference where the examination of a long account is declared. Dickinson v. Mitchell (N. Y.) 19 Abb. Prac. 286.

Code Civ. Proc. § 271, declares that no compulsory reference can be ordered unless the examination of a "long account" be declared. Held, that a long account, within such section, does not include a bill of particulars in an action for work, labor, and services. Dickinson v. Mitchell (N. Y.) 19 Abb. Prac. 286.

Under a statute authorizing a compulsory reference only in cases involving the examination of a "long account" the word "account" must be taken according to its ordinary acceptance, and therefore does not include an action to recover damages for the destruction of property by rioters, though the trial will require an examination of a large number of items of property injured or destroyed, for which plaintiff seeks to recover damages; since the fact that an action involves a large number of items does not necessarily make it an action of account within the meaning of such act. Ross v. City of New York (N. Y.) 2 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 266.

"Long accounts," as used in Rev. St. § 3064, providing that a reference may be had in all cases requiring the examination of a long account, "is construed to mean a series of charges made at various times as the transactions occurred." Druze v. Horter, 16 N. W. 14, 16, 57 Wis. 644.

"Long account," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 1013, providing that an involuntary reference of issues in an action at law may be made when the trial will require the examination of a "long account," and will not require the decision of difficult questions at law, cannot be construed to apply to an action involving the value of the fee and the amount of the rental loss in land taken by a railroad company. Doyle v. Metropolitan El. R. Co., 20 N. Y. Supp. 865, 868, 1 Misc. Rep. 376.

LONG PRICE.

"Long price," as used in a sale of imported goods by the importer at the "long price," is the price which includes the amount of duties paid, and carries to the purchaser the right to the drawback. Moore v. Des Arts, 1 N. Y. 359, 363.

LONG SWINGS.

The term "long swings" is used in the postal service to designate intervals of time of considerable length between the time of the closing of one mail delivery and the commencing of the next subsequent delivery, such interval being the carrier's own time, for which he is entitled to receive no compensation. King v. United States, 32 Ct. Cl. 234, 238.

LONG TIME.

In an answer in an action against a railroad company to recover damages for personal injury caused by a defect in the track, an allegation in the answer being that the person injured had full knowledge and had had such knowledge for a "long time," the term "long time" does not denote any specific length of time. It means that the person injured had the knowledge long enough to have afforded him an opportunity to make objections to the company. Worden v. Humeston & S. Ry. Co., 33 N. W. 629, 632, 72 Iowa, 201.

LONG TRANSACTIONS.

"Long transactions," in relation to stocks, mean those where an order is given to a broker to buy, where the broker receives an order to credit the account with certain stocks. Baldwin v. Flagg, 36 N. J. Eq. (9 Stew.) 48, 56.

LONG WALL WORK.

The term "long wall work" is used to designate a manner of operating a coal mine in which the coal is all taken out as the work progresses. Chicago, W. & V. Coal Co. v. Peterson, 39 Ill. App. 114, 115.

LONG WEIGHT.

A sale of one hundred tons iron "long weight," being a phrase perfectly well known to mean tons of twenty hundred weight of one hundred twenty pounds each, was not illegal and void under Act 5 & 6 Wm. IV, c. 63, for the establishment of weights and measures. Jones v. Giles, 10 Exch. 119, 127.

LONGER PERIOD.

The words "longer period," as used in section 3310, Rev. Codes, which declares invalid all leases of agricultural lands which are made for a longer period than ten years, in which rent or service is reserved, should be construed as meaning a definite period, and not as applicable to estates whose duration is wholly indefinite and uncertain in its duration. Wegner v. Lubenow (N. D.) 95 N. W. 442, 444.

LONG YEARLINGS.

After cattle enter the second year, and before completing it, they are called "long yearlings." Sparks v. Deposit Bank (Ky.) 74 S. W. 185.

LONGER TIME.

"Longer time," as used in a promise to pay a debt if longer time is given, in common parlance is as indefinite as the word "time" without an adjunct, and are equivalent to it in strict meaning, the adjunct being redundant. Downing v. Funk (Pa.) 5 Rawle, 69, 73.

LONGEST PERIOD.

The term "longest period," as used in the bankruptcy act, declaring that the petition in bankruptcy shall be addressed to the judge of the district in which the debtor has resided for the longest period during the six months next immediately preceding the time of filing the petition, means the longest period during or within such six months that he has resided or carried on business in any district. Thus, during such six months the debtor may have resided or carried on business in one district for two months, in another for one month and three-quarters, in another for one month and one-quarter, and in another for one month. In such case the proper district in which to file the petition is the one in which the debtor has resided or carried on business for the two months. In re Foster (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 521, 522.

LONGS.

The term "longs" is used in the language of boards of trade, stock exchanges, etc., to designate the buyers of commodities for future delivery, who, by reason of the fact that there is a much greater quantity of such commodities sold for such future delivery than can be purchased in the markets, are said to have procured a corner on the market, and by insisting on delivery of the commodity run up prices to a fictitious point. Kent v. Miltenberger, 13 Mo. App. 503, 506.

LOOK.

In speaking of the meaning of the word "look" in the rule that a person of ordinary care is required to look and listen before attempting to cross a railway track, the court says that it cannot be that "look" simply means that a person with his eyes open shall turn his head in a particular direction, but that the word, as understood in the decisions, must mean that he looked intelligently, and in such manner that what his vision disclosed might influence his action or conduct. McAuliffe v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 84 N. Y. Supp. 607, 609, 88 App. Div. 356; Swart v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 80 N. Y. Supp. 906, 909, 81 App. Div. 402.

LOOK AFTER.

To "look after" means to watch after, and to watch; to tend; to guard; to have in keeping; so that a person who employs another "to look after" a gambling device, to keep the same from being broken, which device was in a saloon where the public came and went, was within a statute making it a penal offense to be directly or indirectly interested in a gambling device. Jeffries v. State, 32 S. W. 1080, 1081, 61 Ark. 308.

LOOKING GLASS.

The term "looking-glass," within the meaning of a statute exempting a looking-glass, includes a barber's mirror. Cherry v. McDaniel, 53 S. W. 732-733.

LOOKING-GLASS PLATES.

"Looking-glass plates," as used in Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 116, relating to the duties on looking-glass plates, does not include cast polished plate glass, silvered and beveled, from which looking glasses are made, but such glass comes within paragraphs 116, 118, relating to the duties on cast polished plate glass, silvered and beveled. Herrman v. United States (U. S.) 62 Fed. 149, 150.

LOOKOUT.

The word "lookout," as used in reference to a lookout on a vessel, does not mean merely persons on deck, "but some one in a favorable position to see, stationed near enough to the helmsman to communicate with him and to receive communications from him, and exclusively employed in watching the movements of vessels which they are meeting or about to pass." The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 53 U. S. (12 How.) 443, 462, 13 L. Ed. 1058.

Where at the time of a collision between a steamboat and a sloop in the North river the only persons on the forward part of the boat were the pilot, the captain, and a hand in the pilot house (neither the captain nor hand being stationed there to act as a lookout), and a man not connected with the boat or in its employ, there was no lookout within the meaning of the rule which requires a steamboat traversing waters where sailing vessels are often met to have a trustworthy lookout besides a helmsman. Reed v. The New Haven (N. Y.) 18 How. Prac. 482, 485, 20 Fed. Cas. 447.

5 Wds. & P.—20

LOOSE.

The terms "fast" and "loose" are relative terms, and might mean one thing in one place, and quite another thing in another place. Sandwich Enterprise Co. v. Joliet Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 91 Fed. 254, 255, 33 C. C. A. 491.

LOOSE PROPERTY.

The term "loose property," in a clause of a will bequeathing all of testator's loose property, includes all of testator's personalty, including money on deposit and choses in action. The term "loose property" corresponds with the term "movables." Fry v. Shipley, 29 S. W. 6, 8, 94 Tenn. (10 Pickle) 252.

LOOSE WOMEN.

A "loose woman" is a woman of unchaste character. Exceptions showing that plaintiff in an action for breach of marriage promise was of loose and immodest character means that plaintiff was an unchaste woman, and not merely loose and immodest in conduct; and thus defendant was not bound by the contract. Foster v. Hanchett, 35 Atl. 316, 68 Vt. 319, 54 Am. St. Rep. 886.

LOPPINGS.

The fruit of trees, together with the usual trimmings. Elliot v. Smith, 2 N. H. 430, 431.

LORD PARAMOUNT.

The King of England is styled the "lord paramount," as under the feudal system all lands are holden mediately or immediately of the King. De Peyster v. Michael, 6 N. Y. (2 Seld.) 467, 495, 57 Am. Dec. 470.

The term "lord paramount" was used in the English feudal law to designate the king, and in him, according to the theory of that law, was the absolute right of the property. As a return or compensation for the possession and enjoyment of the land, the owners, or, as they were then called, "vassals," were obliged to render the king certain services, the failure to perform which defeated the estate and caused it to revert to the lord paramount. In re Opinion of the Justices, 33 Atl. 1076, 1080, 66 N. H. 629.

LORD'S DAY.

"Lord's day," as used in a statute providing that, if any civil process shall be issued and served on the "Lord's day," it shall be void and of no effect, comprises the solar day only, and does not include Saturday and Sunday nights. Fox v. Able, 2 Conn. 541, 549.

In a statute prohibiting the keeping of shops open on the Lord's day or evening, it is held that the expression "Lord's day or evening" meant Sunday and the evening immediately following Sunday on that day, and not the evening immediately preceding Sunday. Commonwealth v. Newton, 25 Mass. (8 Pick.) 234.

LOSE.

A note promising to pay a certain sum of money six months after the date when such person loses his situation as a teacher at a certain place, provided that he loses such situation at any time after the date of the note and previous to the date of the maker's second marriage, means that the situation is lost involuntarily, and not voluntarily by abandonment or resignation. As found in Webster's Dictionary, the use of the word "lose" implies an inability to retain or to recover, or an involuntary deprivation of the thing which is said to be lost. In the ordinary and common sense of the word no man can be said to have lost a situation which he of his own motion and without any reasonably compelling cause resigns, and the duties of which, of his own free will, he refuses longer to discharge. The situation might be lost from sickness or personal injury, by the failure of the person to reappoint him, or by his discharge to make way for another, or by the insolvency of his employer, or the destruction of the buildings by fire; but he certainly does not lose his situation when he voluntarily resigns and abandons it to take another, which, under the circumstances, he preferred. Shafer v. Senseman, 17 Atl. 350, 125 Pa. 310.

Forgetting place of deposit.

"To lose is not to place or put anything carefully or voluntarily in the place you intend, and then forget it. It is to casually and involuntarily part from the possession; and the thing is then usually found in a place or under circumstances to prove to the finder that the owner's will was not employed in placing it there, and where money has been concealed it cannot be said to have been lost." Sovern v. Yoran, 20 Pac. 100, 102, 16 Or. 269, 8 Am. St. Rep. 293.

"To lose is not to place or put anything carelessly and voluntarily in the place you intend, and then forget it. It is casually and involuntarily to part from possession, and the thing is then usually found in a place or under circumstances to prove to the finder the owner's will was not employed in placing it there. To place a pocketbook, therefore, upon a table, and to omit or forget to take it away, is not to lose it." Lawrence v. State, 20 Tenn. (1 Humph.) 228, 232, 84 Am. Dec. 644.

LOSS.

See "Direct Loss"; "Net Loss"; "Partial Loss"; "Pecuniary Loss"; "Salvage Loss"; "Total Loss"; "Unnecessary Loss"; "Utterly Lost."

All other losses, see "All other."

In the case of injury or destruction of the property insured, or injury by accident, or liability for death, the liability is called a "loss." State v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 67 N. E. 93, 96, 68 Ohio St. 9, 64 L. R. A. 405, 96 Am. St. Rep. 635.

"In its most general sense the word 'loss' means any deprivation. In some instances it may mean that which can never be recovered, and in others that which is simply withheld, or that of which a party is dispossessed." Queenan v. Palmer, 7 N. E. 613, 618, 117 Ill. 619.

"Loss," as used in Code, §§ 2064, 2066, relating to the liability of carriers for "loss" of goods, includes injury or damage to the goods. Central Railroad & Banking Co. v. Hasselkus, 17 S. E. 838, 839, 91 Ga. 382, 44 Am. St. Rep. 37 (citing Richmond & D. R. Co. v. White, 15 S. E. 802, 88 Ga. 805).

The county treasurer having defaulted, action was commenced upon his bond to recover the amount, and pending such action the state applied for mandamus to compel the supervisors of the county to assemble and cause to be raised the amount of taxes due the state included in such default; the application being under the statute which provides "that all losses which may be sustained by the default of the treasurer of any county in the discharge of his duties shall be chargeable upon such county, and the several boards of supervisors shall add such losses to the next year's taxes of such county." The court said: "We are of opinion that the money cannot be said to be lost while the means provided by law for securing its payment are being enforced in the ordinary course of justice, and it cannot properly be said to be lost where a creditor is prosecuting a surety for its recovery. The statute does not authorize the money to be collected a second time from the taxpayers unless a loss has actually resulted from the delinquency of the treasurer." People v. Livingston County Sup'rs, 17 N. Y. 486, 487.

"Loss," as used in Code, § 2064, declaring that in all cases of bailments after proof of loss, the burden of proof is on the bailee to show proper diligence, means injury or damage to goods, as well as for the destruction or disappearance. Hawkins v. Haynes, 71 Ga.

40, 43; Richmond & D. R. R. Co. v. White, 15 S. E. 802, 804, 88 Ga. 805.

"Loss," as used in a policy of credit insurance insuring the holder against loss sustained by reason of the insolvency of debtors owing the insured for merchandise, means not the whole amount due from an insolvent debtor at the time of his suspension, but the amount remaining due after deducting from such indebtedness any payments made by the debtor. Mercantile Credit Guarantee Co. v. Wood (U. S.) 68 Fed. 529, 533, 15 C. C. A. 563.

A contract of hiring between a party who owned a plantation and the person who was to act as his manager, in which the manager agreed to "share one-third of all losses which may occur on the said plantation for the present year, etc.," would not include the loss of working animals by death from natural causes. Gomez v. Levy, 38 La. Ann. 420, 423.

The preamble of 11 Geo. IV, and 1 Wm. IV, c. 681, recites that "loss" has been sustained by the frequent omissions of the senders of parcels to notify the carriers of the value and nature of the contents so as to enable the carriers to protect themselves against loss, and the enacting portion declares that no carrier shall be liable for "the loss of or injury to" any of the enumerated articles unless notified of their value. Held, that the word "loss" in the enacting clause did not mean the loss of money or profit to the railroad company, as in the preamble, but would include cases where the chattel was either abstracted altogether or taken from the place where it ought to be, and incapable of being delivered at the time it ought to be by reason of that sort of loss. Hearn v. London Southwest Ry. Co., 29 Eng. Law & Eq. 494, 499, 10 Exch. 793, 801.

Whenever the word "loss" occurs in a standard fire insurance policy it shall be deemed the equivalent of "loss or damage." Rev. St. Wis. 1898, §§ 1941-1960.

As amount due.

Ordinarily the loss for which a credit insurance company is liable is the amount remaining due upon a debt at the time of rendition of proofs of loss, rather than the amount due at the time of the insolvency of the debtor. Money which a creditor is able to obtain is not lost within the ordinary meaning of the term, whether the payment be made before or after an act of insolvency. Nevertheless, where a credit insurance policy provides that "when only a part of the loss is covered by this contract the proportionate part of everything realized or secured by the indemnified shall be credited to so much of the loss as is covered by this contract," it is evident that the loss there meant is not the final unpaid balance of the debt, since the phrase itself looks to other payments on such loss, but is rather the amount due at the time of the insolvency of the debtor. Goodman v. Mercantile Credit Guarantee Co., 45 N. Y. Supp. 508, 513, 17 App. Div. 474.

Damage synonymous.

"Loss" is a generic term, of which "damage" is a species. They are synonymous. "Loss signifies the act of losing, or the thing lost. Damage—in French, 'dommage'; Latin 'damnum,' from 'demo,' take away—signifies a thing taken away; a loss which a party is entitled to have restored to him so that he may be made whole again. Loss or damage sustained—the thing taken away—may be supplied by compensation; but the loss, damage, or thing taken away cannot be supplied or restored by the vindictive punishment of him who has occasioned the loss or damage." Fay v. Parker, 53 N. H. 342, 16 Am. Rep. 270.

The words "loss" and "damage," as used in a provision in a fire insurance policy that in case of loss the amount of loss or damage shall be ascertained by arbitration, are synonymous, and hence the provision applies, though there is a total loss of the property insured. Chippewa Lumber Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co., 44 N. W. 1055, 1057, 80 Mich. 116.

In a mortgage given by a guardian as indemnity to his surety, providing that, if the guardian failed to comply with the terms of the law in the guardianship and caused loss by the surety, the surety was authorized to take possession of the land mortgaged and sell the same, the word "loss" does not mean an actual loss by the surety incurred by his payment of the debt. The failure of the guardian to pay over to those entitled the balance which he owed on final settlement was a loss to the surety, who was personally bound for the payment of the debt. The word "loss," as used in the mortgage, means nothing more than legal damage, detriment, or forfeiture. Daniel v. Hunt, 77 Ala. 567, 570.

Delivery to wrong person.

A bill of lading stipulating that in the event of the loss of any property, etc., the value or cost of the same at the point in time of the shipment is to govern, does not include a delivery of the goods at the point of destination to a wrong person. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. McWhinney, 36 Ind. 436, 441.

As deposits.

"Make good all losses," as used in the charter of a bank requiring its stockholders to make good all losses to depositors or others, is equivalent to the phrase "make good all deposits." It requires the stockholders on the default of the bank to repay deposits to the parties entitled to receive them. Queenan v. Palmer, 7 N. E. 613, 618, 117 Ill. 619.

Destruction by fire.

The word "loss," when applied to property, includes the destruction of the property by fire, and hence an allegation that the note has been lost is supported by evidence that it has been destroyed by fire. McGregory v. McGregor, 107 Mass. 543, 546.

As diminution of profits.

Where several parties enter into an agreement to prosecute a common enterprise and to share the profits, it being a part of the agreement that there should be reserved monthly, to meet any losses that might occur, 25 per cent. of the profits falling to either party, this clearly shows the intention of the parties that losses were to be shared as well as profits. In addition to this, it is generally an accepted rule that a community of profits implies a community of losses, and this seems to follow naturally from the consideration that losses are in a certain sense nothing more than a diminution of profits. Priest v. Chouteau, 12 Mo. App. 252, 256.

Indemnity distinguished.

"Loss," as used in a bond to indemnify plaintiffs against losses by sales in their business, etc., means the loss which the plaintiffs sustained in their dealings with their customers, and not the amount for which the obligor may be liable under the bond; the latter being spoken of as "indemnity." Rice v. National Credit Ins. Co., 41 N. E. 276, 277, 164 Mass. 285.

Injury distinguished.

To say that the phrases "loss of property" and "injury to property" in connection with damages to freight shipped have the same signification is to declare them synonymous, when in fact they are not. One means a total destruction or loss of property; the other means a partial loss or destruction; and in case of injury a value may yet remain in the property equal to or exceeding the stipulated value. Nelson v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 72 Pac. 642, 648, 28 Mont. 297.

Time of destruction related to.

"Loss," as used in Gen. Laws 1895, c. 175, p. 421, providing that no action shall be brought to recover claim on an insurance policy unless commenced within two years from the time the loss occurred, refers to the destruction of the property, and not to the time when the right of action against the insurance company accrued. Rottier v. German Ins. Co., 86 N. W. 888, 889, 84 Minn. 116 (citing Chandler v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 21 Minn. 85, 18 Am. Rep. 385).

LOSS ARISING FROM PETROLEUM.

A fire policy insuring goods and merchandise while in process of transportation, which provides that no loss is to be paid in case of collision unless fire ensues, and then only for a loss and damage by fire, and that no loss is to be paid "arising from petroleum," construed to exempt the insurer from liability for loss of a car load of freight caused by the explosion of petroleum in other cars belonging to the insured. Imperial Fire Ins. Co. v. Fargo, 95 U. S. 227, 231, 24 L. Ed. 428.

LOSS BY CAUSE BEYOND CONTROL.

A bill of lading providing that the carrier shall not be liable for "loss or damage occasioned by causes beyond his control" does not include a loss occasioned by a jettison of sound cattle from unfounded apprehensions during rough weather. Compania De Navegacion La Flecha v. Brauer, 18 Sup. Ct. 12, 168 U. S. 104, 42 L. Ed. 398.

LOSS BY EXPLOSION.

"Loss by explosion," as used in a fire policy exempting the insurer from any loss by explosion of steam boilers, construed to include a loss by fire caused by the explosion of a boiler. St. John v. American Mut. Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 11 N. Y. 516, 518.

A fire policy providing that the company shall not be liable for any loss or damage by fire caused by means of an invasion, insurrection, riot, etc., nor for any loss occasioned by the explosion of gunpowder, etc., is to be construed to mean the loss actually caused by the explosion, and not the loss caused by a fire resulting therefrom. Commercial Ins. Co. v. Robinson, 64 Ill. 265, 267, 16 Am. Rep. 557.

"Loss by bursting of boilers," as used in a marine policy exempting the insurer from liability from any loss by the bursting of boilers is construed to include the total loss of a vessel caused by the bursting of a boiler, which inflicted injury causing it to take fire and to be ultimately scuttled to prevent the entire loss of the cargo. Roe v. Columbus Ins. Co., 17 Mo. 301, 303.

LOSS BY FIRE.

The phrase "loss by fire" in a fire policy embraces property destroyed by being blown up under the authority of a city to prevent the spreading of the fire. Pentz v. Receivers of Aetna Fire Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 9 Paige, 568, 572.

"Loss by fire," as used in an insurance policy covering loss by fire, includes loss by water thrown upon the property to prevent its destruction by fire. John Davis & Co. v. Insurance Co. of North America, 73 N. W. 393, 394, 115 Mich. 382.

A bill of lading exempting the carrier from liability for "loss by fire" does not exempt the carrier from liability for loss by fire occasioned by ordinary negligence of the carrier. New Orleans Ins. Co. v. New Orleans J. & G. N. R. Co., 20 La. Ann. 302, 304.

A bill of lading issued by an express company containing the condition that the company is not to be liable in any manner or to any extent for any "loss or damage or detention of the package or its contents or of any portion thereof occasioned by fire," does not excuse the express company from liability for the loss of such package by fire if the loss was caused by the negligence of a railroad company to which the former had confided a part of the duty it had assumed. Bank of Kentucky v. Adams Express Co., 93 U. S. 174, 23 L. Ed. 872.

A clause exempting a carrier from liability for "loss of goods by fire" does not apply where the goods were stolen, and the car was then burned to conceal the crime. Merchants' Dispatch Transp. Co. v. Hoskins, 41 S. W. 31, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 799.

A policy of insurance insuring against "loss or damage by fire" would include every loss of which combustion is the cause, and hence would cover a loss occasioned by an explosion of gunpowder. It would not cover any losses occasioned by explosions which were not the result of combustion, such as an explosion caused by steam, etc. Scripture v. Lowell Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 64 Mass. (10 Cush.) 356, 363, 57 Am. Dec. 111.

A fire policy covering "all loss or injury by fire" is not to be construed to cover an injury to boilers produced by fire kept therein. "In Wood, Ins. § 103, it is laid down that where fire is employed as an agent either for the ordinary purpose of heating the building, or for the purpose of manufacture, or as an instrument of art, the insurer is not liable for the consequences thereof so long as the fire itself is confined within the limits of the agencies employed; as from the effects of smoke or heat evolved thereby or escaping therefrom from any cause, whether intentional or accidental. In order to bring such consequences within the risk, there must be actual ignition outside of the agencies employed, not purposely caused by the assured," and the damage caused as a consequence of such ignition debars the agencies. American Towing Co. v. German Fire Ins. Co., 21 Atl. 553, 554, 74 Md. 25.

A fire insurance policy indemnifying the insured against "loss by fire" must be construed as meaning the whole loss of which the fire is the actual cause, whether it is the remote or proximate cause of the loss. That which is the actual cause of the loss, whether operating directly or by putting intervening agencies—the operation of which could not be reasonably avoided—in motion, by which the loss is produced, is the cause to which such loss should be attributed. A fair and reasonable interpretation of a policy of insurance against loss by fire will include within the obligation of the insurer every loss which necessarily follows from the occurrence of the fire to the amount of the actual injury to the subject of the risk, whenever that injury arises directly and immediately from the peril, or necessarily from incidental and surrounding circumstances the operation and influence of which could not be avoided; and hence where the building was destroyed to such extent that its repair was prohibited by city ordinance, the insurer is liable for the entire loss since the fire was the cause thereof. Brady v. Northwestern Ins. Co., 11 Mich. 425, 445.

An exception in a bill of lading exempting a carrier from liability for "loss or damage on any article or property whatever by fire or other casualty while in transit or while in depots or places of transshipment," is applicable to goods forcibly taken from the carrier while in transit and burned by a lawless mob, where such carrier was not guilty of any negligence by which the efficiency of the exception was in any way impaired. Hall v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (U. S.) 1 Fed. 226.

LOSS BY FIRE OR WETTING.

A bill of lading which exempts the ship and owner from "loss by fire or wetting" does not exempt from liability to contribute in general average for loss of cargo by water poured thereon to extinguish a fire. The Roanoke (U. S.) 53 Fed. 270, 272.

LOSS BY MOB.

See "Mob."

LOSS BY THEFT.

An insurance policy providing that the company should not be liable for any loss or injuries to goods contained in the show window when the loss or damage is caused by the light in the window, nor shall the company be liable for "loss by theft," means theft from the show windows, and not theft committed in the necessary removal of goods to save them from impending conflagration. When goods prudently removed to save them from an impending fire were stolen in consequence of such removal, it is not a loss by theft within the meaning of the policy. Loss by theft about large commercial towns and markets is a consequence as immediate and certain and direct as is the damage to the goods by water and defacement when goods are necessarily removed to prevent destruction by the peril. Leiber v. Liverpool, L. & G. Ins. Co., 69 Ky. (6 Bush) 639, 641, 90 Am. Dec. 695.

LOSS OF EARNINGS.

"Loss of earnings for that time," as an element of damages in an action for personal injuries, is not distinguishable from loss of time. The damages to be awarded in either case is the pecuniary value of the time lost, and either expression sufficiently indicates the measure. In common acceptance they are one and the same thing. Slaughter v. Metropolitan St. Ry. Co., 23 S. W. 760, 762, 116 Mo. 269.

LOSS OF LIMB.

An accident insurance policy insuring against the loss of a limb, does not necessarily mean loss by amputation. The word includes loss of the use of it by paralysis or otherwise resulting from an accident. Sheanon v. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co., 46 N. W. 799, 800, 77 Wis. 618, 9 L. R. A. 685, 20 Am. St. Rep. 151.

"Loss of two feet," as used in an accident policy providing that, if assured should suffer the loss of two feet within a certain time after the accident causing the loss, the full amount of the policy should be payable, should be construed to include the loss of the use of the legs caused by paralysis, which was in turn caused by the wounds received, and is not limited only to a loss by amputation. Sheanon v. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co., 53 N. W. 878, 882, 83 Wis. 507.

Amputation of the arm a little below the elbow is the "loss of an arm," within the meaning of that phrase as used in an accident policy. Garcelon v. Commercial Travelers' Eastern Acc. Ass'n, 67 N. E. 868, 869, 184 Mass. 8.

An insurance policy providing for the payment of a certain sum for the loss of feet or hands will be construed to mean the destruction of the usefulness of the member or of the entire member. Fuller v. Locomotive Engineers' Mut. Life & Accident Ins. Ass'n, 81 N. W. 326, 328, 122 Mich. 548, 48 L. R. A. 86, 80 Am. St. Rep. 598.

LOSS PAYABLE PRO RATA.

The Resolute Fire Insurance Company made its policy in which it contracted to reinsure the L. Insurance Company on property of G., B. & R. against loss or damage by fire to the amount of $5,000, the property being the same described in the policy made by the L. Insurance Company to G., B. & R. After the description of the property was written, "Loss, if any, payable pro rata with the reassured." One of the printed conditions of the policy was reinsurance in case of loss to be settled in proportion as the sum reinsured shall bear to the whole sum covered by the reinsured company. Held, that the phrase "loss, if any, payable," etc., should be construed as if it were as follows, to wit: "The loss in this policy is payable by the Resolute Insurance Company pro rata with the loss payable by the L. Company under the primitive policy." Norwood v. Resolute Fire Ins. Co., 36 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Jones & S.) 552, 554.

LOSS OF SIGHT.

A policy of accident insurance providing that for the "total and permanent loss of the sight of both eyes" the whole of the principal sum named should be paid, should be construed to include the loss of one eye, the insured at the time of the insurance having lost the sight of the other eye. The loss of one eye to him was precisely the same as the loss of both eyes by an ordinary man. It is total blindness in either case. The loss of one eye does not produce a total and permanent loss of sight. For practical purposes, a man with one eye can still follow his occupation and gain his living. It was the loss of sight which was insured against, and this was just as complete in the case of the insured as though both eyes had been lost during the life of the policy. Humphreys v. National Benefit Ass'n, 20 Atl. 1047, 1048, 139 Pa. 214, 11 L. R. A. 564.

LOSS OF SOCIETY.

Greater New York Charter, § 1364, subd. 2, giving the municipal court jurisdiction of actions to recover damages for personal injuries or injuries to property, except actions for the "loss of society of a husband or wife," etc., applies only to actions founded upon an intentional injury to the consortium, and not upon an unintentional act, as of negligence which may result in the loss of service or society. I see no good reason why the court should have jurisdiction of actions based upon negligence, and yet be excluded from such an action because loss of services or of society constitutes an element of damage resulting from the negligence. An application of the principle of nosctur a sociis to the antecedent words "criminal conversation," "seduction," would also lead to this conclusion. The plaintiff does not complain of a loss of society, but that the accident prevented or will prevent his wife from performing her customary duties as a housewife. McVeigh v. Gentry, 76 N. Y. Supp. 535, 536, 72 App. Div. 598.

LOSS OF TIME.

Loss of time, as an element of damages in an action for personal injuries, is not distinguishable from loss of earnings for that time. The damages to be awarded in either case is the pecuniary value of the time lost, and either expression sufficiently indicates the measure. In common acceptation they are one and the same thing. Slaughter v. Metropolitan St. Ry. Co., 23 S. W. 760, 762, 116 Mo. 209.

LOSS OF VOYAGE.

The term "loss of voyage" in the law of marine insurance does not include the interruption of the voyage. Wain v. Thompson (Pa.) 9 Serg. & R. 115, 119, 11 Am. Dec. 675.

LOSSES OF BUSINESS.

"Losses," as used in a Code requiring, in order to constitute a partnership, "a joint interest in the partnership property, or a joint interest in the profits and losses of the business," means something more than the mere failure to realize profits, and means the actual deficits sustained by such partnership. South Carolina & G. R. Co. v. Augusta Southern R. Co., 33 S. E. 36, 38, 107 Ga. 164.

The losses incurred in the prosecution of a business which are to be deducted in ascertaining the net profits of such business necessarily include such accounts as are to be treated as bad and uncollectible. McCulsky v. Klosterman, 25 Pac. 366, 367, 20 Or. 108, 10 L. R. A. 785.

LOST.

The word "lost," according to the various definitions of it as found in Webster's Dictionary, implies an inability to retain or to recover, or an involuntary deprivation of the thing which is said to be lost. In the ordinary and common sense of the word no man can be said to have lost a situation which he of his own motion and without any reasonable compelling cause resigns, and the duties of which of his own free will he refuses longer to discharge. A situation as teacher may be lost from sickness or personal injury, by the failure of the principal to reappoint, or by discharge to make way for another, or by the insolvency of the employer, or the destruction of the buildings by fire; but the situation is not lost when the person voluntarily resigns and abandons it to take another, which under the circumstances he refers. Shafer v. Senseman, 17 Atl. 350, 125 Pa. 310.

"In one sense a thing is lost when it cannot be found. When your spectacles are on top of your head, and you don't know where they are, in a sense they are lost. In another sense, they are not lost. That is to say, there is a very great difference between a thing being mislaid, which a vigilant search will discover, and a thing being gone where ordinary vigilance will not regain it." State Sav. Bank v. Buhl, 88 N. W. 471, 472, 129 Mich. 193, 56 L. R. A. 944.

It is held that the word "lost," as used in an instruction in a prosecution for larceny, that, if the evidence satisfied the jury, that the prosecuting witness lost bank bills, and they were afterwards found in defendant's possession, and there was no evidence proving how defendant came into possession of them, they should find him guilty, may be construed as including a loss by stealing or by any act of another, as well as by the act of the owner himself or by casualty. It is further said that the general term, as so used, should be construed with reference to the charge against the accused, and must be understood with reference to the loss established by the evidence. Belote v. State, 36 Miss. 96, 120, 72 Am. Dec. 163.

The term "lost" does not describe a purse accidentally left in a store, and therefore a person who takes it with felonious intent is guilty of larceny. State v. McCann, 19 Mo. 249.

"Lost or damaged," as used in a notice by a carrier that it would not be answerable for parcels above the value of five pounds if "lost or damaged," unless an insurance were paid, are not to be construed in their largest sense as comprehending any case where the goods were lost or damaged, but the true construction is that the carrier is not to be protected by the words "lost or damaged" if he divests himself willfully of the charge of the parcel intrusted to his care; but the words ought to be qualified thus: "The carrier himself doing nothing by his own voluntary act or the act of his servants to divest himself of the charge of carrying the goods to the ultimate place of destination." Garnett v. Willan, 5 Barn. & Ald. 53, 54.

Money left on a desk in a bank, provided for the use of the customers of the bank, is not "lost property," so as to entitle the finder to the same against the bank; the inference being that such money was voluntarily placed on the desk by the owner, and inadvertently left there by him. Loucks v. Gallogly, 23 N. Y. Supp. 126, 1 Misc. Rep. 22.

The authorities, as a general rule, hold that money or other property voluntarily laid down and forgotten is not, in legal contemplation, lost, and that the owner of a shop, bank, or other place where it is left is the proper custodian, rather than the person who happens to discover it, as well, also, as to all other persons except the owner. Hoagland v. Forest Park Highlands Amusement Co., 70 S. W. 878, 880, 170 Mo. 335, 94 Am. St. Rep. 740 (citing State v. McCann, 19 Mo. 249; Kincaid v. Eaton, 98 Mass. 139; 93 Am. Dec. 142).

Where the owner of a tannery, when removing his hides, omitted to remove all, and the tannery was sold, and many years after the hides were discovered in the vat by workmen assisting in the erection of a factory on the premises, the hides could not be regarded as having been lost. The fact of their being there being forgotten by the owner did not render them any the less his, and, though forgotten, they were not lost. Livermore v. White, 74 Me. 452, 456, 43 Am. Rep. 600.

Deposits.

Rev. St. 1894, § 2031, which makes it embezzlement for a banker to receive a deposit, when insolvent, from any one not indebted to the bank, whereby the deposit so made shall be lost to the depositor, will be construed so that a deposit is lost to the depositor when, by reason of such insolvency, he is deprived of the use of the same, or any part thereof; and hence the suspension of the bank by reason of such insolvency and the withholding of the deposits from the depositors is a loss within the meaning of the statute. State v. Beach, 46 N. E. 145, 150, 147 Ind. 74, 36 L. R. A. 179; State v. Beach (Ind.) 43 N. E. 949, 954.

Act June 4, 1879, providing that if any banker shall receive any deposit when insolvent, whereby the deposit so made shall be lost to the depositor, the banker so receiving said deposit shall be deemed guilty of embezzlement, should be construed so that the crime is consummated when the banker receives the deposit, and he is unable, by reason of his insolvency, to repay the entire sum deposited; and hence, when an insolvent bank is placed in the hands of a receiver, a deposit received while the bank was insolvent is lost within the meaning of that word as used in the statute, so as to warrant a conviction of the banker for receiving the same, though pending the prosecution therefor the full amount of the depositor's claim is tendered to him. Meadowcroft v. People, 45 N. E. 303, 309, 163 Ill. 56, 35 L. R. A. 176, 54 Am. St. Rep. 447.

Ships.

The word "lost," when applied to a ship, is understood to mean "lost at sea." This is the common acceptance of that word in that connection. It would be unusual, if not unheard of, to speak of a ship, under any circumstances, as lost at her wharf. Portland Flouring Mills Co. v. Weir (U. S.) 95 Fed. 997, 1000.

It has been held, in construing a bottomry bond, that "lost" means a loss by going to the bottom of the sea. Delaware Mut. Safety Ins. Co. v. Gossler (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 404, 406.

A vessel which is lost is one that is totally gone from its owners against their will, so that they know nothing concerning it, either whether still existing or not. Or one which they do know is to them no longer within their use or control, either by capture by an enemy or pirates, or by a known foundering, or by a sinking by a known storm, or collision, or by a total destruction by shipwreck. Bennett v. Garlock (N. Y.) 10 Hun, 828, 338.

"There is a difference in the words 'lost' and 'wrecked' in their marine signification. A vessel lost is one that has totally gone from the owners against their will, so that they know nothing concerning it, either whether still existing or not, or one which they do know is to them no longer within their use and control, either from capture by enemies or pirates, or by unknown foundering, or by a sinking by a known storm, or collision, or by a total destruction by shipwreck. But a vessel is wrecked by being stranded or cast upon the shores, snags, and rocks. The consequence may be a total loss, or a partial loss, or a temporary disability. A loss, then, is consistent with the fact that a vessel, raft, or other property, being still in existence, though its location be unknown to the owner, and therefore as to him is lost, and may be found and become the subject of salvage under our statute, providing that when any boat, vessel, raft, or other property shall be lost or wrecked and in a perishable condition upon any river, any person may take up and secure the same at or near the place where found. So a wreck, to be within the statute, its condition must be such as its owner is ignorant of at the time the person claiming salvage saves it; otherwise it could not be said to be found." A steamboat lying at the levee, having no person on board, which breaks loose from its moorings in broad daylight, and is not secured before it had drifted over sixty feet without injury, is not lost or wrecked within the meaning of the statute. Collard v. Eddy, 17 Mo. 354, 355.

LOST ART.

The term "lost art" is applicable peculiarly to certain monuments of antiquity still remaining in the world, the process of whose accomplishment has been lost for centuries, has been irretrievably swept from the earth, with every vestige of the archives or records of the nations with whom those arts existed, and the origin or even the identity of which process none can certainly establish. Gayler v. Wilder, 51 U. S. (10 How.) 477, 507, 13 L. Ed. 504.

LOST BOUNDARY.

A lost boundary "is a boundary which has lost its distinctive character as such by removal, displacement, decay, or change, so that it no longer answers the purpose of a bound in defining the true line between the tracts. And it is immaterial whether it be a natural object or an artificial one. A tree that has been turned over with its roots by a gale, and is lying in the vicinity, but away from the corner or the line, has lost its place and distinctive character as a bound." So, also, if cut down, and the stump has decayed and become invisible. So of a stone which has been displaced, although remaining near the place. So of the mouth of a stream which has been filled by sudden avulsion, and has broken for itself a new mouth at a distance more or less remote from the line. It has lost, by sudden removal from its place, or a series of sudden removals from the line, its character as a bound. Perry v. P 21 Conn. 433, 442.

LOST GRANT.

The fiction of a "lost grant" is merely a presumption, from the long possession and exercise of right by user of an easement with the acquiescence of the owner, that there must have been originally a grant to the claimant, which had been lost. It was called a "lost grant" not to indicate the fact of the existence of the grant originally was of importance, but to avoid the rule of pleading requiring proof. Boyce v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 68 S. W. 920, 922, 168 Mo. 583, 58 L. R. A. 442.

LOST INSTRUMENT.

"Lost instrument," within the meaning of the statute which allows secondary proof of the contents of instruments which have been lost, includes a letter that is beyond the territory of the state. Zellerbach v. Alenberg, 33 Pac. 786, 791, 99 Cal. 57.

A deed which has been surrendered to be canceled is not a "lost deed," so as to make parol evidence of its contents admissible. Thompson v. Thompson, 9 Ind. 323, 328, 68 Am. Dec. 638.

LOST MOTION.

"Lost motion," as applied to a locomotive, means a jarring or swinging motion, caused by its worn-out condition. Southern Pac. Co. v. Johnson (U. S.) 69 Fed. 559, 567, 16 C. C. A. 317.

LOST OR NOT LOST.

The use of the words "lost or not lost" in a marine policy on cargo lost or not lost operates to make the policy cover the loss of the goods occurring either before or after the issuance of the policy. Arkansas Ins. Co. v. Bostick, 27 Ark. 539, 544.

The use of the words "lost or not lost" in a marine policy on a vessel lost or not lost operates to render the contract valid, although the property insured may be lost when the contract is made. It is the stipulation for indemnity against past as well as future losses, and the law upholds it. Hooper v. Robinson, 98 U. S. 528, 537, 25 L. Ed. 219.

As used in a policy of insurance on property, "lost or not lost" gives the policy a retroactive effect. But such phrase is not necessary to make the policy retroactive. It is sufficient if it appear by the description of the risk and the subject-matter of the contract that the policy was intended to cover previous loss. Mercantile Mut. Ins. Co. v. Folsom, 85 U. S. (18 Wall.) 237, 251, 21 L. Ed. 827.

LOST PROPERTY.

The term includes only property which the owner has involuntarily parted with, and does not include property that he has intentionally concealed in the earth or elsewhere for safe-keeping. Sovern v. Yoran, 20 Pac. 100, 102, 16 Or. 269, 8 Am. St. Rep. 293 (citing Lawrence v. State, 20 Tenn. (1 Humph.) 228, 229, 34 Am. Dec. 644).

Lost property is property that the owner has casually or involuntarily parted with, and not property where the surroundings evidence that the owner deposited it intentionally in the place where found for safe-keeping. Sovern v. Yoran, 20 Pac. 100, 105, 16 Or. 269, 8 Am. St. Rep. 293.

Property is not lost if the owner knows where it is, so that he is able to recover the actual possession thereof when he desires; and therefore the taking thereof is constructively from the possession of the owner, and constitutes theft. Pritchett v. State, 34 Tenn. (2 Sneed) 285, 288, 62 Am. Dec. 468.

The term "lost" cannot be applied to characterize the act of the owner of a ring in leaving it by accident in the tub where she has been washing, if she knows where it is, and therefore a person taking the ring is guilty of taking it from the owner's possession. State v. Cummings, 33 Conn. 260, 264, 89 Am. Dec. 208.

LOST TIME.

"Lost time," as used in a contract hiring a slave, by which the hirer was to lose the slave's lost time, means lost time no matter by what means, whether by death or by sickness or running away. Barlow v. Lambert, 28 Ala. 704, 710, 65 Am. Dec. 374.

LOT.

As chance.

"Lot" is defined to be a contrivance to determine a question by chance, or without the action of man's choice or will. Lynch

v. Rosenthal, 42 N. E. 1103, 1105, 144 Ind. 88, 31 L. R. A. 835, 55 Am. St. Rep. 168 (citing Chavannah v. State, 49 Ala. 396); Loiseau v. State, 22 South. 138, 139, 114 Ala. 34, 62 Am. St. Rep. 84; Johnson v. State, 34 South. 1018, 1019, 137 Ala. 101.

Webster defines "lot" as that which causes, falls, or happens; that which, in human speech, is called chance, fortune, hazard. Wilkinson v. Gill, 74 N. Y. 63, 65, 30 Am. Rep. 264; People v. Noelke, 1 N. Y. Cr. R. 252, 258.

Lot signifies chance, or that which happens without design or forethought, so that a record of an election of an umpire to serve on a committee of arbitration by lot authorized a conclusion that the umpire was selected in some irregular and unjustifiable manner. In re Grening, 26 N. Y. Supp. 117, 119, 74 Hun, 62.

As expressive of quantity.

A lot means a great quantity or number, a great deal, and an indictment charging simple larceny in the stealing of "a lot of cord wood" of a stated value is an insufficient description of the property alleged to have been stolen, and the indictment should be quashed. Walthour v. State, 39 S. E. 872, 114 Ga. 75.

"Lot," as the term is used when speaking of a lot of goods, a lot of logs, etc., means the separate portion belonging to one person; and hence a distinct parcel or a separate part. It was so used in the notice of a lien in which the property upon which the lien was claimed was described as follows: "A lot of saw logs marked 'F. & A.,' now lying in Edey's Slough;" and this description is held to be equivalent to "A certain raft of logs marked 'F. & A.,' now lying in Edey's Slough." Wheeler v. Port Blakeley Mill Co., 3 Pac. 635, 2 Wash. 71.

LOT.

See "Cemetery Lot"; "Church Lots"; "Contiguous Lots"; "House and Lot"; "Public Lots"; "Single Lot"; "Town Lots."

Abutting lot, see "Abutting."

"Town lots, out lots, common field lots and commons were known and recognized parts of the Spanish town or commune of St. Louis. They existed by public authority, whether by concession, custom or permission." Vasquez v. Ewing, 42 Mo. 247, 256.

The term "lot" is sometimes used in a restricted sense, being limited at the time, as "wood lot," "house lot," or "store lot"; but where the term is used unqualifiedly, especially if said to be a lot in a certain range or right, it is almost uniformly used in a technical sense, and means a lot in a township, and duly laid out by the original proprietors. White v. Gay, 9 N. H. 126, 131, 31 Am. Dec. 224.

The term "lot" means any contiguous quantity of land in the possession, owned by, or recorded as the property of, the same claimant, person, or company. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1176.

Act 1830, amending the charter of the city of Charleston, authorizing the city to fill up any "lots or grounds within the city of Charleston belonging to any person or persons," where the same are public nuisances, and to recover the cost from the landowner if it does not exceed one-half the value of the lot, does not refer to only a portion of any lot or ground which is not occupied by buildings, but includes the whole of any lot or grounds with the value of the buildings thereon. City Council of Charleston v. Werner, 24 S. E. 207, 208, 46 S. C. 323.

As city lot.

The word "lot," when applied to real estate, is indefinite in its dimensions, but is a portion of land that has been set off or allotted, whether great or small. There is no definite and fixed meaning attached to the word which is applicable to all cases, since what would be deemed a lot of land in the country would not be so considered a lot in a city or town. Its ordinarily accepted meaning, when applied to property within a corporate city or town, is not synonymous with the word "tract" or "parcel," but is used in the sense of a city lot as bounded and described on the recorded plats of the city, or as subdivided and bounded by conveyances of the owners, or by the city authorities in exercising the right of eminent domain in opening and establishing streets. When the word is used in a statute providing that a lien may be had on the lot for grading or otherwise improving the street in front of it, it means a city lot, as contradistinguished from a rural lot. Pilz v. Killingsworth, 26 Pac. 305, 306, 20 Or. 432.

The word "lot," as used in the chapter relating to special taxes in cities, shall be taken to mean any subdivided real estate. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 261.

In Gen. St. 1878, c. 68, § 1, exempting an amount of land not exceeding one lot, if within the laid-out or platted portion of any incorporated town, city, or village having over 5,000 inhabitants, as a homestead of the owners thereof, "lot" is not synonymous with "tract" or "parcel," but means a city lot of the size or description of lots in the addition in which it is situated. Lundberg v. Sharvey, 49 N. W. 60, 46 Minn. 350.

"Lot," as used in the homestead law (Gen. St. 1894, § 5521), means a city, town, or village lot, according to the plat thereof, and has no application to a rural homestead outside the limits of any incorporated city, town, or village. Hence, where an owner divided his farm into lots, the fact that his house was situated on one of the lots did not limit his homestead to such lot. Phelps v. Northern Trust Co., 73 N. W. 842, 844, 70 Minn. 546.

The term "lot," as used in the homestead law, which limits the homestead in a city or town to a quantity of land not exceeding in amount one lot, means a city, town, or village lot, according to the survey and plat of the city, town, or village in which the property is situated, and is not synonymous with the words "tract" or "parcel." Wilson v. Proctor, 8 N. W. 830, 832, 28 Minn. 13; Ford v. Clement, 71 N. W. 672, 673, 68 Minn. 484.

Lot denotes a single piece or parcel of land lying in a solid body, and separated from contiguous land by such subdivisions as are used to denote different tracts of land, as in the subdivision of a tract of land into city lots. North & South Lumber Co. v. Hegwer, 42 Pac. 388, 390, 1 Kan. App. 623.

A statute providing that claims of mechanics and materialmen shall be a lien not only on the building, but on the "lot" or curtilage as well, means a town lot. Edwards v. Derrickson, 28 N. J. Law (4 Dutch.) 39, 72; Coddington v. Drydock Co., 31 N. J. Law (2 Vroom) 477, 484.

The word "lots" must be construed with reference to the subject-matter, and when used in reference to city property means such "lots and blocks" as are appropriate to cities, and such as cities usually have for convenience and for arrangement into groups with streets and alleys between, which may be larger or smaller in different cities or in different parts of the same city, subject to the general convenience; and generally the words do not include rural subdivisions for agricultural purposes. Webster v. City of Little Rock, 44 Ark. 536, 551.

As distinct or separate portion of land.

"In the general acceptance of the words, a 'lot of land' is the separate portion belonging to one person. According to Webster, 'that portion of ground which is allotted or assigned to any one, and hence any distinct portion of land.'" As used in a statute limiting the powers of commissioners appointed to fix a compensation for land taken by a railroad for condemnation proceedings to a particular quarter-section or other "lot of land," the term is not restricted to a subdivision less than a quarter, but may include a section lying in one body, and owned by one person. Kansas City, E. & S. R. Co. v. Merrill, 25 Kan. 421, 423.

The expression "lot of land," as used in the rule of law which requires that in the assessment of damages to land for injuries thereto by reason of the appropriation of a right of way by a railway company the damages shall be limited to the "lot of land" over and across which the right of way is condemned, is construed in Kansas to include any contiguous compact body of land used as a single farm. Leavenworth, N. & S. Ry. Co. v. Wilkins, 26 Pac. 16, 17, 45 Kan. 674.

Rev. St. § 1174, providing for the assessment of land for taxation, declares that the printer who shall publish the list and notice shall receive 30 cents for each "lot or tract of land." Section 1048 declares that, where parcels of land are contiguous, and owned by the same person, they may be assessed together in one tract. Section 1045 provides that when each parcel or tract of land are deemed by the assessor so improved or occupied with buildings as to be practically incapable of separate valuation, they may be assessed as one parcel. Held, that the term "lot or tract of land," as used in section 1174, included as a single "lot or tract" several parcels of land which are assessed together in one tract, they being contiguous, and owned by the same person; or being so improved, as provided by section 1045, that they could not be separately assessed. Bohan v. Ozaukee Co., 60 N. W. 702, 703, 88 Wis. 498.

In a will by which the testator devised "my two lots of ground, lying on the east and west sides of Ledenhall street in Ridgley's Addition to Baltimore town, now city," the word "lot" was construed to mean the entire tract owned by testator, lying on the west side of Ledenhall street, and extending from said street to the next parallel street, and not to be confined to a single building lot as laid down upon the plat of the town and designated by a number. Warner v. Miltenberger's Lessee, 21 Md. 264, 270, 273, 83 Am. Dec. 573.

Within the meaning of the act of Congress approved May 23, 1844, for the relief of citizens of towns upon the lands of the United States, authorizing the judges of the county court to enter lands within incorporated towns in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants thereof, and providing that the execution of the trust as to the disposal of the lots in such town, and the proceeds of the sale thereof, shall be conducted under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the legislative authority of the state or territory in which same is situated, the word "lot" applied to the land actually occupied by the residents of the town site as well as to the unoccupied platted tracts. One of the ordinary meanings of the word given by lexicographers is "that portion of ground which is allotted or assigned to any one, and hence a distinct portion of land." Diamond Machine Co. v. Vil- lage of Ontonagon, 40 N. W. 448, 453, 72 Mich. 249, 261.

A deed conveyed a lot of land containing 60 acres, lying in block 1111, according to the official map of the city. At the time of the conveyance there had been no survey or subdivision of the block. Held, that "the lot" referred to should be construed to mean an undivided 60 acres in the block. Cullen v. Sprigg, 23 Pac. 222, 224, 83 Cal. 56.

Divided lot.

A "lot," within the meaning of a statute exempting a lot occupied by a college building, includes all of such lot, though it is divided by a highway into two portions, one only of which is occupied by the college buildings, the other being occupied for the use and recreation of pupils and teachers. People v. Commissioners of Taxes (N. Y.) 10 Hun, 246, 247.

As field or land.

See "Land."

A "lot" is a piece of land, usually lying in cities or towns. It may consist of one acre, or more, or less, and, if inclosed and cultivated, is just as much a "field," according to the definition that a field is a cultivated tract of land, as if it lay in the country. "An acre lying in the country, fenced and cultivated, would certainly be called a 'field.' The fact of its lying on one or the other side of a corporate boundary of a town would make no difference." State v. McMinn, 81 N. C. 585, 587.

Improvements.

The terms "real property," "real estate," "land," or "lot," whenever used in the chapter relating to the assessment and collection of the revenue, shall be held to mean and include not only the land itself, whether laid out in town or city lots or otherwise, with all things pertaining therein, but also all buildings, structures, and improvements and other permanent fixtures, of whatsoever kind, thereon, all shot towers and all machinery therewith connected, all smelting furnaces and all machinery therewith connected, all gristmills, sawmills (except portable mills of every description), oilmills, tobacco, hemp, and cotton factories, tobacco stemmeries, ropewalks, manufactories of iron, nails, glass, clocks, and all other property belonging to manufactories of whatever kind, all wool-carding machines, all distilleries, breweries, all tanneries, all iron, copper, brass, and other foundries, and all rights and privileges belonging or in any wise pertaining thereto, except where the same may be otherwise denominated by the chapter. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 9123.

The words "real property," "real estate," "land," "tract," or "lot," when used in the revenue act, shall be construed to include not only the land itself, whether laid out in town or city lots or otherwise, with all things contained therein, but also all buildings, structures, and improvements, and other permanent fixtures, effects of every kind thereon, and all rights and privileges belonging or in any wise pertaining thereto, except where the same may be otherwise denominated by this act. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1494, c. 120, § 292, subd. 12.

As smallest legal subdivision.

The term "single lot," in Rev. St. c. 138, § 7, subd. 4, providing that where a known farm or a single lot has been partially improved, etc., the portion of such farm or lot that may have been left not cleared, etc., shall be deemed to have been occupied for the same length of time as the part improved and cultivated, means the smallest legal subdivision of land. Its extent is certain of itself, without any recourse to any course or custom. Pepper v. O'Dowd, 39 Wis. 538, 547; Wilson v. Henry, 40 Wis. 594, 609.

The term "lot," in a statute exempting from levy and forced sale a lot of ground, and the building thereon occupied as a residence and owned by the debtor, to the value of $1,000, only exempts the lot actually so occupied, and the court will take judicial notice of the subdivisions of land; and therefore, if one-fourth of 160 acres of land exceeds the value of $1,000, the other three-fourths may be levied on and sold. Gardner v. Eberhart, 82 Ill. 316, 321.

Where a statute exempting a homestead from execution provided that "the lot of ground" and the buildings thereon occupied as a residence and owned by the debtor should be exempted, the term "lot" should be construed to mean a legal subdivision of land, and hence, where the debtor's dwelling house is situated on a quarter section of land, and the value of the entire tract does not exceed the value limited in the statute, the term included the entire tract. Aldrich v. Thurston, 71 Ill. 324, 325.

Narrow strip.

The term "lot" does not properly apply to a very narrow strip of land. Coutt's Trustees v. Craig (Va.) 2 Hen. & M. 618, 622.

As platted lots or blocks.

"Lot," as used in a conveyance, may mean the entire premises conveyed, whether such premises consists of a farm, or even a block in a city. But the ordinary meaning of the word, when used in reference to town or city property, is a subdivision of a block, according to the plat or survey of such town or city. As used in a mortgage of property, part of which only was platted into lots, the rest being merely platted in blocks, the mortgage providing that the mortgagor should be entitled to a partial release of the mortgage on payment of a certain sum for each "lot" released, it only includes the lots which had been platted as such, and does not include those blocks which had not been subdivided into lots. Ontario Land & Imp. Co. v. Bedford, 27 Pac. 39, 90 Cal. 181.

The term "lots," as used in 1 Rev. St. 1852, p. 220, § 81, providing that whenever there shall be lots laid off and platted adjoining a city, etc., the common council may extend the boundary of such city so as to include such lots, means any subdivision platted for the purpose of embracing on them urban character, in contradistinction from rural use and character. Collins v. City of New Albany, 59 Ind. 396.

The words "lot of land," in a statute providing that in towns, villages, or cities a mechanic's lien shall be upon the building, erection, or improvement, and the "lot of land" on which the same are situated, plainly refer to the lots as bounded and described on the recorded plats of such towns, cities, or villages, or as subdivided and bounded by conveyances of the owners thereof, or other acts done by them for that purpose. The lien given by the statute is against each building or improvement and the lot on which it is situated, and thus, where a number of buildings are built on separate lots, the one lien cannot be filed on all the buildings and lots, although the lots are contiguous and in a compact body of land without division fences. Fitzgerald v. Thomas, 61 Mo. 499, 500.

The term "lots," in a statute authorizing the annexation of platted lots adjoining a city, means the subdivisions marked on the plat with an evident view to impress upon them the character of urban as contradistinguished from rural use; and the word is not used in contradistinction to the term "blocks," and therefore adjoining territory may be annexed though not platted into smaller subdivisions than blocks. City of Evansville v. Page, 23 Ind. 525, 528; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. City of Alexandria, 55 N. E. 435, 437, 153 Ind. 521.

The word "lot" means "any portion, piece, or division of land" (Webster's Dict.), and is just as applicable to a piece of land described as "commencing at 4th avenue, west side of 7th street, in Buell's Addition, and running south 480 feet, property not laid out, but corresponding to block 3, range 7, Buell's Addition," where such tract is clearly designated on the map of such addition, as if it had been duly platted and recorded as "lot 1 in block 1," or any other number, or as to any other lot in the city, and such description is a sufficient designation of the property in proceedings to assess the same for street improvements in front thereof. Buell v. Ball, 20 Iowa, 282, 290.

The term "lot," employed in a statute exempting homesteads, is used in its proper sense, and denotes a parcel of land within the limits of the state or village as surveyed and platted. Norfolk State Bank v. Schwenk, 51 Neb. 146, 70 N. W. 970.

The term "lot," in a constitutional provision providing that the homestead of a family shall not exceed 200 acres of land not included in a town or city, or any town or city lot or lots in value not to exceed $2,000, "must be taken and construed in the popular sense of those terms, and, when so used, never would be considered as embracing land within the jurisdictional limits of the corporation, but not connected with the plan of the city." Taylor v. Boulware, 17 Tex. 74, 79, 67 Am. Dec. 642.

Public street.

According to the common ordinary use of the word "lot," it cannot be held to designate land in an open public street, and hence one who owns the fee of a street where it intersects a paved street is not a "lot" owner, within a corporate charter providing that the expense of paving in front of a lot may be recovered by a suit against the owner. City of Schenectady v. Trustees of Union College, 39 N. E. 67, 68, 144 N. Y. 241, 26 L. R. A. 614.

Quantity indicated.

The word "lot" contains no legal or other meaning as to quantity, except it is a distinct portion of land usually smaller than a field. Kaufman v. Stein, 37 N. E. 333, 336, 138 Ind. 49, 46 Am. St. Rep. 368.

In Gen. St. p. 3345, providing that all real estate shall be assessed in the township, ward, or taxing district in which the same may be situated, and where the line between two taxing districts divides a farm or "lot" owned or possessed by the person taxed, the same shall be taxed in the taxing district in which the occupant resides, "lot" is indefinite, and cannot be held to denote such a parcel as in a particular locality is commonly considered a lot, and that the local tax maps afford guide in that direction. Potter v. City of Orange, 40 Atl. 647, 648, 62 N. J. Law, 192.

In proper meaning, when applied to real estate, a "lot" is a portion of land that has been set off or lotted, whether great or small; but in common use it means simply a piece, parcel, or tract of land, without regard to size. It does not necessarily connect itself with buildings, but may be anywhere on the surface of the earth. It may be a small or a large one; it may be a town lot, a wood lot, or a mill lot. Edwards v. Derrickson, 28 N. J. Law (4 Dutch.) 39, 45.

The term "lot" is more generally used to describe a small parcel of land than a large parcel. Inhabitants of Phillipsburgh v. Bruch's Ex'r, 37 N. J. Eq. (10 Stew.) 482, 486.

A power of attorney authorizing the sale of real estate in lots "as surveyed by B." will be construed to limit the right of the attorney to lots, it clearly conveying the idea that the land could only be conveyed in small parcels as designated on the plat; hence a sale by the acre was unauthorized. Rice v. Tavernier, 8 Minn. 248, 251 (Gil. 214), 83 Am. Dec. 778.

Where suburban property is platted into lots, and marked in such a way as to impress on it the character of urban property, as distinguished from rural use, the fact that the lots are larger than ordinary city lots will not exclude them from the operation of laws of Indiana authorizing a city to annex suburban property which has been platted into "lots." Glover v. City of Terre Haute, 129 Ind. 593, 594, 29 N. E. 412.

Railroad property.

"Lot," as used in St. N. C. March 28, 1870, giving a lien to mechanics and laborers for labor performed on any "building, lot, farm, and any kind of property not herein enumerated," does not include railroad property. Buncombe County Com'rs v. Tommey, 5 Sup. Ct. 626, 629, 115 U. S. 122, 29 L. Ed. 308.

A railroad right of way in a street cannot come within the term "lot." Indianapolis & V. R. Co. v. Capitol Pav. & Const. Co., 54 N. E. 1076, 1077, 24 Ind. App. 114 (citing Oshkosh City Ry. Co. v. Winnebago Co., 89 Wis. 435, 61 N. W. 1107).

A strip of land used by a railroad company as a right of way is a "lot" within the meaning of the statute governing street improvements. Figg v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 75 S. W. 269, 270, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 350.

Within Laws 1883, c. 183, subc. 10, § 3, giving aldermen the right to charge the cost of certain improvements to any lot fronting on the street, even within the definition of the term "lot" as a strip of land, a right of way of a railroad, with its roadbed and tracks, lying wholly within the street and not outside of it, and of indefinite length, is not a lot which may be assessed for such improvement. Oshkosh City Ry. Co. v. Winnebago Co., 61 N. W. 1107, 1108, 89 Wis. 435.

Tide land.

A division of land under tide water is not a "lot" or "curtilage," within the meaning of those words as used in a mechanic's lien law. Coddington v. Beebe, 31 N. J. Law (2 Vroom) 477, 484.

As tract or parcel.

In Sp. Laws 1885, c. 110, § 26, providing for the assessment of water-frontage tax on each and every "lot," the word "lot" is synonymous with "tract" or "parcel," and an answer in an action to enforce assessment for water tax, which alleges that the land assessed is vacant, unoccupied pasture land, does not show that it was a lot. State v. Robert P. Lewis Co., 75 N. W. 108, 110, 72 Minn. 87, 42 L. R. A. 639.

In an assessment assessing a "lot," counting a certain number of feet on the east side of the street bounded by premises owned by certain persons, the word "lot" will be held to be synonymous with "tract," "piece," or "parcel," and hence the description is not sufficiently definite, and the assessment is absolutely void. Harvey v. Meyer, 48 Pac. 1014, 1015, 117 Cal. 60.

In Mechanic's Lien Law, Gen. St. 1878, c. 90, § 1, which gives the laborer or materialman a lien upon a house and the lot of ground on which such house is erected, the word "lot" merely denotes one single parcel of land lying in a body, known and treated by usage or otherwise as one tract, and as being the tract, lot, or parcel which the parties naturally understood as that which will appertain to or be connected with a building or buildings after they should be erected. It does not confine the lien to a particular town or city lot as bounded and described on the town or city plat, and separated from adjacent property by real or imaginary lines. Lax v. Peterson, 44 N. W. 3, 4, 42 Minn. 214; North Star Iron Works Co. v. Stronge, 21 N. W. 740, 741, 33 Minn. 1.

The terms "tract" or "lot," and "piece or parcel of real property," and "piece or parcel of lands," whenever used in the chapter relating to the assessment and collection of taxes, shall be held to mean any contiguous quantity of land in the possession of, owned by, or recorded as the property of the same claimant, person, or company. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 1658.

Where a city by its charter is authorized to let, "lease or rent at public sale any lot or lots of land" belonging to such city, the Legislature did not intend to confine the term "lot or lots" to those portions of ground which had been admeasured off and set apart as lots in the plan of the town designated by numbers and boundaries, but in the more popular and ordinary sense, as embracing any piece of ground. City of Savannah v. Steamboat Co. (Ga.) R. M. Charlt. 342, 351.

In a statute authorizing the sale of "lots" in towns and cities that have been forfeited to the state for nonpayment of taxes, the word "lot" includes any parcel or piece of land lying in a town or city. Texarkana Water Co. v. State, 35 S. W. 788, 790, 62 Ark. 188.

Within the meaning of Act Cong. April, 21, 1806, providing that "the Governor and Judges of the territory of Michigan are authorized to lay out a town, including the whole of the old town of Detroit and 10,000 acres adjacent, and finally adjust all claims to lots therein, and give deeds for the same," the term "lot" is not limited or confined to such lots only as they should lay out on their plan, but included all lots or tracts of ground as to which there were claims to be adjusted. People v. Jones, 6 Mich. 176, 187.

Under Rev. St. § 1174, providing that the printer who shall publish the list and notice of the time when the redemption of land sold for taxes will expire shall receive 30 cents for each lot or tract of land in such list, it is held that the words "lot or tract of land" do not refer to each subdivision which has been made of the land, but that, where several parcels of land are assessed together as contiguous and owned by the same person, or as being so improved or occupied with buildings as to be practically incapable of separate valuation, they constitute one "tract" within the meaning of the statute. Bohan v. Ozaukee Co., 60 N. W. 702, 88 Wis. 498.

Two or more lots.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1191, giving to a contractor for grading a "lot" a lien thereon to secure the pay for his work, the lot upon which a lien is authorized is not limited to any artificial subdivision upon the surface of the earth, or to any official designation upon a map, but its meaning includes whatever territory is owned by a person which he may cause to be graded under a single contract; as in this case, where the owner of two blocks contracted for the grading of both, the earth taken from one block being used to fill in the other, both blocks constituted the lot to which the lien attached. Warren v. Hopkins, 42 Pac. 986, 988, 110 Cal. 506.

The word "lot," as used in the mechanic's lien law giving a mechanic a lien on a lot, is not synonymous with "city lot" or "platted lot," but it may include more, and may include less, than a lot as platted. Two owners in severalty of contiguous city or platted lots may by their acts connect them so as to constitute one lot. They do so connect them when they treat them as one tract for the purpose of building, as where they join in the construction of a single building on both lots. Menzel v. Tubbs, 53 N. W. 653, 654, 51 Minn. 364, 17 L. R. A. 815.

In Act March 11, 1843, giving a mechanic's lien upon the lot of land on which improvements are erected, etc., for the construction thereof, the words "lot of land" do not mean merely the ground covered by the building, nor do they confine the lien to the particular lot as known on the town plat on which the building stands. Where two adjacent town lots are used without any actual division between them, as one mill lot or the like, a part of the buildings and machinery being upon one and a part upon the other, the lien extends to both lots, although the precise spot where the work was done may be within the limits of one of them. The same rule applies to two or more adjacent lots thrown for any common purpose into one, the ideal lines of division being disregarded. Choteau v. Thompson, 2 Ohio St. 114, 123.

LOTTO.

"Lotto" is a game of chance and a gambling device, and therefore an indictable offense. Lowry v. State, 1 Mo. 722; State v. Foster, 2 Mo. 210.

LOTTERY.

See "Class Lottery"; "Dutch Lottery"; "Genoese Lottery"; "Numerical Lottery."

The term "lottery" has no technical meaning in the law distinct from its popular signification. A lottery is a scheme for the distribution of prizes by chance. Dunn v. People, 40 Ill. 465, 467; Thomas v. People, 59 Ill. 160, 163; Commonwealth v. Mackay, 58 N. E. 1027, 177 Mass. 345; State v. Shorts, 32 N. J. Law (3 Vroom) 398, 401, 90 Am. Dec. 668; Rolfe v. Delmar, 30 N. Y. Super. Ct. (7 Rob.) 80, 81; People v. Noelke, 94 N. Y. 137, 141, 46 Am. Rep. 128; State v. Willis, 2 Atl. 848, 849, 78 Me. 70; Randle v. State, 42 Tex. 580, 585; Quatsoe v. Eggleston, 71 Pac. 66, 42 Or. 315.

A lottery is a scheme for the distribution of prizes by chance, or the distribution itself when the latter depends on chance. Commonwealth v. Sullivan, 15 N. E. 491, 493, 146 Mass. 142; Commonwealth v. Manderfield (Pa.) 1 Leg. Gaz. R. 37, 39; Holoman v. State, 2 Tex. App. 610, 611, 28 Am. Rep. 439. A lottery which does not involve the determination of any right to property is not illegal. People v. Payne (N. Y.) 3 Denio, 88, 90; People v. Noelke, 1 N. Y. Cr. R. 252, 258.

The word "lottery," as used in the statute forbidding the same, is used in its ordinary and popular sense. The statute aimed to prohibit the mischief of that species of gambling. People v. Noelke, 1 N. Y. Cr. R. 252, 257.

"Lottery" is defined as a hazard in which sums are ventured for a chance of obtaining a greater value. Lotteries are nuisances in the eye of the common law. In re Smith, 39 Pac. 707, 708, 54 Kan. 702; Ford v. State, 37 Atl. 172, 174, 85 Md. 465, 41 L. R. A. 551, 60 Am. St. Rep. 337.

"Lotteries," within the meaning of Mills' Ann. St. § 2923, prohibiting lotteries, includes an arrangement by which the members of an association each pay a certain sum a week, and at drawings held each week one of the members receives a lot. Branham v. Stallings, 40 Pac. 396, 21 Colo. 211, 52 Am. St. Rep. 213.

"A 'lottery' may be defined to be a game by which a person paying money becomes entitled to money or other thing of value on certain contingencies, determinable by lot cast in a particular way by the manager of the game." Chavannah v. State, 49 Ala. 396, 397.

Chance is an essential element of a lottery, whether that chance be as to any return, or merely as to the amount or value of the return. Commonwealth v. Moorhead, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 513, 516.

A lottery is a scheme for the distribution of property by chance or lot among persons who have paid or agreed to pay a valuable consideration for the privilege of participating in such scheme. New Orleans v. Collins, 27 South. 532, 536, 52 La. Ann. 973.

To be a criminal lottery, there must be a consideration, and when small amounts are hazarded to gain large amounts, and the result of the winning is to be determined by the use of a contrivance of chance in which neither choice nor skill can exert any effect, it is gambling by lot, or a prohibited lottery. Johnson v. State, 34 South. 1018, 1019, 137 Ala. 101.

In Stearnes v. State, 21 Tex. 692, Judge Roberts defines a "lottery," which he terms a "grand raffle," as "a game in which there is a keeper or exhibitor who has the real fund, and against this the bettor stakes his money, which may be evidenced by tickets. On the side of those who hold tickets, it is a perfect game of chance. On the side of the keeper, there are both chance and skill." On the other hand, he defines a "raffle," which is authorized by our Code, as a game of perfect chance in which every participant is equal with every other in the proportion of his risk and prospective gain. The prize is a common fund, or that purchased by a common fund. The successful party takes the whole prize, and the rest lose. Riseln v. State, 71 S. W. 974, 975, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 413.

There are three essential ingredients in a lottery—consideration, prize, and chance. Equitable Loan & Security Co. v. Waring, 44 S. E. 320, 345, 117 Ga. 599, 62 L. R. A. 93, 97 Am. St. Rep. 177.

A lottery is a scheme by which a result is reached by some action or means taken in which result man's choice or will has no part, nor can human reason, sagacity, foresight, or design enable him to know or determine such result until the same has been accomplished. People v. Elliott, 74 Mich. 264, 267, 41 N. W. 916, 917, 3 L. R. A. 403, 16 Am. St. Rep. 640. To constitute a lottery, it must be a matter depending entirely on chance. United States v. Rosenblum (U. S.) 121 Fed. 180, 182.

Where a pecuniary consideration is paid, and it is determined by lot or chance, according to some scheme held out to the public, what the party who pays the money is to have for it, or whether he is to have anything, it is a lottery. State v. Lovell, 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 458, 461 (quoting State v. Clarke, 33 N. H. 329, 66 Am. Dec. 723; Hull v. Ruggles, 56 N. Y. 424); Swain v. Bussell, 10 Ind. 438, 441; MacDonald v. United States (U. S.) 63 Fed. 426, 430, 12 O. C. A. 339; Cross v. People, 32 Pac. 821, 822, 18 Colo. 321, 36 Am. St. Rep. 292; Long v. State, 22 Atl. 4, 5, 74 Md. 565, 12 L. R. A. 425, 28 Am. "The term 'lottery' has no technical meaning in the law distinct from its popular signification, and it is defined by various lexicographers as follows: 'A distribution of prizes and blanks by chance; a game of hazard in which small sums are ventured for the chance of obtaining a larger value either in money or other articles.' Worcester's Dictionary. 'A scheme for the distribution of prizes by chance.' Webster's Dictionary. 'A kind of game of hazard wherein several lots of merchandise are deposited in prizes for the benefit of the fortunate.' Rees' Cyclopædia. In the Century Dictionary, under the word "lottery," is the following definition: "A scheme for raising money by selling chances to share in a distribution of prizes; more specifically, a scheme for the distribution of prizes by chance among persons purchasing tickets, the correspondingly numbered slips or lots, representing prizes or blanks, being drawn from a wheel on a day previously announced in connection with the scheme of intended prizes." In law, the term "lottery" embraces all schemes for the distribution of prizes by chance, such as policy playing, gift exhibition, prize concert, raffles at fairs, etc., and includes various forms of gambling. Most of the governments of the Continent of Europe have at different periods raised money for public purposes by means of lotteries, and a small sum was raised in America during the Revolution by a lottery authorized by the Continental Congress. Both state and private lotteries have been forbidden by law in Great Britain and in nearly all of the United States, Louisiana and Kentucky being the notable exceptions. In general, lotteries consist of a certain number of tickets drawn at the same time, some of which entitle the holders to prizes, while the rest are blanks. This species of gaming has been resorted to at different periods by most of the European governments as a means of raising money for public purposes. United States v. Politzer (U. S.) 59 Fed. 273, 274.

The term "lottery" has often been defined by high authority, and, in speaking of the United States statute authorizing prosecutions for depositing in the post office a document concerning a lottery, Judge Deady says: "It is directed against the use of the mails for the conveyance of any lottery or gift enterprise of any kind. This language is sufficiently comprehensive to include any scheme in the nature of a lottery. It cannot be deemed necessary to enumerate the similar definitions given by lexicographers and courts of the term 'lottery.' It may be sufficient to say that it embraces the elements of procuring, through lot or chance, by the investment of a sum of money or something of value, some greater amount of money or thing of greater value. When such are the chief facts of any scheme, whatever it may be christened, or however it may be guarded or concealed by cunningly devised conditions or screens, it is, under the law, a lottery." United States v. Fulkerson (U. S.) 74 Fed. 619, 627; United States v. Wallis (U. S.) 58 Fed. 942, 943.

A lottery is a game of hazard in which small sums are ventured for the chance of obtaining greater. Payment of prizes in money is not necessary to bring the transaction within the meaning of the Constitution or statutes prohibiting lottery. The American Encyclopedia defines "lottery" as a gaming contract by which, for a valuable consideration, one may by favor of the lot obtain a prize of a value superior to the amount or value of that which he risks. The writer says: "In its best and most frequent application, the word describes those schemes of this nature which are conducted under the supervision and guaranties of government." Two kinds of lottery may be distinguished. The Genoese or "numerical," and the Dutch or "class" lottery. The former is described as a scheme by which, out of 90 consecutive numbers, five are to be selected or drawn by lot. The players fixed on certain numbers, wagering that one, two, or more of them would be drawn among the five, or that they would appear in a certain order. Of the Dutch or "class" lottery the author says: "In this species the number and value of the prizes are regularly estimated, all the ticket holders are interested at once in the play, and chance determines whether a prize or a blank shall fall to a given number." Fleming v. Bills, 3 Or. 286, 289; Buckalew v. State 62 Ala. 334, 335, 34 Am. Rep. 22.

"Lotteries," as used in 2 Brev. Dig. 26, 27, providing for the punishment of any persons who set up lotteries under the denomination of the sales of houses, lands, plate, tools, goods, wares, merchandise, and other things by chances, is a term of art, for, if otherwise, it might mean anything, as in common parlance it is applied to one-half of the ordinary occurrences or accidents of life. Being a term of art, and applied to the class to which it belongs, it embraces only one class of adventure or hazards, the grand schemes of which our daily newspapers exhibit. It is not meant that a lottery cannot exist without this formality and publicity, but there may be an adventure or a hazard without a lottery. Every throw of the die, even for an ordinary wager, is an adventure or hazard, but it has never yet entered the mind of any man that it constituted a lottery. A raffle of watches or other articles, of which the owner fixes the value, which is equally apportioned among the adventurers, and the chances are usually determined by throwing of dice, pieces of coin, or some substitute, is not a lottery. State v. Pinchback (S. C.) 2 Mill, Const. 128, 130.

"Lotteries," as used in an act prohibiting and punishing lotteries, must be understood in its general sense of a scheme for the distribution of prizes by chance. We must not confound the decision of certain questions by lot with a lottery. One, or two, or more persons may be obliged to do a certain thing, or go to a given place upon a specified day, and they may legally decide by lot which of them shall do the said thing, or go to the said place. The members of a deliberative body may by lot determine their seats. A division of property under some circumstances may be made by lot, and yet not be a lottery. Sacred history contains several instances where property has been parted and divided by lot: Psalms xxii, 18; Matthew xxvii, 35; Acts i, 26. Leviticus xvi, 8. The term as used in the criminal law refers to something in which there are supposed prizes and blanks. On the other hand, the disposal of any species of property, by any of the schemes or games of chance popularly regarded as innocent, comes within the terms of the law. The raffles which occur daily at the street corners, in barrooms, at fairs, and at other places, are as clearly violations of the criminal law as the most elaborate and carefully organized lotteries by which the ignorant and credulous are swindled out of their hard earnings. Commonwealth v. Manderfield (Pa.) 8 Phila. 457, 459.

A lottery is a scheme for the distribution of property, by chance, among persons who have paid or agreed to pay a valuable consideration for the chance, whether called a "lottery," "raffle," or "gift enterprise," or by some other name. Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 323.

A lottery is any scheme for the disposal or distribution of property, by chance, among persons who have paid or promised to pay any valuable consideration for the chance of obtaining such property or a portion of it, or for any share or any interest in such property, upon any agreement, understanding, or expectation that it is to be distributed or disposed of by lot or chance, whether called a "lottery," "raffle," or "gift enterprise," or by whatever name the same may be known. Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 319; Comp. Laws Nev. 1900, § 4937; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 7217; Pen. Code S. D. 1903, § 379.

Bond investment scheme.

A bond investment scheme in which only a limited number, who are determined by the order in which their applications are received, are certain to receive a return, and the rest are dependent for any return, and for the time thereof, upon the probability that the great majority will permit their bonds to lapse, is a scheme in which the prize is dependent on chance, and constitutes a lottery. United States v. McDonald (U. S.) 59 Fed. 263, 265.

The term "lottery" does not describe a transaction by which a foreign government, for the purpose of obtaining a loan, issues bonds providing that the government is to pay principal and interest and a premium named, together with one-fifth of any additional sum to which the holder may become entitled in case the number of his bond draws a prize in a specified drawing. Kohn v. Koehler, 96 N. Y. 362, 368, 48 Am. Rep. 628.

"Lottery," as used in Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 27, § 172, providing that no person shall draw any lottery or sell any lottery tickets in the state, should be construed to include a bond of a foreign government in which the purchaser would in all events receive his principal and interest at the time fixed by chance, and, if a certain wheel of fortune containing prize numbers should turn in his favor, a large premium in addition thereto. Ballock v. State, 20 Atl. 184, 185, 73 Md. 1, 8 L. R. A. 671, 25 Am. St. Rep. 559.

"Lottery," in Rev. St. § 3894, as amended by Act Sept. 19, 1890, c. 908, providing a punishment for any person depositing in the post office, to be carried through the mails, any letter, postal card, or circular concerning any "lottery," so called, gift concert, or other similar enterprises offering prizes dependent upon lot or chance, should be construed to include a transaction by a foreign government which offered to every holder of a bond, if it was redeemed during the first year, considerably more than its face value, and during the second year a larger increase, and so on, with an increase of a certain amount each year, and offering to the holder, as part of the bond, a chance of drawing a prize, varying in amount from a small to a large sum of money, every holder of a bond having an equal chance with the holder of every other bond of drawing one of such prizes. This species of gaming has been resorted to at different periods by most of the European governments as a means of raising money for public purposes. Horner v. United States, 13 Sup. Ct. 409, 147 U. S. 449, 37 L. Ed. 237.

Disposal of property by chance.

The term "lottery," in a statute declaring lotteries to be common nuisances, etc., includes a scheme for the disposal of land by chance. Seidenbender v. Charles' Adm'rs (Pa.) 4 Serg. & R. 151, 159, 8 Am. Dec. 682.

Where a scheme provides for a sale of a tract of land in lots of unequal value, to be distributed among the purchasers by chance, by means of tickets of members bought at a fixed price, greatly exceeding the value of the majority of the lots, and much less than the value of other lots, such scheme constitutes a lottery, as it would be a mere device to attract adventurers, holding out the hope of great gain by mere chance. Elder v. Chapman, 52 N. E. 10, 12, 176 Ill. 142.

The term "lottery," in the constitutional provision prohibiting lotteries, was construed to include a scheme by which a tract of land was subdivided into lots, and the lots divided into three classes, and sold by parties paying $25 down for a share in the scheme, with a condition that they should pay an additional sum, differing in amount with the class to which the lot drawn should belong, one inducement for the sale of the lots in such manner being that there was a house on one of the lots in the first class. Guenther v. Dewien, 11 Iowa, 133, 134.

A scheme by which town lots were sold in parcels at a uniform price, each purchaser to receive at least one lot, of an estimated value of $50, some of the parcels being of the value of $5,000, and after all were sold the parcel to be received by each purchaser to be determined by lot, was clearly a lottery. United States v. Olney (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 233, 234.

The term "lottery," in the Maryland act of 1792, c. 58, § 1, making it unlawful to propose any scheme of a lottery to be drawn within the state, includes a lottery for the sale of lands or lots. Hawkins v. Cox (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 878.

Within the meaning of a New York statute forbidding "lotteries," that term includes a scheme whereby a tract of land is divided into lots of unequal value, which are sold to a number of purchasers at a uniform price, and are distributed among those purchasers by drawing or lot, and a deed given to each purchaser for the lot drawn by him. Wooden v. Shotwell, 23 N. J. Law (3 Zab.) 465.

"Lottery" is defined to be any scheme whereby one, on paying money or other valuable thing to another, becomes entitled to recover from him such a return in value, or nothing, as some formula of chance may determine; and pursuant to this definition it is held that where, by contract, parties bought lots of different values, each paying $100, and the lot each purchaser was to receive was determined by drawing from a box a card with the description of the lot on it, the transaction was a lottery. Paulk v. Jasper Land Co., 22 South. 495, 496, 116 Ala. 178.

The word "lottery" has not acquired a technical or legal significance different from that of approved usage. A distribution of prizes by lot or chance may constitute a lottery. To constitute a "lottery" within the meaning of the statute prohibiting lotteries, something of value must be parted with, directly or indirectly, by him who has the chance. There must be some plan or scheme, on the part of the promoter of the enterprise alleged to be unlawful as a lottery, for the sale or disposition of property by lot or chance, before it can be said to have the character of a lottery. Certain lots contracted for by the promoter of a packing-house plant were subscribed for under an agreement to take the number set opposite the name of each subscriber if the packing house were secured. The lots were to be apportioned in such manner as the subscribers might decide. At a meeting called by the promoter to divide the lots by a method to be decided upon by a vote of the subscribers, the plan of one of the promoters was adopted, the others taking no part, and having announced that they left the method and apportionment to the subscribers. The subscribers' names were thrown into one box, and the number of lots to correspond were thrown into another by two of the subscribers agreed upon. None of the lots were worth more than the price paid. Held, that the method was not a "lottery" within the meaning of the statutory provision (Code 1873, § 4043) prohibiting lotteries. "We have discovered no authority," says the court, "denying the subscribers the right to apportion the lots by chance. Joshua so apportioned the promised land among the several tribes of the children of Israel, and the disciples of Christ chose Matthias to succeed Judas by casting lots." Chancy Park Land Co. v. Hart, 73 N. W. 1059, 104 Iowa, 592.

Under a statute prohibiting lotteries, but not defining the term, it must be construed in a popular sense, and means a scheme for the distribution of property by chance among persons who have paid or agreed to pay a valuable consideration for the chance, whether called a "lottery," "raffle," or "gift enterprise," or by some other name. Where clubs of 40 persons each were formed by a merchant tailor for the disposition of suits of clothing, each at a stipulated value, at $40 by lot, under nominal contracts of purchase, the price to be paid in weekly installments of $1 each, such payments entitling the holders of tickets to participate in weekly drawings by lot, with the chance of securing goods of the value of $40 at any drawing, without further additional payments than the weekly installments then paid, it was held that the transaction was a lottery. State v. Moren, 48 Minn. 555, 51 N. W. 618, 619.

Game of skill.

By Pen. Code, § 323, a "lottery" is defined to be a scheme for the distribution of property, by chance, among persons who have paid or agreed to pay a valuable con-consideration for the chance, whether called a "lottery," "raffle," "gift enterprise," or by some other name. And a fish-pond game seeming to involve no element of chance, and calling wholly for the exercise of skill, is probably not subject to inhibition against lotteries. In most instances the chances are that the anglers are found to be unskillful, but that does not make the result of the angling depend upon chance. People v. Fuerst, 34 N. Y. Supp. 1115, 1117, 13 Misc. Rep. 304.

Gift enterprise.

Where a merchant gave to a designated class of customers an opportunity to secure by lot or chance any article of value additional to that for which such customers paid, he violated the provisions of Pen. Code, § 407, which declares that no person "shall keep, maintain, employ or carry on any lottery in the state or other scheme or devise for the hazarding of any money or valuable thing." Meyer v. State, 37 S. E. 96, 112 Ga. 20, 51 L. R. A. 496, 81 Am. St. Rep. 17.

The term "lottery" includes the sale of prize candy packages, some of which contain tickets with the name of a piece of silverware thereon, to which the lucky purchaser is entitled. Hull v. Ruggles, 56 N. Y. 424, 427.

Lottery is a game of hazard, in which small sums are ventured for the chance of obtaining greater. The term includes what is called a "gift enterprise," by which a merchant or tradesman sells his wares for their market value, but by way of inducement gives to each purchaser a ticket which entitles him to prizes, to be determined after the manner of a lottery. Bell v. State, 37 Tenn. (5 Sneed) 507, 509.

Within the meaning of Battle's Rev. St. c. 32, § 69, forbidding lotteries, a "lottery" is a scheme, device, or game of hazard whereby, for a small sum of money or thing of value, the person dealing therein, by chance or hazard or contingency, may or may not get money or other thing of greater or less value, or, in some cases, of no value at all, from the owners or managers of such "lottery." The word includes the sale to customers of small boxes of candy, of trifling value, for the chance or opportunity of designating one of certain pictures conveniently arranged in defendant's place of business, behind some of which were small sums of money, and behind others a card on which was the letter "c," the purchaser getting either the money or the card accordingly as he may select, but if he got a card he became entitled to another box of candy. State v. Lumsden, 89 N. C. 572.

1 Rev. St. p. 664, provides that a "lottery" shall be an unlawful scheme, etc. A ticket issued by the managers of a concert stated that the borrower was entitled "to admission to a grand concert, and to whatever gift might be awarded to its number," to which was added the number of the ticket. Held, that the enterprise was a "lottery" within the meaning of the statute. Negley v. Devlin (N. Y.) 12 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 210, 212.

A firm operating a dry-goods store placed in its window a locked box containing $25 in bills, and advertised that all persons buying goods in their store and paying 50 cents or more would be given a key, and only one key would be given out which would unlock the box; that the person receiving the key which would unlock the box would be given the $25 in it. The firm sold goods at the usual and ordinary prices, without extra charge on account of the key, and gave to each purchaser a key, to which was attached a card stating the offer in substance. Held, that such transactions were in fact sales of merchandise and lottery tickets for an aggregate price, so that the arrangement constituted a lottery. Davenport v. City of Ottawa, 54 Kan. 711, 89 Pac. 708, 45 Am. St. Rep. 303.

A horse race, the winner of which is to receive a stake, is not a lottery. There is no foundation for such claim either in common speech or in legal definition. A lottery depends on lots or chance, such as the casting of lots, throwing of dice, or the turning of a wheel. In re Dwyer, 35 N. Y. Supp. 884, 14 Misc. Rep. 204.

A racing association permitted owners of horses of a certain age to compete for a prize of a certain amount to be furnished by the association, each person who entered a horse for the race being required to pay a sum known as "entrance money," which became the property of the association. The prize to be paid to the winner was contributed by the association without reference to the entrance money. It was held that such transaction was not a "lottery" within the prohibition of Pen. Code, § 323. A "lottery" is defined by the Penal Code to be a scheme for the distribution of property, by lot or chance, among persons who have agreed to pay a valuable consideration for the chance. The essential quality of a lottery is that the distribution of the property shall depend strictly upon chance, and that, so far as possible, if the lottery is honestly conducted, no other element whatever shall enter into it. There certainly is a wide distinction between the wager of money upon the result of any game and the possession of shares in a lottery. To a certain extent it may be said that what is called "chance" enters into the result of any game, and that nothing which is the result of contest or competition is decided without some other element entering into it than the mere skill of persons who take part in the contest. Everybody recognizes that in a baseball game or in a running or walking match the result depends not only upon the skill and strength of the competitors, but upon numerous incidents which may or may not occur, and whose occurrence depends upon something which nobody can predict, and, so far as human knowledge is concerned, has no reason for existing. It is a chance pure and simple, and yet the result in those games cannot in any true sense be said to be a lottery. The distinction we apprehend to be that in a lottery no other element is intended to enter into the distribution than pure chance, while in the result of other contests which are forbidden under the act against betting and gaming other elements enter in, and the element of chance, although necessarily taken into consideration, may be and is eliminated to a very considerable extent by the skill, careful preparation, and foresight of the competitors. People v. Fallon, 39 N. Y. Supp. 865, 866, 4 App. Div. 82. See Id., 46 N. E. 296, 152 N. Y. 12, 37 L. R. A. 227, 57 Am. St. Rep. 492.

Keno.

"A lottery," says Webster, "is a distribution of prizes by chance." "Keno" is not a lottery, though the winner is determined by chance, for in a lottery the prizes have an existence before tickets are sold, but in "keno" each player puts up a certain amount to make an aggregate sum, which is the amount played for. Portis v. State, 27 Ark. 360, 363.

Place for sale of tickets.

The term "lottery" cannot be applied to a place for the sale of lottery tickets. People v. Jackson (N. Y.) 8 Denio, 101, 102, 45 Am. Dec. 449.

Policy playing

See "Policy Playing—Policy."

Pool selling.

See, also, "Pool Selling."

Pool selling does not constitute a lottery, or a policy or bucket shop, within the meaning of a municipal ordinance prohibiting the keeping of such establishments. People v. Reilly, 50 Mich. 384, 15 N. W. 520, 45 Am. Rep. 47.

Selling pools on horse races is not a lottery, within Const. art. 1, § 10, prohibiting lotteries or the sale of lottery tickets; and therefore Laws 1887, c. 479, authorizing such pool selling on races conducted on the track of any incorporated association, is constitutional. Reilly v. Gray, 28 N. Y. Supp. 811, 814, 77 Hun, 402.

A pool on a race horse is a lottery, within the interdiction of Const. § 1071, providing, "nor shall any lottery ever be authorized, or any sale of lottery tickets allowed, within this state." Irving v. Britton, 28 N. Y. Supp. 529, 530, 8 Misc. Rep. 201.

Preference in distribution.

To constitute a lottery, there must be a prize offered, and the payment of something for the chance to obtain it. The prize may be anything of value. A preference or privilege in the distribution of a common fund among those entitled thereto may be a prize. A scheme whereby a common fund is to be produced by the contributions of various parties, and afterwards distributed among those contributing thereto, and a valuable preference in the distribution is made to depend upon chance, is a lottery. State v. Nebraska Home Co. (Neb.) 92 N. W. 763, 764, 60 L. R. A. 448.

Prize for suggestions.

A lottery is a scheme for the distribution of prizes by lot or chance. The proposal made by the owners of several suburban lots to pay a large sum of money to the person who would suggest the best name for a village to be built upon the lots, the choice of names to be determined by a committee, is not a lottery. Holt v. Wood, 14 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 499, 501.

Property owned by participants.

Sections 30, 31, Rev. St., entitled "Of Raffle and Lotteries," have reference only to the distribution of money or valuable things, to be determined by law or chance, which shall be dependent upon the drawing of a lottery over which the parties to the distribution have no control, and the distribution among the members of an art union of its works of art by a lot conducted by themselves is not embraced within it. People v. American Art Union, 7 N. Y. 240, 241.

Public or private.

Const. art. 4, § 24, declares that "no lottery shall be authorized by this state." Held, that the language means that no lottery, either public or private, shall be authorized by the state, and does not mean merely that no lottery shall be authorized for the purpose of raising revenue. State v. Overton, 16 Nev. 136, 150.

Redeemable coupons.

The term "lottery" does not include the selling of tickets with coffee, which absolutely entitles the holders in every case to certain articles. People v. Gillson, 17 N. E. 343, 347, 109 N. Y. 389, 4 Am. St. Rep. 465.

Slot machine.

A lottery is a game of hazard or chance, in which small sums are ventured for the chance of obtaining a larger sum of money.

Where a nickel-in-the-slot machine was so constructed that if the nickel, in falling into the machine, touched certain springs, a valve would be opened, and the machine would pay a certain amount of money in excess of the deposit, the nickel remaining in the machine, and the proportion of times when one playing the machine would win was less than the times when he would lose, such machine constituted a lottery. Prendergast v. State, 57 S. W. 850, 851, 41 Tex. Cr. R. 358.

The crime of conducting a lottery is similar to that of gaming, and in fact a lottery is a species of gaming. The use of a slot machine, where the element of chance determines whether the prizes are to be given, brings the operation thereof under the definition of lottery, whether the prizes given are stock in trade of licensed establishments or not. Therefore an ordinance of the city of New Orleans, making it unlawful for any person to engage in the operation of a slot machine, is legal. City of New Orleans v. Collins, 27 South. 532, 536, 52 La. Ann. 973.

Trading stamp business.

Pub. Laws, c. 652, making it a misdemeanor to sell or give a stamp or coupon, in connection with the sale of property, which shall entitle the purchaser to receive from some person other than the seller any article of merchandise other than that actually sold, and for such other person to deliver the extra article of merchandise on presentation of the stamp, does not prohibit a lottery. State v. Dalton, 46 Atl. 234, 236, 22 R. I. 77, 48 L. R. A. 775, 84 Am. St. Rep. 818.

Wheel of fortune.

A device whereby one having paid for the privilege of whirling an arrow was entitled to the prize opposite the number on which it stopped, was a "lottery," pure and simple. Reeves v. State, 17 South. 104, 105 Ala. 120.

LOTTERY GIFT.

The phrase "lottery gifts" does not embrace anything which is free from chance or hazard. Hence Act June 3, 1885, entitled "An act for the suppression of lottery gifts by storekeepers and others to secure patronage," reciting in the preamble that the laws against gambling and lotteries are evaded by the giving of tickets entitling the holders to money or articles of value as an inducement to purchase, and providing that merchants and others giving and selling such tickets shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, is void, under the constitutional requirement that the subject of every act must be clearly expressed in its title. Commonwealth v. Moorhead, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 513, 516.

LOTTERY TICKET.

As letter, see "Letter."

A lottery ticket is any device whatsoever by which money or any other thing is to be paid or delivered on the happening of an event or contingency in the nature of a lottery. Smith v. State, 11 Atl. 758, 759, 68 Md. 168.

A ticket which purports to entitle the holder to whatever prize may be won by its corresponding number in a scheme called a prize concert, in which the prizes consist of gifts in greenbacks and in other kinds of property, and one-half of the tickets represent blanks in the awarding, is a lottery ticket. Commonwealth v. Thacher, 97 Mass. 583, 584, 93 Am. Dec. 125.

A guaranty, or a written assurance or promise, whereby the guarantor binds himself that he will pay the prize which may be drawn to a certain number in a lottery, is a lottery ticket, within the meaning of the law prohibiting the sale of lottery tickets when made by the proprietor of the lottery or a duly authorized agent of the proprietor. There is no set form of a lottery ticket. It is a written promise that the proprietors will be responsible for the prize, and, whether they use the usual form or not, their responsibility is the same. If a man opens an office, from which he vends assurances or guaranties, as a substitute for lottery tickets, and for the purpose of evading and defeating the law, although he does not strictly and literally sell lottery tickets, yet he does sell those papers which are substantially lottery tickets, if it can be proved or inferred from the evidence in the cause he holds the tickets themselves for the benefit of the purchaser. Commonwealth v. Chubb (Va.) 5 Rand. 715, 720.

A "ticket," within the meaning of Act Dec. 19, 1842, to establish lotteries and to prohibit the sale of lottery tickets, includes a ticket entitling the holder to one-fourth the prize drawn by its members, although such a ticket is usually called a quarter of a ticket. Freleigh v. State, 8 Mo. 606, 612.

The term "tickets," when speaking of the sale of lottery tickets, is equivalent to "chances." Saloman v. State, 27 Ala. 26-30.

The sale of a lottery ticket is in violation of Const. art. 4, § 28, forbidding any person to sell any lottery ticket, though the ticket had drawn the prize before the sale. Kitchen v. Greenabaum, 61 Mo. 110, 111.

LOVE.

"Love between the sexes has different constituents from those found in mere friendship. It is very variable in its constitution. It may be refined, having elevated aims, or it may be gross, in which the baser desires predominate. So that evidence that a person acted toward another as a lover is inadmissible." Carney v. State, 79 Ala. 14, 19.

LOVELY CLAIM.

A "lovely claim" is a donation made by the general government of two quarter sections of the public lands, according to the legal subdivisions of the public surveys, to a particular class of people embraced by the act of Congress of May 24, 1828, who have complied with the conditions therein imposed, and also with the stipulations of the treaty ratified between the United States and the Cherokee nation of Indians on the 28th of May, 1828. Logan v. Moulder, 1 Ark. 313, 33 Am. Dec. 338.

LOW.

"Low" is a relative term. A thing is said to be low when compared to other structures. A structure is said to be low according to the uses to which it is to be put. As used with relation to a bridge over a railroad track, the bridge is high or low according to the height of cars to pass under it. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Tucker's Adm'r (Ky.) 65 S. W. 453, 454.

"Low" is defined in the Century Dictionary as "not high in character or condition; not haughty or proud; meek; lowly; lacking in dignity, refinement, or principle; vulgar, groveling, abject, mean, base; in a mean condition, as a low-born fellow;" and such is its meaning in a bill to restrain the importation of armed men alleged to be of a low and lawless type. Arkansas v. Kansas & T. Coal Co. (U. S.) 96 Fed. 353, 362.

LOW DILIGENCE.

"Low or slight diligence" is that which persons of less than common prudence, or, indeed, of any prudence at all, take of their own concerns. Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Rollins, 5 Kan. 167, 180.

LOW WATER.

See "Ordinary Low Water."

LOW-WATER MARK.

The "low-water mark" of a fresh-water river is the point to which the river recedes at its lowest stage. Paine Lumber Co. v. United States (U. S.) 55 Fed. 854, 864.

In a case involving the construction of the statute fixing the boundary line between New York and Kings counties at low-water mark on the Long Island shore, it was said that "low-water mark" means the low-water mark as the water flows after the land is reclaimed from the bay or river by the erection of wharves and piers, and the filling from the shore for that purpose; but it was held that the Atlantic Basin, which was originally below the low-water mark on the Long Island shore, which was originally and had always continued below low-water mark, was in New York county, although practically inclosed by piers, wharves, etc. Orr v. City of Brooklyn, 36 N. Y. 661, 664.

As margin of sea at low tide.

"Low-water mark," as used in reference to tide waters, is the margin of the sea when the tide is out. Storer v. Freeman, 6 Mass. 435, 439, 4 Am. Dec. 155.

"Low-water mark is the line or the margin of the water at ordinary low tides, and not the lowest possible state of the water at some particular time, from natural causes." Gerrish v. Proprietors of Union Wharf, 26 Me. 384, 395, 46 Am. Dec. 568.

Colony Ordinance 1641-47 provided that the title of the owners of land adjoining tidal waters should extend to low-water mark. Held, that the phrase "low-water mark" meant the lowest line made by the receding tide with the land, not the lowest line with a stream of fresh water emptying into the sea, or a cove or tidal river mixed with the land. It has nothing to do with a fresh-water stream or with a tidal channel, through which only fresh waters flow at low tide. Tappan v. Boston Water-Power Co., 31 N. E. 703, 705, 157 Mass. 24, 16 L. R. A. 353.

As ordinary low-water mark.

"Low-water mark" does not mean the lowest stages of water in seasons of great drought, but the height of the water in ordinary stages of low water. Kentucky Lumber Co. v. King (Ky.) 65 S. W. 156, 157.

"Low-water mark," as a terminus of boundary, means ordinary low-water mark, and not the lowest point to which the water has ever receded. McBurney v. Young, 32 Atl. 492, 493, 67 Vt. 574, 29 L. R. A. 539.

"Low-water mark," as used in deeds calling for the line of the land at low-water mark on a river, means the ordinary low-water mark unaffected by drouth. Low water, as distinguished from high water, does not mean the lowest water the stream may exhibit under special and extraordinary circumstances. Ordinary high water and ordinary low water each has its reasonably well defined mark, so nearly certain that there is not much difficulty in ascertaining it. The ordinary rise and fall of the stream usually finds nearly the same limits, but to bound title by a mark which is set by an extraordinary flood or an extreme drouth would do injustice, and contravene the common understanding of the people. Stover v. Jack, 60 Pa. (10 P. F. Smith) 339, 342, 100 Am. Dec. 568.

By "low-water mark," as used where the level of a lake, or other body of water, is not constant, but is fluctuating, ordinary low-water mark is intended, or the line or level at which the waters of the lake usually stand when free from disturbing causes. Slauson v. Goodrich Transp. Co., 69 N. W. 990, 991, 94 Wis. 642 (citing Diedrich v. Northwestern Union Ry. Co., 42 Wis. 248, 24 Am. Rep. 399; Seaman v. Smith, 24 Ill. [14 Peck] 521).

LOW WINE.

Low wine is the product of the first process of distillation of spirituous liquors by the application of heat to a still containing the material, and differs from spirits, in that the latter passes through a second distillation. United States v. Tenbroek, 15 U. S. (2 Wheat.) 248, 258, 4 L. Ed. 231.

LOWEST.

"Lowest," in the meaning of a statute requiring that the contracts for public improvements shall be awarded to the "lowest responsible bidder," is that the contract, when awarded, shall be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder, but does not require the authorities to accept a bid when but one bid is made. In such case, there being no other bid with which to make comparison, such bid is not the lowest, but might as well be termed the highest. People v. Kings County Sup'rs (N. Y.) 42 Hun, 456, 458.

LOWEST AVERAGED PRICE.

Where a contract binds a gas company to furnish to a city such quantity of gas as may be required by the city council for public lamps at two-thirds of the lowest averaged price at which gas shall or may be furnished to private individuals in five certain specified cities, the words "lowest averaged price" means such cash price in each of the five cities named, averaged by adding together such lowest cash prices, and dividing the amount by five, the words "lowest averaged price" entitling the city to the benefit of such discounts as are or may be allowed to individuals by the company in each city furnished gas at the lowest price. City of Cincinnati v. Cincinnati Gaslight & Coke Co., 41 N. E. 239, 242, 53 Ohio St. 278.

LOWEST BIDDER.

A statute requiring municipal contracts to be given to the lowest bidder is not to be "construed literally, and accepted as an absolute restriction. In such case undoubtedly the bid should be bona fide, and should conform strictly to the prescribed specifications: but in determining whether a bid is the lowest among several others the quality and utility of the thing offered—in other words, its adaptability to the purpose for which it is required—must be first considered. The offer in nominal amount may be exceedingly low, while the thing offered may be exceedingly worthless." Cleveland Fire Alarm Co. v. Metropolitan Fire Com'rs (N. Y.) 7 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 49, 55; Id., 55 Barb. 288, 292.

Under the laws requiring that contracts for street improvements in New York City must be let to the lowest bidder, on estimates made by the surveyor, where the surveyor had made an estimate founded upon a surface examination of the locality and bids are invited upon that basis, he who is the lowest bidder upon those estimates is the lowest bidder under the law, and does not lose his rights because the estimates prove to be erroneous when the work is actually done. Reilly v. City of New York, 111 N. Y. 473, 474, 18 N. E. 623, 624.

It ought hardly to be supposed that a law requiring municipal authorities to let a contract to the "lowest bidder" means absolutely that the contract shall be given to the lowest bidder without regard to his fitness, responsibility, or capacity to perform the work, and generally such laws read to the lowest or best bidder, or the lowest responsible bidder. Clapton v. Taylor, 49 Mo. App. 117, 124.

The words "lowest bidder" in Baltimore City Charter, § 1415, requiring certain public contracts to be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder, necessarily implies a common standard by which to measure the respective bids, and therefore requires that specifications for the work and the materials be furnished as a basis upon which such bids may be made, and therefore it is improper to allow the bidders to furnish their own specifications. Packard v. Hayes, 51 Atl. 32, 36, 94 Md. 233.

LOWEST RESPONSIBLE BIDDER.

See, also, "Responsible Bidder."

Act 1874, requiring all public work and materials which are capable of being contracted for to be awarded to the "lowest responsible bidder," means the bidder lowest in amount and peculiarly responsible. The word "responsible," as defined by Webster, means liable to accounting, accountable, answerable, able to discharge an obligation, or having an estate adequate to the payment of a debt. As used in the statute, it refers to the pecuniary ability of the bidder to answer to the undertaking, so that the interest of the city should suffer no damage. Lowest in price and responsibility, in the sense of being accountable, able to discharge the obligation, so as to save the city from pecuniary loss, is what is intended by the act of 1874. Gutta Percha Co. v. Stokely (Pa.) 11 Phila. 219-221.

In the requirement that public work should be let to the lowest responsible bidder, the term "lowest responsible bidder" means one who complies with all the requirements of the statute, specifications, etc., not merely one whose bid is less than his competitors'. Boseker v. Wabash County Com'rs, 88 Ind. 267.

St. 1881, p. 59, § 5, providing that the board of commissioners having charge of the erection of an insane asylum may adopt or reject any or all bids for the erection of such asylum not being responsible or satisfactory, but in determining bids for the same work or material the "lowest responsible bid" shall be taken, means not only the bid by the one whose pecuniary ability to perform the contract is best, but the one in point of skill, ability, and integrity who is most likely to do faithful, conscientious work, and fulfill the contract promptly, according to its letter and spirit. Hoole v. Kinkead, 16 Nev. 217, 220.

Act May 23, 1874, directing municipal officers to award certain contracts to the lowest responsible bidder, applies not to pecuniary ability only, but also to judgment and skill. The duties imposed on the city authorities are not merely ministerial, limited to ascertaining whose bid was the lowest and the pecuniary responsibility of the bidder and his sureties, but it calls for the exercise of duties which are deliberative and discretionary. Interstate Vitrified Brick & Paving Co. v. City of Philadelphia, 30 Atl. 383, 164 Pa. 477; Douglass v. Commonwealth, 108 Pa. 559, 563, 42 Leg. Int. 337.

"Responsible," as used in Act 23d May, 1874, Pamph. L. 230, declaring that all work to be done for the city shall be performed under contract, to be given to the lowest responsible bidder, means not only pecuniary ability to make a good contract by security for its faithful performance, but means the one who, under all the circumstances, will probably best perform the work. Commonwealth v. Mitchell, 82 Pa. 343, 349.

"Responsible," as used in a corporate charter providing that contracts for public improvements shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder, is not limited to financial, but means ability to perform all the conditions of the contract; and the commissioner of public works may reject a bid notwithstanding it is the lowest made, and the bidder is able to give the required bond, if in the judgment of that official, after due investigation, the materials customarily used, and the workmanship exhibited by the bidder in the performance of the kind of work required, are poor and unsatisfactory. People v. Kent, 43 N. E. 760, 761, 160 Ill. 655.

Laws 1875, c. 634, declaring that all contracts for certain work should be awarded to the lowest bona fide "responsible bidder," meant that the successful bidder should be one "able to respond or to answer in accordance with what is expected or demanded." People v. Dorsheimer (N. Y.) 55 How. Prac. 118, 120.

LOYAL VOTERS.

The words "loyal voters," as ordinarily used, is quite different in meaning from that of the phrase legal voters or qualified voters; and therefore an averment that plaintiff was elected by the loyal voters of the county is not equivalent to an allegation that he was elected by the legal or qualified voters. Lee-man v. Hinton, 62 Ky. (1 Duv.) 37, 41.

LTD.

As used in connection with the signature of a limited partnership, signed by only one manager of such partnership, "Ltd." does not create a general liability; Act June 2, 1874, providing for limited partnerships, requiring that the word "Limited" shall be the last word in the name of every such partnership. Bernard & Leas Mfg. Co. v. Packard & Calvin (U S.) 64 Fed. 309, 310, 12 C. C. A. 123.

LUCID INTERVAL

"Lucid interval" does not mean a perfect restoration to reason, but a restoration so far as to be able beyond doubt to comprehend and do an act with such reason, memory, and judgment as to make it legal. Frazer v. Frazer, 2 Del. Ch. 260, 263.

The term "lucid interval" means not an apparent tranquillity or seeming repose, not a simple diminution or remission of the disease, but a temporary cure—an intermission so clearly marked that it perfectly resembles a return of health—and must be continued for a length of time sufficient to give certainty to the temporary restoration of reason. Godden v. Burke's Ex'rs, 35 La. Ann. 160, 173.

"A 'lucid interval,' as the term is used in speaking of lucid intervals of insane persons, is not merely a cessation of the violent symptoms of the disorder, but a restoration of the faculties of the mind sufficiently to enable the party soundly to judge of the act. The evidence in support of a lucid interval, after derangement has been established, should be as strong and demonstrative of such fact as when the object of the proof is to show insanity; and it ought to go to the state and habit of the person, and not to the accidental interview of any individual, or to the degree of self-possession in any particular act." Ricketts v. Jolliff, 62 Miss. 440-448.

The term "lucid interval," used in reference to insanity, means more than a mere remission of the manifestations of insanity. It must be such a full return of the mind to sanity as places the party in possession of the powers of his mind, enabling him to understand and transact his affairs as usual. Ekin's Heirs v. McCracken (Pa.) 11 Phila. 534, 539.

LUCKY.

"Lucky," as used in an agreement for the purchase of a horse, by which the purchaser agreed to pay £63, and, if the horse was lucky, would give seller £5 more, was too vague and uncertain a term to be considered in a court of law, and the only certain part of the agreement was that for £63. Guthing v. Lynn, 2 Barn. & Adol. 232.

Where a person has four bids from contractors on a house that he intended to construct, and, on the opening of the bids, such person stated to one of the bidders, "You are the lucky man," such phrase was merely a recognition that he was the lowest bidder, and was not equivalent to the award of the contract to him. Laskie v. Haseltine, 25 Atl. 886, 155 Pa. 98.

LUCRATIVE BAILMENT.

In an action against a corporation for the value of a picture lost by it while engaged in carrying on a public fair, it appeared that the article was shipped by plaintiff upon invitation of defendant, issued in pursuance of its general purpose to augment its receipts, and lost after the close of the exhibition by reason of the failure of defendant's agent to return the picture to plaintiff. Held, that the transaction was a lucrative bailment, and defendant was liable for the loss. Prince v. Alabama State Fair, 17 South. 449, 450, 106 Ala. 340.

LUCRATIVE OFFICE.

The office of colonel of volunteers is lucrative, and so is that of reporter of the Supreme Court; and a colonel of volunteers cannot hold both without violating Const. art. 2, § 9, providing that no person shall hold more than one lucrative office at the same time. Kerr v. Jones, 19 Ind. 351, 353.

Const. art. 2, § 9, declares that no person holding a lucrative office or appointment under the United States or under this state shall be eligible to a seat in the General Assembly, nor shall any person hold more than one lucrative office at the same time, except as in the constitution expressly provided, etc. Held, that the term "lucrative," as defined by Webster, means "yielding lucre; gainful; profitable; making increase of money or goods; as a lucrative trade, lucrative business or office"—and that the test was whether the office yielded a pay supposed to be an adequate compensation for the services or duties performed. The lucrativeness of an office, which is its net profits, does not depend on the amount of compensation affixed to it, but expenses incident to an office with a high salary may render it less lucrative in this latter sense than other offices having a much lower rate of compensation, but the office is nevertheless a lucrative one. State v. Kirk, 44 Ind. 401, 405, 15 Am. Rep. 239.

The office of county recorder and that of a county commissioner are lucrative offices. Pay, supposed to be an adequate compensation, is affixed to the performance of their duties. The lucrativeness of an office—its net profits—does not depend upon the amount of compensation affixed to it. The expenses incident to an office with a high salary may render it less lucrative, in this latter sense, than other offices having a much lower rate of compensation. Dailey v. State (Ind.) 8 Blackf. 329, 330.

"Lucrative office," as used in Const. art. 2, § 9, providing that no person shall hold more than one lucrative office at the same time, except as expressly provided, means an office, the incumbent of which is charged with duties under the laws of the state, for which he is entitled to compensation. If an office is purely municipal, the officer not being charged with any duty under the laws of the state, it is not a "lucrative office," within the meaning of the Constitution. The office of school trustee is a lucrative one, for the trustee is charged with the performance of duties imposed by state laws, for the performance of which compensation is provided. Chambers v. State, 26 N. E. 893, 127 Ind. 365, 11 L. R. A. 613.

"Lucrative office," within Const. art. 4, § 21, prohibiting the holder of a lucrative office from holding any other office of profit under the state, means an office attached to which is a pecuniary salary. Thus an office to which is annexed a salary of $1,000 per annum is a lucrative office, within the section. Crawford v. Dunbar, 52 Cal. 36, 39.

The term "lucrative office," in Const. art. 4, § 20, providing that no person holding any lucrative office under the United States shall be eligible to any civil office of profit under this state, etc., refers solely to office under the United States. People v. Leonard, 14 Pac. 853, 855, 73 Cal. 230.

The term "lucrative office," in Rev. St. 5095, which prohibits a person holding a lucrative office from being interested, directly or indirectly, in any contract with the state, county, etc., in which he exercises any official jurisdiction, applies to the office of coroner. Baker v. Crook County Com'rs, 59 Pac. 797, 9 Wyo. 51.

The term "lucrative office," in Const. arts. 6, 16, prohibiting persons who hold lucrative offices under authority of the United States from being candidates for any elective office, includes officers of the United States on the retired list, as they constitute a part of the army of the United States, retain the actual rank held by them at the date of their retirement, receive 75 per cent. of the pay of such rank, are subject to trials by court-martial, and may be assigned to duty at the Soldiers' Home. State v. De Gress, 53 Tex. 387, 400.

LUCRATIVE TITLE.

Under the Spanish and Mexican law, property acquired by the husband and wife during the marriage, and whilst living together, whether by onerous or lucrative title, and that acquired by either of them by onerous title, belonged to the community, whilst property acquired by either of them, by lucrative title solely, constituted the separate property of the party making the acquisition. Lucrative title was created by donation, devise, or descent. Scott v. Ward, 13 Cal. 458, 471.

LUCRI CAUSA.

"Lucri causa," or with a view to pecuniary profit, is a term used in the law of larceny to characterize the nature of a taking sufficient to bring the act within the definition of the crime of larceny. State v. Ryan, 12 Nev. 401, 403, 28 Am. Rep. 802.

Eyre, C. D., says: "Larceny is the wrongful taking of the goods with the intent to spoil the owner of them—lucri causa." But Blackstone says the taking must be felonious; that is, done animo furandi, or, as the civil law expresses it, lucri causa. The point arrived at by these two expressions, "animo furandi" and "lucri causa," the meaning of which has been much discussed, seems to be this: that the goods must be taken into possession of the thief with the intention of depriving the owner of his property in them. (Roscoe, Cr. Ev. p. 621.) State v. Slingerland, 7 Pac. 280, 282, 19 Nev. 135.

LUGGAGE.

See, also, "Baggage"; "Personal Luggage."

"Luggage" or "baggage," as applied to a traveler, implies something which he bags up or lugs along with him for his daily comfort and convenience on his journey. McCaffrey v. Canadian Pac. Ry. Co., 24 Am. Law Reg. 175, 178.

Luggage may consist of any articles intended for the use of a passenger while traveling, or for his personal equipment. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 709; Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. v. Zwirtz (Okl.) 73 Pac. 941, 942. Bicycles are declared to be, and are deemed, luggage. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4233. We take it that the term "luggage" is synonymous with "baggage"; the latter being in common use in this country, while the former seems to be almost exclusively used in England. Merchandise or other articles intended for business purposes are not included in the term "baggage." It is impossible to draw any very well defined line as to what is and what is not necessary or ordinary baggage for a traveler. That which one traveler would consider indispensable would be deemed superfluous and unnecessary by another. But the general habits and wants of mankind must be deemed to be in the mind of the carrier when he receives a passenger for conveyance. Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. v. Zwirtz (Okl.) 73 Pac. 941, 942.

"Luggage," as used in a contract whereby a shipowner contracted to carry "10 cubic feet of luggage," meant whatever the passenger might bring with him, of any character, proper to be transported, and was not limited to baggage. Duffy v. Thompson, 4 E. D. Smith, 178, 180.

Merchandise.

The luggage of a passenger, which a carrier is bound to convey, comprises clothing and such articles as a traveler usually carries with him for his personal convenience. Perhaps even a small present, or a book for the journey, might be included in the term; but certainly not merchandise, or materials bought for the purpose of being manufactured and sold at a profit. Great Northern Ry. Co. v. Shepherd, 8 Exch. 30, 37 (citing Angell, Carriers, § 115; Story, Bailments, 526).

LUMBER.

"Lumber" is a word of doubtful or indefinite signification, and includes any timber sawed or split for use. It would include hemlock or hardwood lumber as well as pine. Williams v. Stevens Point Lumber Co., 40 N. W. 154, 155, 72 Wis. 487.

A contract providing that one of the parties should deliver the lumber in good order along the trackway on which lumber is delivered means the manufactured product of the logs. Dutch v. Anderson, 75 Ind. 35, 40.

The word "lumber" is used in the article relating to floating lumber to designate all timber, whether in logs, boards, planks, or beams, or whether in rafts or otherwise, but does not include the sort of wood commonly called "driftwood." Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 2389.

The term "lumber," as used in the chapter relating to liens upon logs and other timber, shall be held and be construed to mean all logs or other timber sawed or split for use, including beams, joists, planks, boards, shingles, laths, staves, hoops, and every article of whatsoever nature or description manufactured from saw logs or other timber. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 5931.

The word "lumber," as used in a contract for the sale of lumber, where there is no opportunity for examination by the vendee, means merchantable lumber. Merriam v. Fields, 39 Wis. 578, 582.

Building material.

Lumber is timber sawed or split for use in building, and is material essential for building any kind of a house ordinarily used for business or by families. It is included within the term "building material." Ward v. Kadel, 38 Ark. 174, 180.

"Lumber," as used in an assignment of a mortgage, which mortgage covered lumber and building material in a certain lot, will be held to include lumber which is sawed in proper widths and lengths for certain work, though such lumber is sometimes called "building material." Lawrence v. Comstock, 82 N. W. 808, 809, 124 Mich. 120.

Fence posts.

Under Laws 1893, p. 428, § 2, relating to liens for performing work or labor in manufacturing logs into lumber, and defining the term "lumber" as meaning all logs or other timber sawed or split for use, including beams, joists, planks, boards, shingles, laths, staves, hoops, and every article of whatsoever nature or description manufactured from saw logs or other timber, "lumber" will be held to include fence posts. Ryan v. Gullfoil, 43 Pac. 351, 352, 13 Wash. 373.

Lath.

The term "lumber," as used in Acts 1862, c. 154, providing for a lien on logs and timber for labor and services performed thereon, means the body, stem, or trunk of a tree, or the larger pieces or sticks of wood which enter the framework of a building or other structure, but does not include laths. Babka v. Eldred, 2 N. W. 102, 103, 47 Wis. 189.

Pulp wood and shingle bolts.

Poplar lumber for pulp is poplar cut into logs of four feet in length, for the principal purpose of being manufactured into pulp. It must be peeled before it can be thus manufactured, in order to fit it for manufacture. Therefore peeling is an incident necessary to it as pulp lumber. And in a statute giving a lien on the lumber for the cutting thereof, the amount due under a contract for cutting and peeling such lumber may be secured by such lien. Bondur v. Le Bourne, 79 Me. 21, 7 Atl. 814.

Under a statute giving a lien to all persons performing work in manufacturing saw logs or other timber into lumber and shingles, and defining lumber to be "all logs or other timber sawed or split for use, and every article of whatsoever make or description manufactured from saw logs or other timber," shingle bolts prepared to be cut into shingles are lumber, and one preparing such bolts is entitled to a lien thereon. Hadlock v. Shumway, 11 Wash. 690, 40 Pac. 346.

Shingles.

In Rev. St. § 3341, which gives a lien on lumber to any person performing manual labor thereon, for or on account of the owner, agent, or assignee, "lumber" includes shingles. Gross v. Eidel, 11 N. W. 9, 10, 53 Wis. 543.

"Lumber," as used in a fire insurance policy on lumber, laths, and pickets, must be understood in its more restricted sense of sawed boards or logs, though, if it had been used alone, it would have included other items, as it would have been understood then in its broadest acceptance. It is not consistent with the enumeration contained in the policy that the term "lumber" should include shingles. West Branch Lumberman's Exch. v. American Cent. Ins. Co., 38 Atl. 1081, 1083, 183 Pa. 366.

LUMBER DEALER.

A lumber dealer is one who habitually deals in lumber, and the mere fact that a merchant in a country town may sometimes, as occasion requires, take lumber or shingles, or anything else, in exchange for goods kept by him for sale, does not make him a lumber dealer, within Laws 1899, c. 11, § 58, imposing a license tax on lumber dealers. State v. Barnes, 35 S. E. 605, 606, 126 N. C. 1063.

LUMBER WAGON.

"Lumber wagon" is a term generally applied to an ordinary double wagon used by farmers, and is sufficiently definite as a description in a chattel mortgage. Jordan v. Hamilton County Bank, 9 N. W. 654, 655, 11 Neb. 499; Rawlins v. Kennard, 41 N. W. 1004, 1005, 26 Neb. 181.

LUMP COAL

Coal is passed through several screens, and prepared by so doing in several sizes

Lump coal is coal not so prepared. Wright v. Warrior Run Coal Co., 38 Atl. 491, 493, 182 Pa. 514.

LUMP WORK.

Lump work is the same as job work. Dixon v. Cory, 3 N. J. Law (2 Penning.) 1043, 1044.

LUMPERS.

Lumpers are men who erect a staging around the exterior hull of a vessel placed in a dry dock for the purpose of repairs, grave the vessel, and put on the felting, if necessary, and run the metal. Butler v. Townsend, 126 N. Y. 103, 107, 26 N. E. 1017.

LUMPING SALE.

The term "lumping sale," as applied to sales under execution, means a sale in mass, or where several distinct parcels of real estate or several articles of personal property are sold together for a single gross sum. Anniston Pipeworks v. Williams, 18 South. 111, 113, 106 Ala. 324, 54 Am. St. Rep. 51.

LUNACY.

See "Commission of Lunacy"; "Inquest of Lunacy."

"Lunacy" is that condition or habit in which the mind is directed by the will, but is wholly or partially misguided or erroneously governed by it, or it is the impairment of any one or more of the faculties of the mind, accompanied with or inducing a defect in the comparing faculties. For, as has been observed by a great philosopher, those who either perceive but dully, or retain the ideas that come into their minds but ill, who cannot readily excite or compound them, will have little matter to think on. Those who cannot distinguish, compare, and abstract, would hardly be able to understand and make use of language; or judge or reason to any tolerable degree; but only a little and imperfectly about things present and very familiar to their senses. Owing's Case (Md.) 1 Bland, 370, 386, 17 Am. Dec. 311.

The term "lunacy" includes both mania and dementia. In re Vanauken, 10 N. J. Eq. (2 Stockt.) 186, 193.

The term "lunacy" includes every kind of unsoundness of mind except idiocy. Laws N. Y. 1892, c. 677, § 7; In re Clark, 67 N. E. 212, 175 N. Y. 139; In re Schrodtt, 67 N. Y. Supp. 244, 246, 32 Misc. Rep. 540.

"Lunacy is a total deprivation or suspension of the ordinary powers of the mind. A mere failure of memory and decay and feebleness of intellectual faculties are not evidence of that unsoundness of mind which will justify a jury in finding a man a lunatic." In re Vanauken, 10 N. J. Eq. (2 Stockt.) 186, 195.

Mania synonymous.

"Lunacy" is synonymous with "mania," whether total or partial, permanent or occasional. Thompson v. Thompson (N. Y.) 21 Barb. 107, 128.

Insanity synonymous.

The word "lunacy" was originally used to designate periodical insanity, but it is not confined to that meaning now, and is generally regarded as having the same extent of meaning as the word "insanity." While, then, an idiot or lunatic may be of unsound mind, a person may be of unsound mind, and not be an idiot or lunatic. Smith v. Hickenbottom, 11 N. W. 664, 667, 57 Iowa, 733.

As periodical insanity.

"Lunacy" is periodical madness. Witte v. Gilbert, 7 N. W. 288, 10 Neb. 539.

"Lunacy," in its strictest sense, implies unsoundness of mind; and, except where the inquisition of lunacy finds lucid intervals, the presumption of law is that there are none. Lunacy does not always have its sober intervals. It is not always easily discovered. It is sometimes latent. It frequently is accompanied by cunning, which enables the lunatic for a considerable space of time to make even his friends believe that he enjoys a lucid interval, when in fact he is insane. So, too, when persons are so insane upon some subjects as to be incompetent to transact business understandingly, they may upon other subjects be entirely rational. Lewis v. Jones (N. Y.) 50 Barb. 645, 667.

LUNATIO.

Sir William Blackstone, in the second volume of his Commentaries, p. 304, says a lunatic or non compos mentis is one who had understanding, but, by disease, grief, or other accident, has lost the use of his reason. A lunatic, indeed, is properly one that hath lucid intervals, sometimes enjoying his senses, and sometimes not, and that frequently depending on the change of the moon. But under the general name of "non compos mentis," which Sir Edward Coke says is the most legal name, are comprised not only lunatics, but persons under frenzies, or who lose their intellects by disease; those that grow deaf, dumb, and blind, not being born so, or such, in short, as are judged by the court of chancery incapable of conducting their own affairs. Mr. Fonblanque, in his treatise on Equity, vol. 1, p. 63, note "p," has transcribed the above passage, and observes that he was induced to do so in order to obviate the error into which the learned commentator seems to have fallen in the concluding sentence. He then proceeds by saying that, the rules of judging upon the point of insanity being the same at law and in equity, the courts of chancery cannot assume any kind of discretion upon the subject. Littleton (section 405) speaks of a man of nonsane memory as one who is non compos mentis, upon which Lord Coke, in his commentary (Co. Litt. 246b, 247a), says, "Here Littleton explaineth a man of no sound memory to be non compos mentis. Many times, as here it appeareth, the Latin word explaineth the true sense, and calleth him not 'amens,' 'demens,' 'furiosus,' 'lunaticus,' 'fatuus,' 'stultus,' or the like, for a non compos mentis is the most sure and legal." Now, it is obvious that Lord Coke considered "non compos mentis" not only the legal, but the sure, term, and not "amens," "demens," etc. He also divides non compos mentis into four sorts: (1) An idiot, who from his nativity by a perpetual infirmity is non compos mentis; (2) he that by sickness, grief, or other accident, wholly loseth his memory and understanding; (3) a lunatic who has sometimes his understanding, and sometimes not, and therefore is called non compos mentis as long as he hath not understanding; lastly, he that by his own vicious act for a time depriveth himself of his memory and understanding, as he that is a drunkard. And in Beverly's Case, 4 Coke, 124, a non compos mentis of the second sort is described to be he who was of good and sound memory, and, by the visitation of God, lost it. In re Beaumont (Pa.) 1 Whart. 52, 53, 29 Am. Dec. 33.

"Lunatics," as used in Rev. St. 1873, c. 227, declaring that the town in which a lunatic has a settlement at the time of his commitment to a state lunatic hospital shall be chargeable for the expenses of his support, does not include a person acquitted of homicide by reason of insanity and committed to a state lunatic hospital for life; it being show that at the time of his commitment he was not, and has not at any time since been, an insane person or lunatic, so as to authorize the state to recover for his keeping from the inhabitants of the town in which he had a settlement at the time of his commitment. Gleason v. Inhabitants of West Boylston, 136 Mass. 489, 490.

Weakness or imbecility of mind in the grantor of land does not make him a lunatic, so as to avoid the deed. Odell v. Buck (N. Y.) 21 Wend. 142, 143.

The term "lunatic" includes a person of unsound mind. Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 2.

Unless the context shows that another sense was intended, the word "lunatic" includes every species of mental derangement. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 1536-907.

The word "lunatic" shall include every idiot, non compos, lunatic, and insane and distracted person. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 88, c. 8, § 5, subd. 6; Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1719, c. 131, § 1, subd. 6.

In the construction of statutes the terms "insane person" and "lunatic" include every idiot, non compos, lunatic, and insane person. Rev. St. Fla. 1892, § 1.

The word "lunatic" includes every species of mental deficiency or derangement. Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 2724.

The word "lunatic," as used in an act relating to lunatics and habitual drunkards, shall be construed to mean and include every person of unsound mind, whether he may be such from his nativity, as idiots, or become such from any cause whatever. P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1894, vol. 1, col. 2816, § 16.

The word "lunatic" shall include every idiot, non compos, lunatic, and insane person. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3.

As used in the chapter relating to asylums for the insane, the term "lunatic" includes every species of insanity or mental derangement. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 720; Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 4894.

The term "lunatic" includes all persons of unsound mind. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 62; Civ. Code Ala. 1896, § 1; Cason v. Owens, 28 S. E. 75, 76, 100 Ga. 142.

As insane person other than idiot.

A serious distinction has always been recognized between lunatics and idiots. The one has lucid intervals; the other, no power of mind whatever. The term "lunatic" has broadened to include all insane persons except idiots, as no other distinction seems to be essential. Bicknell v. Spear, 77 N. Y. Supp. 920, 921, 38 Misc. Rep. 389.

The term "lunatic," as used in provisions relating to the annulment of voidable marriages, shall extend to persons of unsound mind, other than idiots. V. S. 1894, § 2668.

The word "lunatic," as used in the chapter relating to insane persons, shall be construed to include every insane person who is not an idiot. Code W. Va. 1899, p. 630, c. 58, § 44.

As person having lucid intervals.

A lunatic is one who has possessed reason, but, through disease, grief or other cause, has lost it. The term is especially applicable to one who has lucid intervals, and may yet, in contemplation of the law, recover his reason. In re Anderson 43 S. E. 649, 650, 132 N. C. 243.

A lunatic or a person non compos mentis has been defined to be one "who hath had understanding, but by disease, grief or other accident, hath lost the use of his reason, sometimes enjoying his senses and sometimes not." Toml. Law Dict. II. 138. Commonwealth v. Haskell (Pa.) 2 Brewst. 491, 496.

A lunatic is a person of any form of unsoundness of mind other than idiocy; mental derangement, with intermittent, strictly periodically intermittent, lucid intervals. Hiett v. Shull, 15 S. E. 143, 147, 36 W. Va. 563.

The return to a writ de lunatico inquirendo recited that the person was a lunatic and of unsound mind, and "does enjoy lucid intervals, so that he is not capable of the government of himself, his lands, tenements, goods, and chattels." It was held that the statement that the person enjoyed lucid intervals was not objectionable, either in form or in fact. Those who are of unsound mind, but with intervals of sanity, require the protection of the courts with regard to their property quite as much as those whose condition is that of continued, unabating insanity, for obviously the contracts of the latter would be far more easily avoided than those of the former. Anciently only those insane persons who enjoyed lucid intervals were regarded as lunatics; the mental disorder being thought to be dependent on the moon, and therefore intermittent. Means, in the writ de lunatico inquirendo, were devised to meet the case of persons of unsound mind who had no lucid intervals, and who consequently were not considered lunatics. In re Hill, 31 N. J. Eq. (4 Stew.) 203.

"Lunatic," as used in Code 1873, § 892, providing that, if real property of any minor or lunatic is sold for taxes, the same may be redeemed within one year after such disability is removed, should not be limited to one who has lucid intervals, but was intended to include insane persons. Hawley v. Griffin (Iowa) 82 N. W. 905, 906.

As person incapable of governing self or affairs.

Under a statute confiding to the court of chancery, without any restriction or limitation, the care and custody of the persons and estates of lunatics, idiots, etc., it is sufficient to give the court jurisdiction if the jury find that the party is mentally incapable of governing himself or managing his affairs. In re Mason (N. Y.) 1 Barb. 436, 441.

"Lunatic," as used in a return to an inquisition in the nature of a writ de lunatico inquirendo that the party is a lunatic, imports such a deprivation of sense as renders the sufferer unfit for self-control, as well as for the management of his affairs. In re Lindsley, 15 Atl. 1, 2, 44 N. J. Eq. (17 Stew.) 564, 6 Am. St. Rep. 913.

An incompetent person, unfit to manage his affairs, is a lunatic, though such infirmity manifests itself in weakness of mind only. In re Wells, 67 N. Y. Supp. 631, 632, 57 App. Div. 5.

The term "lunatic," as used in the chapter relating to lunatics, shall be construed to include idiots, insane and distracted persons, and every person who, by reason of intemperance or any disorder or unsoundness of mind, shall be incapable of managing and caring for his own estate. Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 2968.

As person incapable of making will.

After the death intestate of a husband whose sole distributee was his wife, the latter was declared a lunatic at an inquisition. Act April 1, 1885, was subsequently passed, providing that where a lunatic dies intestate, and possessed of personality derived from an intestate spouse, such property should pass to the next of kin of the person from whom it was derived. Though she lived several years after the act was passed, no one suggested that she make a will, and her guardian and physician testified that she was incapable of making a will. Held, that she was a lunatic, within the meaning of the act, and that the word "lunatic," as so used, denotes a person who has not sufficient mental capacity to make a will. Stratton Claimants v. Morris Claimants, 15 S. W. 87, 89, 89 Tenn. (5 Pickle) 497, 12 L. R. A. 70.

LUNGE.

A statement that a person made a lunge toward another likely means a certain pass or movement towards such person. State v. Biggs, 61 N. W. 417, 418, 93 Iowa, 125.

LYING.

A description in a deed as 70 acres "being and lying in the southwest corner" of a certain section includes the land in an equal square. Walsh's Lessee v. Ringer, 2 Ohio (2 Ham.) 327, 331, 15 Am. Dec. 555.

LYING AT ANCHOR.

"Lying at anchor," as used in Laws 1860, c. 253, providing that wharfage might be charged for every vessel lying at anchor within any slip or basin, does not include a vessel occupying a slip between two piers, and confined to its position only by being fastened to one of those piers and to the bulkhead between them. Walsh v. New York Floating Dry Dock Co. (N. Y.) 8 Daly, 387, 389; Id., 77 N. Y. 448, 453.

A policy insuring a vessel while she was plying certain waters or lying at anchor applies to vessels afloat, unless only temporarily or accidentally aground, ready to move, and usually certain to move if the anchor is lifted, and does not apply to a vessel which was wholly unoccupied, and which was hauled up on the beach, and had holes in the hull to let the water in and out, and at low tide was a mile from the water's edge, although the vessel was held to its place on the beach by a cable and anchor, since the vessel was not in readiness for use, and was not accompanied with that care and oversight which belongs to vessels in use, but was abandoned and deserted, and was not casually or accidentally aground, but was drawn up on the beach to be kept stationary by its weight, and the blocks were withdrawn to prevent floating, and the sole purpose of the cable and anchor was to prevent its shifting position in its bed. Reid v. Lancaster Fire Ins. Co., 90 N. Y. 382, 386.

A vessel driven by steam, head on, at high tide, on the beach, was not lying at anchor, within a policy of insurance covering the vessel while lying at anchor. Reid v. Lancaster Fire Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 19 Hun, 284, 286.

LYING IN WAIT.

Conceal as synonymous, see "Conceal—Concealment."

"Lying in wait, according to Bouvier, is being in ambush for the purpose of murdering another. It implies a hiding or secreting of one's self." State v. Olds, 24 Pac. 394, 403, 19 Or. 397.

To constitute lying in wait, within the meaning of Acts 1829, c. 23, § 1, providing that all murder perpetrated by means of lying in wait shall be murder in the first degree, three things must concur, to wit, waiting, watching, and secrecy. Riley v. State, 28 Tenn. (9 Humph.) 646, 651.

LYING ON.

"Lying on," as used in a will giving to testator's daughter that part of his land lying on the northeast side of a certain road, imports, in law, as well as in fact, that the land extends to and borders upon the boundaries designated in the description. Carson v. Hickman (Del.) 4 Houst. 323, 335.

An allegation of the ownership of property lying on the bay is not to be construed as showing a riparian proprietorship, as the phrase will include lands lying at some distance from the bay, when there is no intervening obstacle or structure. Sullivan v. Moreno, 19 Fla. 200, 223.

LYING UP.

An insurance policy on a vessel declared certain enumerated perils insured against to be those which might occur on said trip or voyage, or while lying up in the port of New York. No mention was made in the policy of a trip or voyage, and a mere permission was given to tow such vessel from place to place in New York Harbor. Held, that a loss occurring while the vessel was being fastened to a pier in the East river, in the city of New York, just after having been towed from her previous berth in the Hudson river, should be deemed to have occurred while the vessel was lying up, within the meaning of the policy. "The meaning of the word 'lying,' as used in the enumeration of the perils, is not necessarily confined to mere inertness of position, joined, as it is, with the preposition 'up,' but embraces the idea of a change from a prior state of activity to one of repose. In this case it meant a cessation of active navigation—making trips or voyages from port to port. The vessel in question did not cease to lie up whenever she was towed from place to place in the harbor, any more than if she lay at the wharf, although, for greater caution, the privilege of towing was expressly reserved. She ceased to be in active service as a vessel capable of being navigated, and was kept as a mere floating warehouse, or receptacle for merchandise, to be towed or transported while afloat by external power, but even then only with the defendant's permission. Dows v. Howard Ins. Co., 28 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Rob.) 473, 481.

LYING WEST AND ADJACENT.

Where a conveyance of land describes a part of the land conveyed as "lying west and adjacent" to a certain tract of land, the quoted phrase is to be construed as merely descriptive, and not amounting to a covenant that the land did lie west and adjacent to that mentioned. Ferguson v. Dent, 3 Mo. 667, 669.

LYNCH LAW.

"Lynch law," as defined by Anderson, is the action of private individuals, organized bodies of men, or disorderly mobs, who, without legal authority, punish, by hanging or otherwise, real or suspected criminals, without trial according to the forms of law. American lexicographers refer the origin of the term to the practice in the seventeenth century of a Virginia farmer named Lynch, who during the War of Independence was presiding justice of the county court of Pittsylvania, Va. The court in that state for the trial of felonies sat at Williamsburg, 200 miles distant. Horse thieves who had established posts from the north, through Virginia, into North Carolina, were frequently arrested and remanded to Williamsburg for trial. Not only was the attendance of witnesses at that distance rendered uncertain, but when they did appear they were sure to be confronted by false witnesses for the outlaws. Moreover, the difficulty of conveying the accused to Williamsburg was increased, and the sitting of the court made uncertain, by the presence of the British under Cornwallis. Accordingly the justices of the county court of Pittsylvania assembled, and Judge Lynch proposed that since, for Pittsylvania, the court at Williamsburg had practically ceased to exist, and, in consequence, heinous crimes went unpunished, the court over which he presided should try all felonies committed in the county; that is to say, the place of trial was to be changed by mere resolution. The plan was adopted, with good results. The thieves were disbanded; many being hanged, which was the lawful penalty. The change of forum was against the words of the law, but justified, Lynch and others held, by the circumstances. Bouvier defines "lynch law" as a common phrase used to express the vengeance of a mob inflicting an injury and committing an outrage upon a person suspected of some offense; and Webster defines "lynch law" thus: "The act or practice by private persons of inflicting punishment for crimes or offenses without due process of law"—all of which definitions seem to concur in defining "lynch law" as something done without the warrant or sanction of law. State v. Aler, 20 S. E. 585, 588, 39 W. Va. 549.

LYNCHING.

Any collection of individuals assembled for any unlawful purpose, intending to do damage or injury to any one, or pretending to exercise correctional power over other persons by violence, and without authority of law, shall be regarded as a mob, and any act of violence exercised by them on the body of any person shall constitute a lynching. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 4426-4.

LYSOL.

Lysol, a liquid substance in which coal tar is the origin of the elements that give it its determining characteristic, the chief use of the article being otherwise than as a medicine, though used as such to a limited and comparatively insignificant extent—is dutiable under the provision in paragraph 15, Schedule A, § 1, c. 11, Tariff Act July 24, 1897, 30 Stat. 152 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1627], for "preparations of coal tar, * * * not medicinal," and not under paragraph 3, Schedule A, § 1, c. 11, of said act (30 Stat. 151 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1627]), covering chemical compounds. United States v. Lehn (U. S.) 124 Fed. 87, 88.

M

M. D.

"The degree of M. D. is something more than a mere honorary title. It is a certificate attesting the fact that the person on whom it has been conferred has successfully mastered the curriculum of study prescribed by the authorities of an institution created by law for the study of medicine, and by law authorized to issue such certificate. It thus has a legal sanction and authority, but it has more, in practical affairs. It introduces its possessor to the confidence and patronage of the public. Its legal character gives it a moral and material credit in the estimation of the world, and makes it thereby a valuable property right, of great pecuniary value." Townshend v. Gray, 19 Atl. 635, 636, 62 Vt. 373, 8 L. R. A. 112.

M. OF GOSPEL

"M. of Gospel," as used after the signature of a person signing a marriage certificate, sufficiently indicates that the person who signed the certificate was a minister of the gospel. Erwin v. English, 23 Atl. 753, 754, 61 Conn. 502.

M. PER CENTUM.

A note containing the following clause, "with interest at the rate of 1 M. per centum," limits the interest on the note to 1 mill per centum. United States v. Hardyman, 38 U. S. (13 Pet.) 176, 178, 10 L. Ed. 113.

MACADAMIZE.

The word "macadamize" has a fixed and definite meaning, and refers not only to the kind of material to be used in covering a street or road, but also the manner in which it is to be laid. It means to cover a street or road by the process introduced by Macadam, which consists of the use of small stones, of a uniform size, consolidated and leveled by heavy rollers. Partridge v. Lucas, 33 Pac. 1082, 1083, 99 Cal. 519.

A "macadamized road" is a technical term well understood by all intelligent road builders and scientific men. Such a road is thus described in the American Encyclopedia: "To form a true macadamized road, the following principles must be fully understood and acted upon: That it is the native soil which actually supports the weight of traffic; that, while this soil is preserved in a dry state, it will carry any weight without sinking, and that it does in fact carry both the road and carriages; that this native soil must be rendered quite dry by a thorough draining from all underwater, and a covering impenetrable to rain must then be placed over it, to preserve it in that dry state; that the thickness of a road should only be regulated by the quantity of material necessary to form such impervious covering, and never by any reference to its own power of carrying weight. This covering or roof of the soil must be made of clean, dry stone, broken into small fragments, each not exceeding six ounces in weight, about the size of a pigeon's egg, which must be so prepared and laid as to unite by its own angles into a firm, compact, impenetrable body. This cannot be effected unless the greatest care be taken that no earth, clay, sand, chalk, or other matter that will hold or conduct water be mixed with the broken stone. A road perfectly made on these principles completely excludes water, and therefore never can be affected by the action of frost. The thickness of the stratum of broken stone should never be less than seven nor more than ten inches, and the surface should be made nearly flat; never having a greater slope from the center to the sides than an inch in every five feet, which will be ample to carry off all the rain." Large, coarse pieces of sandstone, with which to make a road fit for travel, were hauled upon it, and mixed with dirt, and the dirt and stone afterward became worn down smooth. Considerable work was done, digging ditches and throwing up the dirt, to make a solid foundation for the road. It was held that the road was not a macadamized one within a charter authorizing one to collect tolls upon the making of a macadamized road between certain points. State v. Curry, 1 Nev. 251, 252.

Construction of gutter.

Macadamized roads, that they may shed water readily, and thereby prevent the roadbed from sinking in the mud or being thrown up by frost, are generally constructed with a raised center, sloping to each side. It is necessary, in the construction of a good road of this character, that the surface water which it sheds should have an easy and appropriate place in which to flow away. This is the purpose of the gutter constructed on the side of the road, and such a gutter is really a part of the road. Therefore a power to macadamize a road includes the power to trim and gutter it, and the expense thereof may be included, as a part of the macadamizing, in the assessment levied upon the property fronting upon such improvement. McNamara v. Estes, 22 Iowa, 246, 255, 256.

Under St. 1871-72, p. 804 (Act April 1, 1872), authorizing a board of supervisors to order a street to be macadamized and to order any other work to be done which shall be necessary to make and complete the whole or any portion of said street, etc., the board had power, when a street was ordered to be macadamized, to order the construction of rock gutterways. Burk v. Altschul, 6 Pac. 393, 66 Cal. 533.

Curbing.

"Macadamizing," as used in a resolution for the improvement of a street, was held in Beaudry v. Valdez, 32 Cal. 269, 276, not to include curbing. City St. Imp. Co. v. Taylor, 71 Pac. 446, 138 Cal. 364.

Improvement of sidewalk.

An order directing that a street be macadamized meant that the roadway only should be thus improved. That is the usual acceptance of the term "macadamize," when applied to street work, which would not include the improvement of sidewalks. Himmelmann v. Satterlee, 50 Cal. 68, 70.

Representing a certain process of street improvement does not include the curbing of the sidewalks, when macadamizing the streets and curbing the sidewalks are by statute made distinct kinds of improvement. Beaudry v. Valdez, 32 Cal. 269, 276.

As pave.

Macadamizing is one mode of paving, deriving its name from the man who invented that particular mode. Burnham v. City of Chicago, 24 Ill. 496, 500.

The term "macadamizing" applies to the paving of city streets with cobblestones. Such work is paving, within the meaning of the statute giving the city power to pave its streets. Hudekoper v. City of Meadville, 83 Pa. 156, 158.

Power to macadamize a street included a power to pave. State v. District Court of Ramsey County, 22 N. W. 295, 296, 33 Minn. 164.

Macadamizing is not paving, within the meaning of a city ordinance requiring street railways to pay the cost of paving the streets. Leake v. City of Philadelphia, 24 Atl. 351, 353, 150 Pa. 643.

"Macadamizing," as used in Act April 23, 1889 (P. L. 44), authorizing boroughs to require the paving, curbing, and macadamizing of streets, etc., is synonymous with "paving." Macadamizing is regarded as a species of paving. The latter word is more general than the former. As properly understood, a macadamized street is a paved street, but every paved street is not necessarily a macadamized street. According to Webster, "paved" means "to lay or cover with brick or stone, so as to make a level or convenient surface for carriage or foot passengers; to floor with brick or other solid material." The same author defines "macadamizing": "To cover, as a roadway or path, with small, broken stones, so as to form a smooth-laid surface." City of Harrisburg v. Segelbaum, 24 Atl. 1070, 1073, 151 Pa. 172.

MACHETE.

A machete is a heavy knife or cutlass used among Spanish colonists and Spanish-American countries both as a tool and a weapon. It is a large, heavy knife, used as a hatchet to cut their way through thickets, and for various other purposes, and is a weapon sufficient to indicate a military purpose when taken aboard a vessel bound for Cuba during the rebellion with Spain. Wilborg v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 1127, 1129. 163 U. S. 632, 41 L. Ed. 289.

MACHINE.

See "Newly Invented Machine"; "Original Machine"; "Perfect Machine."

Webster's definition of a machine is: "A construction more or less complex, consisting of a combination of moving parts or simple mechanical elements, as wheels, levers, cams, etc., with their supports and connecting framework, calculated to constitute a prime mover, or to receive force and motion from a prime mover or from another machine, and transmit, modify, and apply them to the production of some desired mechanical effect or work," etc. In Chambers' Encyclopedia machines are defined to be instruments interposed between the moving power and the resistance, with a view to change the direction of the force or otherwise modify it. N. K. Fairbank & Co. v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. (U. S.) 66 Fed. 471, 475.

The term "machine" includes every mechanical device or combination of mechanical powers and devices to perform some function to produce a certain effect or result. Pittsburgh Reduction Co. v. Cowles Electric Smelting & Aluminum Co. (U. S.) 55 Fed. 301, 316; Corning v. Burden, 56 U. S. (15 How.) 252, 267, 14 L. Ed. 683; Central Trust Co. v. Sheffield & B. Coal, Iron & Ry. Co. (U. S.) 42 Fed. 106, 110, 9 L. R. A. 67 (citing Piper v. Brown [U. S.] 19 Fed. Cas. 718, 719); Pratt v. Thompson & Taylor Spice Co. (U. S.) 83 Fed. 516, 518; Chicago Sugar Refining Co. v. Charles Pope Glucose Co. (U. S.) 84 Fed. 977, 981, 28 C. C. A. 594.

A machine is a concrete thing, consisting of parts or of certain devices and combination of devices. The principle of a machine is properly defined to be its mode of operation, or that combination of devices which distinguishes it from other machines. A machine is not a principle or an idea. Boyd Power Brake Co. v. Westinghouse, 18

Sup. Ct. 707, 716, 170 U. S. 537, 42 L. Ed. 1136; Burr v. Duryee, 68 U. S. (1 Wall.) 581, 570, 17 L. Ed. 650, 660, 661.

A machine is an instrument composed of one or more of the mechanical powers, and capable, when set in motion, of producing by its own operation certain predetermined physical effects. It differs from all other mechanical instruments, in that its rule of action resides within itself. Frederick R. Stearns & Co. v. Russell, 85 Fed. 218, 225, 29 C. C. A. 121.

A machine is a concrete thing, being an entirety of co-operating elements and agencies. When it consists of a combination of old elements and devices, the leaving out of one of the essential elements of the combination destroys the identity of the combination, and a person cannot be sued as an infringer who uses a machine in which a material part of the combination patent is omitted. Carter Mach. Co. v. Hanes (U. S.) 70 Fed. 859, 868.

"Machine," as used in 1 Stat. 318, providing that any person or persons, having discovered or invented any new machine, etc., may make application for a patent, "includes new combinations as well as new organizations of machinery, and hence there may be a patent for new combinations of machinery to produce certain effects, whether the machines constituting the combination be new or old. In such a case the patent is not for an abstract principle, but for the particular application of the principle which the patentee professes to have made." Wintermute v. Redington (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 367, 370.

Dredgeboat.

A dredgeboat, without power of self-propulsion, and capable of use as a dredging machine only, is a manufacture or machine, within the meaning of Rev. St. § 2505, entitling a manufacture or machine, after exportation from the United States, to be reimported without duty, if returned in the same condition as exported. United States v. Dunbar (U. S.) 67 Fed. 783, 784, 14 C. C. A. 639.

Fixtures.

"Machine," as used in Code, art. 63, § 22, providing that every machine, wharf, and bridge erected, constructed, or repaired within the state shall be subject to a lien in like manner as buildings are, is such a machine as is not an integral part of a building, and has not lost its character as a removable chattel. Stebbins v. Culbreth, 39 Atl. 321, 322, 86 Md. 656.

Acts 1845, § 4, providing that every machine thereafter erected, constructed, or repaired within the city of Baltimore should be subject to a lien in like manner as buildings are made subject, means a fixed or stationary machine, and not a movable machine. The term "machine," as used in the statute, is not extensive enough to embrace all kinds of machines. The word "machine," if to be taken in its most extended signification, means everything which acts by a combination of the mechanical powers, however simple or complex it may be. If the term be understood in its broad sense, it will not only comprehend locomotives, threshing machines, and such like, but all the various machines used in agriculture and commerce, carriages and vehicles in ordinary use, even watches and clocks, and all the machines in domestic use. New England Car Spring Co. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 11 Md. 81, 89, 69 Am. Dec. 181.

Jail.

"Machine," as used in Patent Act 1836, authorizing the grant of patents for any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, does not include jails. Jacobs v. Baker, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 295, 297, 19 L. Ed. 200.

Machinery distinguished.

See "Machinery."

Passenger elevator.

Within the meaning of the mechanics' lien law, subjecting a building to a lien for any machine furnished, an electric passenger elevator will be included; the term "machine" embracing any mechanical contrivance, as the wooden horse with which the Greeks entered Troy; a coach; a bicycle. Lefler v. Forsberg, 1 App. D. C. 36, 41.

Process distinguished.

The term "machine" includes every mechanical device or combination of mechanical powers and devices to perform some function and produce a certain effect or result; but, when the result or effect is produced by chemical action, or by the operation or application of some element or power of nature, or of one substance to another, such modes, methods, or operations are called "processes." A new process is usually the result of discovery; a machine, or invention. MacKay v. Jackman (U. S.) 12 Fed. 615, 618, 20 C. C. A. 466; Piper v. Brown (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 718, 719; Risdon Iron & Locomotive Works v. Medart, 15 Sup. Ct. 745, 749, 158 U. S. 68, 39 L. Ed. 899; Corning v. Burden, 56 U. S. (15 How.) 252, 267, 14 L. Ed. 683 (cited and approved in Pittsburgh Reduction Co. v. Cowles Electric Smelting & Aluminum Co. [U. S.] 55 Fed. 301, 316); In re Weston, 17 App. D. C. 431, 436.

Mr. Justice Bradley said in O'Reilly v. Morse, 56 U. S. (15 How.) 62, 14 L. Ed. 601: "A machine is a thing. A process is an act, or mode of act. The one is visible to the eye—an object of perpetual observation. The other is a conception of the mind, seen only by its effect when being executed or performed. Either may be the means of producing a useful result." Either may be the subject of a patent. Boyden Power Brake Co. v. Westinghouse, 18 Sup. Ct. 707, 728, 170 U. S. 537, 42 L. Ed. 1136. So, also, Tilghman v. Proctor, 102 U. S. 707, 728, 26 L. Ed. 279.

Toy bank.

A machine is a definite combination of definite elements assembled to accomplish a given result, so that a toy bank, having a discharging aperture controlled by a spring latch operated by the weight of the accumulated coins within, is a machine. Card v. Colby (U. S.) 64 Fed. 594, 598, 12 C. C. A. 319.

MACHINE SHOP.

A fire insurance policy on a machine shop cannot be construed to include a building in which organs and melodeons are manufactured. Goddard v. Monitor Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 108 Mass. 56, 58, 11 Am. Rep. 307.

The phrase "machine shop," as employed in a mortgage on a machine shop, includes all the fixed elements of it that give it its peculiar character of a machine shop, including the lathe. Hoskin v. Woodward, 45 Pa. 42, 44.

MACHINERY.

See "Fixed Machinery"; "Water Machinery."

"Machinery" is defined by Webster as the working parts of a machine, engine, or instrument, arranged and constructed so as to apply and regulate force, as the machinery of a watch; the means and appliances by which anything is kept in action. Worcester's definition is, "An artificial work which serves to apply or regulate moving power or to produce motion; an engine; a piece of mechanism." Brewer v. Ford, 12 N. Y. Supp. 619, 624, 59 Hun, 17.

By the Century and by the Standard Dictionaries "machinery" is defined as parts of a machine considered collectively; any construction of mechanical means designed to work together so as to effect a given end. Brower v. Locke, 67 N. E. 1015, 1017, 31 Ind. App. 353.

Bridges, posts, railings.

"Machinery" is defined as parts of machinery considered collectively; as the combination of mechanical means to a given end, such as the machinery of a locomotive or of a canal lock or a watch. The term comprises different mechanical appliances and is more extensive in meaning than "machine." It does not, however, cover railings, posts, bridges, and such things. They are not in any respects part of a machine. Benedict v. City of New Orleans, 11 South. 41, 44 La. Ann. 793.

As building.

See "Building (In Lien Laws)."

Car axle.

A bill of lading exempting the carrier from liability for loss arising from collisions, explosions, and accidents to boilers or machinery, applies only to the group of mechanical parts connected with the boiler and steam supply by which power is generated and applied, and the vessel or train of cars is propelled, and it does not include an axle of one of the cars in the train. N. K. Fairbank & Co. v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. (U. S.) 81 Fed. 289, 291, 26 C. C. A. 402 (reversing [U. S.] 66 Fed. 471).

Fixtures.

As fixtures, see "Fixtures for Manufacturing Purposes."

Wagner's St. pp. 907, 909, §§ 1, 5, authorize a mechanic's lien for the benefit of persons who furnish any materials, fixtures, engines, boilers, or machinery for any building, erection, or improvement on land. Held, that the machinery upon which a mechanic's lien can attach, under such statute, must be such as is used in the erection of a building, and which will, when placed in the building, erection, or improvement, become a fixture and a part of the realty, or at least such as is necessary in the erection of the improvement. Thus no lien could be filed for the furnishing of a carding machine used in the building, but not a part thereof, which did not in any sense become attached to the realty. Graves v. Pierce, 53 Mo. 423, 424.

Gas mains, etc.

"Machinery," as used in St. 1864, c. 208, § 5, relating to the taxation of a gas company if it shall be found that the market value of all the shares or capital stock of such corporation exceeds the value of its real estate and machinery as returned by the assessors of a town or city, should be construed to include the mains and pipes laid down in the streets and elsewhere to distribute the gas among those who are to consume it. "They constitute a part of the machinery by means of which the corporate business is carried on in the same manner as pipes attached to a pump or fire engine for the distribution of water, or wheels in a mill which communicate motion to looms and spindles, or the pipes attached to a steam engine to convey and distribute heat and steam for manufacturing purposes, make a portion of the machinery of the mill in which they are used. In a broad, comprehensive, and legitimate sense, the entire apparatus by which gas is manufactured or distributed for consumption throughout a city or town constitutes one great, integral machine, consisting of retorts, station meters, gas holders, street mains, service pipes, and consumers' meters, all connected and operating together, by means of which the initial, intermediate, and final processes are carried on, from its generation in the retort to its delivery for the use of the consumers." Commonwealth v. Lowell Gaslight Co., 94 Mass. (12 Allen) 75, 76.

Act April 9, 1873, § 1, exempting "machinery in manufactories" from taxation, does not exempt the pipes, lamp posts, and meters of a gas company. Covington Gaslight Co. v. City of Covington, 84 Ky. 94, 96; City of Covington v. Covington Gaslight Co. (Ky.) 2 S. W. 326, 328.

Hammer.

Where a hammer breaks in the hands of an employé, and it is unconnected with mechanical appliances, and is used directly by muscular strength, it is not machinery, within Code, § 3033, creating the presumption of negligence when any person is injured by the running of cars or other machinery of a railroad. Georgia R. & Banking Co. v. Nelms, 83 Ga. 70, 74, 9 S. E. 1049, 20 Am. St. Rep. 308.

"A hammer is a tool or instrument ordinarily used by one man in the performance of manual labor. It may be made an essential part of machinery when intended to be and is operated by means thereof, but, when disconnected from any other mechanical appliances, and operated singly by muscular strength directly applied, such hammer, when used for driving spikes in cross-ties on a railroad, is not machinery, in its most comprehensive signification, or in the meaning of Code 1886, § 2590, subd. 1, providing that an employer is liable for injuries to an employé when the injury is caused by any defect in the machinery used in the business of the master or employer." Georgia Pac. Ry. Co. v. Brooks, 4 South. 289, 291, 84 Ala. 138.

Joint.

A joist which workmen are placing in a building does not come within the term "machinery." Griffiths v. New Jersey & N. Y. R. Co., 25 N. Y. Supp. 812, 5 Misc. Rep. 320.

Lead pipe machine.

Where a partnership owned, among other property, a steam engine, a rolling mill, and a pipe machine, and the contract of dissolution provided that one partner was to "take all the machinery," and to pay certain claims, the term "machinery," though more appropriate to the steam engine and its fixtures, is sufficiently extensive to embrace both the lead pipe machine and the rolling mill. Lowber v. Le Roy, 4 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Sandf.) 202, 217.

Linotypes.

Linotypes, though they are indispensable parts of printing machinery, are not themselves machinery, so as to be exempt from taxation under article 207 of the Constitution. They have not the construction of parts required to constitute machinery. It is said in the brief that the printing machine or press could not be successfully operated without them. The ordinary hammer or the lever may be an essential part of the machinery, but it would not for that reason be machinery. Nicholson v. Board of Assessors, 21 South. 167, 168, 48 La. Ann. 1570.

Machine distinguished.

As the term "machinery" is used in insurance policies insuring machinery, it is not synonymous with "machine," but includes all instruments intended to be operated exclusively by machinery in the business, and which are so operated from time to time. Seavey v. Central Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 111 Mass. 540, 541.

"Machinery" comprises different mechanical appliances, and is more extensive in meaning than "machine." Benedict v. City of New Orleans, 11 South. 41, 44 La. Ann. 793.

Patterns.

A contract between plaintiff and defendant's assignors provided for the sale "of a certain amount of machinery and all patterns pertaining to the lock business. Said machinery shall be the property of the said" plaintiff until paid for. Held, that the word "machinery" included the patterns. Brewer v. Ford, 12 N. Y. Supp. 619, 620, 59 Hun. 17.

Planer and saw in sawmill.

A written application for insurance on a sawmill, in which the property was described as "a boiler, engine, machinery, and belting contained in a certain building," includes a planing machine in the building on the same floor with the machinery proper, but about 25 feet distant, and attached to it by belting, and plainly visible. James River Ins. Co. v. Merritt, 47 Ala. 387.

The saw of a sawmill is a part of the machinery of a sawmill. The power is applied at the wheel, and the saw at the objective point does the work. Without the wheel, no power could be applied; without the saw, the power could do no work. The one is as indispensable as the other. State v. Avery, 44 Vt. 629.

Smokestack.

A declaration asking damages for the removal of a shingle mill outfit, consisting of engine, boiler, belts, and other machinery, should not be construed as limited to actual contrivances with wheels, etc., used in cutting shingles, but should be liberally construed, and, as so construed, would include a smokestack. Wreggitt v. Barnett, 58 N. W. 467, 99 Mich. 477.

Steel bar.

"Machinery," as used in Code, § 1749, subd. 1, authorizing a recovery by a servant for personal injuries caused by any defect in the condition of the machinery used in the business of the master, is not sufficiently broad to cover a steel bar used, among other things, to align the track, and operated by muscular strength applied directly. Clements v. Alabama Great Southern R. Co., 28 South. 643, 645, 127 Ala. 166.

Tools and implements.

A policy of fire insurance upon a paper mill and machinery covers not only the machines, but the tools and implements used therewith for the manufacture of paper. Buchanan v. Exchange Fire Ins. Co., 61 N. Y. 26, 34.

"Machinery," as used in policies of insurance insuring machinery, is not synonymous with "machine," but includes all instruments intended to be operated exclusively by machinery in the business of the assured, and which are so operated from time to time in the regular and ordinary prosecution of the business described or referred to in the policy. As used in a policy of insurance on an engine and machinery used for the manufacture of tinware, it would include dies of iron or steel used to give form to various utensils manufactured by the assured, though all of such dies were not in actual use at the time of the loss. Seavey v. Central Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 111 Mass. 540, 541.

Under a statute giving to one who furnishes any material, machinery, or fixtures for any improvement on land a lien on such improvement and the land on which it is situated, there is no lien for wrenches or belting furnished, in no way attached to the real estate, or a necessary part of the machinery which is thus attached. Meek v. Parker, 63 Ark. 367, 369, 38 S. W. 900, 58 Am. St. Rep. 119.

MACHINERY ADAPTED TO THE CONSTRUCTION OF FIREARMS.

A corporate authority to manufacture firearms and other implements of war, applicable to the use of firearms and all kinds of "machinery adapted to the construction thereof," does not include a power to manufacture and deliver circular railroad locks. Whitney Arms Co. v. Barlow, 38 N. Y. Super. Ct. (6 Jones & S.) 554, 563.

MACHINIST.

A machinist is a constructor of machines, or one skilled in their construction. The word is not descriptive of a dealer in machinery and implements, so that an insurance policy covering machines used in his business as a machinist does not cover machinery, tools, and implements carried in stock for sale. Michel v. American Cent. Ins. Co., 44 N. Y. Supp. 832, 835, 17 App. Div. 87.

A machinist, according to Webster, is a constructor of machines and engines, or one well versed in the principles of machines. Though a corporation cannot answer to the latter of these two definitions, it can to the former—not, it is true, in a strict sense, but in a general sense. A corporation, considered in itself, can construct nothing, can do nothing. It is in fact a myth, a fiction, and has no existence but in the imagination of the law. It may be a carrier, a banker, a manufacturer, and an insurer. By itself it can do nothing, but by its employes it can transport goods, sign a bank note, or execute a policy of insurance. Through the like instrumentalities it can construct machines and repair machinery, and therefore is a machinist, within Irwin's Code, § 1966, giving a machinist repairing or furnishing machinery a lien therefor. Loudon v. Coleman, 59 Ga. 653, 655.

MAD POINT.

The term "mad point" is used to designate the idea or object upon which the derangement of the mental faculties of one suffering with monomania is confined. In re Owing's Case (Md.) 1 Bland, 370, 388, 17 Am. Dec. 311.

MADE.

See "Duly Made"; "Legally Made."
See, also, "Make."

Completion imported.

In the statutory proviso that an act shall not affect any contracts heretofore made, the word "made" contemplates the completion of the contract, so that it is not made while anything yet remains to be done to give it legal efficacy. United States Sav. & Loan Co. v. Miller (Tenn.) 47 S. W. 17, 24.

Delivery imported.

It has been held that the averment, "he made the bill," when used in reference to the drawer of a bill of exchange, imports the delivery of the bill to the payee. Churchill

v. Gardner, 7 Term R. 596; Higgins v. Bullock, 66 Ill. 37, 39.

The term "made and executed," as often used, means a completion of the transaction to which it refers, and, when applied to a written instrument, imports not only the signing and acknowledgment thereof, but also a delivery of the same. Elbring v. Mulen, 38 Pac. 404, 405, 4 Idaho, 199.

If a note was never delivered by the maker to the payee, it is incorrect to say that he made his note, whereby he promised to pay, etc., for, in common parlance, "made" implies doing everything necessary to render it a valued instrument. Burbank v. French, 12 Wis. 376, 378.

An allegation in a complaint on a note that defendant made his note should be construed to import delivery, which is one of the essential elements of the complete making of a note. Chappell v. Bissell (N. Y.) 10 How. Prac. 274; Sawyer v. Warner (N. Y.) 15 Barb. 282, 285.

As executed.

"Made," as used in a mortgage which provides that it is agreed between the parties that the notes described therein and the mortgage shall be governed and construed by and under the laws of the state of Alabama, "where the same is made," means executed. Farrior v. New England Mortg. Sec. Co., 7 South. 200, 88 Ala. 275.

In Comp. St. c. 6, § 1, providing that no voluntary assignments for the benefit of creditors hereafter made shall be valid, unless the same be made in conformity to the terms of this act, "made" will be construed to mean executed. Sager v. Summers, 68 N. W. 614, 615, 49 Neb. 459.

"Made," as used in a pleading alleging that defendants made an obligation in writing, will be held to mean executed, since "execute" is defined to mean make. Hazelet v. Holt County, 71 N. W. 717, 51 Neb. 716.

The use of the word "made" in a complaint alleging that defendant made and delivered to plaintiff his promissory note, etc., is a sufficient allegation of execution, without averring a delivery. Keteltas v. Myers, 19 N. W. 231, 233.

The word "made," used in speaking of a contract being made, means that the contract has been executed by both parties, so as to become binding upon them. Holder v. Aultman, Miller & Co., 18 Sup. Ct. 269, 272, 169 U. S. 81, 42 L. Ed. 669.

An allegation in the petition that certain parties made and entered into a certain contract is a sufficient allegation of the execution thereof, "for that is the only manner in which a written contract can be made and entered into." Limerick v. Barrett, 43 Pac. 853, 3 Kan. App. 573.

Where a bond was written in California, and signed by one of the obligors there, and the money was then loaned, and the bond was sent to the obligor, in Nevada, who signed it, and then sent it to the obligee, in California, the instrument was completed and took effect at the time it left the hands of the party who last executed it and sent it to the obligee, and was therefore made in Nevada, within the meaning of the statute of limitations of that state applying to instruments "obtained, executed, or made out of the state of Nevada." Alcalda v. Morales, 3 Nev. 132, 136.

The use of the word "made" in a declaration of assumpsit on a promissory note, reciting that it was made on a certain date, and was payable in a certain time after date, is a sufficient allegation that the note bore date on the date recited as the day on which it was made. Robinson v. Grandy, 50 Vt. 122.

MADE LAND.

"Made land" is a term applied to land reclaimed from the waters of a lake by filling out into the lake. Carli v. Stillwater St. Ry. & Transfer Co., 10 N. W. 205, 207, 28 Minn. 373, 41 Am. Rep. 290.

MADE TO APPEAR.

"Made to appear," as used in Act Cong. March 3, 1887, c. 373, 24 Stat. 552 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 508], providing for the removal of a suit from a state court to the circuit court of the United States when it shall be made to appear to the circuit court that, from prejudice or influence, the party will not be able to obtain justice in such state court, imports a duty on the part of the circuit court to investigate or examine the fact on which an alleged inability to obtain justice in a state court must rest. It requires the court to receive evidence on the point by affidavits, or by depositions, or by means of an oral examination of witnesses in its presence. The simple affidavit of the party, stating in general terms the existence of such prejudice and its effect, should not be accepted as sufficient evidence of the fact. Malone v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (U. S.) 35 Fed. 625, 626.

MADE UP.

A railroad train is said to be made up when the cars are coupled together, and the train is completed, ready to start out on a trip over the road. Union Stockyards Co. v. Conoyer, 59 N. W. 950, 954, 41 Neb. 617.

MADMAN.

Locke defined a madman to be one who reasoned correctly from false premises, but that would embrace a very large class who are commonly supposed to be sane. Francke v. His Wife, 29 La. Ann. 302, 303.

Madmen differ from idiots, in that madmen put wrong ideas together, and so make wrong propositions, but argue and reason right from them, but idiots make very few or no propositions, and reason scarcely at all. Commonwealth v. Haskell (Pa.) 2 Brewst. 491, 497.

MADNESS.

"Madness," says Sir William Scott, "is a state of mind not easily deducible to correct definition, since it is the disorder of that faculty with which we are little acquainted, for all the study of mankind has made but a very moderate progress in investigating the texture of the mind, even in a sound state. In disease, where it has pleased the Almighty to envelop the subject-matter in the darkness of disease, it will probably always continue so; but the effects of this disordered state are pretty well known. We learn from experience and observation all that we can know, and we see that madness may subsist in various degrees, sometimes slight, as partaking rather of disposition or humour, which will not incapacitate a man from managing his own affairs or making a valid contract. It must be something more than this—something which, if there be any test, is held by the common judgment of mankind to affect his general fitness to be trusted with the management of himself and his own concerns. The degree of proof must be still stronger when a person brings a suit on allegation of his own incapacity, by exposing to view the changes of his mind." And an eminent physician, in "An Inquiry Concerning the Indications of Insanity," observes that "the same intellectual light may be given to all; but in some obscured by a gross organization, and in others, more happily organized, shining forth more brightly. Itself out of reach of physical injury, it works by physical instruments; and the exactness of its operations depends on the growth, maturity, integrity, and vigor of its instruments, which are the brain and nervous system. If the nervous agents of sensation are unfaithful, the mind receives false intelligence, or transmits its orders by imbecile messengers; if the seat of thought, the center of intellectual and moral government, is faultily arranged; the operations of the understanding are impeded and incomplete. Nay, so dependent is the immaterial soul upon the material organs, both for what it receives and what it transmits, that a slight disorder in the circulation of the blood through different portions of the nervous substance can disturb all sensation, all emotion, all relation with the external and the living world; can obstruct attention and comparison; can injure and confound the accumulations in the memory, or modify the suggestions of imagination." In re Owings' Case (Md.) 1 Bland, 370, 384, 17 Am. Dec. 311.

MAGAZINE.

A magazine is a receptacle in which anything is stored; a storehouse; a warehouse. State v. Sprague, 50 S. W. 901, 903, 149 Mo. 409.

MAGISTERIAL PRECINCT.

A justice's precinct or magisterial precinct is a local subdivision of a county, and has no corporate autonomy. Its boundaries are fixed by the county court, and serve to define the territorial jurisdiction of justices of the peace and constables. It generally constitutes an election district, and the county assessment rolls are made out by precincts, as is the case with the wards of cities. The relation of such a precinct to the county, under the law of Kentucky, is substantially that of a ward to a city. While not a autonomous, self-governing body, it is a geographical and semipolitical entity. Breckinridge Co. v. McCracken (U. S.) 61 Fed. 191 194, 9 C. C. A. 442.

MAGISTRATE.

See "Police Magistrate."

A magistrate is a public civil officer invested with some part of the legislative, executive or judicial power given by the Constitution or the law. The President of the United States is chief magistrate of the nation. The Governors are the chief magistrates of their respective states. In a narrower sense, the term only includes inferior judicial officers, such as justices of the peace. Martin v. State, 32 Ark. 124, 127, 128; Childers v. State, 16 S. W. 903, 905, 30 Tex. App. 160, 28 Am. St. Rep. 899.

In an insurance policy providing that the company shall not be liable for damage by fire which shall happen or arise by any person or persons engaged or concerned in notorious resistance to the authority of magistrates, the word "magistrates" means public civil officers. Straus v. Imperial Fire Ins. Co., 6 S. W. 698, 700, 94 Mo. 182, 4 Am. St. Rep. 368.

A magistrate is an officer having power to issue a warrant for the arrest of a person charged with the commission of a crime. Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 1582; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 4607; Code Cr. Proc. S. D. 1903, § 90; Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 807; Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 4690; Comp

Laws Nev. 1900, § 4071; Pen. Code Idaho 1901, § 5220; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 5237.

The term "magistrate," as used in the Penal Code, signifies any judge of the Supreme Court or of the district court, justice of the peace, police magistrate and such other officer or officers as are authorized and empowered to issue warrants for the arrest of persons accused of crime. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 7721; Pen. Code S. D. 1903, § 816.

"Magistrate," as used in the Penal Code, signifies any justice of the peace, judge of probate court, mayor of an incorporated city or town, and such other officer or officers whose duty it is made by law to examine and punish violations of the public peace. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2694.

The term "magistrate," in the Criminal Code, when not otherwise expressly stated, is used to mean a justice of the peace, probate judge, mayor of a city or incorporated village, or police judge. Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 2378.

The following officers are magistrates: (1) The judges of the Supreme Court, with authority to act as such throughout the state; (2) the judges of the district courts, with authority to act as such throughout the judicial districts for which they are respectively elected; (3) as limited by law directing the place of exercising their jurisdiction and authority, county, city, township, and other justices of the peace, police magistrates, and, when authorized by law, the judges of the county courts, with authority to act as such throughout the counties or the judicial subdivisions in which the county, city, township, or municipality of which they are respectively elected are located. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 7835.

The following persons are magistrates: (1) The justices of the Supreme Court; (2) the judges of any city court; (3) the county judges and special county judges; (4) the city judge of the city of New York and the judges of the court of general sessions in the city and county of New York; (5) the justices of the peace; (6) the police and other special justices appointed or elected in a city, village, or town; (7) the mayors and recorders of cities. But in the city of New York the only magistrates authorized to commit children to institutions are the justices of the Supreme Court, the recorder, city judge of the city of New York, and judges authorized to hold the court of general sessions, and the police justices. Cr. Code N. Y. 1903, § 147; Cr. Code N. Y. 1903, § 959.

Bail commissioner.

The term "magistrate," in any section of these statutes which provides for admitting persons to bail in criminal cases, shall be construed to include a bail commissioner, so far as to give him authority to act in any case of admitting prisoners to bail. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 1832, c. 217, § 80.

Consul.

In construing the term "magistrate" in St. 1783, c. 37, § 4, providing that deeds should be acknowledged before a justice of the peace in this state, or before a justice of the peace or magistrate in some other of the United States, or any other state of kingdom wherein the grantor or vendor may reside, the court says that it is difficult to fix any definite meaning to the word "magistrate." It is a generic term importing a public officer exercising a public authority, but it appears that the act intended to use a term sufficiently broad to indicate a class of officers exercising an authority similar to that of justices of the peace in Massachusetts, or as nearly so as the difference in the forms of government and institutions would permit. There is, says the court, nothing to indicate what kind of magistrate was intended, except the nature of the act to be done, and the connection in which the term was used. The act is a ministerial one, and to be before a justice of the peace or magistrate, it must then be a ministerial officer exercising like powers with those of a justice of the peace in this commonwealth when acting in his ministerial capacity. As a result of this reasoning, it is held that a consul in a foreign country is a magistrate, within the meaning of the act. Scanlan v. Wright, 30 Mass. (13 Pick.) 523, 528, 25 Am. Dec. 344.

Justice of the peace.

In a narrower sense, the term "magistrate" includes inferior judicial officers, such as justices of the peace, etc. Childers v. State, 16 S. W. 903, 905, 30 Tex. App. 160, 28 Am. St. Rep. 899; Martin v. State, 32 Ark. 124, 127.

A justice of the peace is a magistrate; that term being defined by statute as an officer having power to issue a warrant for the arrest of a person charged with a public offense. Ex parte White, 15 Nev. 146, 147, 37 Am. Rep. 466.

A justice of the peace is a magistrate, and, when he sits for the purpose of inquiring into a criminal accusation against any person, he sits, not as a justice, but as a magistrate, and the court which he then holds is an examining court, so that when holding such a court his functions as a magistrate are the same as those of the courts of record when they sit as magistrates to hold an examining trial, and the same rules govern each. Kerry v. State, 17 Tex. App. 178, 181, 50 Am. Rep. 122.

Comp. Laws 1878, § 2301, providing that magistrates have jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine all public offenses, etc., wherein the punishment does not exceed 6 months' imprisonment in a county jail, or a fine in any sum less than $300, or by both, includes justices of the peace. Yearlan v. Spiera, 10 Pac. 609, 613, 4 Utah, 385.

Notary public.

"Magistrate," as used in an insurance policy which required the assured to furnish and annex to the proofs of loss a certificate of a magistrate nearest the place of fire that he has investigated the facts of the case, and that the claim is just and honest, means an inferior judicial officer, as a justice of the peace, and it does not include a notary public. Cayon v. Dwelling House Ins. Co., 32 N. W. 540, 542, 68 Wis. 510.

The word "magistrate," as used in a policy of fire insurance requiring proofs of loss to be made before a magistrate, does not necessarily imply an officer exercising any duties or functions, and might very well be held to embrace notaries and commissioners of deeds, but it is properly used to apply to justices only. Schultz v. Merchants' Ins. Co., 57 Mo. 331, 336.

Police magistrate.

A magistrate is a judicial officer having a summary jurisdiction in matters of a permanent or quasi criminal nature, and is commonly used in the United States to designate two classes of judicial officers—justices of the peace and police justices. A police magistrate of a city in the state of New York is therefore a magistrate, within the meaning of Rev. St. § 5278 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3597], providing that wherever the executive authority of any state or territory demands any person as a fugitive from the justice of the executive authority of any state or territory to which such person has fled, and produces a copy of an indictment found or an affidavit made before a magistrate of any state or territory, etc. Kurtz v. State, 22 Fla. 36, 44, 1 Am. St. Rep. 173.

Laws 1899, c. 632, providing that any female convicted of a misdemeanor by a magistrate may be sentenced, etc., is general, and uses the term "magistrate" in its general sense, and is not applicable to the New York City magistrates, who have no jurisdiction of misdemeanors. People v. State Reformatory, 77 N. Y. Supp. 153, 154, 38 Misc. Rep. 243.

MAGNETIC FIRE BRICK.

Magnetic brick glazed, not known in commerce as fire brick, is not within Tariff Act Aug. 27, 1894, c. 349, § 1, Schedule B, par. 77, 28 Stat. 512, imposing a duty on magnetic fire brick. Fleming v. United States, 124 Fed. 1014.

MAGNETIC HEALING.

Defendant was charged with practicing medicine without a license, and it appeared that he was a magnetic healer. The court, in discussing the question as to whether it was within the authority of the Legislature to discriminate against a particular school of practitioners, said: "We are not judicially advised that 'magnetic healing,' so called, is so far based on co-ordinated, arranged and systematized knowledge that it can be termed a science, or that any considerable degree of instruction is a prerequisite to its prosecution, as it is actually practiced by those whose knowledge does not go beyond the manifestation of the phenomena of magnetism. * * * The Legislature, in judging of a matter of this kind, was authorized to give heed to the opinions of scientific men, and, judged by such authority, it appears that, while the practice of magnetic healing is based on some elements of ascertained knowledge, its prosecution is attended with danger to such a degree that the Legislature was justified in its effort to take it out of the hands of the empirics. Thus J. G. McKendrick, professor of the Institute of Medicine, University of Glasgow, in concluding his learned article on 'Animal Magnetism' in the Encyclopædia Britannica, says: 'It is evident that animal magnetism, or hypnotism, is a peculiar physiological condition excited by perverted action of certain parts of the cerebral nervous organs, and that it is not caused by any occult force emanating from the operator. Whilst all the phenomena cannot be accounted for, owing to the imperfect knowledge we possess of the functions of the brain and chord, enough has been stated to show that, just in proportion as our knowledge has increased has it been possible to give a rational explanation of the phenomena. It is also clear that the perverted condition of the nervous apparatus in hypnotism is of a serious character, and therefore that these experiments should not be performed by ignorant empirics for the sake of gain, or with a view of causing amusement.'" Parks v. State, 64 N. E. 862, 867, 159 Ind. 211.

MAGNETO TRANSMITTER.

A "battery transmitter" is one in which a battery or strong current is utilized for the transmission of speech through a telephone, as distinguished from a "magneto transmitter," in which only a feeble current is generated by induction. It requires a battery current to transmit speech a long distance. American Bell Tel. Co. v. National Tel. Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 119 Fed. 893, 56 C. C. A. 423.

MAIDEN.

The usual and ordinary meaning of "maiden" is not virgin. Webster's and Worcester's Unabridged Dictionaries give as the first definition of "maid" and "maiden" "an unmarried woman." They also give "virgin" as another definition. The first full definition of the word as contained in the Century Dictionary is "a young, unmarried woman; a girl. Specifically, a girl of marriageable age, but applied usually with 'little' or some other qualifying term to a female child of any age above infancy." Richardson's English Dictionary gives these meanings of the word: "A female child; a female who has preserved her chastity; a virgin; a female servant." From these definitions by the foremost lexicographers it results that the common, ordinary meaning of the word "maiden" is a young, unmarried woman or female. The word "maiden" in an indictment for adultery only means an unmarried woman. State v. Shedrick, 38 Atl. 75, 69 Vt. 428.

MAIL

"Mailing," to come within the provision of Rev. St. §§ 5467-5469 [U. S. Comp. St. 901, pp. 3691, 3692], must get into the mail in some of the ordinary ways prescribed by the postal authorities, and become fairly and reasonably a part of the mail matter under the control of the postal department. United States v. Rapp (U. S.) 30 Fed. 818, 822.

As carriage of letters by public authority.

The word "mail" with some changes in the orthography, is found in many languages. In its original signification, it means a wallet, sack, trunk, or bag, and in connection with the post office means the carriage of letters, whether applied to the bag into which they are put, the coach or vehicle by means of which they are transported, or any other means for their carriage and delivery by public authority. The term came originally into use as referring to the valise which postillions or couriers had behind them, and in which they carried letters, at an early period, when that was the mode in which letters were carried and delivered; and after the establishment of post offices, post routes, and post coaches, it became, as it is now, a general word to express the carriage and delivery of letters by public authority. Wynen v. Schappert (N. Y.) 6 Daly, 558, 560.

Under a statute providing that notice of protest of a note for nonpayment may be sent by mail, the mail referred to is the regular legalized mail of the government of the United States. No other mails, as applicable to the states of the Union, were known, none other than could have been intended. The intention of the law makes the law. The Confederate mails or mails of the rebel organization were merely mails so called. The attempt to send a notice by such a mode of conveyance is not sufficient under the statute, unless it appears that it was actually carried. Todd v. Neal's Adm'r, 49 Ala. 266, 274.

As mail matter.

"Mail," as used in Post Office Act March 3, 1825 (4 Stat. 108) § 22, providing for the punishment of any person who steals the mail, or steals out of any mail any letter or packet, has, in general acceptation, both a generic and specific sense. It is employed as embracing the whole body of mailable matter transmitted from office to office, and also the particular packets addressed from and received at different post offices. United States v. Marsells (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1167.

"Mail," as used in Rev. St. § 5469 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3692], relative to robbing the "mail," may mean either the whole body of matter transported by the postal agents, or any letter or package forming a component part of it. United States v. Inabnet (U. S.) 41 Fed. 130, 131.

As receptacle for letters.

"A mail is a portable receptacle in which letters or packets of written or printed sheets are conveyed by post to an appointed station." United States v. Kochersperger (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 803.

The term "mail" means a bag, valise, or portmanteau used in the conveyance of letters, papers, and packages by any person acting under the authority of the postmaster general from one post office to another. Each bag so used is a "mail," of which there may be several in the same vehicle, as the "way mail," the "general mail," the "letter mail," or the "newspaper mail." United States v. Wilson (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 699, 711.

MAIL CARRIER.

See "Carrier of the Mail."

MAIL COACH.

"Johnson defines a mail coach as a coach that carries the mail, so that a mail coach is subject to payment of toll where toll is chargeable against coaches." Cincinnati, L. & S. Turnpike Co. v. Neil, 9 Ohio (9 Ham.) 11, 13.

The term "mail coach" in the toll clause in the charter of a turnpike company providing that for each passage over the company's road of a coach, chariot, or phaeton there shall be paid a toll of 33 cents, but that a "mail coach" may pass for only 6 cents, includes a coach which actually carries the public mail over the road under temporary arrangement fairly made with the Post Office Department, through a deputy postmaster, for the public convenience, and not for the mere purpose of evading the higher rate of toll. Rhode Island & O. Turnpike Soc. v. Harris, 6 R. I. 224, 230.

MAIL CRANE.

In an action for personal injury the court stated that a "mail crane" is an upright post planted close to the railroad track, with an arm, which, when not in use, hangs by the side of the post, but when in use is extended horizontally towards the track, and from which a suspended mail sack may be taken while the train is in motion by means of an iron hook or "mail catcher" attached to the door of the car, and operated by a mail clerk. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Stephenson, 54 S. W. 1086, 1087, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 220; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Gregory, 58 Ill. 272, 275.

MAIL MATTER.

The term "mail matter" in modern statutes in reference to the mails is a term which has grown in modern legislation to be a substitute for the old-fashioned phrase "letters and packets," and is a generic term, which includes all matters which may be transmitted in the mails. United States v. Huggett (U. S.) 40 Fed. 636, 641.

After the voluntary termination of the custody of a letter by the post office or its agents, it ceases to be "mail matter," and becomes the personal property of the addressee, and is under the guardianship of the local law of the jurisdiction in which the addressee lives, and is no longer subject to the laws of the United States. United States v. Parsons (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 451.

A letter or packet, to become part of the mail matter, within Rev. St. §§ 5467, 5469 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 3691, 3692], punishing the stealing of such matter, must get into the mail in some of the ordinary ways provided by the postal authority; and a decoy packet placed in a receptacle for apparently worthless or unmailable matter is not within the meaning of the term. United States v. Rapp, 30 Fed. 818, 820.

MAILABLE MATTER.

See "Nonmailable Matter."

An order for goods, folded and directed as a letter, is "mailable matter," within the meaning of Act Cong. March 3, 1825, § 10, prohibiting any stage coach, railroad car, steamboat, or other vehicle or vessel, or any of the owners, managers, servants, or crews of either, which regularly performs trips on a post route on which the mail is carried, from transporting letters, packages, or other "mailable matter," except such as may have relation to some part of the cargo or to some article at the same time conveyed in a stage or other vehicle. United States v. Bromley, 53 U. S. (12 How.) 88, 95, 13 L. Ed. 905.

MAILED.

A letter is "mailed," within the meaning of the law relating to the giving notice of dishonor of commercial paper, when it is dropped in a street letter box as well as when it is deposited in the post office. Casco Nat. Bank v. Shaw, 10 Atl. 67, 79 Me. 376, 1 Am. St. Rep. 319.

Prepayment of postage.

"Mailed," as applied to a letter, means that the letter was properly prepared for transmission by the service of the postal department, and that it was put in the custody of the officer charged with forwarding the mail, and a notary's certificate of protest "that he personally mailed" notices in the post office on a certain date is not objectionable in not stating that the postage was prepaid, as such would be implied. Pier v. Heinrichshoffen, 67 Mo. 163, 169, 29 Am. Rep. 501 (cited in Rolla State Bank v. Pezoldt, 69 S. W. 51, 53, 95 Mo. App. 404).

The word "mailed" is usually employed to designate the placing of letters or parcels in a post office to be delivered under the public authority, the delivery of which is prohibited unless the postage thereon is prepaid. When the word "mailed" appears as a note or memorandum in the official register of a deceased notary, it is consistent with reason and the actual meaning of the term to presume that it described what that act in its common and ordinary performance calls for. National Butchers' & Drovers' Bank v. De Groot, 43 N. Y. Super. Ct. (11 Jones & S.) 341, 344.

MAIM.

"Maim," as used in Code, § 2678, making it criminal to kill, maim, or disfigure any horse, cattle, etc., implies some permanent injury. State v. Harris, 11 Iowa, 414, 415.

7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 30, § 18, inflicting a penalty for the wounding or "maiming" of an animal, means the infliction of a permanent injury. Regina v. Jeans, 1 Car. & K. 539, 540.

"To maim is to willfully and maliciously cut off or otherwise deprive a person of a hand, arm, finger, toe, foot, leg, nose, or ear, to put out an eye, or in any way to deprive the person of any other member of his body. Pen. Code, art. 509. It is maiming, under such statute, to knock out a front tooth, as it is a member of the body within the meaning of the statute." High v. State, 10 S. W. 238, 241, 26 Tex. App. 545, 8 Am. St. Rep. 488.

Under the statute of Arkansas, defining "maiming" to be unlawfully disabling a human being by depriving him of the use of a limb, or member, or rendering him lame, or defective in bodily vigor, it is implied that the act, being unlawful in itself, evidences a malicious intent; and it is immaterial by what means or with what instrument the injury is effected, or whether the party is deprived of the use of a limb or member, or rendered permanently lame, or whether his bodily vigor is merely affected by his strength, activity, or the like being decreased. Baker v. State, 4 Ark. (4 Pike) 58.

Cripple synonymous.

Pasch. dig. art. 2345, provides that if any person shall willfully maim any dumb animal enumerated in the preceding article he shall be fined, etc. It was held that the word "maim" was there used in the sense of "to cripple"; the court saying: "If we were to go to the common law for the meaning of the word 'maim,' or 'mayhem,' as sometimes written, we would find it difficult to apply it to dumb animals, it being generally applied to rational beings, as men; but the language of the Code, except when a word, term, or phrase is specially defined, is to be taken and construed in the sense in which it is understood in common language. The word 'maim,' as a transitive verb, is defined by Webster, 'to deprive of a necessary part, to cripple, to disable,' 'the privation of any necessary part, a crippling;' and hence the word 'maim,' as applied to dumb animals, is synonymous, or very nearly so, with the word 'cripple.'" Turman v. State, 4 Tex. App. 586, 588.

Mayhem synonymous.

The word "maim" is defined to be the privation of the use of a limb or member of the body, by which one is rendered unable to defend himself or to annoy his adversary. The words "maim" and "mayhem" are at common law equivalent words, and mean the same thing. State v. Johnson, 51 N. E. 40, 58 Ohio St. 417, 65 Am. St. Rep. 769.

Mayhem, at common law, is defined by Blackstone as the violently depriving another of the use of such of his members as may render him less able in fighting either to defend himself or to annoy his adversary. 4 Bl. Comm. 204. The first general comprehensive statute on the subject in England was the statute of Charles II, which enacted that "any person who should on purpose and with malice aforethought, unlawfully cut out or disable the tongue, put out the eye, slit the nose or lip, or cut off or disable any limb or member, or disfigure him in any of the manners with intent to maim or disfigure him, shall be guilty of felony." Since this statute the crime of mayhem includes those injuries only which are therein enumerated. 2 Rev. St. § 36, was intended as a statutory definition of the crime. Under that definition a blow aimed and delivered upon the head cannot constitute the crime of assault and battery with intent to maim. Foster v. People, 50 N. Y. 598, 604.

In a statute declaring that if any person with malice aforethought, and with an intention to maim and disfigure, shall unlawfully cut off an ear of another, he shall be punished, etc., the word "maim" is used in the popular sense of "mutilated," and not as synonymous with the technical word "mayhem." Commonwealth v. Newell, 7 Mass. 245, 249.

MAIN.

The chief or principal part, the main or most important thing. Webst. Dict.

MAIN BRANCH.

The "main branch" of a river is not necessarily that in whose channel water may be found at all seasons of the year at a point farthest removed from its mouth. The largest volume of water is one indication of the main stream. The length of the stream is another. It is obvious that two branches may pursue such a course that the source of the longest may be nearer the mouth of the river than that of the shortest. When France ceded to Great Britain all her pretensions to the country lying east of the Mississippi "from its course to the river Iberville," no man could have been so extravagant as to assert that the source of the Mississippi was to be looked for through all its branches, and fixed at that point in the channel of either in which water might be found farthest removed from the mouth of the river. Where one branch of a small stream has by consent retained the name of the main river in exclusion of others, that branch must be considered, in the absence of other circumstances, as the true boundary intended by the parties in a deed which calls for the stream by its name. Reynolds v. McArthur, 27 U. S. (2 Pet.) 417, 440, 7 L. Ed. 470.

MAIN CHANNEL.

It is difficult to define the "main channel" of a river with precision, but it is sufficient to say that it is that bed of a river over which the principal volume of water flows. The words "main channel" do not mean the habitual course of navigation, though they may be employed in that sense by pilots or other boatmen. Saint Louis & St. P. Packet Co. v. Keokuk & H. Bridge Co. (U. S.) 31 Fed. 755, 757.

Act Cong. June 6, 1836, designating the eastern boundary of Arkansas as the middle of the "main channel" of the Mississippi river, is to be construed as meaning "the point or line along the river bed equidistant from the permanent and defined banks of the ascertained channel on either side." It does not mean the line of deepest water sought by boatmen, which is the meaning attached to the word by boatmen. Cessill v. State, 40 Ark. 501, 504.

"Main channel," as used in Act Cong. March 3, 1845, admitting Iowa into the Union, and also in the Iowa Constitution, in both of which the eastern boundary of the state of Iowa is declared to be the "middle of the main channel" of the Mississippi river, means middle of the principal channel of the river from bank to bank, and does not refer to the middle of the main navigable channel. Dunleith & D. Bridge Co. v. Dubuque County, 8 N. W. 443, 446, 55 Iowa, 558.

MAIN SEA.

The common-law definition of the "main sea" was that part of the sea lying outside of the fauces terræ or points on the opposite shore sufficiently near to enable persons standing on one shore to distinctly see and discern with the naked eye what is doing on the opposite shore. The water within the fauces terræ, although properly called the sea, or an arm of the sea, is not the main sea within the common-law definition. People v. Board of Sup'rs of Richmond County, 73 N. Y. 393, 396 (citing Fitz. Abridge, Corone, 399; 8 Edw. 2; De Jure Maris, Harg. Tracts, c. 4, p. 10; 2 East, P. C. c. 17, § 10, p. 804; United States v. Grush [U. S.] 26 Fed. Cas. 48); United States v. Rodgers, 14 Sup. Ct. 109, 111, 150 U. S. 249, 37 L. Ed. 1071; United States v. Grush (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 48, 51; People v. Ostego County Sup'rs, 51 N. Y. 401, 406; Baker v. Hoag, 7 N. Y. (3 Seld.) 555, 561, 59 Am. Dec. 431.

The term "main sea" is used to designate that part of the sea which lies not within the body of a country. It is also known as the "ocean," and is distinguished from the "sea," which has been said to include arms or branches of the sea which lie within the fauces terræ, or at least may be within the body of a country. De Lovio v. Bolt (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 418, 428.

The channel of a navigable river cannot be regarded as the main sea, so as to render property sunk there a wreck. Baker v. Hoag (N. Y.) 7 Barb. 113.

MAIN STEM.

The words "main stem," as used in a statute relating to taxation of railroads, etc., is expressly defined to include the roadbed, not exceeding one hundred feet in width, with its rails, sleepers, and depot buildings used for passengers, connected therewith. State Board of Assessors v. Central R. Co., 4 Atl. 578, 609, 48 N. J. Law, 146.

MAINPRISE.

"Mainprise" was the taking or receiving of a person into friendly custody, who otherwise might be committed to prison upon security that he should be forthcoming. In re Wolfe, 3 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 383, 385.

MAINTAIN.

Webster's International Dictionary defines "maintain" to mean to hold or keep in any particular state or condition; to support; to sustain; to uphold; to keep up; to keep possession of; not to surrender; to continue; not to suffer to cease or fall; to bear the expense of. Lucas v. St. Louis & S. Ry. Co., 73 S. W. 589, 591, 174 Mo. 270, 61 L. R. A. 452; Breen v. City of Troy (N. Y.) 41 How. Prac. 475, 479.

In a prosecution under the statute providing that "any free person who, by speaking or writing, shall maintain that owners have not right of property in their slaves, shall be punishable," etc., it is incumbent on the commonwealth to show in the alleged speaking that the defendant denied the right of owners to property in their slaves, and also to show that that denial was maintained by him, which would seem to imply the consideration of an effort made by adducing facts, or proofs, or arguments to verify that denial. Bacon v. Commonwealth (Va.) 7 Grat. 602, 608.

Under Rev. St. § 4947, requiring a county to pay a sheriff his expenses for maintaining persons confined in the county jail, the sheriff is entitled only to the actual expenses which he incurs in maintaining prisoners, including the cost of the materials used for food and for preparing and serving same, but without allowance for his individual services or for profits. Doty v. Sauk County, 67 N. W. 10, 11, 93 Wis. 102.

The term "maintaining highways" in a municipal charter providing that the common council may in each year cause a sum sufficient to pay all the ordinary and necessary expenses of maintaining the city government, including the "maintaining" of the highways of said city, to be raised by taxation, does not include the expense of establishing a grade of an avenue. Webster's Dictionary, which has become, in effect, a law book on questions of construction, defines the word "maintain" as follows: "To hold, preserve, or keep in any particular state or condition; to sustain; not to suffer to fall or decline." Brenn v. City of Troy (N. Y.) 60 Barb. 417, 421.

"Maintaining and sustaining" a railroad means keeping it in repair, supplying it with machinery, and such like acts; and thus a grant of a power to a corporation of "maintaining and sustaining" a railroad does not apply to projects for maintaining its business by schemes and enterprises not contemplated and expressed in clear unambiguous terms by the charter itself. A power of maintaining and sustaining a railroad is included within a corporation grant of the power of laying, building, and making the road. Central R. Co. v. Collins, 40 Ga. 582, 624.

As bear the expense of.

Maintain means to bear the expense of, to support, keep up. Citing Judson v. Blanchard, 4 Conn. 566; Rhodes v. Munnery, 48 Ind. 216, 217; and hence the provision in Const. art. 10, § 6, providing that in cities of the first and second class the public school system shall be maintained and controlled by the board of education apart and separate from the counties in which said cities are located, gives the board of education authority to bear the expense of such system. Merrill v. Spencer, 48 Pac. 1096, 1097, 14 Utah, 273.

As clean.

"Maintain," as used in an ordinance providing that a railroad company shall, at its own expense, furnish, construct, and maintain all necessary conduits and syphons for carrying water through its culverts, etc., does not impose upon it the keeping of the syphons clean and in a sanitary condition, since to maintain is to keep in repair or replace, and a failure to keep them clean in no way impairs their use or impedes the flow of water. City of Denver v. Denver City Cable Ry. Co., 45 Pac. 439, 440, 22 Colo. 565.

As closing gate or fence.

Within a statute requiring railroads to maintain gates at private crossings, such gates are maintained when kept in a reasonably good condition and repair, and the railroad company is not required to keep them closed. Swanson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 81 N. W. 670, 671, 79 Minn. 398, 49 L. R. A. 625.

The word "maintained" in Gen. St. c. 148, § 1, providing that the proprietors of every railroad shall erect and maintain a sufficient fence, etc., "clearly means keep in repair, or keep in the same condition. They are to erect a sufficient fence, and keep it sufficient. They are to make gates, crossings, and other facilities for the owner, and keep them in proper condition for use; but are not liable for killing stock getting into the right of way through gates or bars left open by the adjoining landowner or his servants." Hook v. Worcester & N. R. R. Co., 58 N. H. 251, 252.

As commence an action.

In Comp. St. p. 610, providing that when the death of one is caused by the wrongful act or omission of another the personal representatives of the former may maintain an action against the latter if the former might have maintained an action, had he lived, for an injury caused by the same act or omission, "maintain" means commence, institute, or begin an action. The word "maintain" is used as synonymous with the existence of a cause of action. In its ordinary and general use the word "maintain" means to hold, preserve, or keep in any particular state or condition; to support; to sustain; not to suffer to fall or decline. Boutiller v. The Milwaukee, 8 Minn. 97, 101 (Gil. 72, 76).

Within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 2468, providing that persons transacting business under a designation not showing the names of the persons interested as partners therein shall not "maintain" any action on contracts made in their partnership name until they have filed the certificate prescribed by section 2466, or made publication of it four weeks, the commencement of an action is a part of the maintaining of it, and such action cannot be commenced until the certificate has been so filed and published. Byers v. Bourret, 28 Pac. 61, 64 Cal. 73.

The use of the word "maintain" in a statute (Rev. St. 1875, tit. 19, pt. 15, § 1) providing that replevin may be maintained to recover any goods or chattels wrongfully detained, etc., does not make the act retroactive, although a critical analysis of the word "maintained" would disclose the idea of continuing a life already commenced. Smith v. Lyon, 44 Conn. 175, 179.

Under an act providing that no action shall hereafter be maintained against any city for injury by reason of a defective highway or bridge, etc., it is held that the word "maintain" means "brought," and does not apply to actions instituted prior to the passage of the act. Burbank v. Inhabitants of Auburn, 31 Me. 590, 591.

"Men both in and out of the profession of law often speak of maintaining an action, having reference to one yet to be instituted." Pardee, J., in Smith v. Lyon, 44 Conn. 175, 178. And it is in this sense that the term is used in the statute providing that no action for personal injuries shall be maintained against any railroad company unless written notice of the claim shall have been given to defendant within four months after the alleged negligence. Gumpper v. Waterbury Traction Co., 36 Atl. 806, 68 Conn. 424.

"Maintain," as used in 95 Ohio Laws, 357, § 6, providing that the partnership should not maintain an action upon any contract made with it in their partnership name until having first filed the certificate and made the publication required in the statute, applies to the institution of an action as well as to its continuance; and hence the right to oring an action is prohibited unless the certificate has been filed and the publication thereof has been completed. Kinsey & Co. v. Ohio Southern R. Co., 3 O. C. D. 249, 250.

"Maintain," as used in 91 Ohio Laws, 357, § 6, providing that any person doing business contrary to the provisions of the act should not maintain an action on or on account of any contract made, or transaction had in their partnership name until they have first filed the certificate and made the publication therein required, is synonymous with "begin" or "commence," and is not used in the sense only to carry forward. The word means to begin and prosecute the action to final judgment. Hence an action may not be commenced, notwithstanding the non-compliance with the conditions prescribed, but not pursued to final judgment until such conditions are fulfilled. New Carlisle Bank v. Brown, 5 O. C. D. 94, 95

As continue an action.

"Maintain," as used in a pleading means to support what has already been brought into existence, so that to maintain an action is not the same as to commence an action (Moon v. Durden, 2 Exch. 30); and is so used in St. 1875, 1876, p. 729, providing that a banking corporation shall not maintain or prosecute any action until it complies with the terms of such act. California Sav. & Loan Soc. v. Harris, 43 Pac. 525, 526, 111 Cal. 133.

The word "maintain" signifies literally "to hold by the hand"; hence, in ordinary use, "to uphold; to sustain; to keep up"; while in pleading it is defined to mean "to support what has already been brought into existence"; so that where a foreign corporation began an action before it was authorized it could maintain the same action after a subsequent authorization. Carson-Rand Co. v. Stern, 31 S. W. 772, 773, 129 Mo. 381, 32 L. R. A. 420 (quoting Anderson's Law Dict.).

"Maintain," in pleading, has a distinct technical signification. It signifies to support what has already been brought into existence. Thus a defendant who admits the right of plaintiff to bring, or to bring and up to the last pleading maintain, his action, but relies on matter disabling him from further proceeding, insists that plaintiff ought not by reason of such matter further to maintain his action. A plea in bar of the further maintenance of the action admits the plaintiff to have properly maintained it up to the time of the plea. Moon v. Durden, 2 Welsb., H. & G. 22, 30.

As having control and custody of place.

In St. 1876, No. 33, prohibiting the "keeping and maintaining" of a public resort for the unlawful sale of liquor, the words "keeping and maintaining" are applicable to persons who are co-operating in the process of instituting and administering the establishment, whatever may be the peculiar relation they sustain to it and to each other in rendering such co-operation. State v. Cox, 52 Vt. 471, 474.

Within Rev. St. tit. 6, § 89, which provides that every justice of the peace may, on the complaint of an informing officer, require sureties of the peace and good behavior from any person who shall be guilty of frequenting, "keeping, or maintaining" houses reputed to be houses of bawdy and ill fame, the phrase "keeping and maintaining" implies much more than to live in such a house, as to keep a hotel implies more than to live in one. The controlling head of the hotel keeps it, while the individuals who take their meals and lodge in such hotel and have no other domicile live therein. So the controlling head of a house of ill fame or a house reputed to be a house of ill fame keeps such house. State v. Main, 31 Conn. 572, 574.

"Maintaining a boarding house for infants," as used in Act 1892, c. 318, § 7, requiring a license for the privilege of "maintaining a boarding house for infants," is constituted by a person having in his control and custody at one time more than one infant under the age of two years. Commonwealth v. Johnson, 39 N. E. 349, 162 Mass. 596.

Gen. St. c. 87, § 7, which declares that "whoever keeps or maintains" a common nuisance, shall be liable to punishment, etc., applies either to one who controls the occupation and procures or permits the illegal use, or to one who engages in the illegal use, and thus maintains or aids in maintaining the public nuisance. Hence a clerk or servant who was employed to run a place for the selling of liquors is liable under this section on an indictment for keeping a liquor nuisance. Commonwealth v. Kimball, 105 Mass. 465, 467.

As cultivation.

A contract requiring the defendant to "cultivate and maintain" a hedge in a skillful manner until the same shall be sufficient to turn ordinary stock means maintenance in the nature of cultivation, as plowing, hoeing, trimming, plashing, replanting, etc., and does not mean the building and maintaining of fences on both sides of the hedge to protect it from the casual depredation of roaming cattle. Usher v. Hiatt, 21 Kan. 548, 550.

As referring to future action.

"Maintained," as used in St. 1875, c. 217, authorizing a certain city to take water from a pond, provided that a dam shall be built where it flows into a certain river sufficient in height to retain sufficient water for one year's supply for the city, and that the natural flow of the pond into such river was at all times to be "maintained," refers to a direct provision, and to future action to produce the desired result, as distinguished from noninterference with an existing condition. Nemasket Mills v. City of Taunton, 44 N. E. 609, 166 Mass. 540.

As hold; not regulate.

"Maintain," as used in a charter of a city authorizing it to set up, establish, keep, and maintain ferries, is derived from "maintenir"—to hold in or by the hand—and signifies to hold, preserve, or keep in any particular state or condition; not to lose or surrender; to continue. The words "keep and maintain" cannot be construed to stand consistent with the idea of a mere public authority to pass ordinances in relation to the number and location and management of ferries. Benson v. City of New York (N. Y.) 10 Barb. 223, 235.

As improve.

In Act June 24, 1895, authorizing the organization of park districts, and providing (section 1) that no portion of such park district should be already included in a park district or in a township whose corporate authorities are authorized by law to levy special taxes or special assessments to maintain a public park, "maintain" should be construed in the sense of "improve"; that is, the making of local improvements by special taxation or special assessments for park purposes, since to give the word "maintain" its strict meaning would render that clause of the statute meaningless, there being at the time the act was passed no law in the state authorizing the corporate authorities of townships to levy special taxes or special assessments to maintain public parks. People v. Ennis, 59 N. E. 236, 237, 188 Ill. 530.

As keep in repair.

Const. art. 4, § 31, provided that the Legislature may pass laws providing for the organization of drainage districts, and vest the corporate authorities thereof with power to construct and to maintain levees, drains, and ditches, and to "keep in repair" all drains, ditches, and levees constructed under the laws of this state. It was held that the term "maintain" should be construed to be synonymous with the expression "keep in repair," the use of the words being merely a change of diction, and not of meaning. McChesney v. Village of Hyde Park, 37 N. E. 858, 862, 151 Ill. 634.

A deed containing a covenant requiring a certain passageway to be left open and "maintained" by the abutters in common should be construed to mean maintained in good order for use. Attorney General v. Wil- liams, 2 N. E. 80, 83, 140 Mass. 329, 54 Am. Rep. 468.

The word "maintain" does not mean to provide or construct, but means to keep up; to keep from change; to preserve (Worcester's Dict.); to hold or keep in any particular state or condition; to keep up (Webst. Dict.). In Moon v. Durden, 2 Exch. 21, it was said: "The verb 'to maintain' signifies to support what is already brought into existence." "To repair" means to restore to a sound or good state after decay, injury, dilapidation, or partial destruction. Louisville, N. A. & C. Ry. Co. v. Godman, 4 N. E. 163, 164, 104 Ind. 490. It will thus be seen that "maintenance" and "repair," when applied to a street, practically mean one and the same thing. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co. v. Hezel, 56 S. W. 449, 451, 155 Mo. 391, 48 L. R. A. 285; Verdin v. City of St. Louis, 33 S. W. 480, 494, 131 Mo. 26.

An averment that a railroad failed to maintain certain stockyards is only an averment that they were out of repair. Louisville, N. A. & C. Ry. Co. v. Godman, 4 N. E. 163, 164, 104 Ind. 490.

As operation.

A statute conferring upon municipalities the power to authorize a street railway company to "construct, maintain, and operate" its line in the streets of the municipality merely means the right to operate the line upon the location of its tracks in the street, which right the location of the tracks carried with it by common occupation. Currie v. Atlantic City, 48 Atl. 615, 617, 66 N. J. Law. 140.

Permanence.

In an instruction in an action for injuries caused by falling on an icy sidewalk due to water from a defective pipe on defendant's premises, that, to entitle plaintiff to recover, there must have been a nuisance on the walk due to defendant's neglect; that defendant was bound to construct and maintain the pipe so as not to conduct the water onto the sidewalk and maintain a nuisance—the word "maintain" conveys the notion of such continuance of conditions and mode of working as all would agree that defendant would be bound to know. Davis v. Rich, 62 N. E. 375, 376, 180 Mass. 235.

The proprietor of a building cannot be said to "keep or maintain" a common nuisance, within the meaning of Pub. St. c. 101, § 6, making a building used for the sale of intoxicating liquors a nuisance, on the strength of a single casual sale, made without premeditation in the course of a lawful business. The words "keep or maintain" import a certain degree of permanence. Commonwealth v. Patterson, 138 Mass. 498, 500.

As rebuild or reconstruct.

In Sess. Laws 1895, p. 421, § 26, providing that an annual tax shall be provided to maintain and keep in good condition and repair certain bridges and ferries, the word "maintain" is not broad enough to require a county to rebuild or reconstruct such bridges and ferries which have been destroyed or fallen into decay. Kadderly v. Multnomah County Court, 52 Pac. 515, 516, 32 Or. 560.

"Maintained," as used in 1 Gav. & H. Rev. St. pt. 1, p. 343, c. 62, § 15, providing that partition fences shall be maintained throughout the year equally by both parties, may properly be construed to require a fence to be rebuilt as well as repaired. Rhodes v. Mummery, 48 Ind. 216, 218.

The word "maintain" being equivalent to "repair" in connection with streets, the maintenance and reconstruction of a street are separate and distinct things. Verdin v. City of St. Louis (Mo.) 27 S. W. 447, 451.

Power to remove or sell.

A reservation to the grantor in a deed of the right to keep and maintain a dam cannot be construed to give him a right to remove such dam. Shelby v. Chicago & E. I. R. Co., 32 N. E. 438, 143 Ill. 385.

The word "maintain" in a city charter authorizing a city to construct and maintain waterworks for protection against fires and for furnishing the inhabitants thereof with a supply of pure water for domestic purposes, requires the municipality to maintain the waterworks for public use, and does not authorize it to sell the works. Huron Waterworks Co. v. City of Huron, 62 N. W. 975, 977, 7 S. D. 9, 30 L. R. A. 848, 58 Am. St. Rep. 817.

As support.

"Maintain" means to bear the expense of; to support; to keep up; to supply with what is needed. Alexander v. Parker, 33 N. E. 183, 184, 144 Ill. 355, 19 L. R. A. 187 (citing Webst. Dict.).

MAINTAINABLE.

"Maintainable" is defined by Webster as capable of being maintained, sustainable. Worcester defines it that may be maintained, tenable, that may be supported by argument. As used within Bankr. Act March 2, 1869, declaring that no suit shall be maintainable by or against an assignee in bankruptcy after two years from the time when the cause of action accrued, the words "not maintainable" are employed ex industria, intending to preclude all doubt that might attend an implied construction by inhibiting in express and explicit terms any suit after the prescribed period. This is the special function of the terms "not maintainable." They go beyond the parties, and reach the very jurisdiction of the court, defining it as to subject-matter. McLaughlin v. Upton, 2 Wyo. 32, 45.

MAINTENANCE.

A will bequeathing a "home and maintenance" to a daughter during the time she remains unmarried, the section of the will following such bequest providing that the remainder of the testator's property, both real and personal, of which he might die possessed, after the payment of debts and legacies and the decease of his wife, shall go to certain other children, means a home and maintenance on the premises where testator lived at the time of his death. Parker v. Parker, 126 Mass. 433, 436.

Build or construct distinguished.

"Maintenance," as used in an act incorporating a railroad company, providing that it should be lawful for the company to enter upon and take possession of and use all lands and real estate which might be indispensable for the construction and maintenance of the railroad, has reference to the powers to be exercised after the completion. This is the natural force of the expression. To build or construct a railroad is one thing, to maintain the structure after it is erected or built is another. Moorhead v. Little Miami R. Co., 17 Ohio, 340, 353.

Creation of road system.

"Maintenance," as used in Const. art. 8, § 9, providing that the Legislature may pass local laws for the maintenance of public roads, is not limited in its meaning to the repair and reconstruction of roads already constructed, but has reference to maintaining a system of public roads and highways, and would authorize the passage of a statute creating a road system, or of any laws necessary to provide and keep up a system of highways. Smith v. Grayson County, 44 S. W. 921, 923, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 153.

Establishment of highway.

The use of the word "maintenance" in Const. art. 8, § 9, authorizing the Legislature to pass local laws for the maintenance of public roads and highways, does not limit the Legislature to such laws only for the purpose of maintaining existing law, but had reference to maintaining a system of public roads and highways, which would include all the necessary powers to provide and keep up such a system. The term includes the establishment of a highway. Smith v. Grayson County, 44 S. W. 921, 923, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 153.

As repairs.

"Maintenance," as used in a paving ordinance and contract requiring the contractor to pay the cost of "maintenance" of the streets paved, has not the same meaning as "repairs," so as to conflict with a provision of the charter requiring the work of repairing the streets to be let to the lowest bidder; but the provision requiring maintenance of the streets is imposed as a mere guaranty of the perfection of the work when completed and the duty to preserve from decay and ordinary use, while the work of repairs mentioned by the charter is a restoration of a street already defective from use and decay. Seaboard Nat. Bank v. Woesten, 48 S. W. 939, 944, 147 Mo. 467, 48 L. R. A. 279.

The "maintenance" of a street within the meaning of an ordinance providing for the reconstruction and maintenance of a street for a period of years under one contract practically has the same meaning as the word "repair," and therefore an ordinance in requiring adjoining owners to pay for the construction and maintenance of a street is in violation of St. Louis Charter, art. 6, § 18, providing that the repairs of all streets shall be paid by the city. The word "maintain" does not mean to provide or construct, but means to keep up, to keep from change, to preserve (Worcester Dict.); to hold or keep in any particular state or condition, to keep up (Webster Dict.). In Boon v. Dunden, 2 Exch. 21, it was said the verb "to maintain" signified to support what has already been brought into existence. "To repair" means to restore to a sound or good state after decay, injury, dilapidation, or partial destruction. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co. v. Hezel, 56 S. W. 449, 451, 155 Mo. 391, 48 L. R. A. 285.

MAINTENANCE (Of Persons).

See "Separate Maintenance"; "Suitable Maintenance."

In the statute relating to bastardy, and providing that the father should be liable for the maintenance of the child, maintenance includes the expenses of lying-in or child-bed expenses, such as board, wages, and other charges attendant on nursing the child, and necessary expenditures at the birth of the child, and even after the birth which do not extend beyond the period of sickness consequently resulting from the act of parturition. Judson v. Blanchard, 4 Conn. 557, 566; Comstock v. Weed, 2 Conn. 155, 159.

Within the meaning of a statute giving the court jurisdiction to charge a man with the maintenance of his illegitimate child, the term "maintenance" includes the reasonable cost of supporting the child and the necessary expenses incident to its birth and burial; but does not include the value of services rendered by an attorney for the mother in the bastardy proceedings. Harshman v. Ingwersen, 71 N. W. 980, 981, 52 Neb. 116.

The maintenance which the father of a bastard child must furnish does not include the lying-in expenses of the mother. Commonwealth v. Cole, 5 Mass. 517, 519.

The term "maintenance," as used in Gen. St. c. 17, § 6, relating to bastardy proceedings, must be held to include necessary lying-in expenses. State v. Zeitler, 28 N. W. 501, 502, 35 Minn. 238.

The term "maintenance" in a statute authorizing the institution of bastardy proceedings is broad enough to include the necessary expenses incident to the birth of the child, such as the employment of a nurse, midwife, and physician, and a decent burial of the infant; and, as so construed, the action, being based on the idea of enforcing the father's liability for maintenance, does not abate by the death of the child pending the prosecution. Hanisky v. Kennedy, 56 N. W. 208, 37 Neb. 618.

"Maintenance" is defined to be aid, support, or assistance; the support which one person, who is bound by law to do so, gives to another for his living. Under this definition it is held that where the child is born dead, after the institution of bastardy proceedings, but before the trial, the action abates, on the ground that no judgment for the maintenance of a dead person can be recovered. State v. Beatty, 16 N. W. 149, 61 Iowa, 307.

The word "maintenance" in the statute appropriating money for the maintenance of patients in an insane hospital comprehends expenses incurred for the food, clothing, and care of the inmates, and for repairs to buildings and equipments, such as are necessary to keep the institution up to its original condition; but the appropriation cannot be applied either to the purchase of additional lands, the erection of additional buildings, or the furnishing of equipments thereof. In re Warren Insane Hospital, 3 Pa. Dist. R. 223, 224; Id., 15 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 83, 84.

Comfort synonymous.

See "Comfort."

Education.

The words "support and maintenance," as used in a will directing that the interest accruing on the residue of testator's estate after the death of his wife, or so much thereof as might be necessary, should be applied to the "support and maintenance" of his infant grandchildren during their minority, should be construed to include their proper education at a private school. Patterson v. Read, 9 Atl. 579, 580, 42 N. J. Eq. 621.

The word "maintenance," as used in Rev. St. c. 27, art. 19, providing that the fiscal courts should have power to make provision for the maintenance of the poor, is not limited to mere sustenance or support, such as all supplies of food, clothing, and other conveniences, but authorizes such court to appropriate money towards paying the cost of educational buildings erected by the Orphans' Society of the City of Lexington, which provides for the support and education of a portion of the poor people of that city and the county. Orphan Soc. of Lexington v. Fayette County, 69 Ky. (6 Bush) 413, 415.

Medical attendance.

The term "maintenance" in a statute prohibiting the probate court from allowing a guardian in any case more than the clear income of the estate for the education and maintenance of the ward without authority of an order from that court directing such expenditures to be made, includes necessary medicines and the services of a physician in sickness. Eastland v. Williams' Estate (Tex. Civ. App.) 45 S. W. 412, 415.

As support.

"Maintenance" means sustenance, support by means of supplies of food, clothing, and other conveniences. Wall v. Williams, 93 N. C. 327, 330, 53 Am. Rep. 458; Winthrop Co. v. Clinton, 46 Atl. 435, 437, 196 Pa. 472, 79 Am. St. Rep. 729; Alexander v. Parker, 33 N. E. 183, 184, 144 Ill. 355, 19 L. R. A. 187 (citing Webst. Dict.).

"Support and maintenance," as used in a petition to recover damages for death, which alleges that the plaintiff and children were dependent upon deceased for "support and maintenance," means food, clothing, and shelter. Kearney Electric Light Co. v. Laughlin, 63 N. W. 941, 943, 45 Neb. 390.

"Maintenance," as used in a contract between the council of a borough and a county that all prisoners should be confined in the jail of the county and should receive their "support and maintenance" therein at so much a head, is not fulfilled by supplying such prisoners with room, clothing, bedding and fuel, but to also include salaries of officers and expenses of repairs of the prison, and hence that the borough was not responsible for the latter charges in addition to the agreed compensation. Regina v. Gravesend, 5 El. & Bl. 459, 466.

The term "maintenance" in a statute authorizing the county court to make provision for the maintenance of the poor has been defined to mean sustenance or support by means of supplies of food, clothing, and other conveniences. Per Hardin, dissenting, in Orphan Soc. of Lexington v. Fayette County, 69 Ky. (6 Bush) 413, 421.

MAINTENANCE (Of Suits).

See "Champertry."

"Maintenance is an officious intermeddling in a suit which in no way belongs to one, by maintaining or assisting either party, with money or otherwise, to prosecute or defend it." Spicer v. Jarrett, 61 Tenn. (2 Baxt.) 454, 457; Duke v. Harper, 2 Mo. App. 1, 4 (affirmed in 66 Mo. 51, 37 Am. Rep. 314); Andrews v. Thayer, 30 Wis. 228, 233; Christie v. Sawyer, 44 N. H. 298, 303; Key v. Vattler, 1 Ohio (1 Ham.) 132, 144 (citing 4 Bl. Comm. 134); Thalhimer v. Brinckerhoff (N. Y.) 3 Cow. 623, 625, 15 Am. Dec. 308; Johnston v. Smith's Adm'r, 70 Ala. 108, 118; Vaughan v. Marable, 64 Ala. 60, 66; Davies v. Stowell, 47 N. W. 370, 371, 78 Wis. 334, 10 L. R. A. 190; Joy v. Metcalf, 37 N. E. 671, 161 Mass. 514. The definition of "maintenance" by the Colorado statute is somewhat different, in that it requires such officious intermeddling, by assisting a litigant with money or otherwise, to be done with a view to promote litigation. Casserleigh v. Wood (U. S.) 119 Fed. 308, 312, 56 C. C. A. 212.

"Maintenance" signifies an unlawful taking in hand or upholding of quarrels or sides, to the disturbance or hindrance of common right. Davis v. Settle, 26 S. E. 557, 560, 43 W. Va. 17; Richardson v. Rowland, 40 Conn. 565, 570; Bayard v. McLane (Del.) 3 Har. 139, 208; Gowen v. Nowell, 1 Me. (1 Greenl.) 292, 296; Hovey v. Hobson, 51 Me. 62, 63; Christie v. Sawyer, 44 N. H. 298, 303; Barnes v. Strong, 54 N. C. 100, 103; Waller's Adm'r v. Marks, 38 S. W. 894, 896, 100 Ky. 541; Brown v. Beauchamp, 21 Ky. (5 T. B. Mon.) 413, 415, 17 Am. Dec. 81; Sherley v. Riggs, 30 Tenn. (11 Humph.) 53, 56; Wheeler v. Harrison, 50 Atl. 523, 526, 94 Md. 147; Casserleigh v. Wood, 59 Pac. 1024, 1027, 14 Colo. App. 265. As where one assists another in his pretensions to certain lands, or stirs up quarrels and suits in the country in relation to matters wherein he is in no way concerned, or as where one officiously intermeddles in a suit depending in any such court which no way belongs to him, by assisting either party with money or otherwise. A contract between an heir at law of a testatrix, and certain devisees and legatees under the will, by which the first party agreed to abandon a proposed contest of the will, in consideration of which he was to be paid the amount of a bequest intended to be given to him but omitted from the will by the mistake of the draftsman, is not in violation of the law against maintenance. Waller's Adm'r v. Marks, 100 Ky. 541, 552, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 121, 38 S. W. 894.

At the common law, if a person officiously interfered in a suit in which he had no present or prospective interest, to assist one of the parties against the other, with money or advice, without any authority of law, he was guilty of the crime of maintenance. McIntyre v. Thompson (C. C.) 10 Fed. 531, 532.

"Maintenance is support given to the litigant in any legal proceeding in which the person giving the assistance has no valuable interest, or in which he assists from any improper motive. 2 Whart. Cr. Law (8th Ed.) § 1854. In 2 Bouv. Law Dict. (14th Ed.) 90, it is defined to be a malicious, or at least officious, interference in a suit in which the offender has no interest, to wit, to assist one of the parties against the other, with money or advice, to prosecute or defend the action, without any authority at law. So Mr. Addison involves in the definition the idea of agreeing to assist in the prosecution of a lawsuit in which the party making the agreement is in no wise interested, and in which he has no just or reasonable ground of interference." Gilman v. Jones, 5 South. 785, 788, 87 Ala. 691, 4 L. R. A. 113 (quoting 1 Add. Cont. § 256).

"Maintenance is divided into two classes: First, ruralis, or in the country, as where one assists another in his pretensions to certain lands, or stirs up quarrels and suits in the country, in relation to matters wherein he is in no way concerned. Secondly, curialis, or in a court of justice, as where one officiously intermeddles in a suit depending in any such court, which no way belongs to him, by assisting either party with money, or otherwise, in the prosecution or defense of any such suit. Of this second class of maintenance there are three species: First, where one maintains another in his suit without any contract to have part of the thing in suit, which generally goes under the name of 'maintenance'; secondly, where one maintains one side, to have part of the thing in suit, which is called 'champerty'; thirdly, embracery, as where one attempts to corrupt, or influence, or instruct a jury, or in any way to incline them to be more favorable to the one side or the other, by money, letters, promises, threats, or persuasions, except only by the strength of evidence, and the arguments of counsel in open court at the trial of the cause." Brown v. Beauchamp, 21 Ky. (5 T. B. Mon.) 413, 415, 17 Am. Dec. 81.

Entire want of interest.

If a man have any interest in the subject of the agreement about which suit is to be brought or is depending, this is not maintenance, be the interest ever so remote. Thalhimer v. Brinckerhoff (N. Y.) 3 Cow. 623, 625, 15 Am. Dec. 308.

"Maintenance," strictly speaking, is the assisting another person in a lawsuit without having any privity or concern in the subject. A person is not guilty of maintenance in carrying on a suit in the name of another, or assisting in its prosecution, where he has any legal or equitable interest in the land or subject of controversy. Wickham v. Conklin (N. Y.) 8 Johns. 220, 228.

One who, having an interest in the subject-matter of a suit, buys up the interest of the plaintiff pending suit, and thereafter prosecutes the suit himself, is not guilty of maintenance. Ross v. City of Ft. Wayne (U. S.) 64 Fed. 1006, 1007, 12 O. C. A. 627.

Maintenance, in this country, is where one stirs up quarrels or suits in relation to matters wherein he is in no way concerned. Those who have a reversion expectant on an estate tail, those who have a bare contingency of an interest in the lands in question, which possibly may never come into existence, heirs apparent, or husbands of such heirs, may maintain and give aid without being guilty of the offense. So may those who are bound to warrant the lands in dispute, and those who have an equitable interest or have a common interest, as of a way, etc., by the same title. So, where various persons who were taxed for the support of public worship by a parish of a denomination other than their own executed a bond binding each to defray his proportion of the expense of defending any suit against one of their number for the recovery of such taxes, or of the cost of any other legal mode of resisting the payment thereof, it was held that the parties were not guilty of maintenance. Gowen v. Nowell, 1 Me. (1 Greenl.) 292, 295.

As intentional intermeddling.

The law of maintenance is, in the modern view, confined to cases where a man improperly, and for the purpose of stirring up litigation and strife, encourages others to bring actions or to make defenses which they have no right to make. The gist of the offense is that the intermeddling is unlawful, that it is officious, and in a suit which in no way belongs to the intermeddler. The offense rests in intention, and no intermeddling in suits is regarded as officious if the party, under an honest, though mistaken, belief that he has an interest, interferes for its protection, and not for the purpose of fomenting litigation. Vaughan v. Marable, 64 Ala. 60, 66.

It is evident that wrongful intention is an essential ingredient in the offense of maintenance, since a father may lawfully assist a son in his lawsuit by counsel and his money, and vice versa, and the books mention other cases in which such assistance is not maintenance. Christie v. Sawyer, 44 N. H. 298, 303.

The doctrine of the common law as to maintenance does not apply to persons who either have any legal interest in the suit promoted by them, or who act under the bona fide belief that they have. McCall's Adm'r v. Capehart, 20 Ala. 521, 526.

As a criminal offense.

"Maintenance is strictly prohibited by the common law, as having a manifest tendency to oppression by encouraging and assisting persons to persist in suits which perhaps they would not venture to go on in upon their own bottoms. In Coke's Commentaries upon the Statute of Westminster, 2 Inst. 208, it is also said to be an offense at common law, and he cites Bracton and Fleta to support his position. And he holds it to be malum in se, for the statute was enacted against the King's officers, and they were to be punished at the pleasure of the King by his justices, because they had greater opportunity to do mischief. Russell on Criminal Law also states maintenance, of which champerty is a branch, to be an offense at common law." Thurston v. Percival, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 415, 416.

"All maintenance is strictly forbidden by the common law, from motives of public policy, as having a tendency to oppression by encouraging and assisting persons to persist in suits which they would not otherwise venture upon. For all offenses of this kind the offender is not only liable at common law to an action of maintenance at the suit of the party aggrieved, but also to be indicted as an offender against public justice. 1 Hawkins, P. C. 543. The English common law and statutes against maintenance and champerty had their origin in a very different state of society from that which prevails at the present time either in England or in this country. When this doctrine was established, lords and other large landholders were accustomed to buy up contested claims against each other, or against commoners with whom they were at variance, in order to harass and oppress those in possession. On the other hand, commoners, thinking they had title to land, would convey part of their interest to some powerful Lord, in order through his influence to secure their pretended right. The want of any sufficient written conveyances and records of land titles, and the feudal relation of villein and liege lord, afforded great facilities for the combinations and oppressions which followed this state of things. The power of the nobles became mighty in corrupting the fountains of justice, and subverting the freedom and independence of the judicial tribunals. It was to remedy these evils that the law of maintenance and champerty was introduced." Hovey v. Hobson, 51 Me. 62, 63. See, also, Swett v. Poor, 11 Mass. 549, 554.

Champerty distinguished.

The distinction between "maintenance" and "champerty" seems to be this: that, where there is no agreement to divide the thing in suit, the party intermeddling is guilty of maintenance only; but, where he stipulates to receive part of the thing in suit, he is guilty of champerty. Quigley v. Thompson, 53 Ind. 317, 320; Lytle v. State, 17 Ark. 608, 624; Stotsenburg v. Marks, 79 Ind. 193, 196.

Aiding criminal prosecution.

Where the principal witnesses on the part of the commonwealth contributed sums of money to employ counsel to aid in carrying on the prosecution, they are not guilty of the crime of maintenance, so as to impeach their credit. Maintenance is committed by a person who has no interest or concern in the cause therein instituted, or stirring up one man to sue another, or it may be committed by such a person in supplying money to commence and carry on a suit with which he has no concern. If, however, he should be the guardian or attorney of the plaintiff, he will be excused; or, if he be otherwise interested in the matter, he will be justified. Interest in the cause of action is sufficient to justify his interference, and, if so, it is manifest that maintenance cannot be committed by any one of a community in taking a part in commencing and carrying on a prosecution, in the name of the commonwealth, charging the defendants with a public offense, because he has an interest in bringing to justice all such as have been guilty of a public offense. Every individual of the community may be considered as a plaintiff in such cases. Commonwealth v. Dupuy (Pa.) 1 Brightly, N. P. 44, 45.

Aiding poor man.

It is now held to be the law that any one may lawfully give money to a poor man to enable him to carry on his suit, and that whoever is in any way of kin or of affinity to either of the parties may assist or apply to counsel to assist him, without being guilty of the offense of maintenance. Perine v. Dunn (N. Y.) 3 Johns. Ch. 508-519.

"The law of maintenace, as I understand it, upon the modern constructions, is confined to cases where a man improperly, and for the purpose of stirring up litigation and strife, encourages others either to bring actions or to make defenses which they have no right to make. I do not like to give an opinion upon an abstract case, and therefore am not desirous to consider it, but if a man were to see a poor person in the street oppressed and abused and without the means of obtaining redress, and furnished him with money or employed an attorney to obtain redress for his wrongs, it would require a very strong argument to convince me that that man could be said to be stirring up litigation and strife, and to be guilty of the crime of maintenance. I am not prepared to say that in modern times courts of justice ought to come to that conclusion." Findon v. Parker, 11 Mees & W. 675, 682.

Aiding relative.

It is lawful for a brother to aid his sister in the pursuit of her legal rights, and he does not thereby become liable for the charge of maintenance, or of officiously meddling in an affair which did not concern him. Crowell v. Gleason, 10 Me. (1 Fairf.) 325, 330.

Assigning interest to brother.

An assignment, in consideration of love and affection, by a sister, of her interest in her father's estate to her brother, who has commenced an action against the administrator to recover his distributive share of such estate as an heir, did not come within the denunciation of any of our statutes against champerty or maintenance. Blackerby v. Holton, 35 Ky. (5 Dana) 520, 522.

Buying claims for suit.

The purchase by an attorney, for a very small and inadequate consideration, of a matter in litigation, and for the very purpose of renewing the litigation, the purchase being avowedly made as a matter of speculation, and at a time when this attorney knew from previous disclosures made to him in his character of attorney all the facts on which the foundation of the claim so purchased rested, and which created a belief in his mind that the same could be recovered, cannot be sustained. It is champerty for the unlawful maintenance of a suit, and the contract was therefore unlawful, as well by common law as by statute. Arden v. Patterson (N. Y.) 5 Johns. Ch. 44-48.

Where plaintiff, knowing that certain lands were in the actual occupation of sundry persons who claimed to hold the same by title, and that this possession had continued for nearly 30 years, but believing that the defendants had a paramount, although dormant title, owing to some defect supposed to exist in the title of the occupants, applied to the defendants to purchase their claim and interest, they not being aware that they had any available interest, and bargained with them for a deed and for their power to commence suits for the purpose of removing the occupants, and commenced such suits, such bargain undoubtedly constituted the offense of maintenance, which is odious to the laws and may be punished on indictment. Swett v. Poor, 11 Mass. 549, 554.

MAJORITY.

"The general character of an accused is not what the majority of his neighbors think of him, and therefore a witness to such fact is not required to know what a majority of defendant's neighbors say or think of him, but the only test of his competency is whether he knows the general character of accused among his neighbors or those acquainted with him. The word 'majority' is usually understood in a less comprehensive sense than the word 'general,' and in case of doubtful reputation a bare majority might be sufficient to make the reputation good, when by regular rule it would be equivocal only. On the other hand, a person's position in a community may be so obscure that a very few of his neighbors know anything of him, though his general character may be very circumscribed. To hold that he could not prove his general character except by witnesses who could swear as to what the majority of his neighbors said or thought of him would be to deprive him of the benefit of this species of testimony." Dave v. State, 22 Ala. 23-38.

Laws 1889, c. 174, § 1, providing that a petition for removal of county seat must be signed by not less than 60 per cent. of the whole number voting, the word "majority," used in the second clause of the section, will be construed to mean the majority required by the first clause, or 60 per cent. Slingerland v. Norton, 61 N. W. 322, 323, 59 Minn. 351.

Laws of 1886, c. 368, provided that the board of supervisors of the city of Lockport should be authorized "by a majority vote" to raise by a tax the amount due the city for a water main. It was held that the act was mandatory, and that the board had no discretion as to whether they would perform the duty prescribed. In reaching this conclusion it was said: "The act, being passed to enable the defendant to perform a public duty in discharge of a just claim, is upon well-settled principles entitled to such construction as will give mandatory import to the words used, and impose upon the defendant the duty to exercise the power thus given. People v. Ostego County Sup'rs, 51 N. Y. 401; People v. Livingston County Sup'rs, 68 N. Y. 114. It is contended on the part of the defendant that the words 'by a majority vote of said board,' in the act, fairly indicate and require the conclusion that it was passed merely to remove the disability, and to enable the defendant, when a majority so voted, to make the levy, and that such result was dependent upon the voluntary action of such majority. It is not entirely clear what was the purpose of the insertion of those words in the act. They are an expression of the ordinary methods of proceedings and of producing results of the actions of such bodies. By emphasizing the use of those words in the act, and applying to them their literal import, there might be some difficulty in supporting the position of the relator. But the considerations bearing upon the purpose of the statute, indicated by its title and general provisions, as well as the circumstances leading to its passage, of which the Legislature are presumed to have been fully advised, are such as to require for it the construction which renders its terms mandatory." People v. Niagara County Sup'rs, 1 N. Y. Supp. 460, 462, 49 Hun, 32.

As majority of entire body.

In construing a party rule giving the executive committee of the party the power to fill vacancies on the county ticket by a majority vote of all the executive committee, it was said by the court that it seems clear, taking the whole rule together, that the provision for filling vacancies on the ticket by a "majority of all the executive committee" means, at the least, a majority vote of all the persons who are in fact members of the committee at the time the vacancy is filled. Ordinarily the phrase quoted might not receive such a construction. We have so decided in two cases recently before us, but, of course, the question in every case is, what do the words mean in a particular connection, and under the particular set of circumstances? In general, they mean a majority of a quorum (the quorum being a majority of the whole body), but when the rule provides for a different test, such decisions cease to apply. In re Berlin, 22 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 615, 616.

As majority of those entitled to vote.

"Majority," as used in Const. art. 16, § 1, requiring a majority of the electors to ratify an amendment to the Constitution, means more than half of those qualified to vote at the time the election is held. In re Denny, 59 N. E. 359, 361, 156 Ind. 104, 51 L. R. A. 722.

The expression "majority of legal voters of said county," as used in the constitutional provision requiring submission of questions to voters in the county, does not mean a majority of those voting on the question to be submitted, but a majority of all the legal voters of the county. State v. Lancaster County Com'rs, 6 Neb. 474, 483 (citing In re Linn County Seat, 15 Kan. 500, 530; State ex rel. Dobbins v. Sutterfield, 54 Mo. 391, 396; Braden v. Stumph, 84 Tenn. [16 Lea] 581; Vance v. Austell, 45 Ark. 400).

As majority of legal votes cast.

"Majority," as used in an allegation in an election contest proceedings that the relator received a majority of the votes cast at a certain election, should be construed to mean a majority of the legal votes. Hahn v. Stinson, 3 S. E. 490, 491, 98 N. C. 591.

The phrase "majority of same voting at such election shall have voted therefor," in a statute providing that the purpose for which a certain tax is intended shall be submitted to a vote of the property taxpayers entitled to vote, and the "majority of same voting at such election shall have voted therefor," means that the tax must receive the vote of the majority of the taxpayers who voted at the election, or, in other words, the majority of the legal votes cast at the election. Duperier v. Viator, 35 La. Ann. 957, 961.

The "majority of the persons voting," within the meaning of a statute authorizing a county to issue bonds when a majority of the persons voting at an election called to vote on such a question vote in favor of such issue, means a majority of those rightfully voting. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Jefferson County Com'rs, 17 Kan. 29, 40.

Under a statute providing that, in an election on the question of corporate subscription to a railroad, it should be necessary only that a majority of the legal voters of the municipality voting at such election should vote in favor of the proposed subscription, it was not essential that a majority of all the legal voters should vote, but only that a majority of legal voters voting should vote in favor of the issue. People v. Supervisor and Clerk of Town of Harp, 67 Ill. 62, 64.

As majority of quorum.

A corporate by-law declared that a "majority vote" of the directors should determine the action of that body. Under this by-law, there being thirteen directors in all, seven constituted a majority. The court said: "In treating this subject, Chancellor Kent says: 'There is a distinction taken between a corporate act to be done by a select and definite body, as by a board of directors, and one to be performed by the constituent members. In the latter case a majority of those who appear may act, but in the former a majority of the definite body must be present, and then a majority of the quorum may decide.' Here a majority of the definite body who are present, and a quorum of those present, to wit, six, did act, and they were sufficient for the passage of the resolution. Thus it has been held that, if there are nine directors, five constitute a quorum, and a resolve passed by the majority at a meeting where a least five are present is binding on the company. 1 Mor. Corp. (2d Ed.) § 531, and cases cited. Field, Corp. §§ 238, 239. And it will be presumed that the words 'the majority vote,' as employed in the by-laws, were intended to bear the above-mentioned signification, since that, according to the authorities, is the ordinary import of those words." Foster v. Mullanphy Planing-Mill Co., 4 S. W. 260, 262, 92 Mo. 79.

In construing Const. art. 7, § 7, providing that no county, city, town, etc., shall contract any debt, etc., except for necessary expenses, unless by a vote of the majority of the qualified voters therein, the court said that: "We think that the words 'by a vote of the majority,' as an entirety, cannot be interpreted as equivalent to, 'with the concurrence or with the assent of the majority,' which can be manifested just as each house of the General Assembly is in the habit of giving assent of the body to a law by a majority of a quorum. Where the word 'majority' is used in the statute to define a quorum, the concurrence of the majority is ascertained by a universal rule governing deliberative bodies. Judge Cooley says a simple majority of a quorum is sufficient unless the Constitution establishes some other rule, and where, by the Constitution, a two-thirds or three-fourths vote is made essential to the passage of any particular class of a bill, two-thirds or three-fourths of a quorum will be understood, unless the terms employed properly indicate that this proportion of all the members or of all those elected is intended. Cooley, Const. Lim. marg. p. 141." There is a concurrence of the majority within the meaning of Code, § 707, subd. 10, prohibiting the commissioners from constructing certain bridges except by the concurrence of a majority of the justices of the peace—by the concurrence of a majority of the justices of the peace sitting as an organized body. Cleveland Cotton Mills v. Cleveland County Com'rs, 13 S. E. 271, 273, 108 N. C. 678.

As majority of statutory number.

3 Rev. St. 687, providing that the board of trustees of a railroad's corporation shall not transact any business unless at least "a majority of the vestrymen are present," requires that a majority of the number which the statute requires to compose the board of trustees be present, and not merely a majority of the number to which the body of vestrymen may have been reduced, either by design or accident. Moore v. St. Thomas' Church, 4 Abb. N. C. 51, 54, 55.

As majority of those present and voting.

Priv. & Loc. Laws 1866, c. 411, declares that a "majority of the legal voters" of a school district may determine the amount of money to be levied and collected, at any legally called special or annual meeting of said voters. Held not to require a majority of all the qualified electors of the district in order to levy a tax, but only a majority of those actually present and voting at the meeting. Sanford v. Prentice, 28 Wis. 358, 361.

An act of the Assembly provided for the removal of dead bodies from the burial grounds of religious societies, and directed that no application should be made therefor, "except in pursuance of the wishes of the 'majority' of the members of such society or church, expressed at a church election held for that purpose." Held, that the "majority" meant by the act was a majority of those present and voting at such election. Craig v. First Presbyterian Church of Pittsburgh, 88 Pa. 42, 48, 32 Am. Rep. 417.

Where the board of directors of a corporation, consisting of seven members, met for the purpose of electing a president, and on a ballot being taken five votes were cast, of which one received three and the other two, the two who were candidates for the presidency not voting, the one receiving the three votes was elected. Booker v. Young (Va.) 12 Grat. 303, 307.

It is held that a "majority" of the electors means a majority of those voting, and not a majority of all the qualified electors present and entitled to vote; so that where several illegal voters were permitted to vote at a parish meeting, and many of the legal voters protested against the proceeding and withdrew without voting, but the persons declared to be elected received a majority of the votes of the legal voters who remained and voted, they were duly elected. Inhabitants of First Parish in Sudbury v. Stearns, 38 Mass. (21 Pick.) 148-154.

The term "majority," in a statute requiring the county superintendent of schools to be elected viva voce by a majority of the whole number of directors present, is not satisfied by the election of a superintendent by an affirmative vote of only one-half of the members present, although one of the members refuses to vote, so that there is less than a half of the votes cast in the negative. Commonwealth v. Wickersham, 66 Pa. (16 P. F. Smith) 134, 136.

Under Const. art. 212, providing for a vote of the majority of the property taxpayers in number and value, is meant a majority of the taxpayers actually present and voting at an election. Citizens and Taxpayers of De Soto Parish v. Williams, 21 South. 647, 654, 49 La. Ann. 422, 37 L. R. A. 761.

As majority of those voting.

A "majority" consists of more than one-half of those who vote at a given election, not of those who might have voted but did not vote, for there is no machinery for ascertaining the number of the latter class, and it would be still more difficult to find on what side they should be counted. Schlichter v. Keiter, 27 Atl. 45, 59, 156 Pa. 119, 22 L. R. A. 161.

In a statute providing for the change of a county seat when a majority of the voters of the county shall vote for the change, by the term "majority of voters" is meant a majority of the legal votes cast at that election. People v. Warfield, 20 Ill. (10 Peck) 159, 160, 165.

In an act authorizing a submission of a question of the issuance of bonds to any railroad, and declaring that the subscription for stock might be made if a "majority of the voters" shall decide in favor of taking the stock proposed, the expression "majority of the voters" does not mean a majority of the voters in the county, since what is a majority of the voters in the county at any given time could be determined only by the ballots cast, but the phrase must be construed to mean a majority of the voters in the county who see fit to exercise their privilege of voting. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Davidson County Court, 33 Tenn. (1 Sneed) 637, 693, 62 Am. Dec. 424.

Act III, Feb. 28, 1867, § 14, providing that the supervisor shall subscribe to the capital stock of a railroad, etc., if it shall appear that a majority of the legal voters of any township have voted for subscriptions, etc., the expression "majority of the legal voters" should be construed to mean a majority of all the legal voters of such township voting at such election. St. Joseph Tp. v. Rogers, 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 644, 655, 21 L. Ed. 328.

The term "majority of registered votes," as used in the Act Jan. 28, 1869, providing that the county site of a county may be changed by a majority of registered votes, must be construed to mean a majority of those qualified electors who vote at the election, and not a majority of all who had a right to vote. State v. Sumpter County Com'rs, 19 Fla. 518, 539.

A "majority of the voters of the city or town," as used in Code, § 471, providing that a proposition for the erection of waterworks by a city must be approved by a "majority of the voters of the city," means a majority of the votes cast at an election therefor, and not a majority of all the voters residing in the city or town. Taylor v. McFadden, 50 N. W. 1070, 1071, 84 Iowa, 262.

A "majority" does not mean a majority of all those qualified to vote, but merely a majority of all those voting. Columbia Bottom Levee Co. v. Meier, 39 Mo. 53, 59.

Under a statute providing for calling an election, and declaring that if a majority of the votes shall be for subscription to the stock of a railroad within the county the city, town, or township shall cause the subscription to be made and bonds to be issued therefor, the provision evidently refers to the majority of the votes cast at that election, and not to the majority of the legal voters residing in the district so voting. If such had been the intention, other and very different language would have been employed. Dunnovan v. Green, 57 Ill. 63, 68.

Under a statute providing that it shall be lawful for the commissioners of a town to subscribe for such an amount of stock of a steam ferry company as they shall be authorized to subscribe by a "majority" of the voters of the town, whose sense of subscribing a particular amount shall be previously ascertained by opening a poll for that purpose, at such time and on such notice and in such mode as the commissioners shall direct, all the voters who do not choose to attend at the poll are to be taken as assenting to the result of the election, according to the votes actually polled, and a majority of all the voters of the town is not required, but only a majority of the votes cast. Reiger v. Town of Beaufort Com'rs, 70 N. C. 319, 321.

Although it is the rule that a candidate for office cannot be elected unless he receives a majority of the legal votes cast, it is the theory and practice of our government that a minority of the whole body of qualified electors may elect to an office when a majority of that body refuse or decline to vote for any one for that office. Those of them who are absent from the polls, in theory and practical result are assumed to assent to the action of those who go to the polls; and those who go to the polls, and who do not vote for any candidate for an office, are bound by the result of the action of those who do; and those who go to the polls and who vote for a person for an office, if for any valid reason their votes are as no votes, are also bound by the result of the action of those whose votes are valid and of effect. But where a majority of the electors, through ignorance of the law or the fact, vote for one ineligible to the office, the votes are not nullities; but while they fail to elect, the office cannot be given to the qualified person having the next highest number of votes. People v. Clute, 50 N. Y. 451, 461, 10 Am. Rep. 508.

Where a constitutional provision declared that constitutional amendments, if adopted by the Legislature, should be published for three months immediately preceding the next election for senators and representatives, at which election they should be submitted to the electors for approval, and if a majority of the electors voting at such election adopt the amendments they should become a part of the Constitution, the term "majority," as so used, meant a majority of all the votes cast at such general election, and was not limited to or affected by the number of votes cast at such election for senators or representatives. Tecumseh Nat. Bank v. Saunders, 71 N. W. 779, 781, 51 Neb. 801.

Where an act of the General Assembly gave permission to municipal corporations to allow the sale of refreshments upon any day of the week when authorized by a "majority" of the legal voters of the respective cities, a vote of 5,000 cast for such permission, out of a vote of 13,000 cast for city officers at the election on the same day, is not the vote of the majority, 2,000 votes being cast against such permission. State v. Winkelemer, 35 Mo. 103, 105.

Const. art. 10, § 5, declares that "the Legislature shall provide by general law for township organization under which any county may organize whenever a majority of the legal voters of such county voting at any general election shall so determine." In construing this provision in a case where there were 2,451 legal voters of the county who voted at the general election, and 952 votes were cast in favor of township organization and 601 votes were cast against it, the court said: "I think this provision must be construed according to the plain meaning of the words used, and that the language employed therein is mandatory, and therefore, as the affirmative vote on the question submitted was less than a majority of all the legal voters voting at the general election, the proposition to adopt township organization was defeated. State v. Lancaster County Com'rs, 6 Neb. 474, 484.

A "majority of the electors voting," within the meaning of Const. art. 11, § 6, authorizing towns to reorganize under the general laws relating to municipal corporations whenever a majority of the electors voting at a general election shall so determine, means a majority of all the electors voting at such election, and not merely a majority of those voting on the reorganization proposition. People v. Town of Berkeley, 36 Pac. 591, 593, 102 Cal. 298, 23 L. R. A. 838.

As majority voting on particular issue.

Under the Constitution requiring that a "majority" of the voters shall vote in favor of the removal of a county seat before it may be removed, it is not sufficient merely that a majority of those voting on the question vote in favor of the removal, but a majority of the voters who vote at that election must vote in favor of the removal, or it will not be authorized. People v. Wiant, 48 Ill. 263, 265.

In Const. art. 11, § 1, requiring all laws for removing county seats to be submitted to the electors of the county at the next general election, and to "be adopted by a 'majority' of such electors," the word "majority" means only a majority of the electors present and voting at such election, and does not mean a majority of the electors residing within the county. Taylor v. Taylor, 10 Minn. 107, 126 (Gil. 81, 99); Everett v. Smith, 22 Minn. 53, 54; Bayard v. Klinge, 16 Minn. 249, 254 (Gil. 221, 228).

The term "majority," in a statute providing for the submission of the question at a general election whether a county shall give a bounty for the growing of hedges, and providing that such bounty shall be given if a majority of the votes are for the bounty, means a majority of the votes cast on the question of bounty or no bounty, and does not require a majority of all the votes cast at the election to be in favor of the bounty. Marion County Com'rs v. Winkley, 29 Kan. 86, 40.

"Majority of electors," as used in a legislative act authorizing the trustees of a township to levy a special taxation if a majority of the electors of said township at some regular election shall vote in favor of said levy, means a majority of all the votes cast at such regular election, and not simply a majority of those voting for or against the levy. Enyart v. Trustees of Hanover Tp., 25 Ohio St. 618, 619.

Under Laws 1864, c. 555, which provided that any issue of school bonds must be authorized by a vote of a "majority" of all the inhabitants of any school district entitled to vote, a vote in favor of bonds by the majority of those voting is sufficient to authorize the issue of the bonds, though such majority is less than half of the voters actually present at the meeting. Smith v. Proctor, 29 N. E. 312, 130 N. Y. 319, 14 L. R. A. 403.

As used in Rev. St. 1894, § 4208 (Rev. St. 1881, § 3233), providing for the union of a town and city where the "majority" of the qualified voters shall decide therefor, means a majority of the votes cast for or against the proposition, and not a majority of all the votes cast at the city election, where the proposition was voted on at such election. City of South Bend v. Lewis, 37 N. E. 986, 988, 138 Ind. 512.

Act Feb. 25, 1889, for the establishment of Harney county, declared that at the next general election the question of the location of the county seat shall be submitted to the legal voters of the county, and the place receiving a majority of all the votes cast shall be the permanent county seat of the county. Held, that the words "a majority of all the votes cast" referred to the "place" receiving them, and should be construed as limited to a majority of the votes cast "on the question of the location of the county seat," and not to require a majority of the votes cast on some other question for which votes might have been cast at such election. State v. Grace, 25 Pac. 382, 385, 20 Or. 154.

Act 1886, c. 248, § 7, provides that the voters of a certain county, at the general election, shall determine the question of the adoption of high license, etc. Section 8 gives the act effect, etc., "if a majority of the voters of said county shall determine by their ballots in its favor." Held, "a majority of the voters," as used in section 8, means a majority of all the voters of the county who vote upon this act, and not a majority of the voters of the county voting upon some other subject. Walker v. Oswald, 11 Atl. 711, 715, 68 Md. 146.

In Laws 1886, c. 147, providing for the establishment of a high school in a district "if a majority of all the votes cast shall be in favor of establishing such high school," the term "majority of all the votes cast" means a majority of those cast upon the proposition itself, and not a majority of the number of votes cast at the same election upon any other question. State v. Echols, 20 Pac. 523, 524, 41 Kan. 1.

The "majority of the electors voting" at an election for senator or representatives, which by Const. art. 16, § 1, is necessary to the adoption of a constitutional amendment, means a majority of all the votes cast at such election, instead of a majority voting for the amendment. State v. Foraker, 23 N. E. 491, 46 Ohio St. 677, 6 L. R. A. 422.

The term "majority of the electors voting at such election," in Const. art. 15, § 1, providing for the submission of constitutional amendments at certain elections for senators and representatives, and the adoption thereof by a majority of the electors voting at such election, means the majority of all the votes cast in the state at that election for senators and representatives. State v. Babcock, 22 N. W. 372, 17 Neb. 188.

The phrase in Const. art. 17, § 1, requiring a "majority of all qualified voters who vote" at elections in which constitutional amendments are submitted, to vote in favor of such amendment in order to pass it, means a majority not only of those who vote on the amendment, but of all those who deposit ballots at that election for any purpose. May & Thomas Hardware Co. v. City of Birmingham, 26 South. 537, 542, 123 Ala. 306.

Const 1851, art. 16, § 1, declares that it shall be the duty of the General Assembly to submit any proposed amendment of the Constitution to the electors of the state, and, if a "majority" of said electors shall ratify the same, it shall become a part of this Constitution; and, as the amendment had received the votes of less than a majority of all the electors who had voted at such election, though receiving a majority of the votes cast for and against itself, it was neither ratified nor rejected, and, under a valid statute, might again be submitted. The amendment must be ratified by the votes of a majority of the electors of the state. State v. Swift, 69 Ind. 505, 510.

In State v. Winkelmeler, 35 Mo. 103, under a law which empowered the city authorities of St. Louis to grant permission for the opening of establishments for the sale of refreshments on any day of the week whenever a "majority" of the legal voters of the city authorizes them to do so, it was held that there must be a majority of the voters participating in the election at which the vote was taken, and not merely a majority of those voting upon that particular question. Cass County v. Johnston, 95 U. S. 360, 365, 366, 24 L. Ed. 416.

The "majority of the electors" mentioned in Const. art. 20, § 1, providing that proposed constitutional amendments passed by the Legislature shall become a part of the Constitution if ratified at a general election by a majority of the electors, means a majority of the electors voting on the amendment, and does not require a majority of the votes cast at such election for state officers. Green v. State Board of Canvassers, 47 Pac. 259, 260, 5 Idaho, 130, 95 Am. St. Rep. 169.

Const. art. 14, § 1, relating to amendments to the Constitution, requires that a majority of the voters present and voting shall have ratified such alterations or amendments. Held, that the words "majority of the voters," etc., meant a majority of the voters who are present and vote on the proposition submitted to the electors, without respect to those who may be present and vote for other purposes at any election which may be held at the same time and place at which the proposition may, for reasons of convenience or other reasons, be submitted, and that those who may at such time and place come and vote for other purposes only are not to be regarded as presenting votes, so far as respects the proposed amendment. Dayton v. City of St. Paul, 22 Minn. 400, 402.

The "majority" of votes necessary, under a statute authorizing a city to issue bonds when the same shall be authorized by a vote of the people, is a majority of all the votes cast at the election, and not a mere majority of the votes cast on the bonding proposition. Bryan v. City of Lincoln, 70 N. W. 252, 253, 50 Neb. 592, 35 L. R. A. 752.

The "majority of legal votes cast," in the enabling act of Congress of February 22, 1889, authorizing the people in what is now the state of North Dakota to elect delegates to the constitutional convention, and to submit the constitution by separate articles or ordinances to the popular vote, and requiring for their adoption a "majority of the legal votes cast," means a majority of the votes cast either for or against any particular provision of the Constitution, even though the vote would not constitute a majority of the total votes cast for Governor. State v. Barnes, 55 N. W. 883, 3 N. D. 319.

The term "majority of voters," in Act March 7, 1867, entitled "An act to prevent domestic animals from running at large in certain counties," and providing that the act shall not be enforced until it is ratified by the majority of the legal voters of the county, is to be construed as meaning a majority of the legal voters voting on the proposition. Holcomb v. Davis, 56 Ill. 413, 416.

Many distinguished.

See "Many."

As embracing plurality.

As the term "majority" is used when speaking of the majority of a legislative body, it means, in its broadest sense, the greatest of any number of unequal divisions of the whole body. In its strictest sense it means the greater of any two unequal divisions of the whole body, and embraces what is denoted by "plurality." State v. Anderson, 12 N. E. 656, 658, 45 Ohio St. 196 (citing Cushing's Law of Legislative Assemblies).

MAJORITY OF THE CORPORATION.

"Majority of the body," as used in a corporation by-law providing that corporate action might be taken and by-laws made and repealed by "the corporate body or a majority thereof," means a majority of the collective body of individuals who are members of the corporation, and not a majority of the capital stock. "The term 'body' certainly refers to the collective number of individuals who are incorporated, and not to the aggregate amount of property, and the term the 'majority of the body' can therefore only mean a majority of the individuals composing the body." Taylor v. Griswold, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 222, 239, 27 Am. Dec. 33.

MAJORITY OF STOCKHOLDERS.

The phrase "majority of shareholders," as used in Act March 21, 1872, relating to the removal of the officers of a corporation, and providing that, on petition by a majority of the shareholders, proceedings for the removal of officers may be enjoined, means a majority of the persons holding shares, and not the holders of a majority of the stock; hence a petition signed by less than a majority of the shareholders, though the signers held a majority of the stock, is insufficient. Chollar Min. Co. v. Wilson, 5 Pac. 670, 671, 66 Cal. 374.

A "majority of stockholders," as ordinarily used, means a majority per capita when the right to vote is per capita, and a majority of the stock where each share of the stock is entitled to one vote. Mower v. Staples, 20 N. W. 225, 32 Minn. 284.

The phrase "majority of stockholders," as used in the books of a corporation reciting that at a meeting of such corporation it appeared that a "majority of the stockholders," either by person or by proxy, were present, means such a majority as the law required, to wit, holders of the majority of the stock. Grays v. Lynchburg & S. Turnpike Co. (Va.) 4 Rand. 578-581.

The words "majority of stockholders" of a corporation, when used without other qualifications, indicates a majority in interest, and not in number. Weinburg v. Union St. Ry. Advertising Co., 37 Atl. 1026, 1027, 55 N. J. Eq. 640.

MAKE.

See, also, "Made."

"To make," in the mechanical sense, does not signify to create out of nothing, for that surpasses all human power. It does not often mean the production of a new article out of materials entirely raw, but generally consists in giving new shapes, new qualities, or new combinations to matter which has already gone through some other artificial process. Norris v. Commonwealth, 27 Pa. (3 Casey) 494, 496.

Account.

Code, § 2599, declares that, on proof of citation by a distributee to an executor or administrator, the ordinary may proceed to "make an account," hear evidence on any contested question, and settle finally between the distributee and administrator. Held, that the term "make an account," should be construed as an ascertainment by figures what is due after expenses to the complaining heir or the heirs complaining, or require its payment by the administrator. Cook v. Weaver, 77 Ga. 9, 15.

Award.

To "make an award" is to form and publish a judgment on the facts. Hoff v. Taylor, 5 N. J. Law (2 Southard) 829, 833.

Case.

In the practice act of 1849, requiring the making of a case for appeal, the words "making of a case for appeal" means the bringing up of so much of the evidence as may be material to the question accompanying the motion for review. Smith v. Harris, 43 Mo. 557, 564.

Crop or hedge.

The meaning of the word "make," when used in relation to a crop, is as well understood as any other word in our language; it means produce at maturity. A growing crop is not "made," but in the process of being "made." What it will make, or would have made but for having been destroyed, is a very different thing from the amount of unformed, or half formed, or unmade ears that may be found upon it in its immature condition. Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Bayliss, 62 Tex. 570, 574.

To "make," as used in a contract by a tenant to pay one-fourth and one-third of the corn and cotton he "makes," means "to gather and house; to fit it for use or market. If after the tenant lays by the crop for want of keeping up the fence himself, and charging the landlord for it, or for want of notice to the landlord, if for this neglect of a most reasonable duty on his part the crop is lost or destroyed in whole or in part, he shall still pay the rent." Driver v. Maxwell, 56 Ga. 11, 20.

To "make," within a contract providing that a lessee of land would make a good and substantial hedge fence, means only that the lessee would make as good a hedge as could be made by proper planting and cultivating within the duration of the lease. Such a hedge as could be produced in five years, the term of the lease, was the substance of the undertaking. Gilchrist v. Gilchrist, 76 Ill. 281, 284.

Deed or will.

Execute synonymous, see "Execute."

A contract for the sale of lands, whereby a party agreed, in consideration of a certain amount in cash to be paid in 60 days, the balance in equal installments, that on receipt of such cash payment and within the 60 days he would "make a deed," should be construed to mean that the deed should convey the land, the legal effect of the covenant to sell being that the land should be conveyed by a deed from one who had a good title or full power to convey a good title; and hence a declaration, in an action for breach of such contract by the purchaser, alleging that the seller was ready and willing to convey, does not show compliance with the requirement of the contract that he "make a deed." Washington v. Ogden, 66 U. S. (1 Black) 450, 456, 17 L. Ed. 203.

St. Ohio Dec. 17, 1811, provided that no estate in lands should be given by deed or will to any person or persons but such as are in being, or to the immediate issue or descendants of such persons as are in being, "at the time of the making of a will." It was held that since the phrase "the time of making such deed or will," as applied to a deed, designated the time both of its execution and of its taking effect, such phrase, as applied to a will, would be deemed to refer to the time when it takes effect by the death of the testator, and not the date of its formal execution. McArthur v. Scott, 5 Sup. Ct. 652, 663, 113 U. S. 340, 28 L. Ed. 1015.

As used in Act Feb. 24, 1770, declaring that when husband and wife desire to convey the estate of the wife in any lands it shall be lawful for them to "make," seal, deliver, and execute a deed for the same, and after such execution acknowledge the same, the use of the words "make the deed" clearly import the signing thereof, so that sealing and delivering are not the only requisites which must precede the acknowledgment. Miller v. Ruble, 107 Pa. 395, 401.

False entry.

"Making an entry," within Rev. St. § 5209 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3497], making it a misdemeanor for any officer or clerk to make, with intent to defraud, any false entry in any book or statement of the bank, embraces the erasure of figures constituting part of a number already written on an account book of a national bank, and a writing of different figures in place of those erased. United States v. Crecilius (U. S.) 34 Fed. 30.

False writing.

Within the rule that forgery is the fraudulent "making" of a false writing, the making does not consist alone of the manual operation of putting the instrument into form as the apparent obligation or act of another, and the authorities establish numerous instances wherein forgeries were found apart from the manual making or signing, as in the fraudulent procurement and use of a signature or writing as an obligation when it is not so intended or understood by the maker. In re Count De Toulouse Lautrec (U. S.) 102 Fed. 878, 881, 43 C. C. A. 42.

Ordinance.

The terms "make," "ordain," "constitute," "establish," and "pass," as used with relation to a grant of legislative authority to a municipal corporation to enact ordinances, mean the same thing. Kepner v. Commonwealth, 40 Pa. (4 Wright) 124, 129.

Patent.

The covenant of a deed "to make a patent" means only to obtain one and deliver it to the grantee. Willis v. Bucher (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 63, 66.

Policy.

Where a statute makes it a crime to "make and establish a policy," it is well understood to be a form of gambling in which bets are made on the numbers to be drawn by lottery. State v. Wilkerson, 70 S. W. 478, 480, 170 Mo. 184.

Property in good condition.

"Make," as used in the clause of a lease in which one of the parties agreed, during the term of the lease, to repair the water pipes, etc., and to do all other necessary repairs to "make" the property in a good and tenable condition, means "put." Gerzebek v. Lord, 33 N. J. Law (4 Vroom) 240, 245.

Railroad.

A grant to a railroad company, in its charter, of the power of "laying, building, and making" a road, includes the power of maintaining and sustaining it, which has reference to keeping it in repair, supplying it with machinery, and such like acts, but does not extend to projects for extending its business by schemes and enterprises not contemplated and expressed in clear, unambiguous terms. Central R. Co. v. Collins, 40 Ga. 582, 624.

River navigable.

A corporation was created to make a river navigable which was not so, but no particular mode of accomplishing that result was pointed out in the charter. It was held that the Legislature intended that the river was to be made navigable in any of the known modes in which the navigation of a river might be improved. When we speak of "navigating a river," without reference to the state or condition of it, ordinarily the navigating of it in its natural course is meant; but when the making a river navigable, which was not so before, is spoken of in general terms, without the designation of any particular mode of doing it, no particular mode is understood to be intended, the making it navigable in its natural course no more than the making it navigable in any other way, there being various modes of making a river navigable; and, indeed, to say that such a river is made navigable or may be made navigable by means of a canal is a common mode of expression. The words of the charter, standing alone, should not be understood as requiring the river to be made navigable in its bed or natural course. Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (Md.) 4 Gill & J. 1, 97.

Sale.

"Making of the sale," as used in Laws 1871, c. 844, amending Laws 1867, c. 658, § 1, relating to the payment into the proper surrogate's court of the surplus money arising on the sale of real property, if letters testamentary or of administration have been issued within a certain time, and providing that this act shall not apply to any case where letters testamentary or letters of administration within this state have been or shall be issued to the personal representative or representative of such deceased person four years previous to the "making of the sale" on which such surplus money arises, refers to the date of the sale, not to the commencement of the action or proceedings resulting therein. White v. Poillan (N. Y.) 25 Hun, 69, 71.

Signature.

Act 1851, Nix. Dig. 917, which states as one of the requisites to a valid will that the signature shall be "made" by the testator, or the making thereof acknowledged by him in the presence of two witnesses, is so construed that the testator must sign the will himself, and a signature made by another at the request and in the presence of the testator is insufficient. In re McElwaine's Will, 18 N. J. Eq. (3 C. E. Green) 499, 502.

Street.

The International Dictionary defines the word "make" as meaning to form of materials, to cause to exist in a certain form, to construct, to fabricate. When used with reference to streets, it is synonymous with "build" or "pave." Morse v. City of Westport, 19 S. W. 831, 832, 110 Mo. 502.

"Making," as used in an act appointing road commissioners, in giving them such powers as the highway surveyors and selectmen have, etc., over the laying out, "making," discontinuing, and repairing of ways, etc., means something more than the repairing, and may properly include the making improvements and alterations on an existing way for the purpose of rendering it more safe for travelers. McManus v. Inhabitants of Town of Weston, 41 N. E. 301, 303, 164 Mass. 263, 31 L. R. A. 174.

Writ.

"Make," as used in Gen. St. c. 12, § 26, providing that no sheriff or deputy sheriff shall be allowed to "make" any writ, declaration, or process, means to form or compose, and the manual act of writing out a complaint, even by the dictation of another, by a sheriff or deputy sheriff, is prohibited by the statute. State v. Drew, 51 Vt. 56, 58. A mere alteration of a writ already perfect, which leaves it substantially the same writ, between the same parties, for the same cause of action, and stated in the same form, is not an act forbidden by the statute. Hunt v. Viall, 20 Vt. 291, 292.

MAKE AWAY WITH.

Words charging the plaintiff with being the father of a bastard child by his sister-in-law, of which she was pregnant, and that he wished the defendant to "make away with it," are actionable per se, as importing a wish that the defendant should destroy the child as soon as born. They import that the plaintiff applied to defendant to commit murder. Demarest v. Haring (N. Y.) 6 Cow. 76, 88.

The words "made away with," in a charge that a person made away with some of another's logs, do not of themselves import a charge of larceny, and therefore are not slanderous per se. Brown v. Brown, 14 Me. (2 Shep.) 317, 318.

MAKE FOR.

The expression "make for," as used in a statement of the conductor of a street railroad, in an action for personal injuries, that he saw the decedent "make for" the car, means that the man was trying to board the car, and hence was sufficient to indicate that the conductor knew that the man intended to become a passenger on that car, so as to make the company liable under the rule of liability relating to the carriage of passengers. Dean v. Third Ave. R. Co., 54 N. Y. Supp. 490, 492, 34 App. Div. 220.

MAKE IT WORTH.

In a warranty that land was worth a certain sum, and that if it was not worth such sum, the grantor "would make it worth" that sum, to "make it worth" means to make up the deficiency if the land was not worth the specified sum. Whitehall v. Conner, 55 Ind. 354, 355.

MAKE OVER.

In construing a deed where the language used was "for value received of G. and B., I hereby make over and confirm unto them and their heirs," etc., the court observed that the words "make over" have no precise technical import, and must be taken in their popular sense. The word "confirm" has no application unless there is a previous estate in possession. A confirmation makes a voidable estate sure or increases a particular estate. There must be a previous estate on which it is to operate. It was held that the words used were sufficient to raise an order under the statute, and to convey the premises to the bargainee in fee. Jackson v. Root (N. Y.) 18 Johns. 60, 68, 79.

Though in its original meaning the word "grant" applied only to a conveyance of incorporeal hereditaments which could not pass by livery of seisin, yet in conveyances under the statute of uses the words "make over and grant" are sufficiently operative to convey land. Jackson v. Alexander (N. Y.) 3 Johns. 484, 485, 3 Am. Dec. 517.

MAKER.

Of cider.

The word "makers," as used in a statute providing that nothing therein contained shall apply to sales of cider or native wines by the makers thereof, includes both farmers and manufacturers, and cannot be limited to those who buy apples from which they make cider, or to those who buy cider manufactured in the state. Commonwealth v. Boyden, 66 N. E. 202, 203, 183 Mass. 1.

Of goods.

In St. 50 Geo. III, c. 41, § 23, exempting from the penalty of hawking without a license, sales by the real workers or "makers of goods" applies to manufacturers on a large scale, employing workmen on premises where they do not reside, and doing no manual labor themselves. Rex v. Faraday, 1 Barn. & Adol. 275.

Of libel.

He is the "maker of a libel" who originally contrived and either executed it himself, by writing, printing, engraving, or painting, or dictated or caused it to be done by others. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 724.

Of note.

See "Accommodation Maker"; "Joint Maker."

In a statute providing that, "in any case where the holder of a usurious note sells the same to an innocent purchaser, the maker of said note, or his representatives, shall have the right to recover back from said original holder the amount of principal and interest paid by him on said note," the words "maker" and "note" include the maker of a guaranty of payment of a promissory note indorsed thereon, where he has been obliged to pay a usurious note by reason of the guarantied note having been sold to an innocent purchaser. Fredin v. Richards, 63 N. W. 1031, 1032, 61 Minn. 490.

A provision in a note for an extension on request of the makers includes sureties, where they signed as makers, though the payee of the note knew that they were sureties only, for the word "makers" intended to refer to all persons who had signed the note. Sawyers v. Campbell, 78 N. W. 56, 57, 107 Iowa, 397.

"The difference between a maker of a note and an indorser or guarantor is that the contract of the first, by its terms, imports an unconditional obligation to pay money, and that of the last, by its terms, imports a conditional obligation. The rules of law settle this species of contracts as well as others, and prescribe how they may be created, their legal effect, and mode of enforcement." Aud v. Magruder, 10 Cal. 282, 290.

MAKING.

The word "making," as used in patent laws, is as applicable to machines as to compositions of matter. Whittemore v. Cutter (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 1120, 1121.

The word "making" is formed from a present participle, and literally applies to the present and not the future time. In common parlance, when it is used with reference to a will, it signifies the signing, sealing, and publication of it. Another common meaning of the word is the creation of a thing. Means v. Evans (S. C.) 4 Desaus. 242, 249.

MAL.

Webster defines the prefix "mal" as ill or evil; derived from the Latin "malus," meaning bad or ill. Taliaferro v. Lee, 13 South. 125, 129, 97 Ala. 92.

MALA FIDE.

"Mala fide," as used in reference to the character of a transaction which will render a conveyance void, is an intent not simply to assert one's rights, but, in addition thereto, to defeat the rights of another, participated in by both parties to the instrument. Lenhardt v. Ponder, 42 S. E. 169, 172, 64 S. C. 354 (citing Magovern v. Richard, 27 S. C. 286, 3 S. E. 340).

A mala fide possessor of real estate is one who is in possession, knowing that the title is contested by a third person claiming a better right to it. Canal Bank v. Hudson, 4 Sup. Ct. 303, 311, 111 U. S. 66, 28 L. Ed. 354; Green v. Biddle, 21 U. S. (8 Wheat.) 1, 79, 5 L. Ed. 547.

The taking of an estate after notice of a prior right makes one a mala fide purchaser. Kellar v. Stanley, 5 S. W. 477, 479, 480, 86 Ky. 240, 9 Ky. Law Rep. 388, 391.

MALA IN SE.

Acts mala in se are felonies or breaches of public duties, injuries to person or property, outrages upon public decency or good morals, and breaches of official duty, when done willfully or corruptly. Commonwealth v. Adams, 114 Mass. 323, 324, 19 Am. Rep. 362.

The offense of mischievously destroying property is a misdemeanor of the first class, penal at common law, and is mala in se. People v. Maxon, 1 Idaho, 330, 344.

There is a clear distinction between acts which are mala in se, which are generally regarded as absolutely void, in the sense that no right or claim can be derived from them, and acts which are mala prohibita, which are void or voidable according to the nature and effect of the act prohibited. Where the act is malum in se, neither party to the contract can have relief. Where it is malum prohibitum, as in the case of usury, the lender cannot enforce the contract, but the bearer can have relief against it notwithstanding he is particeps criminis. Turner v. Merchants' Bank, 28 South. 469, 475, 126 Ala. 397.

MALA PROHIBITA.

Acts mala prohibita are acts forbidden by statute, but not otherwise wrong. Commonwealth v. Adams, 114 Mass. 323, 324, 19 Am. Rep. 362.

A misdemeanor of the second class, penal by statute, is mala prohibita. People v. Maxon, 1 Idaho, 330, 344.

MALADMINISTRATION.

"Maladministration" means wrong administration, and includes repeated acts of removal of government section corner stones by a county surveyor, under a claim of right so to do, for the purpose of rectifying the original government survey. Minkler v. State, 15 N. W. 330, 331, 14 Neb. 181.

Code, § 1696, which makes the wasting, embezzlement, or any other maladministration of the estate a cause for the removal of an administrator, means acts injuriously affecting the property or assets of the estate of which wasting and embezzlement are specimens. Forrester v. Forrester's Adm'rs 37 Ala. 398, 399 (citing Johnson v. State, 35 Ala. 583).

MALCONDUCT.

"Malconduct" means essentially the same thing as "actual fraud and wickedness," though it is a less strong term, and does not include mere negligence on the part of election officers, which did not proceed from evil motives or wickedness of purpose, but from mere omission of official duty, so as to be a ground for the contest of an election, under Code, § 396, providing that elections may be contested for malconduct of the election officers. Taliaferro v. Lee, 13 South. 125, 129, 97 Ala. 92.

The word "malconduct," in Galveston City Charter, § 156, giving the city council power to remove any officers for incompetency, malfeasance, or nonfeasance in office, means malconduct in office. "Malconduct," as used, means misconduct, and the offense is official misconduct. The commission of an assault by striking a person with a pistol is not malconduct authorizing the removal of such an officer. Johnson v. City of Galveston, 33 S. W. 150-152, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 469.

It is malconduct in the office of an attorney and counselor at law for him to insert an advertisement in a newspaper reading: "Divorces legally obtained very quietly; good everywhere. Box 2324, Denver"—for it is against good morals, and is a false representation and a libel on courts of justice, for which the Supreme Court may strike his name from the roll of attorneys. People v. MacCabe, 32 Pac. 280, 281, 18 Colo. 186, 19 L. R. A. 231, 36 Am. St. Rep. 270.

MALE.

The right to hold office, given to males of the age of 21 years, etc., by Mill. & V. Code, § 936, does not extend to women, though section 48 provides that words used in the statute importing the masculine gender shall include the feminine and neuter. State v. Davidson, 22 S. W. 203, 204, 92 Tenn. 531, 20 L. R. A. 311.

In holding that a woman could not be admitted to practice law in the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, the court say: "We would refer to a case in Iowa, which unfortunately we do not find in the Reports of that state, holding a woman not excluded by the statutory description of 'any white male person.' If we should follow that authority in ignoring the distinction of sex, we do not perceive why it should not emasculate the constitution itself, and include females in the constitutional right of male suffrage and male qualification." In re Goodell, 39 Wis. 232, 242, 20 Am. Rep. 42.

MALE CHILDREN.

A will naming as beneficiaries certain men and women of his family, and the children of the women, and, in a like manner, the male children of the above-named men, means male descendants, which means descendants claiming through males only. Bernal v. Bernal, 3 Mylne & C. 559, 581.

MALE CITIZEN.

An affidavit of the service of summons stating that the affiant is a male citizen of the United States, over 18 years of age, was not sufficient to show that he was over 18 years of age at the time of the service of the summons, on the contention that the words "male citizen of the United States" indicated that he was an elector, and therefore 21 years of age or over, since, while it is true that a citizen, in the full acceptance of that term, is a member of the civil state, entitled to all its privileges, the possession of all political rights is not essential to citizenship, which term is a comprehensive one, and includes citizens of the state and citizens of the United States, and these include political as well as civil citizens, electors and nonelectors. And hence a person may be a citizen of the United States, though under age and not entitled to vote. Lyons v. Cunningham, 4 Pac. 938, 939, 66 Cal. 42.

MALE HEIRS.

See "Heirs Male."

MALE HOG.

"Male hog," as used in an information charging the theft of a male hog, does not mean one which has been changed from a boar to a barrow by alteration; that is, depriving such hog of its seed. Williams v. State, 17 Tex. App. 521, 524.

MALE ISSUE.

A will providing that, if a certain daughter should die without male issue, the estate should go to certain others, means all male descendants of the male line of such daughter to the remotest generation. Pennington v. Pennington, 17 Atl. 329, 331, 70 Md. 418, 3 L. R. A. 816.

A will devising property to the male issue of a certain person means the whole class of male descendants, whether descended through or from males or females. Wistar v. Gillilan (Pa.) 4 Atl. 815.

Where a devise of a contingent remainder was, on the determination of a precedent estate, to the male issue then living of testator's son R., R. taking no interest, and the testator's intent being unexplained by the context, the words "male issue," etc., are to be construed as words of purchase, designating a class of devisees, to wit, all the lineal descendants of R. who are males living at the determination of the life estate; and such male lineal descendants take in equal shares, whether they trace their descent from R. through males or through females. Wistar v. Scott, 105 Pa. 200, 207, 51 Am. Rep. 197.

MALE LINE.

Testator gave personalty to be accumulated for 21 years, and then to be paid to "my then nearest of kin in the male line, in preference to the female line." Testator died a bachelor, leaving two brothers who died bachelors, three sisters who died spinsters, and three other sisters who were married. Of all these, only one sister survived the period of 21 years. Two of the married sisters had sons who survived, and the testator had a cousin who was the son of a paternal uncle. Held, that the surviving sister was entitled; the words "male line," under the circumstances, being equivalent to "ex parte paterna." Boys v. Bradley, 17 Eng. Law & Eq. 132; Id., 19 Eng. Law & Eq. 73, 80.

MALE LINEAL DESCENDANT.

The term "male lineal descendant," in a will, was not applicable to a male person claiming in part through a female. Oddie v. Woodford, 3 Mylne & C. 584, 628.

MALFEASANCE.

See "Willful Malfeasance."

Malfeasance is the doing of an act which is wholly wrongful and unlawful. Coite v. Lynes, 33 Conn. 109, 115; Minkler v. State, 15 N. W. 330, 331, 14 Neb. 181.

Malfeasance is the doing of an act which a person ought not to do at all. Bell v. Josselyn, 69 Mass. (3 Gray) 309, 311, 63 Am. Dec. 741.

Malfeasance is the unjust performance of some act which the party has no right, or which he had contracted not, to do. Dudley v. City of Flemingsburg (Ky.) 72 S. W. 327. In other words, the performance of the act, the party being aware of the fact that the right to act did not exist. Stokes v. Stokes, 48 N. Y. Supp. 722, 726, 23 App. Div. 552.

Malfeasance is defined to be evil doing; ill conduct; the doing of what one ought not to do; the unjust performance of some act which the party had no right, or which he had contracted not, to do; the omission of some act which is positively unlawful. Hence it is held that, under a provision of the Constitution that a district judge may be removed for nonfeasance or malfeasance in office, it is not necessary that the malfeasance charged must, as a condition precedent to removal, be proved to be criminal or corrupt. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Lazarus, 1 South. 361, 376, 39 La. Ann. 142.

MALICE.

See "Actual Malice"; "Constructive Malice"; "Express Malice"; "General Malice"; "Implied Malice"; "Particular Malice"; "Preconceived Malice"; "Pre-meditated Malice."

"Malice," in common acceptation, means ill will against a person; but in its legal sense it means a wrongful act done intentionally, without just cause or excuse. Ohio Valley Tel. Co. v. Meyer (Ky.) 56 S. W. 673; (quoting Rap. & L. Law Dict. p. 784); Jones v. Fruin, 42 N. W. 283, 284, 26 Neb. 76; Davis v. State, 70 N. W. 984, 987, 51 Neb. 301; Housh v. State, 61 N. W. 571, 572, 43 Neb. 163; Shannon v. Jones, 13 S. W. 477, 478, 76 Tex. 141; Evans v. State, 6 Tex. App. 513, 520; Farrar v. State, 15 S. W. 719, 720, 29 Tex. App. 250; Powell v. State, 13 S. Decklotts*, 19 Iowa, 447, 448; True v. Plumley, 38 Me. 466, 484; State v. Robbins, 66 Me. 324, 328; McCormack v. State, 15 South. 433, 440, 102 Ala. 156; Lovett v. State, 11 South. 550, 552, 30 Fla. 142, 17 L. R. A. 705; Bell v. Fernald, 71 Mich. 267, 269, 38 N. W. 910, 911, 912; Long v. Tribune Printing Co., 107 Mich. 207, 215, 65 N. W. 108, 111; Zimmerman v. Whiteley (Mich.) 95 N. W. 989, 991; Ruffner v. Hooks, 2 Pa. Super. Ct. 278, 282; State v. Spivey, 43 S. E. 475, 476, 132 N. C. 989.

"'Malice' means wickedness of purpose, or a spiteful or malevolent design against another; a purpose to injure another; a design of doing mischief, or any evil design or inclination to do a bad thing, or a reckless disregard of the rights of others, or an intent to do an injury to another, or absence of legal excuse, or any other motive than that of bringing a party to justice." Shannon v. Jones, 13 S. W. 477, 478, 76 Tex. 141.

The term "malice" is variously used according to the nature of the litigation in which it is sought to be established. In legal parlance, malice may be actually implied whenever there is a deliberate intention to do a grievous wrong without legal justification or excuse. In civil controversies the very essence of malice is a disposition or willingness to do a wrongful act greatly injurious to another. Williams v. Williams, 37 Pac. 614, 619, 20 Colo. 51.

In law, "malice" is a term of art, importing wickedness, and excluding a just cause or excuse. It is implied from an unlawful act, willfully done, until the contrary be proved. State v. Doig (S. C.) 2 Rich. Law, 179, 182.

"'Malice' is defined to be that state of mind or act when one willfully does that which he knows will injure another person or property." Territory v. Egan, 13 N. W. 568, 571, 3 Dak. 119 (cited in Carr v. State, 37 N. W. 630, 633, 23 Neb. 749).

"The term 'malice' denotes a wicked intention of the mind. An act done with a depraved mind, attended with circumstances which indicate a willful disregard of the rights or safety of others or of social duty, indicates malice." People v. Davis, 32 Pac. 670, 671, 8 Utah, 412.

"Malice," in the true sense of the law, at least in all cases except willful murder, signifies no more than a willful intent to do a wrongful act. Commonwealth v. York, 50 Mass. (9 Metc.) 93, 97, 43 Am. Dec. 373.

Malice is the disposition to injure another without cause from a spirit of revenge, merely, or from personal gratification. King v. Root (N. Y.) 4 Wend. 113, 155, 21 Am. Dec. 102.

"Malice" is defined to mean enmity of heart; malevolence; ill will; a spirit desiring harm to another; a disposition to injure others; unprovoked malignity of spirit. Chandler v. State, 39 N. E. 444, 447, 141 Ind. 106.

"Malice" means, in its legal sense, exactly what it means in its popular sense, namely, a mischievous design or intent to do an injury to an individual or to the public. Viele v. Gray (N. Y.) 18 How. Prac. 550, 564, 565.

The malice referred to in the rule that, where an injury is maliciously inflicted, punitive damages may be recovered, is not merely doing an unlawful or injurious act. The word implies that the act complained of was conceived in the spirit of mischief, or of criminal indifference to civil obligations. Smith v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co., 38 Atl. 1072, 1073, 87 Md. 48; Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Hoeflich, 62 Md. 300, 307, 50 Am. Rep. 223 (citing Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Quigley, 62 U. S. [21 How.] 202, 16 L. Ed. 73).

A willful wrongful intent is not involved in the legal definition of the term "malice." Davis v. Standard Nat. Bank, 63 N. Y. Supp. 764, 766, 50 App. Div. 210.

Malice is implied by law from every deliberate cruel act committed by one person against another, however sudden that act may be. State v. Warren (Del.) 41 Atl. 190, 1 Marv. 487.

Malice denotes a wicked intention of the mind; an act done with a depraved mind, attendant with circumstances which indicate the willful disregard of the rights and safety of others. Thiede v. People of Territory of Utah, 16 Sup. Ct. 62, 67, 159 U. S. 510, 40 L. Ed. 237.

Malice is a wicked and mischievous purpose which characterizes the perpetration of an injurious act without lawful excuse. State v. Coella, 28 Pac. 28, 33, 3 Wash. St. 99.

A man may do a thing willfully, and yet be free of malice, but he cannot do an act maliciously without at the same time doing it willfully. The malicious doing of an act includes the willful doing of it, while malice includes intent and will. State v. Robbins, 66 Me. 324, 328.

"Any unlawful act done willfully and purposely to the injury of another is, as against that person, malicious. This wrong motive, when it is shown to exist, coupled with a wrongful act willfully done to the injury of another, constitutes legal malice." Dempsey v. State, 11 S. W. 372, 373, 27 Tex. App. 269, 11 Am. St. Rep. 193 (citing Glasgow v. Owen, 6 S. W. 527, 69 Tex. 167; Ramsey v. Arrott, 64 Tex. 322).

Malice is that state of mind which prompts a conscious violation of law to the prejudice of another. Abbott v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 68 S. W. 124, 125.

"Malice," in law, simply means a depraved inclination on the part of a person to disregard the rights of others, which intent is manifested by his injurious acts; and where one, though not actuated by hatred, revenge, or passion, nevertheless acts wantonly against what any man of ordinary intelligence must have known to be contrary to his duty, and purposely injurious to another, the law will imply malice. In re Freche (U. S.) 109 Fed. 620, 621.

Malice is an intent of the mind and heart. Allen v. United States, 17 Sup. Ct. 154, 155, 164 U. S. 492, 41 L. Ed. 528.

Malice is the expression of a wicked and depraved heart and mind; of a cruel disposition. State v. Wallace (Del.) 47 Atl. 621, 622, 2 Pennewill, 402.

The word "malice" imports a wish to vex, annoy, or injure another person, or an intent to do a wrongful act, established either by proof or presumption of law. Pen. Code Ariz. 1901, par. 7, subd. 4; Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 7, subd. 4; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 7716; Pen. Code S. D. 1903, § 811; Pen. Code Idaho 1901, § 4544, subd. 4; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 4053; Ann. Codes & Sts. Or. 1901, § 2179; Pen. Code Mont. 1895, § 7, subd. 4; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2689.

The term "malice," as used in the Penal Code, imports an evil intent or wish or design to vex, annoy or injure, another person, or to maltreat or injure an animal. Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 718.

Malice may consist in personal spite, or in a general disregard of the right consideration of mankind, directed by chance against the individual injured. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3855.

Express or implied.

Malice has always been divided into two kinds—implied malice, or malice in law, and express malice, or malice in fact. Gambrill v. Schooley, 52 Atl. 500, 501, 95 Md. 260, 63 L. R. A. 427; State v. Mills, 21 S. E. 106, 107, 116 N. C. 992; State v. Town (Ohio) Wright, 75, 76; State v. Harrigan (Del.) 31 Atl. 1052, 9 Houst. 369.

There is a great deal in the lawbooks, and considerable in the brief of counsel, about express malice and implied malice, but there is in reality no such distinction. They both mean precisely the same condition of mind. The law makes malice a necessary ingredient in both degrees of murder, and it is the same thing whether shown to exist by one set of circumstances or another. Its existence as a fact must be proved in every charge of murder. The law never presumes its existence. The modes of proof may differ widely in individual cases; in some it may be proven by declarations; in others, by acts preceding the homicide; and in others still, by the circumstances of the killing. Its existence in every case must be established by proof either directly or circumstantially, never by presumption. So that to classify it as express malice and implied malice is to recognize a distinction where there is no difference. Craft v. State, 3 Kan. 450, 486.

"Malice is essential to every action for libel. It has been sometimes divided into legal malice, or malice in law, and actual malice, or malice in fact. These terms might seem to imply that the two kinds of malice are different in their natures. The true distinction, however, is not in the malice itself, but simply in the evidence by which it is established. In all ordinary cases, if the charge or imputation complained of is injurious, and no justifiable motive for making it is apparent, malice is inferred from the falsity of the charge. The law in such case does not impute malice not existing in fact, but presumes a malicious motive for making a charge which is both false and injurious, when no other motive appears. Where, however, the circumstances show that the defendant may reasonably be supposed to have a just and worthy motive for making the charge, then the law ceases to infer malice from the mere falsity of the charge, and requires from the plaintiff every proof of its existence." Lewis v. Chapman, 16 N. Y. 369, 372.

"Malice," in the old definitions, is spoken of as express and implied. That is a distinction which is a delusion and a snare. Practically, jurymen never deal with express malice. There is no express malice given to them. Malice is an intent of the mind and heart. There is never presented to a jury direct evidence of what was the intent of a man's heart at the time. He is the only possible direct witness to that; and, if he meant so to testify, he would plead guilty. The existence or nonexistence of malice is an evidence to be drawn by the jury from all the facts of the case. United States v. King (U. S.) 34 Fed. 302, 311.

Malice aforethought distinguished.

"Malice" alone does not signify the same thing as "malice aforethought." Bishop says that the better use makes a distinction between them, and assigns to malice a meaning somewhat less intense in respect to wickedness than malice aforethought. State v. Green, 7 South. 793, 794, 42 La. Ann. 644; State v. Curtis, 70 Mo. 594, 598; Cravey v. State, 35 S. W. 658, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 90, 61 Am. St. Rep. 833. Contra, see Harrell v. State, 45 S. W. 581, 588, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 204.

Negligence distinguished.

"Malice" is distinguished from negligence, in that it arises from an evil purpose, while negligence arises from a failure of purpose. People v. Camp, 21 N. Y. Supp. 741, 745, 66 Hun, 531 (citing Whart. Cr. Law, 126).

In criminal law.

"Malice," in the law of murder, does not mean mere spite, ill will, or dislike, as it is ordinarily understood, but it means that condition of the mind which prompts one person to take the life of another without just cause or provocation, and it signifies a state of disposition which shows a heart regardless of social duty, and fatally bent on mischief. State v. Avery, 21 S. W. 193, 197, 113 Mo. 475; State v. Howell, 23 S. W. 263, 267, 117 Mo. 307; State v. Dickson, 78 Mo. 438, 441; State v. Fitzgerald, 32 S. W. 1113, 1115, 130 Mo. 407; State v. Musick, 14 S. W. 212, 213, 101 Mo. 260; State v. Seaton, 17 S. W. 169, 106 Mo. 198; State v. Brooks, 5 S. W. 257, 261, 92 Mo. 542; State v. Gatlin, 70 S. W. 885, 888, 170 Mo. 354; State v. Ashcraft, 70 S. W. 898, 900, 170 Mo. 409; State v. McMullin, 71 S. W. 221, 224, 170 Mo. 608; Harris v. State, 8 Tex. App. 90, 109, 110; Martinez v. State, 16 S. W. 767, 768, 30 Tex. And therefore "malice" is implied from any deliberate cruel act against another, however sudden. Commonwealth v. Webster, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 295, 306, 52 Am. Dec. 711 (quoting East, P. C. c. 5, § 12); State v. Young, 40 S. E. 334, 50 W. Va. 96, 88 Am. St. Rep. 846.

"Malice," in its common acceptation, signifies ill will, hatred, or revenge toward a particular individual. In a legal sense, as relating to murder, it denotes that condition of one's mind which is manifested by his intentionally doing a wrongful act without just cause or excuse. It means any wicked or mischievous intention of the mind. State v. Witt, 8 Pac. 769, 770, 34 Kan. 488; People v. Ah Toom, 9 Pac. 311, 312, 68 Cal. 362; Carr v. State, 37 N. W. 630, 633, 23 Neb. 749; United States v. Meagher (U. S.) 37 Fed. 875, 879; United States v. Harriman (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 172, 173; State v. Schaefer, 22 S. W. 447, 450, 116 Mo. 96; State v. Harper, 51 S. W. 89, 91, 149 Mo. 514; State v. Hays, 23 Mo. 287, 325; Pennsylvania v. Lewis (Pa.) Add. 279, 282; Williams v. United States (Ind. T.) 69 S. W. 871, 872; Commonwealth v. Wood, 77 Mass. (11 Gray) 85, 92. Malice, which is essential to murder, is defined by Blackstone to be "any evil design in general, the dictate of a wicked, depraved, and malignant heart, and may exist without any fixed purpose to take the life of the individual." Ex parte Wray, 30 Miss. 673; Galley v. State, 17 S. E. 863, 864, 92 Ga. 463; Revel v. State, 26 Ga. 275, 281. See, also, State v. Cole (Del.) 45 Atl. 391-393, 2 Pennewill, 344; Commonwealth v. Moore, 2 Pittsb. R. 502, 503; State v. Davis (Del.) 33 Atl. 55, 56, 9 Houst. 407; Ohio v. Brooks (Ohio) 9 West. Law J. 407, 409; State v. Cook, 2 Ohio Dec. 36, 39; State v. Gardner (Ohio) Wright, 392-400; Adams v. People, 109 Ill. 444, 450, 50 Am. Rep. 617.

Malice, in the law of homicide, is a deliberate intent to unlawfully take away human life. Huff v. State, 11 S. E. 618, 619, 85 Ga. 285; Beck v. State, 76 Ga. 452, 472; Dozier v. State, 26 Ga. 156, 160; Hinkle v. State, 21 S. E. 595, 601, 94 Ga. 595; Powell v. State, 20 S. E. 483, 95 Ga. 502.

"Malice," as employed in definition of murder, to the effect that it is the killing of any reasonable creature with malice, means with design and without excuse. State v. Reed, 9 N. C. 454, 455.

Any formed design of mischief may be called malice. Malice is a deliberate and willful attempt, regardless of whether he had an intention of the mischief. This may be collected from previous circumstances, or circumstances attending the manner or fact of the killing. There may be malice, in its legal sense, when there is no actual intention of any mischief, or the killing is the actual consequence of a careless action, as riding a horse or driving a carriage through a crowd. State v. Bell (Pa.) Add. 156, 1 Am. Dec. 298.

Malice is a state and condition of the mind or heart which is best understood as "wickedness." Its existence in the case of a homicide is shown by the character of the act done. If there be preconceived purpose to take life, as shown by threats, lying in wait, the selection of a deadly instrument or weapon, likely to produce death, and use of it in pursuance of the threats, etc., it is called "express malice aforethought." State v. Walker (Del.) 33 Atl. 227, 228, 9 Houst. 464.

"Malice is but a wicked and evil state or frame of mind towards another; a mental emotion aroused and awakened by some motive of real or imagined wrong, or of some personal benefit or advantage to be gained, fostered, and cherished in moments of coolness, sedateness, and deliberation, and which prompts to action, and seeks its gratification in the destruction of its intended victim whenever a favorable conjuncture of circumstances may present itself." Cotton v. State, 32 Tex. 614-641.

Reduced to its lowest terms, "malice," in murder, means knowledge of such circumstances that, according to common experience, there is a plain and strong likelihood that death will follow the contemplated act, coupled, perhaps with an implied negation of any excuse or justification. The criterion in such cases is to examine whether common social duty would, under the circumstances, have suggested a more circumspect conduct. Of course, we do not mean to imply that such a likelihood would be enough to satisfy the statutory requirement of deliberately premeditated malice aforethought, and to constitute murder in the first degree. Commonwealth v. Chance, 54 N. E. 551, 554, 174 Mass. 245, 75 Am. St. Rep. 306.

The term "malice," when used to characterize murder, does not mean mere hatred, spite, or ill will, as ordinarily understood, but means that the killing was wrongfully and intentionally committed. State v. McKenzie, 45 S. W. 1117, 1118, 144 Mo. 40.

"Malice" means an evil intent. It may exist in the human heart for years, or it may arise on the instant. But if it is present at the time the fatal blow is given or the fatal shot fired, the killing would be murder. State v. Symmes, 19 S. E. 16, 17, 40 S. C. 333.

The malice necessary to the crime of murder cannot coexist with the heat of passion. Malice excludes passion. Passion presupposes the absence of malice. State v. Sloan, 56 Pac. 364, 367, 22 Mont. 293; State v. Johnson, 23 N. C. 354, 362, 35 Am. Dec. 742.

The malice necessary to be proved to support an indictment under the act of 1835 for beating a member of the crew of a ship with malice is a willful departure from a known duty. If the master knows that his act was unlawful, and does it intending to take the consequences, it is a malicious act, within the meaning of the law. United States v. Cutler (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 740.

In extortion.

Under a statute providing that any person who maliciously threatens to accuse another of a crime or offense, with intent to extort money, etc., shall be punished, etc., it is held that the malice required by the statute is not a feeling of ill will towards the person threatened, but the willful doing of the act with illegal intent. If a threat is willfully made with the intent to extort money, it is a malicious act, and the fact that the charge is true would be immaterial. Commonwealth v. Buckley, 18 N. E. 577, 148 Mass. 27, 1 L. R. A. 624.

In insolvency law.

In the statute providing that, when malice is not the gist of the action, one held to bail may be released on complying with the provisions of the act, the term "malice" should not be construed in the sense of hate or ill will, but of malus animus, and as denoting that the party is actuated by improper or dishonest motives. It implies a wrong inflicted on another with an evil intent, design, or purpose, requiring intentional perpetration of an injury or wrong to another. The wrong and intention to commit the injury are necessary to a fulfillment of the meaning of the term. Kitson v. Farwell, 132 Ill. 338, 23 N. E. 1024, 1025; First Nat. Bank of Flora v. Burkett, 101 Ill. 391, 394, 40 Am. Rep. 209. A wrongful act done intentionally without just cause or excuse. In re Murphy, 109 Ill. 31, 33. It applies to that class of wrongs which are inflicted with an evil intent, design, or purpose. It implies that the guilty party was actuated by improper or dishonest motives, and requires the intentional perpetration of an injury or a wrong on another. Jernberg v. Mix, 65 N. E. 242, 199 Ill. 254 (citing Kitson v. Farwell, 132 Ill. 327, 23 N. E. 1024).

In libel and slander.

"Malice," in the law of libel and slander, is defined to be the doing of a wrongful act intentionally, and with the purpose to wrong and oppress, without any just cause or excuse. Hiatt v. Kinkaid, 58 N. W. 700, 704, 40 Neb. 178; Smith v. Rodecap, 81 N. E. 479, 5 Ind. App. 78 (quoting Branstetter v. Donough, 81 Ind. 527); King v. Patterson, 9 Atl. 705, 706, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 417, 60 Am. Rep. 622 (citing Cooley, Torts, 209); Jones v. Todd (Ky.) 51 S. W. 452; Nebb v. Hope, 2 Atl. 568, 570, 111 Pa. 145; Regensperger v. Keifer (Pa.) 7 Atl. 724, 725; Buckley v. Knapp, 48 Mo. 152; Barbee v. Hereford, Id. 323; Viele v. Gray (N. Y.) 10 Abb. Prac. 1, 5; McFadden v. Morning Journal Ass'n, 51 N. Y. Supp. 275, 281, 23 App. Div. 508; Austin v. Hyndman, 78 N. W. 663, 664, 119 Mich. 615; In re Maples (U. S.) 105 Fed. 919, 921; Times Pub. Co. v. Carlisle (U. S.) 94 Fed. 762, 766, 36 C. C. A. 475; Staub v. Van Benthuyssen, 36 La. Ann. 467.

Malice, as referring to libel and slander, is an indirect or wicked motive which induces the defendant to defame the plaintiff. Halstead v. Nelson, 1 N. Y. Supp. 280, 285; Moore v. Stevenson, 27 Conn. 14, 19.

Malice is of the essence of libel, and any definition or any charge of libel which does not embrace this essential characteristic would be defective. In a legal sense, any act done willfully and purposely to the prejudice and injury of another, which is unlawful is, as against that person, malicious. It is not necessary, to render an act malicious, that the party be actuated by a feeling of hatred or ill will toward the individual, or that he entertain and pursue any general bad purpose or design. On the trial he may be actuated by a general good purpose, and have a real and sincere design to bring about a reformation of manners. But if, when pursuing that design, he willfully inflicts a wrong on others which is not warranted by law, such act is malicious. Commonwealth v. Snelling, 32 Mass. (15 Pick.) 321, 340.

"Malice," in the sense of the law of libel, means willfulness. Dexter v. Spear (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 624; Austin v. Hyndman, 78 N. W. 663, 664, 119 Mich. 615.

The malice which is the gist of actions for slander is not malice in its worst sense, but such malice as consists of an intent to deceive or injure. And in order to constitute it, there must be a false statement, and it must be made with full knowledge of its falsity, and for the purpose of injuring plaintiff. Hopkins v. Drowne, 41 Atl. 567, 568, 21 R. I. 20.

The word "malice," as used in a criminal prosecution for slander, is that evil mind that intentionally violates the law, without the moral sanction of honest conviction, supported by probable cause, to excuse it. Therefore, when the slanderous words are groundless, malice is implied. Haley v. State, 63 Ala. 87, 88.

"Malice," as used in libel, "denotes ill will or intent to injure or to offend, or to wound the feelings of another." Chaffin v. Lynch, 1 S. E. 803, 807, 83 Va. 106.

"Malice," in the law of libel, consists in an intentional defamatory publication in violation of a legal duty. Atwater v. Morning News Co., 34 Atl. 865, 866, 67 Conn. 504.

"Malice is the wrongful doing of an act with the intention to do harm, and, where a libel imputes crime, malice is implied. A mere charge of the commission of crime carries with it the element of malice. State v. Shaffner (Del.) 44 Atl. 620, 621, 2 Pennewill, 171.

In order to make an act malicious, it is not necessary that the person accused should entertain a feeling of hatred toward the person injured, or that he was actuated by a desire for revenge. In the absence of a lawful excuse, a defamatory publication is presumed to be malicious, and therefore libelous; and, if not privileged, the absence of ill will against the person defamed, or the fact that the matter was published in a spirit of pleasantry, becomes immaterial. Commonwealth v. Brown (Pa.) 30 Wkly Notes Cas 320, 321.

In malicious prosecution.

The term "malice," as used in the rules relative to malicious prosecutions, does not mean spite or hatred against an individual, but rather malus animus, as denoting that the party is actuated by improper and indirect motives in prosecuting the action. Harpham v. Whitney, 77 Ill. 32, 38.

"Malice," as the term is used in reference to an excessive levy of an execution, "is an improper act, injurious to another, proceeding from an improper motive; whether it be done propter odium vel causa lucri; whether the motive be solely to break up the fortunes of a man, or whether it proceeds from oppressive acts under cover of the law and of legal process, by its means, and not permitted by the law, by which the perpetrator is a gainer, and the party acted upon receives a prejudice, as here to coerce the payment of another debt, by levying more on the execution than could be legally levied." Sommer v. Wilt (Pa.) 4 Serg. & R. 18, 23; Messman v. Ihlenfeldt, 62 N. W. 522, 523, 89 Wis. 585; Spear v. Hiles, 30 N. W. 506, 509, 67 Wis. 350; Mitchell v. Wall, 111 Mass. 402, 498.

The malice necessary to sustain an action for malicious prosecution is not express malice—a specific desire to vex or injure another from malevolence or motives of ill will—but the willful doing of an unlawful act to the prejudice or injury of another. Johnson v. Ebberts (U. S.) 11 Fed. 129, 131; Lemay v. Williams, 32 Ark. 166, 176, 177;

Ramsey v. Arrott, 64 Tex. 320, 323, 660, 663; Carothers v. McIlhenny Co., 63 Tex. 138, 141; Porter v. Martyn (Tex.) 32 S. W. 731, 733.

By the term "malice," as used in an action for malicious prosecution, is not necessarily meant that state of mind which must proceed from a spiteful, malignant, and revengeful disposition, but it includes, as well, that which proceeds from an ill-regulated mind, not sufficiently cautious, and recklessly bent on the attainment of some desired end, although it may inflict want and injury on another. Savage v. Davis, 42 S. E. 571, 572, 131 N. C. 159.

"Malice," as used with reference to a malicious prosecution, means that the prosecution is willful, wanton, or reckless, or against the prosecutor's sense of duty and right, or for ends that he knows or is bound to know are wrong and against the dictates of public policy. The term is not used with reference to this matter in the sense often ascribed to it. There may be ill will, malevolence, spite, a spirit of revenge, or purpose to injure without cause, but it is not necessary that there should be. Malice may be inferred from want of probable cause, but not conversely. Hamilton v. Smith, 39 Mich. 222, 226.

Malice consists in a bad mind; that is, either a direct intention to injure, or that degree of bad motive or ill will which would lead the mind to conclusions not warranted to the understanding of an impartial mind. No degree of malice, however, is sufficient to render a defendant in an action for malicious prosecution liable if he had probable cause. Bacon v. Towne, 58 Mass. (4 Cush.) 217, 233.

"The malice in malicious prosecutions is not necessarily, while it may be, ill will to the individual; but it is any evil or unlawful purpose, as distinguished from that of promoting the justice of the law." Ahrens & Ott Mfg. Co. v. Hoeher, 51 S. W. 194, 195, 106 Ky. 692.

"Malice," as applied to an action for malicious prosecution, may be defined as such a state of mind as leads to the doing of some act, knowing it to be without just cause or legal excuse. Noble v. White, 72 N. W. 556, 558, 103 Iowa, 352.

In malicious prosecutions the term "malice" does not necessarily mean that it must proceed from a specified malignant or revengeful disposition, but it includes conduct injurious to another, though proceeding only from an ill-regulated mind, not sufficiently cautious before it occasions an injury to another, and bent on the attainment of some desired end—such, for example, as the collection of a just debt without due regard to the rights of that other. Juries may infer this kind of malice from facts and circumstances proven in the case which show that the party acted with a reckless disregard for the rights of others, and was willing, in order to accomplish the desired end, to inflict a wanton injury. Brewer v. Jacobs (U. S.) 22 Fed. 217, 222.

In a malicious prosecution, any improper motive is sufficient to constitute legal malice, and malice will be inferred when the object of the prosecution is to enforce the payment of a debt. Morgan v. Duffy, 30 S. W. 735, 94 Tenn. (10 Pickle) 686.

In slander of property.

In order to constitute malice, to authorize a recovery for the publication of a false and malicious statement concerning property, it is not necessary that there should be proof of an intention to injure the value of property. Malice in uttering such statements may consist either in a direct intention to injure another, or a reckless disregard of his rights and the consequences that may result. Therefore an instruction which required plaintiff to prove in defendant "a disposition willfully and purposely to injure the value" of a particular piece of property, as well as "wanton disregard of the interest of the owner," was clearly erroneous. Gott v. Pulsifer, 122 Mass. 235, 239, 23 Am. Rep. 322.

MALICE AFORETHOUGHT.

See "Willfully and of Malice Aforethought."

See, also, "Aforethought."

Malice aforethought is nothing more than an unlawful or wicked intention. State v. White, 14 Kan. 538, 540; State v. Fooks, 29 Kan. 425.

"Malice aforethought" is the term used in law to designate the wicked and mischievous intent with which a man willfully does a wrongful act, and is to be inferred from acts committed or words spoken. Cain v. State, 59 S. W. 275, 277, 42 Tex. Cr. R. 210.

"Malice aforethought" is a condition of the mind which shows a heart regardless of serious duty and fatally bent on mischief, the existence of which is inferred from acts committed or words spoken. Hayes v. State, 14 Tex. App. 330, 331.

An intention to kill unlawfully, without sufficient provocation, is a malicious intention; and, if executed, the killing is, in law, from malice aforethought, and is murder. United States v. McGlue (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1093, 1094.

"Malice aforethought" are technical words for which, in an indictment for murder, there can be no equivalents or substitutes. They constitute an essential part of the definition of murder both at common law and under the statute. McElroy v. State, 14 Tex. App. 235, 236 (quoted with approval in Cravey v. State, 35 S. W. 658, 659, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 90, 61 Am. St. Rep. 833).

"Malice aforethought," in common parlance, conveys only the idea of express malice, but its meaning has been enlarged by judicial construction so as to include implied malice. Territory v. Bannigan, 46 N. W. 597, 598, 1 Dak. 451; People v. Wright, 29 Pac. 240, 241, 93 Cal. 564; Bohannon v. State, 14 Tex. App. 271, 300; United States v. Boyd (U. S.) 45 Fed. 851, 857; People v. Jefferson, 52 Cal. 452, 453.

Deliberation or premeditation implied.

"Malice aforethought" means that the act was done with malice and premeditation. State v. Brooks, 5 S. W. 257, 261, 92 Mo. 542; State v. Harper, 51 S. W. 89, 91, 149 Mo. 514; State v. McKenzie, 45 S. W. 1117, 1118, 144 Mo. 40; State v. Dale, 18 S. W. 976, 108 Mo. 205; State v. Reed, 23 S. W. 886, 889, 117 Mo. 604; State v. Avery, 21 S. W. 193, 197, 113 Mo. 475; State v. Howell, 23 S. W. 263, 267, 117 Mo. 307.

Malice aforethought is a wicked intention of the mind, previously entertained. Thiede v. Utah, 16 Sup. Ct. 62, 67, 159 U. S. 510, 40 L. Ed. 237; People v. Davis, 32 Pac. 670, 671, 8 Utah, 412.

"Malice aforethought" is defined in the Century Dictionary as actual malice, particularly in cases of homicide; in Webster, "malice previously and deliberately entertained." Thus it appears that the adjective "aforethought" describes, not the intent to take life, but the malice, and that malice must be previously and deliberately entertained when the purpose to take life is formed, and must co-operate with the blow in producing death to constitute murder. To understand malice aforethought, malice must not be confounded with the intent to take life. It is the malice that must previously exist or be deliberately entertained. The intent may spring into existence, and be immediately followed by the fatal blow, and that, at common law, is murder. State v. Fiske, 28 Atl. 572, 573, 63 Conn. 388.

"Malice aforethought" means with malice thought of beforehand. State v. Seaton, 17 S. W. 169, 171, 106 Mo. 198; State v. Curtis, 70 Mo. 594, 601.

"Malice aforethought" means that the act done was thought of before its commission. Any length of time, however short, is sufficient. Anderson v. Territory, 13 Pac. 21, 25, 4 N. M. (Johns.) 108.

Malice aforethought is a wicked intention to kill, previously and deliberately formed. State v. McGaffin, 13 Pac. 560, 562, 36 Kan. 315.

"Malice aforethought" does not mean deliberate and calculated malice, but merely malice existing at any time before the act, so as to be its moving cause or concomitant. Nye v. People, 35 Mich. 16, 19.

The term "malice aforethought" is co-extensive with the words "deliberation" and "premeditation," and its primary and popular significance is rather more comprehensive, inasmuch as the latter words do not necessarily imply wickedness of purpose or evil design. Hill v. People, 1 Colo. 436; Redus v. People, 14 Pac. 323, 325, 10 Colo. 208.

"Malice aforethought" does not imply deliberation or the lapse of considerable time between the formation and execution of the intent to take life, but rather denotes purpose and design. It means malice existing at any time before the act, so as to be its moving cause or concomitant. People v. Borgetto, 58 N. W. 328, 329, 99 Mich. 336.

In its legal sense, malice expresses a willingness to injure another, and, when qualified by the word "aforethought," it implies that the act was done on a previous determination. One may shoot at another with malice aforethought, intending to break his pistol arm or disable him, and yet with no design to effect the death of the person he desires to injure. Jewell v. Territory, 43 Pac. 1075, 1078, 4 Okl. 53.

"Malice aforethought" does not necessarily imply a premeditated design to kill, but means that the act has been attended with such circumstances as are the ordinary symptoms of a wicked, depraved, and malignant spirit. Darry v. People, 10 N. Y. (6 Seld.) 120, 137, 138; United States v. Cornell (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 650.

Malice aforethought means a predetermination to do the act of killing without legal excuse, and it is immaterial how sudden or recently before the killing the determination was formed. Strutton v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 62 S. W. 875, 877; Armstrong v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 23 S. W. 654, 655; Clark v. Commonwealth, 63 S. W. 740, 746, 111 Ky. 443.

Deliberation is necessary to exist in order to create malice aforethought, though it need be only for a moment. Johnson v. State, 30 South. 89, 40, 79 Miss. 42.

The intent necessary to constitute malice aforethought need not have existed for any particular time before the act of killing, but it may spring up at the instant, and may be inferred from the act of killing. Allen v. United States, 17 Sup. Ct. 154, 155, 164 U. S. 492, 41 L. Ed. 528.

It has never been held that hatred or ill will towards the deceased must exist in the mind of the slayer for any considerable length of time in order to constitute malice aforethought. Kota v. People, 27 N. E. 53, 136 Ill. 655.

"Malice aforethought" has come to have a well-defined and well-understood meaning, and it is well settled that, if malice existed at the time the fatal blow was struck, it constituted malice aforethought. Ross v. State, 57 Pac. 924, 932, 8 Wyo. 351.

To constitute malice aforethought, it is only necessary that there be a formed design to kill, and such design may be conceived at the moment the fatal stroke is given, as well as a long time before. "Malice aforethought" means the intention to kill, and, when such means are used as are likely to produce death, the legal presumption is that death was intended. Beauchamp v. State, 6 Ind. (6 Blackf.) 300.

Ill will implied.

"Malice aforethought" means more than enmity, ill will, or revenge, and has been extended so as to include all those states of the mind under which the killing of a person takes place without any cause which in law will justify, excuse, or extenuate the homicide. Tooney v. State, 5 Tex. App. 163, 164, 188; State v. Schaefer, 22 S. W. 447, 450, 116 Mo. 96; United States v. Boyd (U. S.) 45 Fed. 851, 857; State v. Stewart, 9 Nev. 120-131.

"Malice aforethought" has a technical meaning, and includes not only hatred and revenge, but every other unlawful and wrongful motive. It is not confined to willful acts toward one or more individuals, but is intended to denote an action flowing from any wicked and corrupt motive, and done mallo animo, as where the act has been attended with such circumstances as carry in them the plain intentions of a heart regardless of social duty and fatally bent on mischief. Commonwealth v. Webster, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 295-304, 52 Am. Dec. 711.

"Malice aforethought," or "preconceived malice," in the statutory definition of murder in the first degree as any murder committed with "malice aforethought," is not so properly spite or malevolence to the deceased in particular as any evil design in general—the dictate of a wicked, depraved, and malignant heart. State v. Reidell (Del.) 14 Atl. 550, 9 Houst. 470.

"When the law maketh use of the term 'malice aforethought,' as descriptive of the crime of murder, it is not to be understood in that narrow, restrained sense to which the modern use of the word 'malice' is apt to lead one, a principle of malevolence to particulars; for the law, by the term 'malice,' in this instance, meaneth that the fact hath been attended with such circumstances as are the ordinary symptoms of a wicked, depraved, and malignant spirit." Hogan v. State, 36 Wis. 226, 242 (citing Foster, 256).

"Malice aforethought" is not malice in its ordinary sense alone, such as a particular ill will, a spite, or a grudge, but is a legal term implying much more, comprehending not only a particular ill will, but hardness of heart, recklessness of consequences, and a mind regardless of duty, although a particular person may not be intended to be injured. Commonwealth v. Drum, 58 Pa. 9, 23.

"Malice aforethought" is a condition of mind in which one man does an intentional injury to another in the willful disregard of the legal rights of the other, and it is to be inferred from acts committed or words spoken. It exists when one does a cruel act voluntarily, and without excuse, justification, or extenuation, and does not necessarily include hatred towards the person injured. Stevens v. State, 59 S. W. 545, 549, 42 Tex. Cr. R. 154.

"Malice aforethought" does not signify a personal hatred or revenge against the person killed, but means that kind of unlawful purpose which, if persevered in, must produce mischief, and which, if accompanied with those circumstances that show the heart to be perversely wicked, is adjudged to be proof of malice prepense. State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 399-402, 6 Am. Rep. 533.

Malice distinguished.

See "Malice."

Maliciously synonymous.

"Malice aforethought" is synonymous with "maliciously." Fisher v. State, 78 Tenn. (10 Lea) 151, 156. Contra, see State v. Curtis, 70 Mo. 594, 598.

Premeditated synonymous.

To premeditate is to think, consider, or resolve in the mind beforehand; to have formed in the mind by previous thought or meditation; previously contrived, designed, or intended. "Premeditated" is held to be sufficiently synonymous with "malice aforethought," so that under the statute providing that all deliberate and premeditated killing, etc., is murder in the first degree, an allegation in an indictment that the killing was with malice aforethought was sufficient; "aforethought" being defined as being premeditated, prepense, or, in other words, that "aforethought" includes premeditated; malice aforethought being malice premeditated, and vice versa. Brannigan v. People, 24 Pac. 767, 769, 3 Utah, 488.

A premeditated design to kill is sufficiently expressed in the term "malice aforethought." People v. Enoch (N. Y.) 13 Wend. 159, 167, 27 Am. Dec. 197.

Willful, deliberate, and premeditated synonymous.

An indictment for murder, charging the homicide to have been with malice aforethought, sufficiently charges that the act was "willful, deliberate, and premeditated." State v. Hing, 16 Nev. 307, 308. Contra, see State v. Wong Fun, 40 Pac. 95, 96, 22 Nev. 336.

MALICE IN FACT.

"Malice in fact" means express malice. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Behee, 21 S. W. 384, 385, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 107; Smith v. Rodecap, 31 N. E. 479, 5 Ind. App. 78.

Malice in fact is where the malice is not established by legal presumption or proof of certain facts, but is to be found by the jury from the evidence in the case. Pullen v. Glidden, 66 Me. 202, 204.

The term "malice in fact" means the malice which is inferred from the act, or, in cases of slander, from the publication of the false language. Smith v. Rodecap, 31 N. E. 479, 5 Ind. App. 78.

Malice in fact is a deliberate intention to do unlawfully any bodily harm to another. State v. Talley (Del.) 33 Atl. 181, 9 Houst. 417.

Malice in fact, or actual malice, relates to the actual state or condition of the mind of the person who did the act. Gee v. Culver, 11 Pac. 302, 303, 13 Or. 598.

The phrase "malice in fact" is a technical one, and does not mean malignity, spite, or hatred, but implies an unjustifiable motive. Hotchkiss v. Porter, 30 Conn. 414; Wynne v. Parsons, 17 Atl. 362, 364, 57 Conn. 73; Moore v. Stevenson, 27 Conn. 14, 27.

Malice in fact implies a desire and an intention to injure, while malice in law is not necessarily inconsistent with an honest purpose, if the act complained of be done intentionally, without just cause or excuse. Bacon v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 33 N. W. 181, 185, 66 Mich. 166.

MALICE IN LAW.

"Malice in law" means implied malice. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Behee, 21 S. W. 384, 385, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 107; Smith v. Rodecap, 31 N. E. 479, 5 Ind. App. 78.

The term "malice in law," as used in reference to libel and slander, is defined as malice, which is inferred from doing a wrongful act without lawful justification or excuse. Smith v. Rodecap, 31 N. E. 479, 5 Ind. App. 78 (citing 1 Starkie, Sland. & L. 213); Pullen v. Glidden, 66 Me. 202, 204.

Malice in fact implies a desire and an intention to injure, while malice in law is not necessarily inconsistent with an honest purpose, if the act complained of be done intentionally, without just cause or excuse. Bacon v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 33 N. W. 181, 185, 66 Mich. 166.

"Malice in law" simply means a depraved inclination on the part of a person to disregard the rights of others, which intent is manifested by his injurious acts. McDonald v. Brown, 51 Atl. 213, 215, 23 R. I. 546, 58 L. R. A. 768, 91 Am. St. Rep. 659; Colwell v. Tinker, 62 N. E. 668, 670, 169 N. Y. 531, 58 L. R. A. 765; Willard v. Holmes, 21 N. Y. Supp. 998, 999, 2 Misc. Rep. 303.

"Malice in law" means an act done wrongfully and willfully without reasonable or probable cause, and not necessarily an act done from ill feeling and spite, or a desire to injure another. Tucker v. Cannon, 49 N. W. 435, 32 Neb. 444; Taylor v. Hearst, 40 Pac. 392, 393, 107 Cal. 262; Bacon v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 33 N. W. 181, 185, 66 Mich. 166; Lewis v. State, 15 S. E. 697, 698, 90 Ga. 95.

MALICE PREPENSE.

"Malice prepense is when one compasseth to kill, wound, or beat another, and doth it in sedato animo. This is said, in law, to be malice aforethought, prepense, malitia, precogitata." Hill v. People, 1 Colo. 436, 444 (citing 3 Coke, Inst. 51); Redus v. People, 14 Pac. 323, 325, 10 Colo. 208.

MALICIOUS.

"Evinced malice; done with malice and an evil design; willful." Ohio Val. Tel. Co. v. Meyer (Ky.) 56 S. W. 673, 674 (citing Black).

"Malicious" means with a fixed hate, or done with intentional motives; not the result of sudden passion. Hawes v. State, 7 South. 302, 304, 88 Ala. 37; Martin v. State, 25 South. 255, 257, 119 Ala. 1; Holley v. State, 75 Ala. 14, 20; Mitchell v. State, 60 Ala. 26, 28.

In a statute punishing the "malicious" killing or disfiguring of domestic animals, the word "malicious" imports a criminal intent, motive, or purpose. Commonwealth v. McLaughlin, 105 Mass. 460, 463.

The word "malicious," in a penal statute, must be construed to mean something more than its signification in common parlance. Its accepted legal meaning when so used is a wrongful act intentionally done, without just cause or excuse. State v. Grasse, 74 Mo. App. 313, 316.

The term "malicious" imports an evil intent or wish or design to vex, annoy, or injure another person, or to maltreat or injure an animal. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 6842, subd. 3.

"Malicious" imports nothing more than the wicked and perverse disposition with which the party commits the act. Commonwealth v. York, 50 Mass. (9 Metc.) 93, 106, 43 Am. Dec. 373.

In a legal sense, says Mr. Greenleaf in his work on Evidence (volume 2, § 453), any lawful act done willfully and purposely to the injury of another is, as against that person, malicious. Culbertson v. Cabeen, 29 Tex. 247, 256.

The word "malicious" is sufficiently identical with the word "willful," so that the use of the former term in an indictment under a statute using the latter does not render the indictment defective. Glover v. People (Ill.) 68 N. E. 464, 466.

"Malicious" may in some sort be considered as synonymous with "malice aforethought," although not a perfect synonym. In its larger sense, it is common to many crimes. At all events, it is common to many degrees of murder, when considered as synonymous with "malice aforethought"; but the words "deliberate" and "premeditated" are peculiarly and solely descriptive of murder in the first degree. Cannon v. State, 31 S. W. 150, 151, 60 Ark. 564.

"Malicious," as used in connection with libel, does not indicate that ill will or any particular state of mind exists, leading to the defamatory statement, but simply imports a negation that there was any just cause or excuse for its publication; and it is not usual, in pleading, to do anything more than to aver in a general way that the publication was false and malicious. Andrews v. Deshler, 43 N. J. Law (14 Vroom) 19, 21.

The word "malicious," in an action for slander, is not to be considered in the sense of spite or hatred against a person, but as meaning that the party is actuated by improper and indirect motives, rather than the mere purpose of protecting the public health or vindicating public justice. Blumhardt v. Rohr, 17 Atl. 266, 270, 70 Md. 328.

MALICIOUS ABUSE OF PROCESS.

See, also, "Abuse of Process."

Malicious prosecution distinguished, see "Malicious Prosecution."

There is a distinction between a malicious use and a malicious abuse of legal process. An abuse is where the party employs it for some unlawful object—not the purpose which it is intended by the law to effect; in other words, a perversion of it. On the other hand, legal process, civil or criminal, may be maliciously used so as to give rise to a cause of action where no object is contemplated to be gained by it, other than its proper effect and execution. Mayer v. Walter, 64 Pa. 283; King v. Weed (Wis.) 51 N. W. 1011; Humphreys v. Sutcliffe, 43 Atl. 954, 956, 192 Pa. 336, 73 Am. St. Rep. 819; Kline v. Hibbard, 29 N. Y. Supp. 807, 809, 80 Hun, 50.

A malicious abuse of legal process consists in the malicious misuse or misapplication of process to accomplish a purpose not warranted or commanded by the writ—the malicious perversion of a regularly issued process, whereby a result not lawfully or properly obtained on a writ is secured—and hence it does not include a case where the process was procured maliciously, but in which there was no abuse or misuse after its issuance. Bartlett v. Christhilf (Md.) 14 Atl. 518, 521 (citing Grainger v. Hill, 4 Bing. N. C. 212; Sommer v. Wilt [Pa.] 4 Serg. & R. 19).

MALICIOUS ACT.

A malicious act is one done without just cause, or one done with a wrongful purpose. Morrison v. Press Pub. Co., 14 N. Y. Supp. 131, 132, 59 N. Y. Super. Ct. (29 Jones & S.) 216.

Bouvier defines a malicious act as “a wrongful act, intentionally done, without cause or excuse”—the definition of Bayley, J., in Bromage v. Prosser, 4 Barn. & C. 247. Brandt v. Morning Journal Ass'n, 80 N. Y. Supp. 1002, 1004, 81 App. Div. 183.

A malicious act is one committed in a state of mind which shows a heart regardless of social duty and fatally bent on mischief—a wrongful act intentionally done, without legal justification or excuse. Bowers v. State, 7 S. W. 247, 24 Tex. App. 542, 5 Am. St. Rep. 901; High v. State, 10 S. W. 238, 241, 26 Tex. App. 545, 8 Am. St. Rep. 488.

A malicious act, in common parlance, is one proceeding from hatred or ill will, or dictated by malice, or done with wicked or mischievous intentions or motives, but, in a legal sense, a malicious act is any unlawful act done willfully or purposely to injure another. Payne v. Western & A. R. Co., 81 Tenn. (13 Lea) 507, 526, 49 Am. Rep. 666; Stansell v. Cleveland, 64 Tex. 660, 663 (citing Greenl. Ev. § 453).

A “malicious act,” within any definition of the term, necessarily includes that of willfulness, and, within the definition as applied to civil injuries, means nothing more than such acts as go to the destruction of another's legal rights, without any just cause therefor—perhaps, rather, in utter disregard of the legal rights of the injured one. Leicester v. Hoadley (Kan.) 71 Pac. 319.

MALICIOUS CONDUCT.

Malicious conduct is willful neglect of a known obligation, with reckless disregard of the consequences. United States v. Reed (U. S.) 86 Fed. 308, 312.

MALICIOUS DESERTION.

See “Willful and Malicious Desertion.”

MALICIOUS INJURY.

A malicious injury is defined to be an injury committed wantonly, willfully, or without cause. Rounds v. Detroit, L. & W. R. Co. (N. Y.) 5 Thomp. & C. 475, 481 (citing Burrill, Law Dict.).

A malicious injury includes a willful injury without just reason. MacLean v. Scripps, 17 N. W. 815, 817, 52 Mich. 214.

A malicious and willful injury is an injury that is not only willful and intentional, but, in order to create the criminal offense, it must have been done out of cruelty, hostility, or revenge. Wing v. Wing, 66 Me. 62, 64, 22 Am. Rep. 548 (citing Commonwealth v. Walden, 57 Mass. [3 Cush.] 558; Same v. Williams, 110 Mass. 401; State v. Hussey, 60 Me. 410, 11 Am. Rep. 206).

The term “malicious injury,” as used in Rev. St. 1898, § 4466a, providing that if two or more persons, who shall combine, associate, agree, mutually undertake, or counsel together for the purpose of willfully or maliciously injuring another in his reputation, trade, business, or profession, by any means whatever, or for the purpose of maliciously compelling another to do or perform any act against his will, etc., is synonymous with that term at the common law. It refers to the infliction of a wrongful injury intentionally. The term is synonymous with that term in the law of conspiracy, independent of the statute. State v. Huegin, 85 N. W. 1046, 1067, 110 Wis. 189.

MALICIOUS INTENTION.

An intention to kill unlawfully, without sufficient provocation, is a malicious intention. United States v. McGlue (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1093, 1094.

“Malicious intention,” as used in Gen. St. c. 129, § 77, relating to libels, and providing that the truth of the matter contained in the publication is a sufficient justification, unless malicious intention is proved, means an actual malicious intention, or, in other words, express malice. Lothrop v. Adams, 133 Mass. 471, 479, 43 Am. Rep. 528.

It was held in Brown v. Massachusetts Title Ins. Co., 151 Mass. 127, 23 N. E. 733, and Fay v. Harrington, 176 Mass. 270, 57 N. E. 369, that by “malicious intention” was meant malice, in the popular sense of hatred or ill will, as used in connection with libel. In consequence of the latter case, the words "actual malice" have been substituted in the act relating to libel and slander for the original words, "malicious intention." Rev. Laws, c. 173, § 91. Conner v. Standard Pub. Co., 67 N. E. 596, 598, 183 Mass. 474.

MALICIOUS MISCHIEF.

"Malicious mischief, or damage amounting to a crime, is defined by Blackstone to be an injury done either out of a spirit of wanton cruelty, or black, diabolical revenge." Commonwealth v. Williams, 110 Mass. 401, 402 (quoting 4 Bl. Comm. 244); Commonwealth v. Walden, 57 Mass. (3 Cush.) 558, 561; Duncan v. State, 49 Miss. 331, 337; People v. Petheram, 31 N. W. 188, 193, 64 Mich. 252; State v. Beekman, 27 N. J. Law (3 Dutch.) 124, 126, 72 Am. Dec. 352.

"Malicious mischief, at common law, is the willful destruction of some article of personal property from actual ill will or resentment towards its owner." People v. Petheram, 31 N. W. 188, 193, 64 Mich. 252.

Malicious mischief is defined by Wharton to be any malicious or mischievous physical injury to the rights of another or those of the public in general. State v. Foote, 43 Atl. 488, 490, 71 Conn. 737.

Malicious mischief is the wanton or reckless destruction of or injury to property. In some cases it implies a wrong inflicted on another with an evil intent or purpose. First Nat. Bank v. Burkett, 101 Ill. 391, 394, 40 Am. Rep. 209.

Malicious mischief done to any kind of property is a misdemeanor, and the party doing the injury may be prosecuted criminally. People v. Upton, 9 N. Y. Supp. 684, 685, 55 Hun, 612.

It has been generally held that any formed design of doing mischief is called "malicious," whether the mischief be intended to fall upon a particular person, or upon any person who may be within its range. State v. Dowdell, 31 South. 151, 152, 106 La. 645.

"Malicious mischief," to be indictable, consists in the willful destruction of some article of personal property from actual ill will or resentment towards its owner or possessor. State v. Robinson, 20 N. O. 129, 131, 32 Am. Dec. 661.

The act in the case of malicious mischief must proceed from malice, and, according to the general doctrine, the malice must be against the owner of the property, and not against another person or against the property itself; it not being sufficient when a man kills an animal out of ill will to it. Therefore one who kills stock found trespassing in his enclosure is not guilty of malicious mischief. Thomas v. State, 30 Ark. 433, 435.

Malicious mischief does not include the maiming or wounding of an animal either at common law, or under the statutory law of New Jersey. State v. Beekman, 27 N. J. Law (3 Dutch.) 124, 125, 72 Am. Dec. 352.

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION.

False imprisonment distinguished, see "False Imprisonment."

A malicious prosecution is a prosecution on some charge of crime which is willful, wanton, or reckless, or against the prosecutor's sense of duty and right, or for ends he knows or is bound to know are wrong and against the dictates of public policy. Fox v. Smith (R. I.) 55 Atl. 698, 699.

Malicious prosecution is a judicial proceeding by one person against another from wrongful or improper motives and without probable cause to sustain it. The term "malicious prosecution" imports a causeless, as well as an ill-intended, prosecution. Hicks v. Brantley, 102 Ga. 264, 268, 29 S. E. 459, 460 (citing Newell, Mal. Pros. § 5).

A prosecution is malicious when actuated by hostile or vindictive motive, provided there is always a lack of probable cause. A prosecution instituted willfully and purposely to gain some advantage to the prosecutor, or out of mere wantonness or carelessness, if it be at the same time wrongful and unlawful within the knowledge of the actor, and without probable cause, is in legal contemplation malicious. Eggett v. Allen, 96 N. W. 803, 805, 119 Wis. 625.

An action for malicious prosecution is defined by Lord Mansfield as a prosecution of the plaintiff for doing something which, upon the stating of it, is manifestly legal. Johnson v. Girdwood, 28 N. Y. Supp. 151, 152, 7 Misc. Rep. 651.

To maintain an action for malicious prosecution, it must appear that there was no probable cause for the prosecution, and also that the defendant was actuated by malice in instituting the prosecution. There must be both want of probable cause and malice. Harpham v. Whitney, 77 Ill. 32, 38; Dempsey v. State, 11 S. W. 372, 373, 27 Tex. App. 269; Brelet v. Mullen, 44 La. Ann. 194, 10 South. 865 (cited in Enders v. Boisseau, 27 South. 546, 548, 52 La. Ann. 1020); Lewton v. Hower (Fla.) 16 South. 616, 618; Medical v. Brooklyn Life Ins. Co., 45 Md. 198, 205; Culbertson v. Cabeen, 29 Tex. 247, 255.

In order to entitle plaintiff to recover in an action for malicious prosecution three things must concur: (1) The motive of the party instituting or prosecuting the suit or proceeding must have been malicious; (2) the suit or proceeding complained of must have been instituted without proper cause; (3) the suit or proceeding must have terminated in the plaintiff's favor. Lauzon v. Charroux, 28 Atl. 975, 976, 18 R. I. 467; Collins v. Campbell (R. L.) 31 Atl. 832; Sweptson v. Davis, 70 S. W. 65, 67, 109 Tenn. 99, 59 L. R. A. 501.

In malicious prosecution there are two essential elements, namely, that no probable cause existed for instituting the prosecution or suit complained of, and that such prosecution or suit terminated in some way favorably to the defendant therein. Frisbie v. Morris, 55 Atl. 9, 75 Conn. 637.

In order to maintain an action for the malicious prosecution of a civil suit, it is not sufficient that the charge made against the person injured by it is false and groundless; but the action must be commenced maliciously and with an intent to injure and oppress defendant. Brush v. Burt, 3 N. J. Law (2 Penning.) 979, 981.

Malice is one of the necessary elements to make out a cause for malicious prosecution, and what proof is sufficient to establish malice is a question for the jury. Moody v. Deutsch, 85 Mo. 237, 243.

A prosecution is malicious when purposely wrong and without justifiable cause. Johnson v. Ebberts (U. S.) 11 Fed. 129, 131.

If the imprisonment is under legal process, but the action has been commenced and carried on maliciously and without probable cause, it is "malicious prosecution." In such an action the imprisonment cannot be false, for it is upon lawful process, and hence by lawful authority. Gelzenleuchter v. Niemeyer, 25 N. W. 442, 444, 64 Wis. 316, 54 Am. Rep. 616.

Where an imprisonment is under legal process, but the prosecution has been commenced and carried on maliciously and without probable cause, terminating in the discharge of the defendant, it is "malicious prosecution," and not false imprisonment. Rich v. McInery, 15 South. 663, 665, 103 Ala. 345, 49 Am. St. Rep. 32.

An action for malicious prosecution, and not an action for assault and false imprisonment, is the proper remedy when an arrest is made by a duly qualified officer, under process fair on its face and issued from a court of competent jurisdiction; the suit being based on a failure to enter the writ in court. Lisabelle v. Hubert, 50 Atl. 837, 23 R. I. 456.

Malicious prosecution is not limited to criminal suits. Hayes v. Union Mercantile Co., 70 Pac. 975, 979, 27 Mont. 264.

The term "malicious prosecution," as used in Rev. St. art. 302, limiting the right of a party to bring an action for malicious prosecution, refers only to a criminal proceeding, and not to a prosecution as involved in a civil action. Bear v. Marks, 63 Tex. 298, 300.

Malicious abuse of process distinguished.

The authorities upon the question of what in law constitutes a cause of action for abuse of process are certainly in a state of some confusion, and frequently this action seems to have been confounded with actions for malicious prosecution, although they are essentially different actions. The test is whether the process has been used to accomplish some unlawful end, or to compel the defendant to do some collateral thing which he could not legally be compelled to do. Docter v. Reidel, 96 Wis. 158, 71 N. W. 119, 120, 37 L. R. A. 580, 65 Am. St. Rep. 40.

As stated in Hale, Torts, p. 361, "malicious abuse of process" is distinguished from "malicious prosecution" in at least two respects: First, in that want of probable cause is not an essential element; and, second, that it is not essential that the original proceeding shall have terminated. If a plaintiff bring suit in a justice court on a valid demand, and upon the return day, instead of joining issue, discontinues the action and sues over, and then repeats the performance several times without any excuse, and solely for the purpose of vexing and harassing the defendant, it is unquestioned that the defendant may recover the damages occasioned him by the improper use of the process of the court. Paul v. Fargo, 82 N. Y. Supp. 369, 373, 84 App. Div. 9 (citing Pangburn v. Bull [N. Y.] 1 Wend. 345).

An action or proceeding instituted against another from wrongful or improper motives and without proper cause is a malicious prosecution. There is a distinction between a malicious prosecution and a malicious abuse of process, and one who, after notice from highway commissioners, refuses to remove an obstruction placed by him in a highway, and resists the commissioners, cannot sue them for malicious prosecution in having him arrested because of such resistance. Kline v. Hibbard, 29 N. Y. Supp. 807, 809, 80 Hun. 50.

MALICIOUS PUBLICATION.

A publication, qualified or privileged, is malicious in the law of slander and libel, if it is not in good faith. If not made for the reason which renders it privileged, but from a wrongful, indirect, and ulterior motive, and it is false, it is malicious. Gattis v. Kilgo, 38 S. E. 931, 933, 128 N. C. 402.

MALICIOUS TRESPASS.

By a statute of Indiana whoever maliciously or mischievously injures or causes to be injured any property of another, or any public property, is guilty of malicious trespass. State v. McKee, 10 N. E. 405, 406, 109 Ind. 497.

If one takes the property of another and converts it to his own use, and the taking is for that purpose, he cannot be convicted of "malicious trespass" ordinarily, because there would be an absence of that malicious injury which is a necessary ingredient in such case. The act of taking a saddle from another's horse and wantonly destroying it constitutes a malicious trespass. Hannel v. State, 4 Ind. App. 485, 486, 30 N. E. 1118, 1119.
